

ACTES and Monuments of matters most speciall and memorable, happenyng in the Church, with an Vniuersall history of the same, wherein is set forth at large the whole race and course of the Church, from the primitiue age to these latter tymes of ours, with the bloudy times, horrible troubles, and great persecutions agaynst the true Martyrs of Christ, sought and wrought as well by Heathen Emperours, as nowe lately practised by Romish Prelates, especially in this Realme of England and Scotland.

Newly reuised and recognised, partly also augmented, and now the fourth time agayne published and recommended to the studious Reader, by the Authour (through the helpe of Christ our Lord) IOHN FOXE, which desireth thee good Reader to helpe him with thy Prayer.

Ad Dominum Iesum Christum Seruatorem clementissimum, Eucharisticon. Ioan. Foxi.

CONFECTO NVNC OPERE, QVOD TVIS PRIMVM AVSPICIjs ac voluntate aggressus (summe & adorande Iesu, idem{que} Seruator clementissime) inchoavi, quod{que} tuo demum beneficio ao fauore exegi atque absolui, praeter omnem certam opinionem & vires meas: superest itaque pro officio meo, vt animula haec, ceu pro votiua tabula, gratias, si non quantas debeat (vtinam enim id posset) at quantas queat maximè, munificentissimae tuae persoluat maiestati: quae tam miserum homuncionem, vel syphar potius hominis, in laboribus tot tantisque istis, qui vel asellum quemuis 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 possent conficere, tumultuantem, benigno successu ac solatio tam clementer suffulcerit. Quanquam autem de operis difficultate nihil hic causari attinet, quae vix aestimari à multis poterit: tua tamen non ignorat omnipotens maiestas, huius, quaecunque sit, negoti• confectio quibus quan{que} non ferendis curis, vigili•s, molestijs constitit: Quibus nullo modo pares futuri essemus, nisi fauentis gratiae tuae numen affluisset, ac sese quodam modo admiscuisset operi.* Quid ni enim fatear ac tester ingenuè, quod re ipsa experti sumus. Persensimus enim, penèque oculis ipsis conspeximus, singularem excelsae dexteræ tuae 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, non modo in successu negotij prouehendo, sed in vita etiam spiritû{que} inter labores, conseruando. Tui igitur muneris est (clementissime Iesu) quod opus tuis susceptum auspicijs huc vsque prouectum sit. Nos vicissim quod nostri sit officij, gratias clementiae tuae, cum nostro priuatim, tum publico quodammodo ecclesiae tuae nomine, agimus. Vel hinc enim cernimus quanti causam Martyrum tuorum aestimes, quando eorum illustrando nomini tanta faueas propensione. Quanquam verò si nulla hic extaret eorum recordatio, non possent non omnibus modis esse illustrissimi, quorum sint nomina vitae tuae libro inscripta. Et tamen voluit hoc modo tua declarare maiestas, nobis{que} innotescere hominibus, quàm honorificum sit pro tui nominis gloria fortiter dimicantes occumbere, quorum tu vitam à cinere ac rogo sic vindicas, sic causam tueris, sic dignitatem illustras, vt eandem multo cum gloriae foenore abs te recipiat clariorè, quam si ipsi nunquam alioqui perdidissent. Habet siquidem peculiare hoc sibi militiae tuae ratio, longe à mūdo hoc diuersum, quòd in castris tuis militantes siue viuant, tibi viuant, siue moriantur, multò clarescant a funere foelicius, quàm si vixissent maximè.

Sic Cranmerum videmus,* Riddleum, Latimerum, Iohannem Hooperum, Bradfordum, caeteros{que} eiusdem decuriae pugiles, quanto maiore occubuisse cum gloria in acie tua depugnantes, quàm si relictæ statione, in qua erant collocati, saluti ipsi suae causam tuam postposuissent. Quae enim gens, quae lingua, quae natio, quae temporum vetustas, quae hominum posteritas eorum non cantabit laudes, non virtutem agnoscet, non magnitudinem admirabitur? Quis Wicleuum vnquam, aut Cobhamum natum fuisse existimasset, nisi tua in causa tam egissent strenuè? Quanto honori illud Hussio Bohemensi, nostro{que} Tindallo fuit, quod vitam in Euangelij tui causa perditam, magis abs te recipere, quam ipsi retinere maluerint? Spectemus è diuersa parte aduersarios tuos, quorum tam multas esse constat caedes, iniurias, crudelitates aduersus tuos, multá{que} item occultè & scelestè ab ijsdem perpetrata, quae nūquam sperabant fore palam: Et tamen quid vnquam in angulis & tenebris ab illis est designatum tam occultè aduersus Ecclesiam, quod non in apricum tua produxit producet{que} prouidentia? atque ita produxit, vt vnde ipsi laudis sibi conceperunt animo opinionem, inde summum sibi ipsis dedecus pepererint & contumeliam, quam nec vita effugere, nec morte vnquam finire poterint. Quis Guisios, Boneros, Storios, Gardineros, tanquam execranda hominum nomina nunc non nouit? non exhorret, quis eorum facinora obliterabit dies, aut sepeliet memoria? Et quid hos in tanta multitudine hostium tuorum recenseo? * Cui vnquam prospere cessit tuo rebellare numini, aut hostem se ecclesiae tuae profiteri? Papae nomen quàm erat aliquando in his terris celebre & gloriosum? Nunc quid putidius, quid probrosius? Cardinalitium fastigium coeperunt primo admirari homines, multàque prosequi reuerentia: * Sic Monachorum & Nonnarum collegia suum quondam habebant plausum apud plebem simplicem & credulam: At postquam spreta veritate tua caeperunt grassari contra te, tuorum{que} homicidae fieri eo tandem sunt prolapsi (exceptis paucis quos tua exemit gratia) vt reliqua fex nihil aliud iam esse praeter vocabula quaedam ad ignominiam relictà videatur.

Haec nimirum (sanctissime domine ac deus noster) iustissimi iudicij tuisunt praeludia, ex quo haud difficile aestimare sit, quidnam in altero illo expectaturi sint, quos in hoc ipso seculo, hoc est in suo ipsorū regno, tanta accumules infamia & dedecore. Sed omissis his, ad sanctos tuos redeamus Martyres, quorum nomine, merito à nobis perenne velut sacrificium laudis & gratiarum tuae debetur, simul & habetur, bonitati. Primum quòd in ecclesiae tuae causa dimicantibus tam fortem & alacrem spiritum [unspec 1] omnibus{que} tormentis maiorem aduersus parricidas Papistas subministrasti. Deinde quòd & nobis [unspec 2] [unspec 3] in illorum desudantibus historia propitius adeò clementiae tuae fauor affuerit. Debetur & hoc priuatim meo quoque nomine singulari tuae pietati, quòd vitam toties alioqui nutantem, in hac tanta, [unspec 4] quantam tu solus nouisti, laboris immensitate conseruatam tuo volueris beneficio. Verum illud inprimis omnes debemus pariter effusissimo tuo in nos amorì, quòd beatorum Martyrum tuorum, quos mundi huius ad flammās & cineres adegerit peruersitas, causam & innocentiam velut è cinere recollectam, in lucem denuò notitiam{que} ecclesiae tuae reuocare at patefacere dignatus sis. Etsi enim dubium non est, quin in supremo illo iudicio tuo, quum virtutes coelorum mouebuntur, omnis eorum ad amussim excutietur causa ante tribunal tuum, est tamen aliquid hîc quo{que} in ecclesia tua causam ipsorum, facta, vitae{que} virtutes caeteras non ignorari. Tunc autem ad illos vberior gloria, ad nos interea maior redundabit fructus, quando ex ipsorum rectè factis, integritate, innocentia, fide ac patientia constar• poterit, non quid ipsi solum fecerint, sed quid & nobis eorum sit exemplo faciendum.

Sed hic rursus (dulcissime Iesu) opus est benigno fauoris tui praesidio. Nos enim qui filij Martyrum tuorum sumus, * quosque maximè maiores nostros imitari conueniebat, nunc nihil serè parentum tenemus, praeter vitae solam hanc, quam suo partam sanguine reliquerunt, libertatem: qua etiam ipsa nimium abutimur intemperanter, vtiam periculum sit, ne non filij modò Martyrum, sed ne fratres quidem ipsorum haberi mereamur. Quantum enim intersit discriminis, quam{que} prorsus disconuenit ordine toto nostra consuetudo ab illorum vestigijs & disciplina, pudet profectò referre. Sed quid ego tibi referam, cuius nihil non perspicit maiestas ac intuetur? Quanto illis studio ac curae fuit amore tui, caetera quae{que}, adeo{que} seipsos ad vitae etiam contemptum abdicare, mundum cum omnibus desideriis floccifacere, voluptates tanquam nugās spernere? Nec sinebant pericula vndi{que} imminetia opibus congerendis multo{que} minus honoribus cumulandis vacare. Contra verò nostra nunc vita, studium, omnis{que} adeò contentio, quid nisi mundum spirat, quid aliud quàm perpetuum quoddam fluxarum rerum, opum, ac honorum aucupium videtur & ambitus? At illi quam praeclarè secum actum putassent, si vel viuere modò licuisset. Ideo{que} multi fuere eorū qui Mariae Reginae facultates & possessiones omnes adus{que} extremum assem obtulerūt, * dum•do solam ipsis remitteret conscientiam. Et quae nos tanta haec habendi intemperies exagitat, quibus nec vnus nec mediocris victus possit esse satis? Sine modo, sine fine opibus, sacerdotijs, censui{que} dilatando inhiamus. Quanto ambitu amicos fatigamus & inimicos, non vt viuamus solum, verum vt sublimes viuamus & honorati? De fide, de mansuetudine eorum, tolerantia, simplicitate, ac patientia incredibili, quid dici satis potest? Quanta constantia, qua animi alacritate perpassi sunt quicquid infligebatur, vindictam omnem deo remittentes, cui & causam commendabant? Nulla vis eos aduersariorum deijcere, nec minae frangere, non ludibria mouere, non pericula, non tormenta vlla consternere, nec delinire blanditiae potuerunt.

Componamus nunc nostram cum his mollitiem. Sed pudor prohibet, Nam quae tam leuis nos tentationis aura afflare possit, quae non illico praecipites ac transuersos rapiat in auaritiam, in fastum, voluptates, turpitudinem, vindictam, & in quid non malorum? Quae tam leuis obijci poterit iniuriola, pro qua non coelum terrae miscemus, maria{que} turbamus ab imo? Ex quo in promptu est colligere, quantum ab eo absumus, vt mortem simus vnquam, tua causa subituri, siquando res Martyrium flagitet, quum nec affectus quidem istos tuo amputare iussu velimus.*
Quapropter vt Martyrum quidem illorum causa gratias agimus nomini tuo sancto: ita nostra vicissim causa deprecamur, vt qui largitus sis ipsis vincendi facultatem, nobis itidem pia eorundem exempla imitandi foelicitatem aspires: sicque ecclesiae tuae affulgeat tua gratia, necubi seducti huius mundi illecebris, secordiores ipsi in retinenda Euangelij tui victoria, quam illi in comparanda strenui, videamur. Postremo quoniam historiam hanc tuo nutu ac voluntate aggressi, in ea re operam studium{que} posuimus, quo facta gestaue sanctorum tuorum (sanctissime Iesu) ad nominis tui gloriam, & in commodum ecclesiae publicum emergerent, adde nunc labori fructum, simul{que} historiae tutelam in te recipias magnopere petimus, cui & opus ipsum, totum{que} meipsum, quem tot modis tuae misericordiae debeo, toto corpore & anima, totis{que} viribus commendo, dedico, consecroque, cui omne cadat genu, omnisque vox & lingua confessionis gloriam per omnes ecclesias tribuat personetque. Amen.

To the Right Vertuous, most Excellent and Noble Princesse, Queene ELIZABETH, our dread Lady, by the grace of God, Queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, Defender of Christes Faith and Gospell, and principall
Gouernour both of the Realme, and also ouer the sayd Churche of England and Ireland, vnder Christ the Supreme head of the same▪ &c. Iohn Foxe her humble subiect wisheth daily increase of Gods holy spirite and Grace, with long raigne, perfect health, and ioyfull peace, to gouerne hys flocke committed to her charge, to the example of all good Princes, the comforte of his Churche, and glory of hys blessed name.

CHRIST the Prince of all Princes, who hath placed you in your throne of Maiestie, vnder him to gouerne the Church and Realme of England, geue your royall highnesse long to sit, and many yeares to raigne ouer vs, in all flourishing felicitie, to his gracious pleasure, and long lasting ioy of all your subiects. Amen.

When I first presented these ACTES and MONVMENTES vnto your Maiestie (most deare Soueraigne Queene ELIZABETH, our peaceable SALOME) which your Maiesties rare clemencie receiued in such gentle part: I well hoped that these my trauailes in this kynd of writing had bene well at an ende, whereby I might haue returned my studies agayne to other purposes after myne owne desire, more fitte then to write histories, especially in the English tong. But certaine euill disposed persons, of intemperant tongues, aduersaries to good procedings, would not suffer me so to rest, fuming and fretting, and raising vp such miserable exclamations at the first appearing of the booke, as was wonderfull to heare. A man would haue thought Christ to haue bene new borne agayne, and that Herode with all the Citie of Ierusalem had bene in an vprore. Such blustering and stirring was then against that poore booke thorough all quarters of England, euen to the gates of Louaine: so that no English Papist almost in all the Realme thoght himselfe a perfect Catholike, vnlesse he had cast out some word or other to geue that booke a blow.

Whereupon, considering with my selfe what should moouue them thus to rage, first I beganne with more circumspect diligence to ouerlooke agayne that I had done. In searching whereof, I found the fault both what it was, and where it lay: which was in deede, not so much in the Booke it selfe (to say the truth) as in an other certayne priuy mysterie and working of some: of whome Ioannes Auentinus shall tel vs in his own words, & shew vs who they be: Quibus, inquit, audiendi quae fecerint, pudor est: nullus faciendi, quae audire erubescunt. Illic vbi opus nihil verentur: hic vbi nihil opus est, ibi verentur. &c. Who beyng ashamed belike to heare their worthy stratagemes lyke to come to light, sought by what meanes they might, the stopping of the same. And because they could not worke it per brachium seculare, by publike authoritie (the Lord of heauen long preserue your noble Maiestie) they renewed again an old wonted practise of theirs: doying in like sort herein as they did sometymes with the holy Bible in the dayes of your renowned father of famous memory king Henry the viij. who when they neither by manifest reason could gainstand the matter contained in the booke, nor yet abide the comming out thereof, then sought they by a subtile deuised traine to deprauē the translation, notes and Prologues thereof, bearing the king in hand and all the people, that there was in it a thousand lies, and I cannot tell how many mo: Not that there were such lies in it in very deede: but because the comming of that booke should not bewray their lying falshood, therefore they thought best to begin first to make exceptions themselues against it: playing in their stage like as Phormio did in the old Comedie, who beyng in all the fault himselfe, began first to quarell with Demipho, when Demipho rather had good right to lay Phormio by the heeles.

With like facing brags these Catholike Phormiones thinke now to dash out all good bookes, and amongst others also, these Monuments of Martyrs. Which godly Martyrs as they could not abide beyng aliue, so neither can they now suffer their memories to lyue after their death, least the acts of them beyng knowne, might bring perhaps their wicked acts and cruell murthers to detestation: and therfore spurne they so vehemently against this booke of histories, with all kind of contumelies and vprores, railing and wondering vpon it, much like as I haue heard of a company of thieues, who in robbing a certaine true man by the high wayes side, when they had found a piece of gold or two about him more then he would be acknown of, they cried out of the falshood of the world, meruailing and complaining what little truth was to be found in men.

Euen so these men deale also with me: for when they themselues altogether delight in vntruths, and haue replenished the whole Church of Christ with fained fables, lying miracles, false visions, miserable errors contained in their Missals and Portuses, Breuiars, and Summaries, and almost no true tale in all their Saintes lyues and Festiuals, as now also no great truthes in our Louanian bookes, &c. Yet notwithstanding, as though they were a people of much truth, and that the world did not perceiue them, they pretend a face and zeale of great veritie: And as though there were no histories els in all the world corrupted, but onely this history of Actes and Monumentes, with tragicall voyces they exclaime and wonder vpon it, sparing no cost of Hyperbolicall phrases, to make it appeare as full of lies as lines. &c. much after the like sort of impudencie as Sophisters vse sometymes in their Sophismes to doe (and sometimes is vsed also in Rhetorike) that when an Argument commeth against them which they cannot well resolue in deed, they haue a rule to shift of the matter with stoute wordes and tragicall admiration, whereby to dash the Opponent out of countenance, bearing the hearers in hand, the same to be the weakest & slenderest argument that euer was heard not worthy to be answered, but vtterly to be hissed out of the Schooles.

With like sophistication these also fare with me, who when they neither can abide to heare their owne doings declared, nor yet deny the same, which they heare to be true for three or foure escapes in the booke committed (and yet some of them in the said Booke amended) they neither reading the whole, nor rightly vnderstanding that they read, inueigh and maligne so peruersly the setting out therof, as though neither any word in al that story were true, nor any other story false in al the world besides. And yet in accusing these my accusers, I do not so excuse my self, nor defend my book, as though nothing in it were to be sponged or amended. Therefore I haue taken these paines, & reiterated my labours in trauiailing out the story again, doying herein as Penelope did with her web, vntwisting that she had done before: Or as builders do sometimes, which build and take down againe, either to transpose the fashion, or to make the foundation larger. So in recognising this history I haue employed a little more labour, partly to enlarge the argument which I tooke in hand: partly also to assay, whether by any paynes taking I might pacifie the stomacks, or satisfie y^e iudgments of these importune quarellers: which neuerthelesse I feare I shall not do, when I haue done all I can. For well I know that all the heads of this hissing Hidra will neuer be cut of, though I were as strong as Hercules. And if Apelles the skilfull Painter, when he had bestowed all his cunning vpon a piece of worke, which no good artificer would or could greatly reprocue, yet was not without some controlling Sutor, which tooke vpon him Vltra crepidam, much more may I looke for the like in these controlling dayes.*

Neuerthelesse committing the successe thereof vnto the Lord, I haue aduentured againe vpon this story of the Church, and haue spent not onely my paines, but also almost my health therein, to bring it to this. Which now beyng finished, like as before I did: so againe I exhibite and present the same vnto your Princely Maiestie, blessing my Lord my God with all my heart: first for this libertie of peace and tyme, which through your peaceable gouernement he hath lent vnto vs for the gathering both of this and other like bookes, tractations and monuments requisite to the behoofe of his Church, which hitherto by iniquitie of tyme could not be contriued in any Kinges raigne since the Conquest, before these Alcion dayes of yours.

Secondly, as we are all bound with publicke voyces to magnify our God for this happy preservation of your royall estate: so priuately for mine owne part, I also acknowledge my selfe bound to my God and to my Sauour, who so graciously in such weake health, hath lent me time, both to finish this worke, and also to offer the second dedication thereof to your Maiesty: desiring the same to accept in worth t^o donation thereof, if not for the worthinesse of the thing geuen, yet as a testification of the bounden seruice and good will of one, which by this he here presenteth, declareth what he would, if he had better to geue.

And though the story being written in the popular tongue, serueth not so greatly for your own peculiar reading, nor for such as be learned: yet I shall desire both you and them, to consider in it the necessity of the ignoraunt flocke of Christ committed to your gouernement in this Realme of England. Who, as they haue bene long led in ignorance, and wrapt in blindenesse for lacke specially of Gods word, and partly also for wanting the light of history, pity I thought but that such should be helped, their ignoraunce relieued, and simplicity instructed. I considered they were the flocke of Christ, and your subiectes, belonging to your account and charge, bought with the same price and hauing as deare soules to the Lord as other. And though they be but simple and vnlearned, yet not vnapt to be taught if they were applied. Furthermore what inconuenience groweth of ignoraunce, where knowledge lacketh, both I considered: and experience dayly teacheth.

And therefore hearing of the vertuous inclination of your Maiesty, what a prouident care, & Zeale full of solicitude you haue, minding (speedely I trust) to furnish all quarters & countreyes of this your realme with the voice of Christes Gospel, & faythful preaching of his word, I thought also not vnprofitable to adioyne vnto this your godly proceedinges, and to the office of the ministry, the knowledge also of Ecclesiasticall history, which in my minde ought not to be separate from the same: that like as by the one the people may learne the rules and preceptes of doctrine so by the other they may haue examples of Gods mighty working in his Church, to the confirmation of their fayth,* and the edification of Christian life. For as we see what light and profite commeth to the Church by histories in olde times set forth of the Iudges, Kinges, Machabees, & the Actes of the Apostles after Christes time: so likewise may it redound to no small vse in the Church, to knowe the Actes of Christes Martirs now since the time of the Apostles.

Besides other manifolde examples and experimentes of Gods great mercies and iudgementes in preseruing his Church,* in ouerthrowing tyrauntes, in confounding pride, in altering states & kingdomes, in conseruing Religion against errorrs and dissentions, in relieuing the godly, in brideling the wicked, in losing and tying vp againe of Sathan the disturber of common weales, in punishing transgressions as well against the first table as the second: wherein is to be seene Idolatry punished, blasphemy plagued, contempt of Gods holy name and religion reuenged, murder with murder rewarded, Adulterers & Wedlockbreakers destroied, periuries, extortions, couetous, oppressions, and fraudulent counsels come to nought, with other excellent workes of the Lord: the obseruing and noting whereof in histories, minister to the readers therof wholesome admonitions of life: with experience and wisdom both to know God in his workes, and to worke the thing that is godly: especially to seeke vnto the sonne of God for their saluation, & in his fayth onely to finde that they seeke for, and in no other meanes. The continuance and constancy of which fayth, the Lord of his grace and goodnes graunt to your noble Maiesty, and to his whole beloued Church, and all the members of the same, to euerlasting life. Amen.

Ad doctum Lectorem Ioh. Foxus.

COgitanti mihi, versantique mecum in animo quàm peri•ulosa res aleae sit, emittere nunc aliquid in publicum, quod in man•s oculósque multorū subeat, his praesertim tam exulceratis moribus temporibús{que}, vbi tot hominum dissidijs, tot studijs partium, tot morosis capitibus, tam rigidis censuris, & Criticorum sannis feruent ferè omnia, vt difficillimum sit quicquā tam circumspectè scribere, quod non in aliquam calumniandi materiam rapiatur: perbeati profectò foelicésque videnturij, quibus eum vitae cursū tenere liceat, vt in otio viuentes cum dignitate, sic alienis frui queant laboribus, velut in theatro ociosi sedentes spectatores, vt nullum interim ipsis uel ex actione taedium, vel ex labore periculum metuendum sit. Me vero nescio quo pacto longe diuersa quidem hactenus exercuit vitae ratio, quippe cui nec fortunae illam foelicitatem, in cuius complexibus tam multos suauiter foueri video, nec otij amoenitatem experiri, vix etiam per omnem vitam degustare in continuo laborum ac negotiorum feruore ac contentione contigerit. Quanquam de fortuna parum queror, quam semper contempsì, quin neque de laboribus multum dicturus, si modo lobores ij, tantum vel prodesse vel placere caeteris possent hominibus, quantum me priuatim atterunt incommodántque. Nuncad meae infoelicitatis cumulum accedit in super, quod in eo argumenti genere laborandum fuit, quod praeter lugubrem rerum ipsarum materiam, praeter linguae inamoenitatem, praeter tractandi difficultatem, quae vix nitorem recipiat orationis, eo porro autorem ipsum redigit angustiae, vt neque falsa narrare sine iniuria historiae, nec verum dicere sine magna sua inuidia odi• que multorum liceat. Nam cum in eo historiae argumento mihi versandum fuit, quod non ad superiorum modo temporū res gestas altéque repetitas pertineat, sed hanc ipsam aetatem nostram, nostraeque gentis nunc homines etiamnum praesentes, viuósque sic attingat, sic perfricet, sic designet, quemadmodum in hoc materiae genere necessario faciundum fuit: quaeso quid híc mihi aliud expectandum sit, nisi postquā frustrà me defatigando, valetudinem attriuerim, oculos perdiderim, senium acciuerim, corpus exhauserim, demum vt post haec omnia multorum me hominum odijs, sibilis, inuidiae ac calumniae exponam. In tot istis asperitatibus cum nihil me tutum praestare poterit, non Caesar, non Monarchae, non Rex, non Regina, non vlla huius mundi praesidia, preter solam diuini numinis potentem deteram: principiò igitur atque ante omnia huc ceu ad tutissimum asylum me recepi, huic me librúmque commendaui & commendo. Tum vero insuper in eodem domino tuum illum candorem (docte piéque Lector) eāque tuam humanitatem appellare vol•i, qua ex humanioribus literis studiisque te scio praeditum, quo nostris his fudoribus tuae approbation ••cedat calculus, aut si approbationem non mereamur, saltem ne fauoris desit benignitas: cui si appro•atum iri hanc historiae nostrae farraginem senserimus, caeterorum iudicia obtrectatorum leuius feremus.

Nam alioquì non defuturos sat scio qui varijs modis nobis facessent molestiam. Habebit hic momus suos morsus, sycophanta suos sibilos, nec deerit Calumniatori sua lingua & aculeus, quem infigat. Hic fidem detrahet historiae. Ille artificium in tractando, alter diligentiam, vel in excutiendis rebus iudicium desiderabit. Illi forsán operis displicebit moles, vel minus disposita seruâtāque temporum ratio. Et si nihil horum fuerit, attamen in tanta religionis pugna, in tanta iudiciorum, capitum, sēsuum varietate, vbi suae quisque fauet ac blanditur factioni, quid tam affabrè aut circumspectè enarra•i potest, quod placeat vniuersis? Quin & iam nunc mussitari etiam audio a nonnullis, qui longa sese teneri dicant expectatione, quoad haec tandem (Legenda nostra vt appellant Aurea) euulganda sit: qui si nostram primùm in eo tarditatem repraehensam velint, nae ego suaues istos homines vicissim rogatos velim, vt ipsi prius in edendis suis se praebeant expeditiores, quam alienam incessant lentitudinem.

Deinde si tardius exeat ipsorum opinione volumen, meminerint prouerbiali praecepto, lentam esse festinationem oportere. Et bos dicitur lassus fortius pedem figere. Egimus in hac quidem re pro virili nostra, egimus spero & pro officio, si non satis pro temporis modo expeditè, at egimus certè pro valetudine, addam porro, egimus supra valetudinem. Quin & illud ipsorum venia adijcere liceat, egisse nos maturius quam ipsis forsitan expediet, qui in hunc nugantur modū: certè maturatius egimus, quam tanti momenti & magnitudinis negotio conueniebat, quod accuratiorem in digerendis rebus moram curam{que} postulabat, cū a nobis vix integros datos esse menses octodecim praeparandae materiae, comportandis componendis{que} rebus, conferendis exemplaribus, lectitandis codicibus, rescribendis his quae scripto mandata erant, castigandis formulis, concinnandae historiae, & in ordinē redigendae. &c, noueruntij qui testes adfuerint, & temporis conscij; & laboris socij. Quòd si autem Legendae suae aureae titulum huc eò accomodant, quòd illius exemplo hanc similiter fabulosam putent historiam, hinc que odioso vocabulo eius preiudicent veritati, quid his respondeam aliud quam quòd ingen•iè suam ipsi prodant calumniam, quam ne ad editionem quidem libri differre queant, prius de rebus dijudicantes quam nouerint. At{que} interim quidem illud bene habet quòd ipsis tandem aliquando Aureae suae legendae pudeat tam fabulosae. Et tamen fabellis illis non puduit mundum tam diu ludificare, periculum etiam intentantes his, si qui Legendae illi, hoc est, menda cissimis illorum nugis auderent detrahere. Quare cum nihil magis esse possit impium quam sacrosanctam ecclesiae fidem fabulamentis huiusmodi confictisque praeter omnem veri fidem delirijs commaculare, tamen ineptissimi isti nugatores ex suo ingenio caeteros quòsque scriptores metientes, nec ipsi verum adferre satagunt, nec afferentibus alijs fidem habendam putāt, cuncta videlicet suis aureis somnijs similia existimantes. Quin apagè cum Aureatua legenda, nugator impudens, quem ego librum, cum omnes cum scimus, nec ipse ignoras prodigiosis mendaciorum portentis & vanissimis vndique commentis scatere, ne cū Homeri quidē fabulis conferre velim: tantum abest vt cū verè serijs grauib us{que} ecclesiae historijs quicquam commune habeat. Quid? an quia Papistis illis tuis & impuris monachis sic libuit in ridiculis miraculorum suorum portentis ineptire, tu protinus nullam grauem historiae auctoritatem putas in ecclesia admittendam? Quin eadem lege & de Eusebij ecclesiastica, & tripartita Sozomeni & Socratis caeterorūque historijs iudicemus. Sunt praeter haec & alia quaedam de Sanctis & Diuis conscripta miracula, quae proprius ad Legendam hanc accedunt, & tamen nequa{que} eo loco apud nos habentur, vt Legendae illi Papisticae annumerentur, etiam quae suspectissimae sunt fidei. Quan{que} de scriptoribus caeteris mea nihil interest censuram ferre. Quòd ad hanc verò nostram 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 attinet, testatum id velim vniuersis, datam esse a nobis operam fedulò ne quid vsquam inesset operi fabulosum, aut eiusmodi, quod vel a nobis fictum, vel quod Legendae illi aureae (magis dicam plumbeae) non vndique foret dissimillimum. Id quod res ipsa & natiua historiae facies testari poterit, cuius tota textura ex ipsis Episcoporum Archiuis atque Registris, partimque ex proprijs martyrum ipsorum literis hausta ac cōflata videri poterit. In qua historia etsi neque id exigam vt singula hic {pro}oraculis habeantur, at dedimus tamen pro virili operam vt si non plenè assequeremur, accederemus tamen quam proximè ad veterē illam historiae legem, vt duas res, prae cipuas historiae pestes vitaremus, timorem uidelicet & assentationem: quarum altera saepe minus dicit, altera semper plus addit quàm par est, narrationi. Sed huius rei fidem ex ipso magis opere, quam ex mea commendatione astrui honestius est. Habet enim veritas ipsa simplicem suam & natiuam faciem, quam non erit deficile non muccosis naribus lectori, ex ipso vel orationis habitu, aut rerum aspectu, siue alijs circumstantiarum notis deprehendere. Sed vereor ne hîc quoque, quemadmodum caeteris in rebus locum habeat veteris prouerbij experientia: faciunt quippe mendaces vt ne vera etiam dicenti fides habeatur. Cum hactenus in Martyrologicis sanctorum Legendis vitisque describendis mendacia, ac nugacissimae somniorum fictiones pro veris legantur narrationibus, sit vt & caeterae eiusdem argumenti materiae eandem pariter suspicionem subeant, vt vix iam quic{que} legi dicîue in ecclesia cum fide queat. Verùm huic malo cùm mederi nequeamus, satis erit quod nostrarum erat virium id nos praestitisse. Quod superest, diuinae curandum prouidentiae relinquamus. Atque de certitudine veritatésque historiae haec hactenus: quae vtinam ne tam vera quidem certaue esset, quàm isti videri volunt, at falsâ potius, consimilisque huic quam dicunt, Aureae ipsorum Legendae, aut Vitis patrum, aut Festiual•, aut Dormi secure, caeterisque Papisticis istis 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 foret. Nunc verò martyrurum horum non a nobis ficta, sed inflicta à vobis supplicia, atroxque caedes veriore hanc comprobant historiam, plurés{que} suae veritatis testes habent quàm vellemus ipsi qui historiam scripsimus. Venio iam ad alteram criminationis partem, quae de Calendario fortassis obijcietur. Audio enim & hic mihi obstrepere non tacitas modò sententias, sed apertas papistarum quorūdam voces, quibus iniquè a me factum videbitur, quòd antiquatis atque ex Calendario explosis veteris ecclesiae Diuis, Martyribus, Confessoribus, Virginibús{que}, nouos eorum loco Martyres at Confessores infultiam. Primùm nulli ego veterum Diuorum hoc facto praeiudicatum velim. Neque verò ideò inter Diuos a me referuntur isti, quòd inseruntur in Calendarium. Hanc ego apotheosin mihi nun{que} sumpsi, quam sibi tam confidenter sumpsit Gregorius nonus. Porro neque eò spectat hoc Calendarium, vt nouam aliquam festorum dierum legem praescribam ecclesiae, Tum multò minus cultum sancti alicuius instituo. Festorum dierum iam plus satis erat in mundo. Vtinam dominicum solum sabbatum dignè, atque vt par est, transigeremus. Habeant per me suum papistae Calendarium. Habeat & ecclesia suos sanctos, tum recētes tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim idē ne colantur, modò quàm sint vetusti, tàm verè etiam sancti sint.

Verum enimvero cum non dubitauit sua etiam aetate Hieronimus multos existimare eorum gehennae ignibus cruciari, quos multi passim pro sanctis haberent in ecclesia: quid hîc tum diceret Hieronimus, si modo superstes papisticam hanc sanctorum colluuiem & Calendaria, tot Papis, tot Episcopis, & Abbatibus oblita cerneret?

Quanquam à me quidem non aliter Calendarium hoc institutum est, nisi vt pro Indice duntaxat suum cuiusque Martyris mensem & annum designante, ad priuatum Lectoris seruiret vsum. Et tamen si in templis etiam fas sit singulorum mensium dies proprijs sanctorum nomenclaturis consignare: quî minus liceat id mihi in veris istis facere Martyribus, quod ipsi in suis pseudomartyribus tanta sibi licentia, ne dicam impudentia, permiserunt? Si non poena, sed causa Martyrem faciat, cur non vnum Cranmerum sexcentis Becketis Cantuariensibus non conferam, sed praetulerim? Quid in Nicholao Ridleo videtur cum quouis Diuo Nicholao non conferendum? Qua in re Latimerus, Hoperus, Marsheus, Simpsonus, caeteri{que} christia•i martyrij Candidati, inferiores summis maximisque illis papistici Calendarij Diuis, imo multis etiam nominibus non praepoendi videantur? Interim nullius ego boni sancti que viri (modo qui verè sanctus sit) causam laedo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et si cui hoc displiceat Calendarium, memineret non in templis collocari, sed domesticae tantum lectioni praeparari.

Sed missis hisce aduersatorum calumnijs, ad te, docte candidéque Lector (quoniam haec ad te instituta est epistola) tempus est vt recurrat oratio, cuius in his rebus iudicium vt pluris aestimo, ita egeo magis hîc quoque patrocínio. Scio enim in vasta hac congerie reperies nonnulla, ad quae merito corruges frontem. Neque vero fieri facile potuit, praesertim in tanta operis praecipitatione, vt cun, cta ad amussim atque ad vnguem perfectè adeo elimarētur, quin alicubi vel ex lassitudine dormitaret scriptor, vel per incuriam excideret authori aliquid, vel ex festinatione eueniret, quod cani solet in prouerbij nimium prae studio properanti, caecos nimirum producenti catulos. In quibus quidem excutiendis rebus magis nobis venia tua quam censura imploranda est. Quamobrem paucis haec apud te, docte simul & humanissime Lector, ante operis ingressum libuit 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , vt si quid inter euoluendum occurrerit, non omnibus perfectum numeris, non ad Cleantis lucernam elucubratum, non ad exquisitum Theologorum acumen expressum aut minus alioqui acutissimis tuis dignum naribus, cogites haec non tuis auribus data esse, sed meae hoc est crassioris turbae hominibus, a quibus facilius leguntur libri quam iudicantur. Aut si ne id quidem grauissimae tuae sententiae fecerit satis, liceat illa mihi vt lege, qua semper permissum est opere in magno scriptori obrepere somnum. Quod si vero tuam hac in re facilitatem impetrauero, minus laborabo quid caeteri obstrepant, graeci memor prouerbij, cuius & ipsos commeminissi velim: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

To the true and faythfull Congregation of Christes Vniuersall Church, with all and singuler the members therof, wheresoeuer congregated or dispersed through the Realme of England, a Protestation or Petition of the Author, wishing to the same aboundaunce of all peace and tranquility, with the speedy comming of Christ the Spouse, to make an ende of all mortall myserye.

SAlomon the peaceable Prince of Israell, as we read in the thirde of Kynges, after he had finished the buildyng of the Lordes Temple (which he had vij. yeares in hand) made his petition to the Lord for all that should pray in the sayde Temple, or turne theyr face toward it. And his request was graūted, the Lord aunswering him, as we read in the sayd booke. cap. 6. I haue heard (sayth he) thy prayer and haue sanctified this place. &c. Albeit the infinite Maiesty of God is not to be compassed in any materiall walles, yet it so pleased his goodnesse to respect this praier of the king, that not only he promised to heare thē which there prayed, but also replenished the same with his own glory. For so we read again in the book aforesayd: Et non poterant ministrare propter nebulā, quia repleuit gloria domini, domū domini. 3. Re. 7.

Vpon like trust in Gods gracious goodnes, if I sinnefull wretch, not comparing with the building of that Temple, but folowing the zeale of the builder might either be so bold to aske, or so happye to speed, after my vij. yeares trauayle about this Ecclesiasticall History, most humbly would craue of almighty God to bestow his blessing vpon the same, that as the prayers of them, which prayed in the outward Temple were heard: so all true disposed mindes which shall resort to the reading of this present Hystory containing the Actes of Gods holy Martyrs, and monumentes of his Church, may by example of theyr lyfe, fayth, & doctrine, receiue some such spirituall fruit to theyr soules through the operation of his grace, that it may be to the aduauncement of his Glory, and profite of his Churche, through Christ Iesus our Lord. Amen.

But as it happened in that Temple of Salomon, that all which came thither, came not to pray, but many to prate, some to gaze and see newes, other to talke and walke, some to buy and sell, some to carpe and finde fault, and finally some also at the last to destroy and plucke down, as they did in deed. For what is in this world so strong, but it will be impugned? what so perfect, but it will be abused? so true, that will not be contraryed? or so circumspectly done, wherein wrangling Theon will not set in his tooth? Euen so neither do I looke for any other in this present Hystory: but that amongst many well disposed Readers, some Waspses nest or other will be styrrd vp to busze about mine eares. Such a daungerous thing it is now a dayes to write or do any good, but either by flattering a man must offend the Godly, or by true speaking procure hatred with the wicked. Of such stinging Waspses and buszing Drones I had sufficient triall in my former edition before, who if they had found in my book any iust cause to carpe, or vpon any true zeale of truth had proceded agaynst the vntruths of my story and had brought iust proofes for the same, I could haue right well abide it. For God forbid, but that faultes, wheresoeuer they be, should be detected and accused. And therefore Accusers in a Common wealth after my mind do serue to no small stead.

But then such Accusers must beware they play not the dog, of whom Cicero in his Oration speaketh, which being set in Capitolio to fray away Theeues by night, left the Theeues and fell to barcke at true men walking in the day. Where true faultes be, there to bay & barcke is not amisse. But to carpe where no cause is, to spye in other strawes, and to leape ouer theyr owne blockes: to swallow Camels, and to strayne gnattes: to oppresse truth with lyes, and to set vp lyes for truth, to blaspheme the deare Martyrs of Christ and to Canonize for Sayntes, whom Scripture would scarce allow for good Subiectes, that is intollerable. Such barcking Curres, if they were well serued, would be made a whyle to stoope. But with these brauling spirites I entend not at this time much to wrastle.

Wherefore to leaue them a while, till further leasure serue me to attend vpon them, thus much I thought in the meane season, by way of Protestation or petition, to write vnto you both in generall & particular the true members and faythful Congregation of Christes Church, wheresoeuer either cōgregated together, or dispersed through the whole Realme of England, that forsomuch as all the seeking of these Aduersaryes is to do what they can, by discrediting of this History with slaunders & sinister surmises, how to withdraw the Readers frō it: This therfore shalbe in few wordes to premonish and desire of all and singuler of you (all well minded louers and partakers of Christes Gospell) not to suffer your selues to be deceiued with the big brags, and hyperbolically speeches of those flaundering tongues, whatsoeuer they haue or shall hereafter exclaime agaynst the same. But indifferently staying your iudgement till truth be tryed, you will first peruse, & then refuse measuring the vntruthes of this Hystory, not by the scoaring vp of theyr hundreds and thousandes of lyes which they geue out, but wisely weying the purpose of theyr doinges, according as you finde, and so to iudge of the matter.

To read my bookes I allure neither one nor other. Euery man as he seeth cause to like as he list. If any shall thinke his labor to much in reading this history, his choyce is free either to read this, or any other which he more mindeth. But if the fruite thereof shall recompence the Readers trauell, then would I wish no man so light eared, to be caryed away for any sinister clamour of Aduersaryes, who many times depraue good doinges, not for the faultes they finde, but therefore finde faultes because they would depraue. As for me and my history, as my will was to profite all and displease none: so if skill in any part wanted to will, yet hath my purpose bene simple, and certes the cause no lesse vrgent also, which moued me to take this enterprise in hand.

*For first to see the simple flocke of Christ, especially the vnlearned sort, so miserably abused, and all for ignoraunce of history, not knowing the course of times, and true discent of the Church, it pittied me, that part of diligence so long to haue bene vnsupplied in this my countrey Church of Englande. Agayne considering the multitude of Chronicles and story writers, both in England, and out of England, of whome the most part haue bene either Monkes or Clientes to the sea of Rome, it grieved me to behold how partially they handled theyr storyes. Whose paynefull trauell albeit I cannot but cōmend, in committing diuers thinges to writing, not vnfruitful to be knowne, or vnpleasant to be read: yet it lamented me to see in theyr Monumentes the principall poyntes, which chiefly concerned the state of Christes Church, and were most necessary of all christen people to be knowne, either altogether pretermitted, or if any mention thereof were inserted, yet were all things drawn to the honor specially of the Church of Rome, or els to the fauor of theyr owne sect of Religion. Werby the vulgare sort, hearing and reading in theyr writings no other church mentioned or magnified but onely that Church which here florished in this world in riches and iollity, were drawne also to the same persuasion, to thinke no other Church to haue stand in all the earth, but onely the Church of Rome.

In the number of this sort of writers, besides our Monkes of England (for euery Monastery almost had his Chronicler) I might also recite both Italian, and other countrey authors, as Platina, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, Martinus, Antoninus, Vincētius, Onuphrius, Laziardus, Georgius Lilius, Pollid▪ Virgilius, with many more, who taking vpon thē to intermeddle with matters of the church, although in part they expresse some truth in matters concerning the Bishops and sea of Rome: yet in suppressing an other part, they play with vs, as Ananias and Saphira did with their mony, or as Apelles did in Pliny, who painting the one halfe of Venus comming out of the sea, left the other halfe vnperfect. So these writers while they shew vs one half of the B. of Rome, the other halfe of him they leaue vnperfect, & vtterly vntold. For as they paynt him out on the one part glistering in welth and glorie, in shewing what succession the Popes had from the chaire of S. Peter, when they first began, and how long they sate, what Churches and what famous buildings they erected, how farre theyr possessions reached, what lawes they made, what counsels they called, what honour they receiued of Kyniges and Emperours, what Princes and Countryes they brought vnder theyr authority, with other like stratagemes, of great pompe and royalty: so on the other side what vices these Popes brought with them to theyr seat, what abhominatiōs they practised, what superstition they mainteined, what Idolatry they procured, what wicked doctrine they defended contrary to the expresse word of God, to what heresies they fell, into what diuision of sectes they cut the vnity of christian Religion, how some practised by Simony, some by Necromancy and Sorcery, some by poysoning, some indenting with the Deuill to come by theyr Papacy, what hypocrisy was in theyr liues, what corruptiō in theyr doctrine, what warres they raysed, what bloudshed they caused, what treachery they trauersed agaynst their Lordes and Emperours, imprisoning some, betraying some to the Templaryes and Saracēs, in bringing other vnder theyr feet, also in beheading some, as they did with Fredericus and Conradinus, the heires and ofspring of the house of Fredericus Barbarossa. an. 1269. furthermore how mightely almighty God hath stand agaynst them, how their warres neuer prospered agaynst the Turke, how the iudgementes of the godly learned frō time to time haue euer repugned agaynst theyr errorrs▪ &c. of these and a thousand other mo, not one word hath bene touched, but all kept as vnder Benedicite in Auricular confession.

This partiall dealing and corrupt handling of Historyes, when I considered, I thought with my self nothing more lacking in the church, then a ful & a complet history, which being faythfully collected out of all our Monastical writers & writtē Monuments, should containe neither euery vain written fable for that would be to much, nor yet leaue out any thing necessary, for that would be to little: but with a moderate discretion taking the best of euery one, should both ease the labor of the reader from turning ouer such a number of writers: and also should open the plaine truth of times lying long hid in obscure darcknes of antiquity. Wherby all studious Readers, beholding as in a glasse the state, course, and alteration of Religion, decay of doctrine, and the controuersies of the church, might discern the better betwene antiquity and nouelty. For if the things which be first (after the rule of Tertullian) are to be preferred before those that be latter, then is the reading of histories much necessary in the church, to know what went before, and what folowed after. And therfore not without cause Historia,*in old authors is called the wnesse of times, the light of verity, the life of memory, teacher of life, & shewer of antiquitie. &c. Without the knowledge wherof mans life is blind, and soone may fall into any kind of errorr, as by manifest experience we haue to see, in these desolate latter times of the Church, when as the Bishops of Rome vnder colour of antiquity haue turned truth into heresy and brought such new found deuises of straunge doctrine and Religiō as in the former age of the church were neuer heard of before, and all through the ignorance of times, and for lacke of true history.

For to say the truth, if times had bene well searched, or if they which wrote Hystories had without partiality gone vpright betwene God and Baall, halting on neither side, it might well haue bene found the most part of all this catholicke corruptiō intruded into the church by the bishops of Rome, as Transubstantiation, leuation, and adoration of the sacrament, auricular confession, forced vowes of Priestes not to mary, veneration of Images, priuate and satisfactory Masses, the order of Gregories Masse now vsed, the vsurped authoritie, & Summa potestas of the sea of Rome, with all the route of their ceremonies and wieses of superstition ouergrowing nowe the Church, all these (I say) to bee new nothings lately coyned in the minte of Rome without any stampe of antiquitie, as by readyng of this present history shall sufficiently, I trust, appeare. Whiche history therefore I haue here taken in hand, that as other story writers heretofore haue employed their trauayle to magnifie the Church of Rome,* so in this history might appeare to all Christian readers the Image of both Churches, as well of the one as of the other: especially of the poore oppressed and persecuted Church of Christ. Which persecuted Church though it hath bene of long season troden vnder foote by enemyes, neglected in the world, nor regarded in histories, and almost scarce visible or knowne to worldly eyes, yet hath it bene the true Church only of God, wherein he hath mightely wrought hetherto in preseruing the same in all extreeme distresses, continually stirring vp frō time to tyme faythful ministers, by whō alwayes hath bene kept some sparkes of hys true doctrine and Religion.

Now for asmuch as the true Church of God goeth not lightly alone,* but is accompanied wyth some other Church or Chappel of the deuill to deface and maligne the same, necessary it is therefore the difference betweene them to be sene, and the descent of the right Church to be described from the Apostles tyme. Which hetherto in most part of histories hath bene lacking, partly for feare, that men durst not: partly for ignoraunce that men could not discerne rightly betweene the one and the other. Who beholding the Church of Rome to be so visible and glorious in the eyes of the worlde, so shining in outward beauty, to beare suche a porte, to cary suche a trayne and multitude, and to stand in such hye authoritie, opposed the same to be only the right Catholike mother. The other because it was not so visibly known in the world, they thought therefore it could not be the true church of Christ. Wherin they were far deceaued. For although the right church of God be not so inuisible in the world, that none can see it, yet neyther is it so visible agayne that euery worldly eye may perceiue it. For like as is the nature of truth▪ so is the proper condition of the true Church, that commonly none seeth it,* but such onely, as be the members and partakers thereof. And therefore they which require that Gods holy Church should be euident and visible to the whole world seeme to de|fine the great sinagogue of the world rather then the true spirituall Church of God.

In Christes time who would haue thought, but the congregations and Councelles of the Pharises had ben the right church: and yet had Christ an other Church in earth besides that, which albeit it was not so manifest in the sight of the world, yet was it the onely true Church in the sight of God. Of this Church ment Christ speaking of the Temple, whiche he would rayse agayne the thyrd day. And yet after that the Lord was risen, he shewed not himselfe to the worlde, but onely to his electe which were but few. The same Church after that encreased and multiplied mightely amonge the Iewes, yet had not the Iewes eyes to see Gods Church, but did persecute it till at length all their whole nation was destroyed.

After the Iewes, then came the heathen Emperours of Rome, who hauing the whole power of the world in their hands, did what the world could do, to extinguish the name and church of christ. Whose violence cōtinued the space of 3. hundreth yeares. All which while the true church of christ was not greatly in sight of the world, but rather was abhorred euery where, and yet notwithstanding the same small •elly flocke so despised in the worlde, the Lorde highly regarded and mightely preserued. For although many then of the Christians did suffer death: yet was their death neither losse to them, nor detriment to the Church: but the more they suffered, the more of theyr bloud encreased.

In the time of these Emperours, God raysed vp then in this Realme of Britayne diuers worthy teachers and witnesses, as Elnanus, meduinus, Meltiuianus, Amphibolus, Albanus, Aaron, Iulius and other moe In whose time the doctrine of fayth without mens traditions was sincerely preached. After theyr death and Martyrdom, it pleased the Lord to prouide a generall quietnes to his Church, wherby the number of hys flocke began more to encrease.

In this age then followed here in the sayd land of Britayne Fastidius,^{*}Niuianus, Patricius, Bacchiarius, Dubricius, Congellus, Kentigernus, Helmotus, Daud, Daniell, Sampson, Elnodugue, Asaphus, Cildas, Heulanus Elbodus, Dinothus, Samuell, Niuius, and a great sort moe, whiche gouerned the Church of Britayne by Christen doctrine a long season, albeit the ciuil gouernours for the tyme, were then dissolute & careles, as Gildas very sharply doth lay to theyr charge, and so at length were subdued by the Saxons.

All this while about the space of foure hundred yeares, Religion remayned in Britayne vncorrupt and the word of Christ truely preached, till about the comming of Austen and of hys companions from Rome, many of the sayd Britayne preachers were slayne by the Saxons. After that began Christen fayth to enter & spring among the Saxons, after a certayne romish sort, yet notwithstanding some what more tollerable, thē were the times, which after folowed, through the dilligent industry of some godly teachers, which then liued amongst them: as Aidanus, Finianus, Coleman Archbishop of Yorke Beda, Iohn of Beuerlay, Alcuinus, Noetus, Hucharius, Serlo, Achardus, Ealredus, Alexander Neckam, Negellus, Fenallus, Alfricus, Sygeferthus & such other: who though they erred in some few thinges, yet neither so grossely,^{*} nor so greatly to be complayned of in respect of the abuses that followed. For as yet, all thys while, the error of Transubstantiation and leuation, with auricular confession was not crept in for a publicke doctrine in Christes Church, as by theyr owne Saxon Sermon, made by Aelfricus, & set out in the second Volume of this present history may appeare pag. 1114. During the which meane time although the Bishops of Rome wer had here in some reuerēce with the Clergy: yet had they nothing as yet to do in setting lawes touching matters of the Church of England: but that only appertayned to the kings and gouernours of the land as is in this story to be seene. pag. 754.

^{*}And thus the Church of Rome albeit it began then to decline a pace frō God, yet during all this while it remayned hitherto in some reasonable order, till at length after that the sayd Bishops began to shout vp in the world through the liberalitie of good Princes, and especially by Mathilda a noble Duches of Italy. Who at her death made the Pope heyre of all her landes, and indued his sea, with great reuenewes. Then riches begot ambition. Ambition destroyed Religion, so that all came to ruine. Out of this corruption sprang forth here in Englād (as did in other places more) an other romish kind of Monkery, worse then the other before, being much more drowned in superstition and ceremo'nies, which was about the yeare of our Lord. 980. Of this swarme was Egbertus Aigelbert▪ Egwine, Boniface, Wilfrede Agathon, Iames, Romaine, Cedda, Dunstane, Oswold, Athelwold, Athelwine Duke of Eastangles, Lanfrancke, Anselme and such other.

And yet in this tyme also through Gods prouidence, the Churche lacked not some of better knowledge and iudgement, to weigh with the darcknes of those dayes. For although king Edgar, with Edward his base sonne being seduced by Dunstane, Oswold and other Monkish Clerkes, was thē a great author and fautor of much superstition, erecting as many Monasteries, as were Sondayes in the yeare: yet notwithstanding this continued not long. For eftsoones after the death of Edgar came king Ethelrede and Queene Elfhred his mother, with Alferus Duke of merceland, and other peeres and nobles of the Realme, who displaced the Monkes againe, and restored the maryed Priests to their old possessions and liuings. Moreouer after that followed also the Danes whiche ouerthrew those Monkish foundations, as fast as king Edgar had set them vp before.

And thus hetherto stode the condition of the true Church of Christ, albeit not without some repugnance and difficultie, yet in some meane state of the truth & veritie, till time of pope Hildebrand called Gregory 7. which was nere about the yeare. 1080. And of Pope Innocentius 3. in the yeare 1215. By whome altogether was turned vpside downe, all order broken, dissipline dissolued, true doctrine defaced. Christian faith extinguished. Instead whereof was set vp preaching of mens decrees dreames, and idle traditions. And whereas before truth was free to be disputed amongst learned men, now libertie was turned into law, Argument into Authoritie. Whatsoeuer the Byshoppe of Rome denounced, that stode for an oracle, of all men to be receaued without opposition or contradiction: whatsoeuer was contrary, ibso facto it was heresie, to be punished with fagot and flaming fire. Then began the sincere fayth of this English Church,* which held out so long, to quayle. Then was the clerre sunne shine of Gods word ouershadowed, with mistes and darcknes, appearing like sacke-cloth to the people, which neither could vnderstand that they read, nor yet permitted to read that they could vnderstand. In these miserable dayes, as the true visible Church beganne now to shrink and keep in for feare: so vpstart a new sort of players to furnish the stage, as schole Doctours, Canonistes, and foure orders of Friars. Besides other Monasticall sectes and fraternities of infinite variety. Which euer since haue kept such a stirre in the Church, that none for them almost durst rout, neyther Caesar, king, nor subiect. What they defined, stode. What they approued, was Catholicke: What they condemned, was heresie: whom soeuer they accused, none almost could saue. And thus haue these hetherto continued or raigned rather in the Church, the space now of foure hundreth yeares and odde. During which space, the true Church of Christ, although it durst not openly appeare in the face of the world, oppressed by tyranny: yet neyther was it so inuisible or vnknown: but by the pro'uidence of the Lord, some remnaunt alwayes remayned from tyme to time, which not onely shewed secret good affection to sincere doctrine, but also stode in open defence of truth agaynst the disordered Churche of Rome.

*In which Catalogue, first to pretermitt Barthramus and Barenarius, which were before Pope Innocent 3. a learned multitude of sufficient witnesses here might be produced, whose names neither are obscure nor doctrine vnknowne: as Ioachim Abbot of Calabria, Almericus a learned Byshop, who was iudged an hereticke for holding agaynst Images, in the time of the sayd Innocentius. Besides the Martirs of Alsatia, of whome we read an hundred to be burned by the sayd Innocentius in one day, as writeth Hermanus Mutius. Adde likewise to these Waldenses or Albigenses, which to a great number segregated themselues from the Church of Rome. To this number also belonged Reymundus Earle of Tholose, Marsilius, Patuius, Gulielmus de S. Amore, Simon Tornacensis Arnoldus de noua villa, Ioannes Semeca, besides diuers other preachers in Sueuia standing agaynst the Pope. Anno. 1240. Ex Cranz. Laurentius Anglicus a Mayster of Parris. anno. 1260. Petrus Ioannis a Minorite, who was burned after hys death. anno. 1290. Robertus Gallas a Dominicke Frier, anno. 1291. Robert Grosthead Byshoppe of Lincolne which was called Malleus Romanorum. anno. 1250. Lord Peter de Cugnerijs. anno. 1329. To these we may adde more our Gulielmus Ockam, Bongratijs Bergomensis, Luitpoldus Andraeas Laudensis. Vlricus Hangenor Treasurer to the Emperour, Ioannes de Ganduno. anno. 1330. mentioned in the Extrauagantes, Andraeas de Castro, Buridianus, Euda, Duke of Burgundy, who counselled the french king, not to receiue the new found constitutions, and extrauagantes of the Pope into his realme, Dantes Alligerius, an Italian, who wrote agaynst the Pope, Monkes and Fryers, and agaynst the donation of Constantine. anno. 1330. Taulerus a Germaine preacher, Conradus Hager imprisoned for preaching agaynst the Masse an. 1339. The author of the booke called, Poenitentiarius Asini, compiled about the yeare 1343. Michael Cesenas a gray Fryer, Petrus de Corbaria, with Ioannes de Poliaco, mentioned in the Extrauantes and condemned by the Pope, Ioannes de Castilione. with Franciscus de Arcatara, who were burned about the yeare of our Lord. 1322. Ioannas Rochtaylada, otherwise called Haybalus, with an other Frier martyred about the yeare. 1346. Franciscus Petrarcha, who called Rome the whore of Babilon. &c. an. 1350. Georgius Ariminensis, an. 1350 Ioannes de Rupe Scissa, emprisoned for certayne prophesies against the Pope. an. 1340. Gerhardus Ridder, who also wrote against Monks and Friers a book called Lacryma Ecclesiae. an. 1350. Godfridus de Fontanis, Gulielmus de Landuno, Ioannes Monachus Cardini. Armachanus, Nicholaus Orem preacher. an. 1364. Militzius a Bohemian, which then preached that Antichrist was come, and was excommunicate for the same, an. 1366. Iacobus Misnensis, Mathias Parisiensis a Bohemian borne, and a writer against the Pope, an. 1370. Ioannes Mountziger, Rector of the Vniuersitie of Vlme, U anno. 1384. Nilus Arch. of Thessalonica. Henricus de •ota, Henricus de Hassia. &c.

I do but recite the principall writers and preachers in those dayes: Howe many thousandes there were which neuer bowed their knees to Baall, that is knowne to God alone. Of whome wee finde in the writings of one Brushius that xxxvi. Citizens of Maguntia were burned, an. 1390. Who following the doctrine of the Waldenses, affirmed the Pope to be the great Antichrist. Also Massaeus recordeth of one hundred and fourty, which in the prouince of Narbon were put to the fire, for not receiuing the decretalles of Rome: besides them that suffered at Paris to the number of xxiiij. at one time, anno. 1210. and the next yeare after were foure hundred brent vnder the names of Heretiques. Besides also a certayne good Heremite, E an Englishman, of whome mention is made in Iohn Bacon. Dist. 2. Quest. 1. who was committed for disputing in Paules Church, agaynst certaine Sacramentes of the Church of Rome. an. 1306.

To discend now somewhat lower in drawing out the discent of the Church. What a multitude here commeth of faythfull witnesses in the time of Iohn Wickleffe, as Ocliffe, Wickliffe. an. 1376. W. Thorp White, Puruey, Patshall, Payne, Gower, Chaucer, Gascoyne, Williã Swinderby, Walter Brute, Roger Dexter, William Sautry about the yeare. 1400. Iohn Badby, an. 1410. Nicholaus Tayler, Rich. Wagstaffe, Mich. Scriuener, William Smith Iohn Henry, W. Parchmenar, Roger Goldsmith, with an Ancresse called Mathilde in the Citie of Leicester, Lord Cobham, Syr Roger Acton knight, Iohn Beuerley preacher, Iohn Husse, Hierome of Prage Scholemaister, with a number of faithfull Bohemians and Thaborites not to be told with whō I might also adioyne Laurentius Valla and Ioannes Picus, the learned Earle of Mirandula. But what do I stand vpon recitall of names, which almost are infinite.

Wherefore if any be so farre beguiled in his opinion to thinke the doctrine of the church of Rome (as it now standeth) to be of such antiquitie, & that the same was neuer impugned before the time of Luther and Zuinglius now of late, let him read these histories: or if he thinke the sayd historie not to be of sufficient credite to alter his perswasion let him peruse the Actes and Statutes of Parliamentes, passed in this realme of auncient time and therein consider and conferre the course of times; where he may finde and read. *An. 5. Regis Richardi. 2. in the yeare of our Lord. 1380. of a great nūber (which there be called euill persons) goyng about from town to town in freese gownes preaching vnto the people &c. which preachers although the wordes of the Statute do terme there to be dissembling persons, preaching dyuers Sermons contayning heresies & notorious errors, to the emblemishment of Christen faith, & of holy Church &c. as the words do there pretend: yet notwithstanding euery true Christian reader may conceaue of those Preachers to teache no other doctrine, then nowe they heare theyr owne Preachers in Pulpits Preache, agaynst the Bishoppe of Rome and the corrupte heresies of his Church.

Furthermore he shall finde likewise in Statut. An. 2. Henr. 4. Cap. 15. in the yeare of our Lord. 1402. another lyke company of good Preachers and faythful defenders of true doctrine agaynst blynd heresie and error. Whom albeit the wordes of the Statute there, through corruption of that time, do falsely terme, * to be false and peruerse Preachers, vnder dissembled holines, teaching in those dayes openly and priuely new doctrines and hereticall opinions contrary to the faythe and determination of holy Church. &c. yet notwithstanding whosoeuer readeth histories and conferreth the order and discent of times, shall vnderstand these to be no false teachers, but saythfull witnesses of the truth, not teaching any newe doctrines contrary to the determination of holy Church: But rather shall finde that Church to be vnholly, which they Preached agaynst, teaching rather it selfe hereticall opinions contrary both to antiquitie, and veritie of Christes true Catholicke Church.

Of the lyke number also, or greater, of lyke true faythfull fauourers and followers of Gods holy worde, we find in the yeare of our Lord. 14•2. specified in a letter sent from Henry Chichesley Archbishop of Canterbury, to Pope Martin 5. in the fift yeare of his Popedome, where mention is made of so many here in Engand infected: (as he sayde) with the heresies of Wickleffe and Husse, that without force of any army they could not be suppressed. &c. Whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals to the Archbishop to cause a tenth to be gathered of all spirituall and Religious men, * and the money to be layde in the chamber Apostolicke, and if that were not sufficient, the residue to bee made vppe of Chalice, Candlestickes, and other implementes of the Church &c.

What shall neede then any more witnes to proue this matter, when you see so many yeares agoe, whole armyes and multitudes, thus standing agaynst the Pope? who thought they bee termed here for heretickes and schismatickes, yet in that, which they call heresie, serued they the liuing Lord, within the Arke of his true spirituall and visible Church.

And where is then the friuolous bragge of the Papistes, which make so much of there paynted sheath, & would nedes beare vs downe, that this gournment of the Church of Rome which now is, hath bene of such an old standing, time out of minde, euen from the primitiue Antiquitie, & that neuer was any other church demonstrable here in earth for men to follow, besides the said only Catholick mother church of Rome? whē as we haue sufficiently proued before by the continual descēt of the Church till this present tyme, that the sayd Church, after the doctrine which is now reformed, is no new begunne matter, but euen the olde continued Church, by the prouidence and promise of Christ, still standing, which albeit it hath bene of late yeares repressed by the tyranny of Romaine Byshops, more then before: yet notwithstanding it was neuer so oppressed but God hath euer maintayned in it the truth of his Gospell, agaynst heresies and errors of the Church of Rome, as in thys history more at full is to be seene.

*Let vs now proceede farther as we began, deducing this descent, of the Church vnto the 1501. yeare. In which yeare the Lord began to shew in the partes of Germany wonderfull tokens, and bloody markes of his Passion, as the bloody Crosse, hys nayles, speare, and Crowne of thornes, which fell from heauen vpon the garments and cappes of men, and rockes of woman, as you may further read in this booke pag. 816. By the which tokens almighty God (no doubt) presignified what grievous afflictions and bloody persecutions shoulde then begin to ensue vpon his Church for hys Gospels sake, according as in this history is described, wherein is to be seene what Christen blood hath bene spilt, what persecutions raysed, what tyranny exercised, what tormentes deuised, what trechery vsed agaynst the poore flocke and Church of Christ, in such sort as since Christes tyme greater hath not bene seene.

*And now by reuolution of yeares we are come from the time of .1501. to that yeare now present 1570. In which the full seuentie yeares of the Babilonicall captiuitie draweth now well to an ende, if we count from the first appearing of these bloody markes aboue mentioned. Or if wee reckon from the beginning of Luther, and hys persecution, then lacketh yet xvi. yeres. Now what the Lord wil do with this wicked world, or what rest he will geue to hys Church after these long sorrowes, he is our father in heauen, his will be done in earth, as seemeth best to his diuine maiestie.

In the meane time let vs for our partes with all patient obedience wayt vpon hys gracious leysure and glorifie his holy name, and edifie one an other with all humilitie. And if there cannot be an end of our disputing, and contending one agaynst an other: yet let there be a moderation in our affections. And for asmuch as it is the good will of our God, that Sathan thus should be let lose amongst vs for a short time: yet let vs striue in the meane while what wee can to amende the malice of the tyme with mutuall humanitie.* They that be in errour, let them not disdayne to learne. They whiche haue greater talentes of knowledge committed, instruct in simplicitie them that be simple. No man liueth in that common wealth where nothing is amisse. But yet because God hath so placed vs Englishmen here in one common wealth, also in one Church as in one shippe together: let vs not mangle or deuide the shippe, which being deuided perisheth: but euerie man serue in his order with dilligence, wherein he is called. They that sitte at the helme, keepe well the poynt of the needle, to knowe how the ship goeth, and whether it should. Whatsoever weather betydeh, the needle well touched with the stone of Gods word will neuer fayle. Such as labour at the oares, start for no tempest, but doe what they can to keepe from the rockes. Likewise they whiche be inferiour rowmes, take heede they moue no sedition, nor disturbance agaynst the rowers and mariners. No storme so daungerous to a shippe on the sea, as is discord and disorder in a weale publique. What countryes and nations, what kingdomes and Empyres, what Cities, townes, and houses discord hath dissolued, in storyes is manifest: I neede not spend tyme in rehearsing examples. The Lord of peace, who hath power both of land and Sea, reach forth hys mercifull hand to helpe them vp that sincke, to keepe them vpp that stand, to still these windes and sourging seas of discord and contention among vs: that wee professing one Christ, may in one vnitie of doctrine gather our selues into one Arke of the true Church together, where we continuing stedfast in fayth may at the last luckely be conducted to the ioyfull porte of our desired landing place by hys heauenly grace. To whome both in heauen and in earth be all power and glory, with his father and the holy spirite for euer. Amen.

The vtilitie of this Story.

SEyng the worlde is replenished with such an infinite multitude of bookes of all kinde of matters, I may séeme (perhaps) to take a matter in hand superfluous and needles, at this present to set out such Uolumes, especially of histories, considering now a dayes the world is so greatly pestered, not only with superfluous plenty therof, but of all other treatises, so that books now seeme rather to lacke Readers,* then Readers to lacke bookes: In which multitude of bookes I doubt not, but many doe both perceiue, and inwardly bewayle this insatiable boldnes of many now a dayes both in writing and printing, which to say the truth, for my part I do as much lament as any man els beside: and would therefore no man should thinke that vnaduisedly or with rashnes I haue attempted this enterprise, as one being not onely doubtful, but also both bashfull and feareful within my self for setting the same abroad. And why? first I perceaued howe learned this age of ours is in reading of bookes, neither could I tell what the secret iudgementes of readers woulde conceaue, to see so weake a thing, to set vpon such a weighty enterprise, not sufficiently furnished with such ornamentes able to satisfie the perfection of so great a story, or sufficient to serue the vtility of the studious: and the delight of the learned. Which abilitie the more I perceiued to be wanting in me, the lesse I durst be bold to become a writer.

But agayne on the other side, when I weyed with my selfe what memorable Actes and famous doynges this latter age of the Church hath ministred vnto vs by the patient suffringes of the worthy martyrs: I thought it not to be neglected, that so precious Monumentes of so many matters, meet to be recorded and registred in books, should lie buried by my default vnder darkenes of obliuion. Me thought somewhat was to be sayd of them for their well deseruing, and something agayne of our partes for benefites by them receaued. But aboue all other thinges nothing did so much styrre me forward hereunto, as the dilligent consideration and speciall regard of the common vtilitie which euery man plentifully may receaue by the reading of these Monuments or Martyrologe which history as I haue taken in hand chiefly for the vse of the English Church: so haue I framed it in that tongue which the simple people could best vnderstand.

Nowe if men commonly delite so much in other Chronicles which intreate onely vpon matters of pollicye, and reioyce to beholde therein the variable euentes of worldlye affayres, the Stratagemes of valiaunt captaynes, the terrour of foughten fieldes, the sacking of Cities, the hurlye burlies of Realmes and people. And if men thinke it such a gaye thing in a common wealth to committe to history such olde antiquities of thinges prophane and bestow all theyr ornamentes of wit and eloquence in garnishing the same: how much more then is it meete for Christians to conserue in remembraunce the liues: Actes and doynges, not of bloody warriours, but of myld and constant Martyrs of Christ, which serue not so much to delight the eare, as to garnish the lyfe, to frame it with examples of great profite, and to encourage men to all kinde of Christian godlines? As first by reading thereof wee may learne a liuely testimony of Gods mighty working in the life of man, contrary to the opinion of Atheistes, and all the whole nest of Epicures. For like as one sayd of Harpalus in times past, that his doyngs gaue a liuely testimony agaynst God, because he being so wicked a man escaped so long vnpunished: so contrariwise in these mē we haue a much more assured and playne witnes of God both in whose liues and deathes appeared suche manifest declarations of Gods diuine working, whiles in such sharpnes of tormentes we behold in them strength, so constant aboue mans reach, such readines to aunswere, such patience in imprisonment, suche godlines in forgeuing, cherefulnes so couragious in suffering, besides the manifold sense and feeling of the holy ghost which they in their liues so plentifully tasted in theyr afflictions,* as in readyng of theyr letters euidently we may vnderstand. Ouer and besides this, the milde deaths of the sayntes do not a little auayle to the stablishing of a good conscience: to learne the contempt of the world, and to come to the feare of God. Moreouer, they confirme fayth, encrease godlines, abate pride in prosperitie, and in aduersitie do open an hope of heauenly comfort. For what man reading the misery of these godly persons, may not therein as in a glasse behold his owne case, whether hee be godly or godles. For if God geue aduersitie vnto good men, what may eyther the better sort promise themselues, or the euill not feare? And whereas by reading of prophane storyes we are made perhaps more skilfull in warlike affayres: so by reading of this we are made better in our liuinges, and besides are better prepared vnto like conflictes, if by Gods permission they shall happen hereafter more wiser by theyr doctrine, and more steadfast by theyr example.

To be short, they declare to the world what true Christian fortitude is, and what is the right way to conquire which standeth not in the power of man, but in hope of the resurrection to come, and is now I trust at hand. In consideration whereof, me thinkes I haue good cause to wish, that like as other subiectes: euen so also Kinges and Princes, which commonly delite in heroicall stories, would diligently peruse such Monumentes of martyrs, and lay them alwayes in sight, not alonely to read, but to follow, and would paynt them vpon theyr walles, cups, ringes and gates. For doubtles suche as these: are more worthy of honour thē an hundreth Alexanders, Hectors, Scipions and warlike Iulies. And though the world iudgeth prosperously of thinges, yet with God the true iudge, certes such are to be reputed in deede, not that kill one an other with a weapon, but they which being rather killed in Gods cause, do retayne an inuincible constancie agaynst the threatens of tyrantes and violence of tormentours. Such as these, are the true Conquerours of the world, by whome we learne true manhoode, so many as fight vnder Christ, and not vnder the world. With this valiantnes did that most milde Lambe and inuincible Lyon of the tribe of Iuda first of all go before vs, of whose vnspeakeable fortitude we heare this propheticall admiration: who is this (sayth he) which walketh so in the multitude of hys strength? * Forsooth the high sonne of the high God, once conquered of the world, and yet conquering the world after the same maner he was conquered.

The like daunce did all hys other Martyrs follow, to whome the auncient antiquitie of the Church did attribute so great honour, as neuer king or Emperour could purchase in this world with all theyr images, pillers hie spires, triumphes, temples, and all theyr solemne feastes. In probation whereof we see with what admiration, and almost superstition, not onely the memory, but also the reliques of those good Martyr's were receaued & kept amongst the auncient Christians. We haue also for witnes the learned Hymnes and Songes of Prudentius and Nazienzene, wherewith Pindarus did neuer so much set out hys triumphes of Olympia and Nemea. I neede not here rehearse the learned Orations of eloquent Cyprian, Chrysostome, Ambrose. and Hierome, who neuer shewed theyr eloquence more, then when they fell into the commendations of the Godly Martyrs?

Whereby it is manifest, what estimation in times past was attributed to Martyrs: with what gratulation, reioyce, myrth, and common ioy the afflictions of those godly, dying in Christes quarrell, were sometime receiued and solemnised, and that not without good reasonable cause.

For the Church did well consider howe much she was beholding to theyr benefites, by whose death she vnderstoode her treasures to encrease. Now then if Martyrs are to be compared with Martyrs, I see no cause why the Martyrs of our tyme deserue any lesse commendation, then the other in the primatiue Church, which assuredly are inferiour vnto them in no poynt of prayse: whether we view the number of them that suffered, or greatnes of theyr formentes, or theyr constancie in dying, or also consider the fruite that they brought to the amendment of posteritie, and encrease of the Gospell. They did water the truth with theyr bloud,* that was newly springing vp: so these by theyr deathes restored it agayne, being sore decayed and fallen downe. They standing in the forewarde of the battell, did receaue the first encounter and violence of theyr enemies, and taught vs by that meanes to ouercome such tyranny. These with like courage agayne like old beaten souldiours did winne the field in the rereward of the battayle. They like famous husbandmen of the world did sow the fieldes of the Church, that first lay vnmanured and wast: these with fatnes of their bloud did cause it to battell and fructifie. Would to God the fruite might be speedely gathered into the •arne, whiche onely remayneth behinde to come.

Now, if we ascribe such reputation to Godly preachers (and worthely) which diligently preache the Gospell of Christ, when they liue notwithstanding by the benefite of tyme, without all feare of persecution: howe muche more reasonable cause haue we to prayse and extoll such men as stoutly spend theyr lyues for the defence of the same? All these premisses duely of our partes considered and marked, seeing we haue found so famous Martyrs in this our age, let vs not fayle then in publishing and setting forth their doings, lest in that poynt we seeme more vnkinde to them, then the writers of y^e primitiue Church were vnto theirs. And though we repute not theyr ashes chaynes, and swerdes in the stede of reliques▪ yet let vs yeld thus much vnto theyr commemoration, to glory the Lord in hys Saintes, and imitate theyr death (as much as we may) with like constancy, or theyr liues at y^e least with like innocency. They offered theyr bodies willing, to the rough handling of the tormentors. And is it so great a matter then for our part, to mortifie our flesh, with all the members thereof? They neglected not onely the riches and glory of the world for the loue of Christ, but also their liues: and shal we then keepe so great a styrr one agaynst an other, for the transitory trifles of this world? They continued in patient suffering, when they had most wrong done vnto them, and when theyr very heartes bloud gushed out of theyr bodyes: and yet will not wee forgeue our poore brother, be the iniury neuer so small, but are ready for euery trifling offence to seeke hys destruction, and cut his throat. They wishing well to all men, did of theyr own accord forgeue theyr persecutors: & therefore ought we, which are now the posteritie and Children of Martyrs, not to degenerate from theyr former steps, but being admonished by their examples, if we cannot expresse theyr charitie toward all men, yet at lest to imitate the same to our power and strength. Let vs geue no cause of offence to any. And if any be geuen to vs, let vs ouercome it with patience, forgeuing and not reuenging the same. And let vs not onely keepe our handes from shedding of bloud, but our tongues also from hurting the same of others. Besides, let vs not shrink if case so require, martyrdom or losse of lyfe, according to their example, to yeld vp the same in the defence of the Lordes flocke. Whiche thing if men would do, much lesse contention and busines woulde be in the world •hen now is. And thus much touching the vtilitie and fruit to be taken of this history.

To all the professed frendes and followers of the Popes proceedinges, foure Questions propounded.

TO you all and singuler, which professe the doctrine and Religion of the Pope your holy Father,* and of your mother Church of Rome, pretending the name of Catholickes▪ commōly termed Papistes, wheresoeuer abiding in the Realme of England, these foure Questions or Problemes hereunder folowing I would moue, desiring you all either to muse vpon thē, or to answere thē at your leisure.

*The first Question.

First,* forsomuch as Mount Sion (which God calleth by the Prophet Iesai, the hill of his holines) beareth in the scripture an vndoubted type of the spiritual church of Christ: & for so much as the sayd Iesai. ca. 11. & 65. prophesying of the sayd Mount Sion, sayth in these wordes: *Non nocebunt ne{que} affligent in omni monte sancto meo, dicit Dominus. &c. 1. They shall not kill nor hurt, in all my holy hill, sayth the Lord. &c. And agayne in the same chap. thus we read: Habitabit Lupus cum agno, & Pardus cū haedo accubabit: Vitulus, & Leo & ouis vna commorabuntur, & puellus paruulus ducet eos. &c. i. The wolfe shall dwell with the Lambe, & the Leopard with the Kid: the Calfe, the Lion & the sheepe shall feed together, & a yong child shall rule thē. The Cow also & the Beare shall abide together w^t theyr yong ones, & the Lion shall eat chaffe & fodder like y^e Oxe. &c.

Upon these premises now foloweth my question, how the church of Rome can be answerable to this hill of Siō: seing in the sayd church of Rome is,* and hath bene now so many yeares such killing and slaying, such cruelty and tyranny shewed, such burning & spoyling of christen bloud, such malice & mischief wrought, as in reading these historyes may to all the world appeare.

To this if they aunswere, & expound these wordes of the Prophet, as pertaining to the church triumphant therevnto I reply agayne: * that by the wordes in the same place & in the same sentence expressed that sence cannot stand, for as much as the Prophet in the very same place, where he prophesieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy mountayne without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the earth, & sheweth also the cause of that godly peace. Because (sayth he) the earth is replenished with knowledge & science of the Lord. &c. ibid. And furthermore the Prophet speaking of the same day when this shalbe, addeth saying: In that day the root of Iesse shall stand for a signe to the people, for the Gentils to be conuerted, and to seeke vnto him▪ &c. Which day in no wise can be applyed to the church in heauen triumphant, but only here militant in earth.

Touching which place of Iesai,* further here is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable Moūt Sion (which comprehendeth both the states, as well ecclesiasticall as tēporall) is not restrayned the publicke penalty of good lawes needfull to be executed vpon publicke malefactors, but here is restrayned the fierceness, reuenge, cruelty, & violence of mens affections. To which affectiōs men being commonly subiect by nature, through grace & working of the gospel are altered, reformed, & chaūged to another disposition: frō stoutnes to softnes: frō violence to sufferance: from fierceness to forbearing: frō pride to humility, frō cruelty to compassion, from wilynes to simplicity, frō solemne singularity to humanity and meekenes. Which vertues, if they had bene in the church of Rome (according to the rule of S. Paul, which willeth men that be stronger, to beare with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the spirit of meeknes. &c. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.) I should not haue needed now at this time to write such a long history as this of the suffering of so many Martyrs.

The second Question.

MY second question is this: * to demaūd of you catholicke professors of the popes sect, which so deadly maligne and persecute the protestants professing the gospell of Christ, * what iust or reasonable cause haue you to allege for this your extreme hatred ye bear vnto the, y^r neither you your selues can abide to liue w^t them, nor yet will suffer y^e other to liue amongst you? If they were Iewes, Turkes or Infidels, or in their doctrine were any Idolatrous impitie or detestable iniquitie in their liues: if they went about any deadly destruction, or priuy conspiracies to oppresse your liues, or by fraudulent dealing to circūuent you, then had you some cause to cōplaine, and also to reuenge. Now seing in their doctrine ye haue neyther blasphemy, idolatry, superstition nor misbeliefe to obiect vnto them: seing they are baptised in the same beliefe, and beleue the same articles of the Crede, as ye do: hauing the same God, y^e same Christ & sauour, the same baptisme, & and are ready •s con•erre with you in all kinde of Christen doctrine, neyther do refuse to be tryed by any place of the scripture, how then riseth this mortall malice of you agaynst them? If you thinke them to be her•tickes, then bring forth if ye can, any one sentence which they arrogantly hold, contrary to the minde of holy scripture: expounded by the censure of most auncient Doctours? Or what is there in all y^r scripture to be required, but they acknowledge & confesse the same? See & try the order of their liues & doinges, what great fault find you. They serue God, they walke vnder his feare, they obey his law, as men may do: and though they be transgressors toward him, as other men are, yet toward you what haue they done, what haue they committed or deserued why you should be so bitter agaynst them?

What offended the poore habitants of Merindal & Cabriers when the bishop of Aix, the Cardinall of Turon, and other Bishops of France wrasting from Fraunces the French king a commission, * sent Men•rius w^t his Captayne Iohn de Gay to destroy theyr countrey, an. 1530. who driuing y^e poore people there into a barn ful of straw, set y^e barn on fire, & burned vp men, women, and children: And likewise in a church, exercised the like crueltie vpon them, where were murdered the same time to the number of a thousand yong and old, women, children, and yong infants, besides vii. whole townes, with the most part of the dwellers thering, being murdered & burnt in y^e sayd country of Prouēce.

Also before that, what offended the Cittizens of Tholouse and Auinion when Pope Gregory the ix. set Lewes the French king to warre agaynst them and agaynst Raymundus their Earle, without cause, where also the sayd kyng died at the siege.

Or to speake of later yeres, what hurt or harme did the poore Protestantes in the towne of Uassy, who peaceably being at a Sermon, were miserably slayne and cut• men, women, and children, by the Duke of Guyes and hys armed souldiours? besides other infinite examples almost not to be numbred of like crueltie, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Fraunce, and now of late in Flaunders, and in other countreyes moe.

But to let other countryes passe, let vs turne now to the peaceable gouernment in this realme of England, vnder this our so milde & gracious Queene now presently reigning. Under whome you see howe gently you are suffered, what mercy is shewed vnto you: how quietly ye liue. What lacke you, that you woulde haue, hauing almost the best rowmes and offices in all the realme, not onely without any losse of lyfe▪ but also without anye feare of death. And though a few of your Arch•lerkes be in custody: yet in that custody so shrewdly are they hurt, that many a good Protestant in the realme would be glad with all their hartes to chaunge rowmes and dyet with them if they might. And albeit some other for their pleasure haue slipt ouer the seas, if their courage to see countries abroade did so allure them, who coulde let them, yet this is certayne, no dreade there was of death that draue them. For what papist haue you seen in all this land to lose eyther life or limme for papistry during al these xii. yeares hetherto since this Queenes reigne? And yet all this notwithstanding, hauing no cause to complayne, so many causes to geue God thāks ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and mutter, and are not pleased with peace, nor satisfied with safety but hope for a day, and fayne would haue a chaunge. And to preuent your desired day, ye haue conspired, and rise vpp in open rebellion agaynst your Prince, whom the Lord hath set vp to be your gouernour.

And as you haue since that,* nowe of late disturbed the quiet and peaceable state of Scotland, in murdering most trayterously the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in sparing the Queenes life there when he had her in his handes, hath now therfore lost his own) so with like fury, as by your rebellion appeareth, would disturbe the golden quiet and tranquillitie of this Realme of England, if ye might haue your willes▪ Which the mercifull grace of almightie, for Christ his sonnes sake our Lord, forfend and vtterly disapoynt. Amen.

Wherefore these premises cōsidered, my question is to aske of you & know, what iust or reasonable cause ye haue of these your vnreasonable doinges,* of this your so mortall and deadly hatred, fury and malice you beare agaynst these your euenchristened, of these your tumultes, coniurations, gaping and hoping, rebellions, mutteringes, & murders, wherewith you trouble and disquiet the whole world. Of all which mischiefes, if the true cause were well known, the truth would be found doubtles to be none other but onely the priuate cause of the Bishop of Rome, that he is not receiued, and the dignity of his Church exalted.

Touching which cause how vnreasonable and vniust it is, more shalbe sayd (the Lord willing) in reply, according as I shal see theyr answer, if it shall so please thē, or any of thē to answer this question. In the meane time this for a briefe note shall suffice: that it standeth not with the scripture, but contrary to the scripture that the Bishop of Rome should so reuenge his owne priuate cause. If his title & plantatiō be good & of God, why doth he not refer it vnto god? And no doubt,* but if it be so, God will maintein it, though the whole world sayd no. If it be otherwise, it will fall & be rooted out, though all the world sayd yea, yea the greatest argument to proue this plantation of the Popes supremacy not to be of God, is, that the Pope fighting in his owne priuate cause, by outward & worldly force seeketh his owne glory▪ Christ our sauior being here refused himselfe, yet neither reuenged his cause, nor sought his owne glory, but only the glory & will of his father, thus speaking of himself: Si ego glorifico meipsū, gloria mea nihil est, pater meus est, qui glorificat me▪ &c. Ioan. 8. i. If I glorify my selfe, my glory is nothing, my father is he that glorifyeth me. &c. Euen so I saye with scripture, that if the Popes proc•edings were planted of God, he would not so wrastle for his glory, as •e doth. But forsomuch as he seeketh by such cruelty and bloodshed to exalt himselfe, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he shalbe brought low. &c. Luke. 18.

* The third Question.

MY third question I take of the 13. chap. of the booke of Reuelation. Which booke as it containeth a Prophetical history of the Church: * so likewise it requireth by histories to be opened. In this chapter mention is made first of a certayne beast comming out of the Sea, hauing vij. heads & x. hornes, with x. diademes of blasphemy. Unto y^e which beast the dragon, the deuill, gaue his strength, and great power to fight agaynst the Sayntes▪ & to ouercome them, & to make xliij. monethes: of the which beast, one of his heades was wounded at length to death, &c.

After this immediatly in the same chap. mentiō foloweth of an other beast, rising out of the land, hauing 2. hornes like a lambe, & spake like a dragon, & did all the power of the former beast before his face, and caused all dwellers of the earth to worship the beast: whose head was wounded, and liued. Who also had power to geue spirit & life to the sayd former beast, to make the Image of the beast to speak, & to cause al men frō the highest to the lowest, to take the marke of the beast in theyr handes and foreheades, & whosoeuer worshipped not the Image of the beast should be killed. &c.

Upon this description of these two beastes riseth my question, wherein I desire all papistes, from the highest to the lowest, either to answere or to consider with thēselues, what the spirit of the prophesy meaneth by the sayd 2. beastes. Neither is the mistery of this prophesy so obscure, but being historicall, by histories it may be explaned & easely expōded. Writing therfore to the Papistes, as men expert in histories, my question is this: that seing the prophesy of these 2. beastes must needes prefigure some people or dominiō in the world, of some high estate & power: they will now declare vnto vs, what people or domination this should be. Which if they will do playnely and truely, according to the markes & propertyes of the sayd ij. beastes here set forth, they must needes be driuen of force ineuitable to graunt and confesse, the same only to agree to the City & Empyre of Rome, & to no other: Which by these reasons folowing of necessity must needes be concluded.

*First, the beast wich came out of the sea, hauing the strength, the seat, and power of the great Dragon (the Deuill, called the Prince of this world, committed to him, who also had power geue ouer all tribes, nations, languages, people and countryes in the earth) must needes be an Empyre or Monarchy of great force, passing all other Monarchies in the world besides, and this must needes argue the Empyre of Rome and none other.

*Secondly, in that the best had vij. heads & x. hornes, with x. diademes full of blasphemy vpō thē: those vij. heades being expounded in the sayd booke, cap. 17. for vii. hilles, notoriously importeth the Citie of Rome, wherein were 7. hilles conteyned. The like also may be thought of y^e x. hornes being there expounded for x. kinges (signifying belike y^e x. Prouincies or Kingdomes of the worlde subdued to the Romaine Empyre) with x. crownes of blasphemy vppon their heades: all which conueniently agree to the Cittie of Rome.

Thirdly, where the sayd beast had power to make 42. monthes and to fight against the Saintes, and to ouercome them, &c. therby most manifestly is declared the Empyre of Rome, with the heathen persecuting Emperours, whiche had power geuē the space of so many monthes, (that is, from Tiberius to Licinius. 294. yeares) to persecute Christs Church as in the Table of the primitiue Church hereafter following is discoursed more at large.

Fourthly, where the prophet speaketh of the one of the heades of the beast to be wounded to the death, & the woūd afterward to be cured agayne, by that ye haue to vnderstand the decay and subuersion of the Citie of Rome & of Italy, which being one of the heades of the Romaine Monarchie, was subdued by the Gottes, Uandals, & Lombards, and the Cittie of Rome, thrise sackt and taken betweene the reigne of Honorius Emperour of Rome, and the tyme of Iustinian Emperor of Constantinople, & so remayned this head of Rome wounded a long time vnder the dominion of y^e Lombards, till at length this wound was cured agayne, as the sequele of this prophesie declareth: For so it followeth in the foresayd chap. of the Reuelation: And after this I saw (sayth he) an other beast rising out of the land, hauing two hornes like the lamb, and spake like the Dragon. Who practi•ed all the power of the first beast before his face, and caused all the inhabitantes of the earth to worship the first beast whose head was wounded and cured agayne &c. And to him it was geuen to geue life to the Image of the beast, and to make it speake: and also to make all them that will not worship the image of the beast, to bee slayne, and caused all from the most to the least, both rich and poore, free men and bondmen, to take the marke of the beast in their right hand and in their foreheades, so that none should buy and sell vnles he had the beastes marke about him▪ &c.

The description of this second beast being well viewed: it cannot be auoided, but needes must be applied to y^e byshop of Rome and to none other: * as by the history and order of times is euident to be proued. For who els representeth y^e hornes of the lambe of God which taketh away the sinnes of the world, but only he? who speaketh with y^e voyce of y^e Dragon so proudly, as he? The voice of the Dragon spake once to Christ: That all the glory of the world was his to geue to whom he would, & that he would geue it. &c. And doth not thys fal•e horned lambe speaking in the same voyce of the Dragon, say by the mouth of Pope Gregory 7. that all the kingdomes of the earth were hys, and that hee had power in earth to loose, and take away Empyres, Kingdomes, Dukedomes, and what els soeuer mortall menne may haue, * and to geue them where he would? &c. Ex platina in Vit. Gregorij. 7.

Furthermore, at what time the declining state of Rome began to decay, and Italy was brought vnder subiection of y^e Lombardes, then the Pope stirred vp Pipinus and Carol•s Magnus, to take his part agaynst the Lombardes, and to restore agayne, the old glory of y^e Monarchie to hys former state. And therefore who cured the wounded head of this beast agayne, but onely he? who gaue life and speach to the Image of the beast but he? who after that by helpe of the French kings, had subdued those Lombardes with other aliens, and had gotten the possession of Rome, into hys own handes, he so repared & aduaunsed the fame and name of Rome, that since that time all persons from the hiest, to the lowest, both rich & poore haue bene glad to send & seek to Rome, yea Kinges, Emperors, Queens, & Dukes haue bene glad to kisse the Bishops feete▪ and to lead hys horse by the bridle: So that the Maiesty of Rome in the old heathē Emperors days was neuer more terrible, nor glorious, nor neuer had more power to persecute & ouercome gods Saintes thē these lambelyke Byshops of Rome haue had, * and haue exercised these 500. yeares in Christendome. And therefore who els in all the world hath so much power to do the workes of the first beast, before hys face, as he? or who but he alone? which forceth both high and low, rich and poore, free and bond to receaue the seale, and to become loyall to the Citie and sea of Rome: so that whoseuer hath not the marke whereby to be knowne to holde of the Church of Rome, shall haue no place, to buy and sell nor to occupy in all Christendome.

Now if any Papist whatsoeuer, in answering to this my questiō can apply this prophetically mistery of these 2. beasts otherwise then thus, I would hartely desire him, to take so much paynes to satisfie this doubt at his good pleasure & laysure. In the meane season let this stand for a Corolarium, that the bishop of Rome by this description must be that second beast prophesied to come in the latter time of the Church vnder a false pretended lambe, to restore agayn the old persecutions of Rome, and to disturbe the whole Church of Christ, as this day to truely is come to passe.

The fourth Question.

AS touching my fourth question, although I could vrge you w^t an other like prophetically place of scripture no lesse euident agaynst the bishop of Rome,* taken out of the second Epistle of S. Paule to the The•la. where mention is made of the sonne of perdition, sitting in the Temple of God, as god, & aduaūcing himselfe aboue al that is called god &c. which place ye can by no reasonable euasiō auoyd: yet notwithstanding to let this passe, I turne my questiō to aske this of you, whether the religion of Christ be mere spiritual, or els corporall. If ye affirme it to be corporall as was the old religiō of the Iewes cōsisting in outward rites, sacrifices, ceremonies of the law: thē shew if ye can, what any one outward actiō or obseruatiō is required in christian religiō by the scripture, as necessary in a christen man, for remissiō of sinnes & saluation,* saue onely the two Sacramentall ceremonies of outward Baptisme, & of the Lordes Supper? Howbeit neither these also as they are corporall, that is to say neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other cōferreth remissiō of sinnes, nor saluation, but onely are visible shewes of inuisible & spirituall benefits. And furthermore if our god, whō we serue, be spirituall, how can his religiō & seruice be corporall as we are taught by the mouth of our sauior, saying: God is a spirit and therefore they that worship him, must worship in spirit & verity. &c. Ioan. 4.

Now if ye graunt (as ye must needes) this our christen religion to be spirituall, & not a corporall religiō, thē shew if ye can, any one poynt of all these things which ye striue for so much with vs, to be spirituall, but altogether corporall, & externe matters & ceremonially obseruations,* nothing cōducing to any spirituall purpose, as your outward successiō of bishops, garmentes, vestures, gestures, co•lors, choise of meates, differēce of dayes, times & places, hearing, seing, saying, touching, tasting, numbring of beades, gilding & worshipping Images, building monasteries, rising at midnight, silence in cloysters, abstaining from flesh & white meat, fasting in Lent, keeping Imberdayes hearing masse & diuine seruice, seing & adoring the body in forme of bread, receiuing holy water, & holy bread, creeping to the crosse, carying palmes, taking ashes, bearing candles, pilgrimage going, sensing, kneeling, knocking, aultars, superaltars, candlestickes, pardons: In orders crossing, annoynting, shauing, forswearing mariage: In baptisme, crossing, salting, spatling,* exorcising, washing of handes: At Easter ear• confession, penance doing, satisfaction: And in receiuing with bearded new shauen, to imagine a body, where they see no body: & though he were there present to be sene, yet the outward seing & touching of him, of it selfe, without fayth, conduceth no more, thē it did to the Iewes. At Rogatiō daies, to cary banners, to follow the crosse, to walke about the fieldes. After Pentecost, to go about with Corpus Christi play. At halowmas to watch in the church, to say a dirige & commendations, & to ring for all soules to pay tithes truely, to geue to the high aultar. And if a man will be a Priest, to say Masse & Mattens, to serue the Saynt of that day, and to lift well ouer his head. &c. In sicknes to be aneled, to take his rites, after his death to haue funerals, & obites sayd for him, and to be rong for at his funerall, moneth mind, and yearemind. &c. Adde moreouer to these the outward sacrifici• of the Masse, with opus operatum sine bono motu vtentis. &c.

All which thinges aboue recited,* as they conteine the whole summary & effect of all the popes catholicke religion: so are they all corporall exercises, consisting in the externe operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right catholicke christian, then it may be said, that men may be made perfect christians by flesh and blood, without any inward working of faith, or of the holy ghost. For what is in all these, but the flesh & blood, of his strength is able to accōplish, though no inward strength or motion of the holy Ghost did worke.

But now the order of our religion, & way of saluation consisteth not in such corporall or outward things as these, but in other more higher & more spirituall gifts, which farre exceed the capacity of flesh & blood: of the which giftes the chieftest & onely meane cause that saueth man, & remitteth sinnes, is his fayth in Christ. Which fayth I thus define, for a man to beleue by the bloudshedding of Iesus y^e sonne of god, his sinnes to be forgeuen, Gods wrath to be pacified, & himselfe to be iustified perfectly from all accusations that can be layd vnto him. &c. And though the Papistes make a light matter of this, to beleue in Christ, and when they heare vs say, that fayth onely iustifieth, they object to vs again and make it a small matter to be sauēd, if fayth onely iustifie vs. Yet notwithstanding, this fayth, if it be well examined, is such a thing that flesh and blood is not able to attayne therto, vnles Gods holy spirite frō aboue do draw him.

Moreouer besides this fayth, many other thinges are incident also to the doctrine of our saluation. Albeit as no causes therof, but either as Sacramentes and seales of fayth, or as declarations thereof, or els as fruites, & effects folowyng the same. So Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord be as testimonies and profes: that by our fayth only in Christ we are iustified, that as our bodyes are washed by water, and our life nourished by bread and wine: so by the bloud of Christ, our sinnes be purged, and the hunger of our soules releued by the death of his body.

Upon the same fayth riseth also outward profession by mouth, as a declaration thereof. Other thinges also as fruites and effectes do follow after fayth, as peace of conscience, ioy in the holy Ghost, inuocation, patience, charitie, mercy, iudgement, & sanctification. For God for our fayth in Christ his sonne, therefore geueth into our hartes his holy spirite of comfort, of peace, and sanctification, whereby mans hart is moued to a godly disposition to feare God, to seek him,* to call vpon him, to trust vnto him, to stick to him in all aduersities and persecutions, to loue him: & for hys sake also to loue our brethren, to haue mercy and compassion vpon them, to visite them if they be in prison, to breake bread to them, if they be hungry: and if they be burdened, to ease them: to clothe them if they be naked, and to harbour them if they be houseles. Mat. 25. with such other spirituall exercises of pietie and sanctification as these. which therefore I call spirituall, because they proceede of the holy spirite and law of God which is spirituall.

And thus haue ye a Catholicke Christian defined, first after the rules of Rome, and also after the rule of the Gospell. Now conferre these Antitheses together, and see whether of these is the truer christian, the ceremonial man after the Church of Rome, or the spirituall man with his fayth and other spirituall fruites of pietie following after y^e same. And if ye say that ye mixt them both together, spirituall thinges with your corporall ceremonies, to that I aunswere agayne, that as touching the end of remission of sinnes, and saluation, they ought in no case to be ioyned together, be^cause the meane cause of all our saluation and remission, is onely spirituall, and consisteth in fayth, and in no other.

And therefore vpon the same cause I come to my question agayne, as I began, to aske whether the Religion of Christ be a mere spirituall religion: and whether in the Religion of Rome: as it is now, is any thing but onely mere corporall thinges required, to make a catholicke man. And thus I leaue you to your aunswere.

IN turning ouer the first leafe of this booke, which is pag. 2. col. 1. and in the latter end of the same colume, thou shalt finde gentle Reader, the argument of Pighius & Hosius, wherein thus they argue: That forsomuch as Christ must needes haue a catholicke Church euer continuing here in earth, which all men may see & wherunto all men ought to resort: and seeing no other church hath endured continually from the Apostles, visible here in earth, but only y^e church of Rome: they conclude therefore the Church onely of Rome to be the right Catholicke Church of Christ. &c.

In aunswering whereunto this is to be sayd: that forsomuch as the medius terminus of this argument, both in the Maior and Minor, consisteth onely in the word (visible and vnknowne) if they meane by this word (visible) in the Maior that Christes Church must be seene here to all the world, that all men may resort to it, it is false: Likewise if they meane by the same word (visible in the Minor: that no other Church hath bene seene and known to any, but onely the Church of Rome, they are likewise deceiued. For the true Church of Christ neyther is so visible, that all the worlde can see it, but onelye they whiche haue spirituall eyes: and bee members thereof: nor yet so inuisible agayne, but suche as be Gods elect, and members therof, doe see it and haue seen it, though the worldly eyes of the most multitude cannot so doe. &c. Wherof read more in the protestation aboue prefixed to the church of England.

*The first Question.

First,* forsomuch as Mount Sion (which God calleth by the Prophet Iesai, the hill of his holines) beareth in the scripture an vndoubted type of the spiritual church of Christ: & for so much as the sayd Iesai. ca. 11. & 65. prophesying of the sayd Mount Sion, sayth in these wordes:*Non nocebunt ne{que} affligent in omni monte sancto meo, dicit Dominus. &c. 1. They shal not kill nor hurt, in all my holy hill, sayth the Lord. &c. And agayne in the same chap. thus we read: Habitabit Lupus cum agno, & Pardus cū haedo accubabit: Vitulus, & Leo & ouis vna commorabuntur, & puellus paruulus ducet eos. &c. i. The wolfe shall dwell with the Lambe, & the Leopard with the Kid: the Calfe, the Lion & the sheepe shall feed together, & a yong child shall rule thē. The Cow also & the Beare shall abide together w^t theyr yong ones, & the Lion shall eat chaffe & fodder like y^e Oxe. &c.

Upon these premises now foloweth my question, how the church of Rome can be answerable to this hill of Siō: seing in the sayd church of Rome is,* and hath bene now so many yeares such killing and slaying, such cruelty and tyranny shewed, such burning & spoyling of christen blood, such malice & mischief wrought, as in reading these historyes may to all the world appeare.

To this if they aunswere, & expound these wordes of the Prophet, as perteing to the church triumphant therevnto I reply agayne:* that by the wordes in the same place & in the same sentence expressed that sence cannot stand, for as much as the Prophet in the very same place, where he prophesieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy mountayne without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the earth, & sheweth also the cause of that godly peace. Because (sayth he) the earth is replenished with knowledge & science of the Lord. &c. ibid. And furthermore the Prophet speaking of the same day when this shalbe, addeth saying: In that day the root of Iesse shall stand for a signe to the people, for the Gentils to be conuerted, and to seeke vnto him▪ &c. Which day in no wise can be applyed to the church in heauen triumphant, but only here militant in earth.

Touching which place of Iesai,* further here is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable Moūt Sion (which comprehendeth both the states, as well ecclesiasticall as tēporall) is not restrayned the publicke penalty of good lawes needfull to be executed vpon publicke malefactors, but here is restrayned the fiercenes, reuenge, cruelty, & violence of mens affections. To which affectiōs men being commonly subiect by nature, through grace & working of the gospel are altered, reformed, & chaūged to another disposition: frō stoutnes to softnes: frō violence to sufferance: from fiercenes to forbearing: frō pride to humility, frō cruelty to compassion, from wilynes to simplicity, frō solemne singularity to humanity and meekenes. Which vertues, if they had bene in the church of Rome (according to the rule of S. Paul, which willeth men that be stronger, to beare with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the spirit of meeknes. &c. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.) I should not haue needed now at this time to write such a long history as this of the suffering of so many Martyrs.

The second Question.

MY second question is this: * to demaūd of you catholicke professors of the popes sect, which so deadly maligne and persecute the protestants professing the gospell of Christ, * what iust or reasonable cause haue you to allege for this your extreme hatred ye bear vnto the, y^r neither you your selues can abide to liue w^t them, nor yet will suffer y^e other to liue amongst you? If they were Iewes, Turkes or Infidels, or in their doctrine were any Idolatrous impitie or detestable iniquitie in their liues: if they went about any deadly destruction, or priuy conspiracies to oppresse your liues, or by fraudulent dealing to circūuent you, then had you some cause to cōplaine, and also to reuenge. Now seing in their doctrine ye haue neyther blasphemy, idolatry, superstition nor misbeliefe to object vnto them: seing they are baptised in the same beliefe, and beleue the same articles of the Crede, as ye do: hauing the same God, y^e same Christ & sauour, the same baptisme, & and are ready •s con•erre with you in all kinde of Christen doctrine, neyther do refuse to be tryed by any place of the scripture, how then riseth this mortall malice of you agaynst them? If you thinke them to be her•tickes, then bring forth if ye can, any one sentence which they arrogantly hold, contrary to the minde of holy scripture: expounded by the censure of most auncient Doctours? Or what is there in all y^r scripture to be required, but they acknowledge & confesse the same? See & try the order of their liues & doinges, what great fault find you. They serue God, they walke vnder his feare, they obey his law, as men may do: and though they be transgressors toward him, as other men are, yet toward you what haue they done, what haue they committed or deserued why you should be so bitter agaynst them?

What offended the poore habitants of Merindal & Cabriers when the bishop of Aix, the Cardinal of Turon, and other Bishops of France wrasting from Fraunces the French king a commission, * sent Men•rius w^t his Captayne Iohn de Gay to destroy theyr countrey, an. 1530. who driuing y^e poore people there into a barn ful of straw, set y^e barn on fire, & burned vp men, women, and children: And likewise in a church, exercised the like crueltie vpon them, where were murdered the same time to the number of a thousand yong and old, women, children, and yong infants, besides vii. whole townes, with the most part of the dwellers thering, being murdered & burnt in y^e sayd country of Prouēce.

Also before that, what offended the Cittizens of Tholouse and Auinion when Pope Gregory the ix. set Lewes the French king to warre agaynst them and agaynst Raymundus their Earle, without cause, where also the sayd kyng died at the siege.

Or to speake of later yeres, what hurt or harme did the poore Protestantes in the towne of Uassy, who peaceably being at a Sermon, were miserably slayne and cut▪ men, women, and children, by the Duke of Guyes and hys armed souldiours? besides other infinite examples almost not to be numbred of like crueltie, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Fraunce, and now of late in Flaunders, and in other countryes moe.

But to let other countryes passe, let vs turne now to the peaceable gouernment in this realme of England, vnder this our so milde & gracious Queene now presently reigning. Under whome you see howe gently you are suffered, what mercy is shewed vnto you: how quietly ye liue. What lacke you, that you woulde haue, hauing almost the best rowmes and offices in all the realme, not onely without any losse of lyfe▪ but also without anye feare of death. And though a few of your

Arch•lerkes be in custody: yet in that custody so shrewdly are they hurt, that many a good Protestant in the realme would be glad with all their hartes to chaunge rowmes and dyet with them if they might. And albeit some other for their pleasure haue slipt ouer the seas, if their courage to see countries abroad did so allure them, who coulde let them, yet this is certayne, no dreade there was of death that draue them. For what papist haue you seen in all this land to lose eyther life or limme for papistry during al these xii. yeares hetherto since this Queenes reigne? And yet all this notwithstanding, hauing no cause to complayne, so many causes to geue God thāks ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and mutter, and are not pleased with peace, nor satisfied with safety but hope for a day, and fayne would haue a chaunge. And to preuent your desired day, ye haue conspired, and rise vpp in open rebellion agaynst your Prince, whom the Lord hath set vp to be your gouernour.

And as you haue since that,* nowe of late disturbed the quiet and peaceable state of Scotland, in murdering most trayterously the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in sparing the Queenes life there when he had her in his handes, hath now therfore lost his own) so with like fury, as by your rebellion appeareth, would disturbe the golden quiet and tranquillitie of this Realme of England, if ye might haue your willes▪ Which the mercifull grace of almightie, for Christ his sonnes sake our Lord, forfend and vtterly disapoynt. Amen.

Wherefore these premises cōsidered, my question is to aske of you & know, what iust or reasonable cause ye haue of these your vnreasonable doinges,* of this your so mortall and deadly hatred, fury and malice you beare agaynst these your euenchristened, of these your tumultes, coniurations, gaping and hoping, rebellions, mutterings, & murders, wherewith you trouble and disquiet the whole world. Of all which mischiefes, if the true cause were well known, the truth would be found doubtles to be none other but onely the priuate cause of the Bishop of Rome, that he is not receiued, and the dignity of his Church exalted.

Touching which cause how vnreasonable and vniust it is, more shalbe sayd (the Lord willing) in reply, according as I shal see theyr answer, if it shall so please thē, or any of thē to answer this question. In the meane time this for a briefe note shall suffice: that it standeth not with the scripture, but contrary to the scripture that the Bishop of Rome should so reuenge his owne priuate cause. If his title & plantatiō be good & of God, why doth he not refer it vnto god? And no doubt,* but if it be so, God will maintein it, though the whole world sayd no. If it be otherwise, it will fall & be rooted out, though all the world sayd yea, yea the greatest argument to proue this plantation of the Popes supremacy not to be of God, is, that the Pope fighting in his owne priuate cause, by outward & worldly force seeketh his owne glory▪ Christ our sauior being here refused himselfe, yet neither reuenged his cause, nor sought his owne glory, but only the glory & will of his father, thus speaking of himself: Si ego glorifico meipsū, gloria mea nihil est, pater meus est, qui glorificat me▪ &c. Ioan. 8. i. If I glorify my selfe, my glory is nothing, my father is he that glorifyeth me. &c. Euen so I saye with scripture, that if the Popes proc•edings were planted of God, he would not so wrastle for his glory, as •e doth. But forsomuch as he seeketh by such cruelty and bloudshed to exalt himselfe, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he shalbe brought low. &c. Luke. 18.

* The third Question.

MY third question I take of the 13. chap. of the booke of Reuelation. Which booke as it containeth a Prophetical history of the Church: * so likewise it requireth by histories to be opened. In this chapter mention is made first of a certayne beast comming out of the Sea, hauing vij. heads & x. hornes, with x. diademes of blasphemy. Unto y^e which beast the dragon, the deuill, gaue his strength, and great power to fight agaynst the Sayntes▪ & to ouercome them, & to make xliij. monethes: of the which beast, one of his heades was wounded at length to death, &c.

After this immediatly in the same chap. mentiō foloweth of an other beast, rising out of the land, hauing 2. hornes like a lambe, & spake like a dragon, & did all the power of the former beast before his face, and caused all dwellers of the earth to worship the beast: whose head was wounded, and liued. Who also had power to geue spirit & life to the sayd former beast, to make the Image of the beast to speak, & to cause al men frō the highest to the lowest, to take the marke of the beast in theyr handes and foreheades, & whosoeuer worshipped not the Image of the beast should be killed. &c.

Upon this description of these two beastes riseth my question, wherein I desire all papistes, from the highest to the lowest, either to answere or to consider with thēselues, what the spirit of the prophesy meaneth by the sayd 2. beastes. Neither is the mistery of this prophesy so obscure, but being historicall, by histories it may be explained & easely expōded. Writing therfore to the Papistes, as men expert in histories, my question is this: that seing the prophesy of these 2. beastes must needes prefigure some people or dominiō in the world, of some high estate & power: they will now declare vnto vs, what people or domination this should be. Which if they will do playnely and truely, according to the markes & propertyes of the sayd ij. beastes here set forth, they must needes be driuen of force ineuitable to graunt and confesse, the same only to agree to the City & Empyre of Rome, & to no other: Which by these reasons folowing of necessity must needes be concluded.

*First, the beast wich came out of the sea, hauing the strength, the seat, and power of the great Dragon (the Deuill, called the Prince of this world, committed to him, who also had power geuē ouer all tribes, nations, languages, people and cuntryes in the earth) must needes be an Empyre or Monarchy of great force, passing all other Monarchies in the world besides, and this must needes argue the Empyre of Rome and none other.

*Secondly, in that the best had vij. heads & x. hornes, with x. diademes full of blasphemy vpō thē: those vij. heades being expounded in the sayd booke, cap. 17. for vii. hilles, notoriously importeth the Citie of Rome, wherein were 7. hilles conteyned. The like also may be thought of y^e x. hornes being there expounded for x. kinges (signifying belike y^e x. Prouincies or Kingdomes of the worlde subdued to the Romaine Empyre) with x. crownes of blasphemy vpon their heades: all which conueniently agree to the Cittie of Rome.

Thirdly, where the sayd beast had power to make 42. monthes and to fight against the Saintes, and to ouercome them, &c. therby most manifestly is declared the Empyre of Rome, with the heathen persecuting Emperours, whiche had power geuē the space of so many monthes, (that is, from Tiberius to Licinius. 294. yeares) to persecute Christs Church as in the Table of the primitiue Church hereafter following is discoursed more at large.

Fourthly, where the prophet speaketh of the one of the heades of the beast to be wounded to the death, & the woūd afterward to be cured agayne, by that ye haue to vnderstand the decay and subuersion of the Citie of Rome & of Italy, which being one of the heades of the Romaine Monarchie, was subdued by the Gottes, Uandals, & Lombards, and the Cittie of Rome, thrise sackt and taken betweene the reigne of Honorius Emperour of Rome, and the tyme of Iustinian Emperor of Constantinople, & so remayned this head of Rome wounded a long time vnder the dominion of y^e Lombards, till at length this wound was cured agayne, as the sequele of this prophesie declareth: For so it followeth in the foresayd chap. of the Reuelation: And after this I saw (sayth he) an other beast rising out of the land, hauing two hornes like the lamb, and spake like the Dragon. Who practi•ed all the power of the first beast before his face, and caused all the inhabitantes of the earth to worship the first beast whose head was wounded and cured agayne &c. And to him it was geuen to geue life to the Image of the beast, and to make it speake: and also to make all them that will not worship the image of the beast, to bee slayne, and caused all from the most to the least, both rich and poore, free men and bondmen, to take the marke of the beast in their right hand and in their foreheades, so that none should buy and sell vnles he had the beastes marke about him▪ &c.

The description of this second beast being well viewed: it cannot be auoided, but needes must be applied to y^e byshop of Rome and to none other: * as by the history and order of times is euident to be proued. For who els representeth y^e hornes of the lambe of God which taketh away the sinnes of the world, but only he? who speaketh with y^e voyce of y^e Dragon so proudly, as he? The voice of the Dragon spake once to Christ: That all the glory of the world was his to geue to whom he would, & that he would geue it. &c. And doth not thys fal•e horned lambe speaking in the same voyce of the Dragon, say by the mouth of Pope Gregory 7. that all the kingdomes of the earth were hys, and that hee had power in earth to loose, and take away Empyres, Kingdomes, Dukedomes, and what els soeuer mortall menne may haue, * and to geue them where he would? &c. Ex platina in Vit. Gregorij. 7.

Furthermore, at what time the declining state of Rome began to decay, and Italy was brought vnder subiection of y^e Lombardes, then the Pope stirred vp Pipinus and Carol•s Magnus, to take his part agaynst the Lombardes, and to restore agayne, the old glory of y^e Monarchie to hys former state. And therefore who cured the wounded head of this beast agayne, but onely he? who gaue life and speach to the Image of the beast but he? who after that by helpe of the French kings, had subdued those Lombardes with other aliens, and had gotten the possession of Rome, into hys own handes, he so repared & aduaunsed the fame and name of Rome, that since that time all persons from the hiest, to the lowest, both rich & poore haue bene glad to send & seek to Rome, yea Kinges, Emperors, Queens, & Dukes haue bene glad to kisse the Bishops feete▪ and to lead hys horse by the bridle: So that the Maiesty of Rome in the old heathē Emperors days was neuer more terrible, nor glorious, nor neuer had more power to persecute & ouercome gods Saintes thē these lambelyke Byshops of Rome haue had, * and haue exercised these 500. yeares in Christendome. And therefore who els in all the world hath so much power to do the workes of the first beast, before hys face, as he? or who but he alone? which forceth both high and low, rich and poore, free and bond to receaue the seale, and to become loyall to the Citie and sea of Rome:

so that whoseuer hath not the marke whereby to be knowne to holde of the Churche of Rome, shall haue no place, to buy and sell nor to occupy in all Christendome.

Now if any Papist whatsoeuer, in answering to this my questiō can apply this propheticall mistery of these 2. beasts otherwise then thus, I would hartely desire him, to take so much paynes to satisfie this doubt at his good pleasure & laysure. In the meane season let this stand for a Corolarium, that the bishop of Rome by this description must be that second beast prophesied to come in the latter time of the Church vnder a false pretended lambe, to restore agayn the old persecutions of Rome, and to disturbe the whole Church of Christ, as this day to truely is come to passe.

The fourth Question.

AS touching my fourth question, although I could vrge you w^t an other like propheticall place of scripture no lesse euident agaynst the bishop of Rome,* taken out of the second Epistle of S. Paule to the The•la. where mention is made of the sonne of perdition, sitting in the Temple of God, as god, & aduaūcing himselfe aboue al that is called god &c. which place ye can by no reasonable euasiō auoyd: yet notwithstanding to let this passe, I turne my questiō to aske this of you, whether the religion of Christ be mere spiritual, or els corporall. If ye affirme it to be corporall as was the old religiō of the Iewes cōsisting in outward rites, sacrifices, ceremonies of the law: thē shew if ye can, what any one outward actiō or obseruatiō is required in christian religiō by the scripture, as necessary in a christen man, for remissiō of sinnes & saluation,* saue onely the two Sacramentall ceremonies of outward Baptisme, & of the Lordes Supper? Howbeit neither these also as they are corporall, that is to say neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other cōferreth remissiō of sinnes, nor saluation, but onely are visible shewes of inuisible & spirituall benefits. And furthermore if our god, whō we serue, be spirituall, how can his religiō & seruice be corporall as we are taught by the mouth of our sauior, saying: God is a spirit and therefore they that worship him, must worship in spirit & verity. &c. Ioan. 4.

Now if ye graunt (as ye must needes) this our christen religion to be spirituall, & not a corporall religiō, thē shew if ye can, any one poynt of all these thinges which ye striue for so much with vs, to be spirituall, but altogether corporall, & externe matters & ceremoniall obseruations,* nothing cōducing to any spirituall purpose, as your outward successiō of bishops, garmentes, vestures, gestures, co•lors, choise of meates, differēce of dayes, times & places, hearing, seing, saying, touching, tasting, numbring of beades, gilding & worshipping Images, building monasteries, rising at midnight, silence in cloysters, abstaining from flesh & white meat, fasting in Lent, keeping Imberdayes hearing masse & diuine seruice, seing & adoring the body in forme of bread, receiuing holy water, & holy bread, creeping to the crosse, carying palmes, taking ashes, bearing candles, pilgrimage going, sensing, kneeling, knocking, aultars, superaltars, candlestickes, pardons: In orders crossing, annoynting, shauing, forswearing mariage: In baptisme, crossing, salting, spatling,* exorcising, washing of handes: At Easter ear• confession, penaunce doing, satisfaction: And in receiuing with beardes new shauen, to imagine a body, where they see no body: & though he were there present to be sene, yet the outward seing & touching of him, of it selfe, without fayth, conduceth no more, thē it did to the Iewes. At Rogatiō daies, to cary banners, to follow the crosse, to walke about the fieldes. After Pentecost, to go about with Corpus Christi play. At halowmas to watch in the church, to say a dirige & commendations, & to ring for all soules to pay tithes truely, to geue to the high aultar. And if a man will be a Priest, to say Masse & Mattens, to serue the Saynt of that day, and to lift well ouer his head. &c. In sicknes to be aneled, to take his rites, after his death to haue funerals, & obites sayd for him, and to be rong for at his funerall, moneth mind, and yearemind. &c. Adde moreouer to these the outward sacrifi• of the Masse, with opus operatum sine bono motu vtentis. &c.

All which thinges aboue recited,* as they containe the whole summary & effect of all the popes catholicke religion: so are they all corporall exercises, consisting in the externe operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right catholicke christian, then it may be said, that men may be made perfect christians by flesh and blood, without any inward working of faith, or of the holy ghost. For what is in all these, but the flesh & blood, of his strength is able to accomplish, though no inward strength or motion of the holy Ghost did worke.

But now the order of our religion, & way of saluation consisteth not in such corporall or outward things as these, but in other more higher & more spirituall gifts, which farre exceed the capacity of flesh & blood: of the which giftes the chieftest & onely meane cause that saueth man, & remitteth sinnes, is his fayth in Christ. Which fayth I thus define, for a man to beleue by the bloudshedding of Iesus y^e sonne of god, his sinnes to be forgeuen, Gods wrath to be pacified, & himselfe to be iustified perfectly from all accusations that can be layd vnto him. &c. And though the Papistes make a light matter of this, to beleue in Christ, and when they heare vs say, that fayth onely iustifieth, they object to vs again and make it a small matter to be saued, if fayth onely iustifie vs. Yet notwithstanding, this fayth, if it be well examined, is such a thing that flesh and blood is not able to attayne therto, vnles Gods holy spirite frō aboue do draw him.

Moreouer besides this fayth, many other thinges are incident also to the doctrine of our saluation. Albeit as no causes therof, but either as Sacramentes and seales of fayth, or as declarations thereof, or els as fruites, & effects folowyng the same. So Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord be as testimonies and profes: that by our fayth only in Christ we are iustified, that as our bodyes are washed by water, and our life nourished by bread and wine: so by the bloud of Christ, our sinnes be purged, and the hunger of our soules releued by the death of his body.

Upon the same fayth riseth also outward profession by mouth, as a declaration thereof. Other thinges also as fruites and effectes do follow after fayth, as peace of conscience, ioy in the holy Ghost, inuocation, patience, charitie, mercy, iudgement, & sanctification. For God for our fayth in Christ his sonne, therefore geueth into our hartes his holy spirite of comfort, of peace, and sanctification, whereby mans hart is moued to a godly disposition to feare God, to seek him,* to call vpon him, to trust vnto him, to stick to him in all aduersities and persecutions, to loue him: & for hys sake also to loue our brethren, to haue mercy and compassion vpon them, to visite them if they be in prison, to breake bread to them, if they be hungry: and if they be burdened, to ease them: to clothe them if they be naked, and to harbour them if they be houseles. Mat. 25. with such other spirituall exercises of pietie and sanctification as these. which therefore I call spirituall, because they proceede of the holy spirite and law of God which is spirituall.

And thus haue ye a Catholicke Christian defined, first after the rules of Rome, and also after the rule of the Gospell. Now conferre these Antitheses together, and see whether of these is the truer christian, the ceremonial man after the Church of Rome, or the spirituall man with his fayth and other spirituall fruites of pietie following after y^e same. And if ye say that ye mixt them both together, spirituall thinges with your corporall ceremonies, to that I aunswere agayne, that as touching the end of remission of sinnes, and saluation, they ought in no case to be ioyned together, be'cause the meane cause of all our saluation and remission, is onely spirituall, and consisteth in fayth, and in no other.

And therefore vpon the same cause I come to my question agayne, as I began, to aske whether the Religion of Christ be a mere spirituall religion: and whether in the Religion of Rome: as it is now, is any thing but onely mere corporall thinges required, to make a catholicke man. And thus I leaue you to your aunswere.

IN turning ouer the first leafe of this booke, which is pag. 2. col. 1. and in the latter end of the same colume, thou shalt finde gentle Reader, the argument of Pighius & Hosius, wherein thus they argue: That forsomuch as Christ must needes haue a catholicke Church euer continuing here in earth, which all men may see & wherunto all men ought to resort: and seeing no other church hath endured continually from the Apostles, visible here in earth, but only y^e church of Rome: they conclude therefore the Church onely of Rome to be the right Catholicke Church of Christ. &c.

In aunswering whereunto this is to be sayd: that forsomuch as the medius terminus of this argument, both in the Maior and Minor, consisteth onely in the word (visible and vnknowne) if they meane by this word (visible) in the Maior that Christes Church must be seene here to all the world, that all men may resort to it, it is false: Likewise if they meane by the same word (visible in the Minor: that no other Church hath bene seene and known to any, but onely the Church of Rome, they are likewise deceiued. For the true Church of Christ neyther is so visible, that all the worlde can see it, but onelye they whiche haue spirituall eyes: and bee members thereof: nor yet so inuisible agayne, but suche as be Gods elect, and members therof, doe see it and haue seen it, though the worldly eyes of the most multitude cannot so doe. &c. Wherof read more in the protestation aboue prefixed to the church of England.

Foure considerations geuen out to Christian Protestantes professours of the Gospell with a briefe exhortation inducing to reformation of life.

The first consideration.

AS in the page before, foure questions were moued to the Catholick Papists to answere them at theyr leysure: so haue I here to the Christian Gospellers foure considerations likewise for them to muse vpon, with speede conuenient.

THE first consideration is this euery good man well to weigh with himselfe the long tranquillitie, the great plenty, the peaceable libertie, which the Lord of his mercy hath bestowed vpon this land during all the reigne hetherto of this our Soueraigne and most happy Queene ELIZABETH, in such sort as the like example of Gods abundant mercies are not to be seene in any nation about vs, so as we may well sing with the Psalme in the Church. Non fecit taliter omni natione, & opes glorie sue non manifestauit eis▪ first in hauing the true light of Gods gospel so shining among vs, so publickly receiued, so freely preached, with such libertie of conscience without daunger professed, hauing withall a Prince so vertuous, a Queene so gracious geuen vnto vs, of our owne natieue country, bred and borne amongst vs▪ so quietly gouerning vs, so long lent vnto vs in such peace defending vs, agaynst such as would els diuoure vs: briefly what could we haue more at Gods hand, if wee woulde wish? or what els could we wish in this world, that we haue not▪ if this one thing lacked not grace to vse that well, which we haue.

The second consideration.

AS these things first are to be considered concerning our selues: so secondly let vs consider likewise, the state and tymes of other our countrymen, and blessed Martyrs afore past: what stormes of persecutions they sustained, what little rest they had, with what enemies they were matched▪ with what crosses pressed, vnder what Princes, vnder what Prelates they liued, or rather dyed in the dayes of King Henry the 4. king Henry 5. King Henry 7. King Henry 8. Queene Mary. &c. vnder Bo•er Bishoppe of London, Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester, Cholmley, Story, Bishoppe Arundell, Stokesley, Courtney, Warham. At what time children were caused to set fire to their fathers: The father adiured to accuse the sonne, the wife to accuse the husband, the husband the wife, brother the sister, sister the brother, examples whereof are plenty in this booke to be seene, pag. 774.

The third consideration.

THirdly let vs call to mynd, considering thus with our selues: These good men and worthy Martyrs in those dangerous daies, tastyng as they did, the heauy hand of Gods sharpe correction, beginning commonly with his owne house first if they were aliue now in these Alcion daies, vnder the protection of such a peaceable prince, O what thanks would they geue to God, how happy would they count themselues hauing but halfe of that we haue, with freedome onely of conscience, and safetie of lyfe. Or if in case we our selues had bene in those times of theirs so troubled and distressed as they were, spoiled of goods, hated of the world, cited in consistories, pinched in prisons, sequestred from wife, house and children, loking for nothing but death, What would we say? what would we thinke? what would we do? Much otherwise doubtlesse, then we do now, God graunt we may do better, for worse I thinke we cānot if we would. Ioh Wickliffe, W. Swinderby, Thorpe, Sawtrie, with a nūber of godly men moe, beyng thē glad in friese gownes goyng barefoote, to preach where they could. If they were now alyue, how glad would they be of these dayes, what paines would they take, yea what pains would they▪ not take in preaching the gospell, not for lucre, nor for mony, nor passing for promotions or dignities of the church? Sir I. Oldcastle L. Cobham, sir Rog. Acton, with diuers worshipful gentlemen a great nūber, If they being in our state might enioy with vs their houses and lands, with the good fauour of their Prince (as then they could not) how gladly would they haue contented themselues though they neuer raised their rentes and fines to the vndoing of their poore tenants? Likewise in the tyme of Ioh. Hus and Hierome of Prage, the Nobilitie and gentlemen of Bohemia, if they might haue had halfe this tranquillitie which we haue, to enioy the liberty of Gods word, and true vse of the sacraments without molestatiō of Romish prelates, what would they haue cared how simply they walked in their attire, without any such monstrous pomp in pranckyng vp themselues, as we Englishmen in these reformed dayes walke now, more like plaiers in a stage, then gods children in his Church.

The fourth consideration.

WHerfore, welbeloued, these thinges being so, let vs call our selues to mind, considering the times that haue bene, the times that be, and times that may come, how we stand, and by whom we stand. If it be the fauor of God onely, that doth support vs in the midst of so many enemies, let vs beware, in no wise we prouoke his indignation. If it be his trueth and Gospell that we professe, let vs walke in the light of his truth, and keepe our selues within the compasse of his Gospell: what the Gospel requireth, and what it abhorreth, who knoweth not? And yet who foloweth that he knoweth? If S. Paule willeth euery one to depart from iniquity▪ which nameth the Lord Iesus: And if the Lord Iesus himselfe testifieth playnely, his kingdome not to be of this worlde, how will then the nature of that kingdome so spirituall, and our conditions so worldly match well together? To rippe vp all our deformities in particular, I minde not here, neither need I, the same being so euident to all mens eyes, that who cannot see our excessiue outrage in pompous apparrell, our carnall desires and vnchast demeanors, without feare of God, our careles security with out conscience, as though there were no iudgement to come, our studyes so vpon this world, as though there were no other heauen: what pride and idlenes of life, double dissembling in word & deed with out simplicity, auarice vnsatiable, litle regard to heare Gods word, lesse to read it, least of all to folow it, euery man aspiring to worldly wealth and promotion, litle or no mercye to the poore, racking of rentes & fines, bribing and taking vnmeasurable. What should I speake of the contentions and vnbrotherly diuision amongst vs most lamentable to see,* but more lamentable, if all were seene which may or is like to folow vpon the same. Such were the times once of the Churh before the horrible persecution of Dioclesian, for so we read, such hatred and disdayne, through much peace and prosperity of the Church, to creepe in amongst the Church men. Read pag. 77.

Wherefore let vs be exhorted (dearely beloued) to reclayme our selues, whyle time doth serue. If we finde the Lord so gracious in sparing vs▪ as he doth, let that not make vs worse, but better. It is a lewd childe, which will not learne without beating. A well minding man will be good, not forced by coaction, but of voluntary office induced. As aduersity if it come, ought not to dismay vs: * so neither prosperity now present ought not to puffe vs vp in security, conside•ing what commonly is wont to folow. As Plato well writeth: Summae at{que} effrenatae libertatis seruitutē plerum{que} affeclam esse. Of immoderate liberty, and to much security, foloweth most commonly extreme seruitude. And as Hippocrates sayth: dispositions of bodyes when the are come to the highest perfection of health, then are they most subiect to daunger of sickenes. &c. Let vs therfore hauing light geuen vs, walke like children of light. Otherwise if we walke like children of disobedience, God hath his roddes to scourge vs, if we will needes be Rebelles, he hath his Pharaos and Nabuchodonosors to plague vs. Or if we will be so vnordinate, and (with reuerence be it spokē, without offence to God or man) so doggish and currish, one to another, the Lorde lacketh not his Doggestrikers to whippe vs. And would God our liues were such, that the destruction and ruine here of late seene amongst vs, may portend nothing agaynst vs, as I trust there is no cause for vs to feare, but rather to feare the Lord and walke in his obedience & amend that is amisse amongst vs. Amen.

The Grace of our Lord Iesus blesse thee gentle reader, that long mayst thou read and much mayst thou profite. Amen.

Pax Pradicantibus. Gratia Audientibus. Gloriam Iesu Christo. *Amen.

FINIS.

Actes and Monumentes of Christian Martyrs, and matters Ecclesiasticall, passed in the Church of Christ from the Primitiue beginning, to these our dayes, as well in other Countreys, as namely, in this Realme of England, and also of Scotland, discoursed at large.

CHRIST our Sauour in the Gospell of S. Mathew, Cap. 16. hearing the confessiō of Simon Peter, who first of all other openlye acknowledged him to be the sonne of God, and perceauing the secret had of his father therin, aunswered agayne and alludyng to his name, called him a Rocke, vpon which Rocke hee would buylde his Church so strōg, that the gates of Hell should not preuaile against it. &c. In which wordes three things are to be noted: First that Christ will haue a Church in this world. Secondly that the same Church should mightely be impugned, not onely by the world, but also by the vttermost strength & powers of all hell. And thirdly, that the same Church notwithstanding the vttermost of the deuill & all his malice should continue. Which Prophetie of Christ, we see wōderfully to be verified. In somuch that the whole course of the Church to this day, may seeme nothyng els but a verifying of the sayd Prophetie. First that Christ hath set vp a Church needeth no declaration. Secondly, what force, what sides and sortes of men, of Princes, Kynges, Monarches, Gouvernours, and rulers of this world, with their subiectes publikely & priuately, with all their strength & cunnyng haue bent them selues against this Church. And thirdly, how the sayd Church all this notwithstanding hath yet endured & holden his owne. What stormes & tempestes it hath ouerpast, wonderous it is to behold. For the more euident declaration wherof, I haue addressed this present history, entendyng, by the fauorable ayde of Christ our Lord, not so much to delight the eares of my countrey in readyng of newes, as most especially to profite the harts of the godly in perusing antiquities of auncient times, to the ende, that the wonderfull workes of God first in his Church might appeare to his glory. Also that the continuaunce and proceedings of the Church from tyme to tyme beyng set forth in these Actes and Monumentes, more knowledge and experience may redound therby to the profite of the Reader, and edification of Christian faith.

For the better accōplishyng wherof, so to prosecute the matter,* as may best serue to the profite of the Reader, I haue thought good first, begynnyng from the tyme of the primitiue Church, & so continuyng (by the Lordes grace) to these latter yeares, to runne ouer the whole state and course of the Church in generall, in such order as digesting the whole tractation of this history, into fiue sundry diuersities of tymes:

1First, I will entreat of the suffring tyme of the Church which continued from the Apostles age about .300. yeres.

Secondly, of the florishyng time of the Church, which lasted other 300. yeares.2

Thirdly, of the declinyng or backeslidyng tyme of the Church, which comprehendeth other 300. yeares, vntill the loosing out of Sathan, which was about the thousand yeare after the ceasing of persecution. During which space of tyme,3 the Church, although in ambition & pride, it was much altered from the simple sinceritie of the Primitiue tyme, yet in outward profession of doctrine and religion, it was somethyng tollerable, & had some face of a Church: notwithstanding some corruption of doctrine,⁴ with superstition and hypocrisie was then also crept in. And yet in comparison of that as followed after, it might seeme (as I sayd) somethyng sufferable.

Fourthly, foloweth the tyme of Antichrist, and loosing of Sathan, or desolation of the Church, whose full swyng containeth the space of 400. yeaes. In which tyme, both doctrine and sinceritie of life, was vtterly almost extinguished, namely, in the chiefe heades and rulers of this West church, through the meanes of the Romaine Byshops, especially countyng from Gregory the vij. called Hildebrand, Innocentius the iij. and Friars which with him crept in, til the tyme of Iohn Wickliffe, & Iohn Husse, duryng 400. yeres.

Fiftly and lastly,⁵ after this tyme of Antichrist, raining in the Church of God by violence and tyranny, followeth the reformation & purgyng of the church of God, wherein Antichrist begynneth to be reuealed, and to appeare in his coulors, and his Antichristian doctrine to be detected, the number of his Church decreasing, and the number of the true Church increasing. The durance of which tyme hath continued hetherto about the space of 280. yeres, and how long shall continue more, the Lord and gouernour of all tymes, he onely knoweth. For in these fiue diuersities & alterations of tymes, I suppose the whole course of the Church may well be comprised. The which Church, because it is vniuersall, and sparsedly through all countreys dilated, therefore in this history standing vpon such a generall argument I shall not be boūd to any one certaine nation, more then an other: yet notwithstanding keepyng mine argument aforesayd, I haue purposed principally to tary vpon such historicall actes and recordes, as most appertaine to this my country of England and Scotland.*

And for somuch as the Church of Rome, in all these ages aboue specified, hath chalenged to it selfe the supreme title, and ringleadyng of the whole vniuersall Church on earth, by whose direction all other Churches haue bene gouerned, in wrytyng therfore of the Church of Christ, I can not but partly also intermedle with the actes and proceedynges of the same Church, for somuch as the doynges & orderyngs of all other Churches from tyme to tyme, as well here in England, as in other nations, haue this long season, chiefly depended vpon the same. Wherefore, as it is much needefull and requisite to haue the doynges & orderyngs of the sayd Church to be made manifest to all Christen congregations: so haue I framed this history, accordyng to the same purpose. First in a generall description briefly to declare as in a summary Table, the misguidyng of that Church, comparyng the former primitiue state of the forenamed Church of Rome, with these later tymes of the same. Which done, then after in a more speciall tractation, to prosecute more at large all the particulars therof, so farforth as shall seeme not vnprofitable for the publike instruction of all other Christen Churches, to behold and consider the maner & dealyng of this one.* In the which one church of Rome foure things, as most speciall points, seeme to me chiefly to be considered. To wit, Title, Iurisdiction, Life, and Doctrine, wherin I haue here to declare, first concernyng the title or primacie of the Church, how it first began, and vpon what occasion. Secondly, concernyng the iurisdiction and authoritie therof, what it was, and how farre it did extend. Thirdly, touchyng the disorder of lyfe and conuersation, how inordinate it is. And fourthly, the forme of doctrine, how superstitious & Idolatrous of late it hath bene. Of the which foure y^e first was preiudiciall to all Byshops, the second derogatorie to Kings and Emperours. The third detestable to all men. The fourth iniurious agaynst Christ.

For first,* the title and stile of that church was such, that it ouerwent all other churches, beyng called the holy vniuersall mother Church, which could not erre, and the Byshop therof holy father y^e Pope, Byshop vniuersal, prince of Priestes,* supreme head of the vniuersall Church, and Uicare of Christ here in earth, which must not be iudged, hauyng all knowledge of Scripture and all lawes cōtayned with in the chest of his brest.

Page 2 Secondly the iurisdiction of that Byshop was such, that chalenging to him selfe both the swordes,* that is, both the keyes of the spirituality, and the scepter of the Laytie: not onely he subdued all Byshops vnder him, but also extended him selfe aboue Kynges and Emperours, causing some of them to lye vnder his feete, some to hold his sturup, Kynges to leade his horse by the bridle, some to kisse his feete, placyng and displacyng Emperours, Kynges, Dukes and Earles, whom and whē he listed, takyng vpon him to translate the Empire at his pleasure. First from Grece to Fraunce, from Fraūce to Germany, preferryng and deposing whom he pleased, confirmyng them which were elected. Also beyng Emperour him selfe sede vacante, pretendyng authoritie or power to inuest Byshops, to geue benefices, to spoyle Churches, to geue authoritie to binde and lose, to call generall Councils to iudge ouer the same, to set vp religions, to canonize Saintes, to take appeales, to binde consciences, to make lawes, to dispence with the law and word of God, to deliuer from Purgatory, to commaunde Aungels. &c.

Thirdly, what was the lyfe and conuersation of the court of Rome,* hereafter in the proces of this history followeth to be sene and obserued.

Fourthly, such was his doctrine in like maner, tedious to Students, pernicious to mens consciences, iniurious to Christ Iesus, & cōtrary to itselfe. In lawes more diuers,* in volume more large, in diligēce & study more applied, in vauntage & preferment more gaynfull, then euer was the study and learning of the holy Scripture of God.

All which foure pointes well cōsidered and aduised in this present history set forth, I trust it may minister to the indifferent Christiā Reader, sufficient instructiō to iudge, what is of this sea and Church of Rome to be esteemed.

But here by the way is to be noted, that all these deformities aboue touched of vayne title, of pretended iurisdiction, of hereticall doctrine, of schismaticall lyfe, came not into the Church of Rome all at one tyme, nor sprang with the begynnyng of the same Church, but with long workyng, and continuaunce of tyme by litle and litle crept vp, through occasion, & came not to full perfectiō, till the tyme partly of Pope Siluester, partly of pope Gregory the vij. an. 1170. partly of Innocentius the thyrd,* and finally of Pope Boniface the viij. an. 1300. Of the which foure Popes, the first brought in the title. an. 670. which was neuer in such ample wise before publickely exacted & receiued publickely in the sayd Church of Rome.* The second brought in iurisdiction. The thyrd, which was Pope Innocent with his rable of Monkes and Friers, (as Thomas Aquine, Petrus Lombardus, Iohannes Scotus;) and with such other Bishops as succeeded in the same sea after hym,* corrupted and obscured the sinceritie of Christes doctrine and maners also. And lastly, Pope Bonifacius the viij. and after him Pope Clement the fift, ouer and besides the iurisdiction, sufficiētly aduaunced before by Pope Hildebrand,* added moreouer the temporal sword to be caryed before them. And that no Emperour (were he neuer so well elected) should bee sufficient and lawfull, without the Popes admission. an. 1300. whereby the Popes power was brought now to his full pride and perfection. And thus came vp the corruption of the Romish Church in continuance of yeares by degrees, and not all together, nor at one tyme, as is declared, and hereafter more particularly (Christ willyng) shalbe expressed.

Wherefore, whosoever shall haue hereafter to do with any aduersaries, about the antiquitie or authoritie of the Church of Rome, let him here well consider when, & how the title, iurisdiction, & corruption of doctrine first begā in the Popes sea. And so shal he see, that the church of Rome, as it is now gouerned with this maner of title, iurisdiction, & institution of doctrine, neuer descended frō the primitiue age of the Apostles,* or frō their succession, nisi tātum aquinocè, & non vniuocè: Like as Sancta Maria picta, non est sancta Maria, & homo pictus est non homo, as the scholes do say: that is as the picture of the holy virgine, is not the holy virgine, and as a man painted on the wall, is not a man: so it is to be sayd of the Church of Rome, (the institution and doctrine of the Church of Rome I meane) that although it haue the name of the Church Apostolicall, & doth bring forth a long Genealogie of outward succession from the Apostles, as the Phariseis did in Christes tyme bryng their descent frō Abraham their father: yet all this is (as I sayd) but onely aequiuocè,* that is, in name onely, and not in effect or matter, which maketh the Apostolicall Church in deede, for as much as the definition of the Apostolicall Church, neither agreeth now with this present Church of Rome, nor yet the maner, forme, & institution of the sayd Romish Church, as it now standeth with this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine, had euer any succession or of•pring from the primitiue Church of the Apostles. But as Christ sayd by the Phariseis, that they were the childrē not of Abraham, but of the deuill: in semblable wise may be aūswered, that this Church of Rome now present, with this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now vsed, can not be fathered vpon the Apostles, neither Petrus, nor Linus, but of an other author, whō here I will not name.*

And here now commeth in the Argument of Pighius, Hosius, and Eccius, to be aunswered vnto, who arguyng for the antiquitie and authoritie of the Church of Rome, reason on this maner.

Da That for somuch as an ordinary & a knowen Church visible must here be knowen cōtinually on earth, during frō the time of the Apostles, to the which church all other Churches must haue recourse.

xi. And seeyng then there is no other Church visible, orderly known to haue indured from the Apostles time, but onely the Church of Rome.

j. They conclude therfore that the Church of Rome, is that Church wherunto all other Churches must haue their recourse. &c.

To the which Paralogisme I aūswere thus:* that this word Durans Ecclesia, the during Church in the Minor, hath fallaciā aequiuoci. For although the name of the Church and outward successiō of Byshops haue had their durance frō tyme of the Apostles, yet the definition and matter which maketh a true Apostolicall church in deede, and vniuocè, neither is now in the church of Rome,* nor yet the forme & institution of the church now vsed in Rome was euer frō the Apostles, whiche Apostles were neuer Authors or fathers of this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now taught in Rome, but rather were enemies euer to the same.

Agayne to the Maior which standeth vpon two partes,* I aunswere, first although the necessitie of the church duryng from the Apostles, may and must be graūted, yet the same necessitie was not boūd to any certaine place, or persō, but onely to fayth, so that wheresoeuer, that is to say, in whatsoeuer congregation true fayth was, there was the church of Christ: And because the true fayth of Christ must needes euer remaine in earth, therfore y^e Church also must needes remaine in earth. And God forbid that the said true faith of Christ should only remaine in one citie in y^e world, and not in other as well. And therfore to the secōd part of the Maior is to be sayd, that as this true and sincere fayth of Christ is not so geuen, to remaine fixely in one place or citie alone: so neither is there any one church in the world so ordained & appointed of God, that al other Churches should haue their recourse vnto it, for determination of their causes and cōtrouersies incident. &c. And thus much to the Argument of Pighius and Hosius, &c.

Now as touchyng the authorities & allegations of the auncient Doctours, and holy fathers in the commēdation of the Church of Rome, here commeth in also to be noted, that whosoeuer will vnderstand rightly their authorities and aūswere to the same, must first learne to make a difference and distinction of the sayd Church of Rome, frō that it was, to that it is, for as much as the Church of Rome is not the same Church now,* which it was then, but onely aequiuocē: otherwise as touching the very propertie and definition of a Church▪ it is an other Church, and nothing agreing to that was then, saue onely in outward name and place, therefore by this distinction made, I aunswere the place of Irenaeus, Cyprianus, and other famous Doctours, commendyng the Church of Rome as Catholicke and Apostolicall, and say that these Doctours speakyng of the Church of Rome which then was, sayd not vntrue, calling it Catholicke & Apostolicall,* for that the same Church tooke their ordinary succession of Byshops, ioyned with the ordinary doctrine and institution frō the Apostles: but speakyng of the Church of Rome, whiche now is, we say the sayd places of the Doctours are not true, neither doe appertaine to the same, all which Doctours neither knew the Church of Rome that now is, neither if they had, would euer haue iudged any thyng therein worthy such commendation.

Ouer and besides,* our aduersaries yet more object agaynst vs, who heauing and shouyng for the antiquitie of the Romish Church for lacke of other sufficient reason to proue, are driuen to fall in scannynge the tymes and yeares. What, say they, where was this Church of yours, before these fiftie yeares? To whom briefly to aunswere, first we demaund what they meane by this, which they call our Church? If they meane the ordinaunce and institution of doctrine and Sacramentes,* now receaued of vs, and differing from the Church of Rome, we affirme and say, that our church was, when this church of theirs was not yet Page 3 hatched out of the shell, nor did yet euer see any light: that is, in the time of the Apostles, in the primitiue age, in the tyme of Gregorie the first, & the old Romane church, when as yet no vniuersall pope was receiued publikely, but repelled in Rome, nor this fulnesse of plenary power yet knowen, nor this doctrine, and abuse of Sacramentes yet heard of. In witnes wherof we haue the old actes and histories of aūcient tyme to geue testimony with vs, wherein sufficiēt matter we haue for vs, to declare y^e same forme, vsage, and institution of this our church reformed now, not to be the begynnyng of any new church of our owne,* but to be the renewyng of the old aūcient church of Christ: nor to be any sweruyng from the church of Rome, but rather a reducyng to the church of Rome, Whereas contrary the church of Rome whiche now is, is nothyng but a sweruyng from the church of Rome, as partly is declared, and more shall appeare (Christ willyng) hereafter.*

And where the sayd our aduersaries doe moreouer charge vs with the fayth of our fathers and Godfathers, wherein we were baptised, accusing and cōdemnyng vs, for that we are now reuolted frō them & their fayth,* wherin we were first Christened: To this we aūswere, that we beyng first baptised by our fathers & Godfathers, in water, in the name of the Father, of the Sonne, & of the holy Ghost, the same fayth wherin we were Christened thē, we do retaine, & because our Godfathers were thē selues also in the same fayth,* therefore they cā not say that we haue forsaken the fayth of our Godfathers. &c. As for other points of Ecclesiasticall vses & circumstaunces cōsidered, besides the principall substaunce of fayth and baptisme, if they held any thyng whiche receaded from the doctrine and rule of Christ, therein we now remoue our selues not because we would differ from them, but because we would not with them remoue from the rule of Christes doctrine. Neither doth the Sacramēt of our baptisme binde vs in all points to the opiniōs of them that baptised vs, but to the fayth of him, in whose name we were Baptised. For as if a man were Christened of an heretique, the Baptisme of him notwithstanding were good, although the Baptiser were nought: so if our Godfathers or fathers, which Christened vs, were taught any thyng, not consonant to Christiā doctrine in all pointes, neither is our Baptisme worsse for that, nor yet we boūd to folow thē in all thynges, wherein they them selues did not folow the true church of Christ.

Wherefore as it is false, that we haue renounced the fayth of our Godfathers wherin we were first baptised, so is it not true y^t we are remoued from the church of Rome. But rather say,* and (by the leaue of Christ) will proue that y^e Church of Rome hath vtterly departed frō the church of Rome, accordyng to my distinctiō afore touched. Which thyng y^e more euidently to declare, I will here compare y^e church of Rome, with y^e churche of Rome: And in a gene'rall description set forth (by Godsgrace (the difference of both the churches, that is of both y^e tymes of the church of Rome:*) to y^e intent it may besene, whether we or y^e churche of Rome haue more Apostated from y^e church of Rome.

And here first I diuide the churche of Rome in a double consideration of tyme, first of those first .600. yeares which were immediatly after Christ: and secōdly of the other .600. yeares, which now haue bene in these our latter dayes. And so in cōparyng these two together, will search out what discrepance is betwene them both. Of the which two age and states of the Romane church, the first I call the primitiue church of Rome. The other I call the latter churche of Rome, countyng this latter churche from the thousand yeares expired after the binding vp of Sathā, to the time of his lousing agayne accordyng to the Prophetie of the xx. chap. of S. Iohns Reuelation, countyng these .1000. yeares from the ceasing of persecution, vnder Constantinus Magnus, to the beginnyng of persecution of the churche agayne vnder Innocentius 3. and Ottomannus the first Turcian Emperour. And thus haue ye the churche of Rome parted into two churches, in double respect and cōsideration of two sondry states and tymes. Now in setting and matchyng the one state with the other, let vs see whether the churche of Rome hath swarued from the church of Rome more then we,* or no.

AND to begyn first with the order and qualities of life: I aske here of this Romane Clergie, where was this Church of theirs which now is, in the old auncient tyme of the primitiue Church of Rome, with this pompe and pride, with this riches & superfluitie, with this gloria mundi, and name of Cardinals, with this praunsing dissolutenes and hooryng of the Curtisans, with this extortiō, bribyng, bying and sell yng of spirituall dignities, these Annates, reformations, procurations, exactions, and other practises for money, this auarice insatiable, ambition, intollerable, fleshly filthynes most detestable, barbarousnes and negligence in preachyng,* promise breaking saythlesse, poysoning and supplantynge one another, with such schismes & diuisions, which neuer were more seen then in the elections and Court of Rome these 700. yeares, with such extreme crueltie, malice and tyranny in burnyng and persecutyng their poorebrethren to death.*

It were to long, and a thing infinite, to stand particularly vpō these aboue rehearsed. And if a man should prosecute at large all the schismes that haue bene in y^e Church of Rome since the time of Damasus the first, which are coūted to the number of xviiij. schismes. What a volume would it require? Or if here should be recorded all that this Sea hath burned and put to death since loosyng out of Sathan, who were able to number them? Or if all their sleightes to get money should be described as processe of matter would require, who were able to recite them all? Of which all notwithstanding, the most principall groundes are reckoned at least to xiiij. or xv. sleights.

First for Annates,* or vacanties of Archbyshoprikes, Byshoprikes, Abbacies, Priories conuentuall, and other benefices electiue.

Secondly, for the holdyng and reteinyng of all other spirituall liuyng whatsoever, besides this which now the incumbent payeth for, or which he may hold hereafter.

Thirdly, new annates for all the same are required agayne, toties quoties, any one of all his spirituall liuynges be, or are fayned to be not orderly come by, whereby it hath chaunced diuers tymes three or foure Annates to be payed for one benefice.

Fourthly, for geuyng out preuētiōs of benefices before they fall, and many tymes some one preuention to be geuē to diuers and sundry persons, by the office for money sake.

Fiftly, for resignations vpon fauour, whiche in many cases the Pope chalengeth to be reserued to him selfe.

Sixtly, for commendams.

Seuently, for compoūdyng with such as be absent frō their charge, and geue attendaunce about the Court.

Eightly, for infinite dispensations, as to dispence with age, with order, with benefices incompatible, as if the nūber be full, if the house be of such or such an order. Item dispensation for irregularitie, for whoredome & aduoutry, for times of mariage, for marying in degrees forbidden, or in affinitie canonicall, for Gossips to mary, for the which it hath bene sene in Fraūce a thousand crownes to be payd to Rome at one tyme, for dispensing with this canonicall affinite of Gossippes, as we call it, the same beyng yet not true, but fayned. Item dispensing for caryng meates in tymes prohibited.

Ninthly, for innumerable priuilegies, exēptiōs, graces for not visityng, or visityng by a Proctor, for cōfirmations of priuileges, for transactiōs made vpon speciall fauour of the Pope, for permutatiōs of benefices with dispensation annexed, or makyng of pensiōs, with such like.

Tenthly, for mandates graunted by the Pope, to Ordinaries, wherof euery Ordinary, if he haue the collation or presētatiō of x. may receaue one mādate, if he haue fifty, he may receaue ij. mandates, & for euery mandate cōmeth to the Pope about xx. ducates. And yet notwithstādyng so many are sold, as will come buyers to pay for them.

Eleuenthy, for the Popes penitētiarie, for absolutiō of cases reserued to y^e Pope, for breaking & chāging of vowes for translation frō one monastery to another, also from one order to an other, for licēce to enter into certaine Monasteries, to cary about altars, with many other things of like deuise, pertaiynyng to the office of the Popes penitentiary.

Twelffly, for geuyng & graūtyng of innumerable Pardons and Indulgences, to be read not onely in publicque tēples, but also to be bought in priuate houses, and of priuate persons, in diuers and sundry respectes.

Thirteenthly, for makyng Notaries, and Protonotories, and other offices of the Court of Rome.

Fourteenthly, for grauntyng out Buls and Commissions of new foundatiōs, or for chaungyng of the old, for reducyng regular Monasteries, to a secular state, or for restoryng agayne into the old, & for other infinite rescriptes & writes, about matters dependyng in controuersie, & otherwise might and ought by the Ordinary to be decided.

Fiftenthly, for geuing the palle to Archbishops newly elected, by reason of all whiche deuises (besides the first of the Annates) it hath bene accounted out of the kynges recordes in Fraunce, in the tyme of Ludouike the ix. (as testifieth Molineus) to the number of CC. thousand crownes, onely out of Fraunce payd & transported to Rome. Which summe since that time hath bene doubled & tripled, besides Annates and Palles, whiche all together are thought to make the totall summe, yearly goyng out of Fraunce to Page 4 the Popes coffers •f late yeares x. Myriades, or Milliōs, euery Myriade mountyng to x. thousand crownes.* Now what hath risen besides in other Realmes and Natiōs, let other men coniecture.

Wherefore if the Gospell send vs to the fruites to know the tree, I pray you what is to be thought of the Church of Rome, with these fruites of lyfe? Or if we will seeke the Church in length and number of yeares, where was this Church of Rome with these qualities then, at what tyme the Church of Rome was a persecuted Church, not a persecutyng Church? And when the Byshops therof did not make Martyrs, as these do now, but were made Martyrs them selues, to the number of xxv. in order one after an other? Or when the Byshops therof were elected & exalted, not by factiōs conspiring, not by power or partes taking, not by money or frendes makyng, as they be now, but by the free voyces of the people & of the Clergy, with the consent of the Emperour ioyned with all, and not by a few cōspired Cardinals, closed vp in a corner, as they be now &c.

AND yet if there were no other difference in the matter, but onely corruptiō of life, all that we would tollerate, or els impute to the common fragilitie of man, and charge them no further therein, then we might charge our selues. Now ouer and beside this deformitie of life, wherein they are cleane gone frō the former steppes of the true Church of Rome, we haue moreouer to charge them in greater pointes, more nearely touchyng the substauntiall ground of the Church, as in their iurisdiction presumptuously vsurped, in their title falsely grounded, and in their doctrine heretically corrupted. In all which three pointes, this latter pretenced Church of Rome, hath vtter sequestred it selfe from the Image and nature of the auncient and true Church of Rome, and haue erected to them selues, a new Church of their owne makyng, as first vsurping a iurisdiction neuer knowen before to their auncient predecessors. For although the Church of Rome in the old primitiue tyme had his due authoritie and place due vnto that sea, among other Patriarchall Churches, ouer and vpon such Churches as were within his precinct, & bordering neare vnto it,* as appeareth by the Actes of Nicene Coūcell: yet the vniuersall fulnesse and plenitude of power in both the regimentes, spirituall & temporall, in deposing & dispensing matters of the Church, not to him belōging, in taking Appeales, in geuyng elections, inuestyng in benefices, in exēpting him selfe from obedience & subiection of his ordinary power & Magistrate, with his coactiue power newly erected in the church of Rome, was neuer receaued nor vsed in the old Romane church, frō which they disagree in all their doings.* For although Victor thē bishop of Rome. an. 200. went about to excōmunicate the East Churches, for the obseruation of Easter day: yet neither did he proceede therein, neither was permitted by Irenaeus so to doe. And although Boniface the first likewise, writyng to the Byshops of Carthage, required of thē to send vp their appellatiōs vnto the Church of Rome, alledgyng moreouer the decree of Nicene Coūcell for his authoritie: The Byshops & Clergy of Carthage assemblyng together in a generall Coūcell (called the vj. Councell of Carthage) to the nūber of .217. Byshops,* after they had perused the decrees in the autentike copies of the foresayd Nicene Councell, & fōūd no such matter, by the sayd Bonifacius alledged, made therefore a publike decree, that none out of that countrey should make any appeale ouer the sea. &c. And what maruell if appeales were forbiddē them to be made to Rome,* whē as both here in Englād the kyngs of this land would not permit any to Appeale frō them to Rome, before king Henry the ij. because of the murther of Thomas Becket, beyng thereunto compelled by Pope Alexander the iij. And also in Fraunce y^e like prohibitions were expressely made by Ludouicus Pius, an. 1268. which did forbid by a publicke instrument,* called Pragmatica sanctio, all exactions of the Popes court within his Realme. Also by kyng Philip named Le bel, an. 1296. the like was done, which not only restrayned all sēdyng or goyng vp of his subiectes to Rome, but also that no money, armour, nor subsidy, should be transported out of his Realme. The like also after him did king Charles the v.* surnamed the Wise, and his sonne likewise after him Charles the vj. who also punished as traytours, certaine seditious persons for appealyng to Rome. The like resistaūce moreouer was in the sayd countrey of Fraūce,* against the Popes reseruatiōs, preuētiōs, & other like practises of his vsurped iurisdictiō in y^e dayes of pope Martin the v. an. 1418. Item, when kyng Henry the vj. in England, and kyng Charles the 7. in Fraūce, did both accord with the Pope, in inuesting & in collatiō of benefices, yet notwithstanding the highe Court of Parliamēt in Fraunce did not admit the same, but still maintayned the old libertie & customes of the French Church. In so much that the Duke of Be•hfort came with the kynges letters patēt to haue the Popes procurations & reseruatiōs admitted, yet the court of Parliamēt would not agree to the same, but the kyngs Procurator generall was fayne to go betwixt them, as is to be sene in their Registers. an. 1425. the fift day of Marche. In the dayes of the which kyng Charles the vij. was setforth in Fraunce,* Pragmatica san•tio, as they call it, agaynst the Anna•es, reseruatiōs, expectatiues, and such other procedyngs of the Popes pretenced iurisdictiō. an. 1438. Wherefore what maruell if this iurisdiction of the Popes Court in excommunicatyng, in takyng Appeales, and geuyng of benefices, was not vsed in the old Church of Rome, when as in these latter dayes it hath bene so much resisted?

And what should I speake of the forme and maner of elections,* now vsed in the Church of Rome, cleane cōuerted from the maner of the old Church of their predecessors? For first in those auncient dayes, when as yet the Church remayned in the Apostles onely, & a few other Disciples, the Apostles then with prayer and imposition of handes, elected Byshops & Ministers, as by the Apostles Iames was made Bishop of Hierusalem. Paule in Creta elected Titus, and Timothe in Ephesus. Also Peter ordayned Linus and Clement in Rome. &c. After which tyme of the Apostles, when the Church began more to multiply, the election of Byshops and Ministers stode by the Clergie & the people, with the consent of the chief Magistrate of the place, and so continued during all the tyme of the Primitiue Church,* till the tyme, and after the time of Constantine the 4. Emperour, which Emperour (as writeth Platina and Sabellic. Enead. 8. lib. 6.) published a law concernyng the election of the Romane Byshop, that he should be takē for true Byshop, whom the Clergy and people of Rome did chuse & elect, without any taryng for any authoritie of the Emperour of Constātinople, or the Deputie of Italy: so as the custome and fashion had euer bene before that day, an. 685. And here the Byshops began first to writhe out their elections and their neckes a litle from the Emperours subiection,* if it be so as the sayd Platina and Sabellicus after him reporteth. But many coniectures there be, not vnprobable, rather to thinke this constitutiō of Constantine to be forged and vntrue. First, for that it is taken out of the Popes Bibliothecarie, a suspected place and collected by the keeper and maister of the Popes Librarie, a suspected author, who whatsoeuer fayned writynges or Apocripha he could finde in the Popes chestes of Recordes, makyng any thyng on his maisters side: that he compiled together, and therof both Platina, Sabellicus, & Gratianus take most part of their reportes, & therefore may the more be suspected. &c.

Secondly, where Platina and Sabellicus say that Constantine moued with the holynes of Pope Benedict the first made that cōstitutiō, how seemeth that to stād with truth, when both the Emperour was so farre of from him being at Constantinople, & also for that the sayd Pope raigned but x. monethes? which was but a small tyme to make his holines knowen to the Emperour so farre of. And giue he were so holy, yet that holynes might rather be an occasiō for the Emperour so to confirme and maintaine the olde receaued maner of his institution, then to alter it.

The third coniecture is this, for that the sayd constitution was not obserued, but shortly after by the sayd Benedict was broken in the election of Pope Conon. And yet notwithstanding albeit the constitution were true, yet the election there by was not takē away from the people, and limited to the Clergy onely, and much lesse might be taken away frō the Clergie, and be limited onely to the Cardinals, without the consent of their Prince and ruler, accordyng to their owne Rubrice in their Decrees, where the Rubrice sayth:De ordinatione Episcopi: Nullus inuitis detur Episcopus, cleri, plebis, & ordinis consensus & desiderium requiratur, &c. That is: Let no Byshop be geuen to any people agaynst their wils: but let the consent & desire both of the Clergy and of the people, and of the order, be also required. &c. And in the same Dist. also, cap. Sacrorū, we read the same libertie & interest to be graunted by Carolus Magnus, and Ludouicus his sonne, not to a few Cardinals onely, but to the order as well of the Clergy, as of the people, to chuse not onely the Bishop of Rome, but any other Bishop within their owne Diocesse whatsoever, and to the Monkes likewise, to chuse their owne Abbot, setting aside all respect of persons and giftes, onely for the worthynes of life, and gift of wisdom, so as might be most profitable for doctrine, and exāple vnto the flocke. &c. And this continued till the tyme of the foresayd Carolus Magnus, and Page 5Ludouicus his sonne, an. 810. of the which two, Carolus the father receaued expresly of Pope Ad••••he first, full iurisdiction and power to elect & ordeine the Bishop of Rome, like as pope Leo the ix. did also to Ottho•he first German Emperour, an. 961. The other, that is, Ludouicus, sonne to the foresayd Charles, is sayd to renoūce agayne, and surrender from him selfe and his successours, vnto pope Paschalis and the Romaines, the right and interest of chusing the Romane Bishop, and moreouer to giue and graunt to the sayd Paschalis the full possession of the Citie of Rome, & the whole territorie to the same belongyng. An. 821. as appeareth by the decree, Ego Ludouicus Dist. 63. But admit that fayned decree to be vnfaynedly true (as it may wel be suspected for many causes, as proceeding out of the same fōtaine, with the cōstitution of Constantine afore mentioned, that is, from the maister of the Popes Library, of whō both Gratianus & Volateran,* by their owne confession take their ground) yet the same decree doth not so geue away the freedome of that election, that he limiteth it onely to the Cardinals, but also requireth the whole cōsent of the Romaines, neither doth he simply & absolutely geue the same, but with cōditiō, so that, Omnes Romani vno consilio, & vna concordia sine aliqua promissione ad pontificatus ordinem eligerent: that is, whō as all the Romaines with one counsaile, & with one accord, without any promise of their voyces graūted before, shall chuse to be Byshop of Rome. And moreouer in the same Decree is required, that at the consecration of the same Bishop, messengers should be directed incōtinent to the Frēch kyng concernyng the same.

Furthermore, neither yet did the same decree (albeit it were true) long continue. For although Pope Stephen the fourth, and pope Paschalis the first, in Ludouicus time were impaced thorough discord without election of the Emperour, yet they were fayne by message to send their purgation to him of their election. And after that, in the tyme of Eugenius the ij. which succeded next to Paschalis, Lotharius sonne of Ludouicus,* and Emperour with his father, came to Rome, and there appointed lawes & magistrates ouer the Citie. Whereby may appeare the donation of Ludouike, in geuyng away the Citie of Rome to the Pope, to be fayned. And after Eugenius, pope Gregory the iiij. who followyng within a yere after Eugenius, durst not take his election without the consent and confirmation of the sayd Emperour Ludouicus. And so in like maner his successours pope Sergius the ij: Pope Leo, the iiij. pope Nicolas the first, and so orderly in a long tract of tyme, from the foresayd Nicolas the first, to Pope Nicolas the ij. an. 1061. (which Nicolas in his Decree beginnyng,*In nomine Domini Dist. 23. ordained also the same) so that in the election of the Bis•ops of Rome, commonly the consent of the Emperour and the people with the Clergy of Rome, was not lackyng. After which Nicolas came Alexander the 2. and wicked Hildebrād, which Alexander being first elected without the Emperors will and consent, afterward repenting the same, openly in his preaching to the people declared that he would no longer sit in the Apostolique sea, vnlesse he were by the emperor confirmed. Wherefore he was greatly rebuked, and cast into prison by Hildebrand, and so deposed. Then Hildebrand and his folowers so ordred the matter of this election, that first the Emperor, then the lay people, after that the Clergie also began to be excluded. And so the election by litle & little was reduced into the handes of a few Cardinals, cōtrary to all anciēt order, where euer since it hath remained.

And like as in elections, so also in power iudiciarie, in deciding and determining of causes of fayth, and of Ecclesiasticall discipline, the state of the Church of Rome, now beyng, hath no cōformitie with the old Romane Church heretofore. For then Byshops debated all causes of fayth onely by the Scriptures, and other questions of Ecclesiasticall discipline they determined by the Canōs, not of the Pope, but of the Church, such as were decreed by the auncient Councils, as writeth Greg. Turonensis in Francorum historia. Where as now both the rule of scripture, & sanctions of the old Councils set aside, all thynges for the most part are decided by certaine new decretall or rather extradecr•tall & extrauagant constitutions, in the Popes Canon law compiled, and in his Consistories practised.

And where as the old ordinaunce and disposition, as well of the common law, as of the sacred Coūcels, and institution of auncient fathers haue geuen to Byshops & other prelates, also to patrons and donors of Ecclesiastical benefices euery one within his owne precinct and dominion, also to cathedrall Churches and other: to haue their free elections & to prosecute the same in full effect: ordryng and disposing promotions, collatiōs, prouisions & dispositions of prelacies, dignities, and all other Ecclesiasticall benefices whatsoever, after their owne arbitremēt, as appeareth by the first generall Councell of Fraunce.* 16. q 7. cap. Omnes Basilicae, by the first generall Councell of Nice, cap 6. Also by the generall Councell of Antioche. cap. 9. and is to be seene in the Popes Decrees. 9. q. 3. Per singulas. And also beside these auncient decrees, the same is confirmed agayne in more latter yeares by Ludouicus the ninth French kyng in his constitution called Pragmatica sanctio, made and prouided by full Parliament agaynst the popes exactions. An. 1228. in these wordes as folow. Item exaction•s & onera grauissima pecuniarum, per curiam Romanam Ecclesiae regni nostri impositas vel imposita (quibus regnum miserabiliter de pauperatum existit) siue etiam imponendas vel imponenda leuari aut colligi nullatenus volumus: nisi duntaxat pro rationabili, pia & vrgentissima causa, vel ineuitabili necessitate, ac etiam de expresso, & spontaneo iussu nostro, & ipsius Ecclesiae regni nostri. &c. that is. Item all exactions & importable burdens of money, which the Court of Rome hath layd vpon the Church of our kingdome (whereby the said our kingdome hath bene miserably hetherto impouerished) or hereafter shall impose or lay vpon vs, we vtterly discharge and forbyd to be leuied or collected hereafter for any maner of cause, vnlesse there come some reasonable, godly, & most vrgent, & ineuitable necessitie, & that also not to be done without the expresse & voluntary commaundement of vs, & of the Church of the same our foresayd kingdome. &c. Now contrary and agaynst to these so manifest & expresse decreementes of generall Councils, & constitutions Synodall, this latter Church of Rome of late presūption, degeneratyng frō all the steppes of their elders, haue taken vpon them a singular iurisdiction by them selues, & for their owne aduauntage, to entemedle in disposing & trāsposing Churches,* Colledges, Monasteries, with the collations, exemptions, elections, goodes & landes to the same belongyng, by reason and exāple wherof haue come in these impropriations, first fruites, & reseruations of benefices to the miserable dispoyling of Parishes, & horrible decay of Christen fayth, which thynges amōg the old Romaine elders were neuer knowē. For so much then did it lacke, that due necessities were pluckt frō the Church, that Emperours, Kyngs, & Princes plucking frō their owne, rather did cumulate the Church with superfluities.

Agayne, when such goodes were geuen to the Church by those auncetors, they were neither so geuen, nor yet taken, to serue the priuate vse of certaine churchmen takyng no paynes therein, but rather to serue the publike subuētiō of the needy, as is cōteined in the canonicall institutiōs by the Emperour Ludouicus Pius set forth. An. 830. The wordes be these: *Res Ecclesiae vota sunt fidelium, pretia peccatorum, & patrimonia pauperum, that is: The goods of the church be the vowes and bequestes of the faythfull, prices to raunsome such as be in captiuitie or prison, and patrimones to succour them with hospitalitie, that be needy.

Wherunto agreeth also the testimony of Prosper, * whose wordes be these: Viros sanctos ecclesiae non vendicas•e vt proprias, sed vt commendatas pauperibus diuissis: that is, good men tooke y^e goodes of the church not as their own but distributed thē as geuē & bequeathed to the poore. And sayth moreouer: Quod habet Ecclesia, cum omnibus nihil habentibus habet commune, that is: Whatsoeuer the church hath, it hath it common, with all such as haue nothyng. &c.

Adde to these the worthy testimony of S. August. ad Bonif. Si autem priuatim,  quae nobis sufficient possidemus, nō sunt illa nostra, sed pauperum quorum procuracionem quodammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis vsurpatione damnabili vendicamus*, &c.

Likewise vowsons and pluralities of benefices were thyngs then as much vnknown, * as now they are pernicious to the church, taking away all free election of ministers from the flocke of Christ.

All which inconueniences as they first came and crept in chiefly by the pretended authoritie & iurisdiction abused in this latter church of Rome, so it can not be denyed, but the sayd latter church of Rome hath taken and attributed to it selfe much more, * thē either the limites of Gods word do geue, or standeth with the example of the old Romane church, in these three thynges especiall. Whereof as mentiō is touched before, so briefly I will recapitulate the same.

The first is in this, that whatsoeuer the Scripture geueth and referreth, 1 either to the whole church vniuersally, or to euery particular church seuerally, this church now of Rome doth arrogate to it selfe absolutely and onely, both doyng iniury to other churches, & also abusing the Scriptures of God. For albeit the Scripture doth geue authoritie to binde and loose, it limitteth it neither to person nor place, that is, neither to the Citie of Rome onely, more thē to other Cities, nor to y^e sea of Peter, more thē to other Apostles, but geueth it clearely to y^e Church, wherof Peter Page 6 did beare the figure, so that where soeuer the true Church of Christ is, there is annexed power to bynde & loose, geuen and taken meerly as from Christ, and not mediatly by the Pope or Byshop of Peters sea.

The second poynt wherein this present Church of Rome abuseth his iurisdiction contrary to Scripture and steps of the old Romane Church, 2 is this, for that it extendeth his authoritie farther and more amply, thē either the warrant of the word, or example of time will giue. For although the Church of Rome hath (as other particular churches haue) authoritie to binde and absolue, yet it hath no such authoritie to absolue subiectes frō their othe, subiection, and loyaltie to their rulers & Magistrates, to dispēse with periury, to denounce remissiō, where no earnest repentaunce is sene before, to number remission by dayes & yeares; to dispense with thynges expressly in the word foriddē, or to restrayne that which the word maketh free, to deuide Religion into Religions, to binde and burthen consciences with constitutions of men, to excommunicate for worldly matters, as for breakyng of parkes, for not ringyng bells at the Byshops commyng, for not bringyng litter for their horse, for not paying their fees and rētes, for withholding the church goods, for holding on their princes side in princely cases, for not going at the Popes commaundement, for not agreeyng to the Popes electiō in an other princes Realme, with other such thyngs mo & more vayne then these. &c. Agayne, although the Scripture geueth leaue and authoritie to the Byshop and Church of Rome to minister Sacraments, yet it geueth no authoritie to make Sacramentes, much lesse to worshyp Sacraments. And though their authoritie serueth to baptise mē, yet it extendeth not to Christen bels: * neither haue they authoritie by any word of God to adde to the word of God, or take from the same, to set vp vnwritten verities vnder payne of damnation, to make other articles of belief, to institute straunge worship, otherwise thē he hath prescribed, which hath told vs how he would be worshipped. &c.

3The third abuse of the Popes iurisdiction standeth in this, that as in spirituall iurisdiction they haue vehemētly exceeded the boūdes of Scripture, so they haue impudētly intermedled them selues in temporall iurisdiction, wherein they haue nothing to do. In so much that they haue trāslated the Empire, they haue deposed Emperours, Kyngs, Princes & rulers & Senatours of Rome, & set vp other, or the same agayne at their pleasure, they haue proclaymed warres, & haue warred them selues. And where as Emperours in aūcient tyme haue dignified thē in titles, haue enlarged thē with donations, & they receauyng their confirmation by the Emperours, haue like ingrattull clients to such benefactors, afterward stampte vpon their neckes, haue made thē to hold their s•urrupe, some to hold y^e bridle of their horse, haue caused them to seeke their confirmation at their hand, yea haue bene Emperours thēselues: Sede vacante, & in discordia electionis, and also haue bene Senators of the Citie. Moreouer haue extorted into their owne handes the plenary fulnes of power & iurisdiction of both the swordes, especially since the tyme of Pope Hildebrand: which Hildebrand deposing Henricus the iiij. Emperour, made him geue attendance at his Citie gate. And after him Pope Bonifacius the viij. shewed him selfe vnto the people on the first day like a Byshop, with his keyes before him, & y^e next day in his robes Imperiall, hauyng a naked sword borne before him, like an Emperour. an. 1298. And for so much as this inordinate iurisdiction hath not onely bene vsed of thē, but also to this day is mainteined in Rome, let vs therefore now compare the vsage hereof to the old maner in tymes past, meanyng the primitiue and first age of the Church of the Romaines. Wherein y^e old Byshops of Rome in those dayes, as they were then subiect to their Emperours, so were other Byshops in like maner of other nations subiect euery one to his Kyng & Prince, acknowledging them for their Lordes, & were ordered by their authoritie & obeyed their lawes, and that not onely in causes ciuile, but also in regiment Ecclesiasticall as appeareth Dist. 10. cap. 1. & 2. Dist. 97. cap. De illicita.

Also 24. q. 3. So was Gregorius surnamed Magnus, subiect to Ma••itius, * and to Phocas, although a wicked Emperour. So also both Pope & people of Rome tooke their lawes of the Emperours of Constantinople, & were submitted to thē, not onely in the time of Honorius an hūdreth yeares after Constantine the great, but also in the tyme of Martianus * an. 1451. & so further vnto the tyme of Iustinian & of Carolus Magnus, and also after the dayes of them. In all which cōtinuance of tyme, it is manifest, that the Emperiall law of Martiane did rule & bynde in Rome, both in the days of Iustinian, an. 150. yeres after, til the tyme of the Empire beyng translated from Grece vnto Fraūce. Whereby it may appeare false▪ that the Citie of Rome was geuē by Constantine the first vnto the bishop of Rome to gouerne, for that Pope 〈◇〉 the first wrytyng to the Emperour Honorius, c••eth in the same place Rome the Emperours Citie. Dist. 97. cap. 1. And Lotharius, also Emperour appointed Magistrates and lawes in Rome, * as is aboue mentioned. Moreouer, for further probation hereof, that both the Byshop of Rome & all other Ecclesiasticall persons were in former tyme, and ought to be subiect to their Emperours and lawfull Magistrates, in causes as well spirituall as ciuile,* by many evidences may appeare, takē out both of Gods law, and mans law. And first by Gods law we haue exāple of godly kyng Dauid, who numbred all the Priestes and Leuites, & disposed thē into xxiiij. orders or courses, appointyng thē cōtinually to serue in the ministry euey one in his proper order & turne, as came about: which institution of the Clergy, also good king Ezechias afterward renued, of whō it is written: he did that was right in the sight of the Lord, accordyng to all things as his father Dauid had done before, he tooke away the high groues, and brake downe Images. &c. 4. Reg. 8. The sayd Ezechias also reduced the Priests & Leuites into their orders, prescribed by Dauid before, to serue euey one in his office of ministratiō .2. Paralip. 30.31. And this order frō Dauid still continued till the time of Zachary at the cōmyng of Christ our Lord, beyng of Abias course, which was the viij. order of the Priestes appointed to serue in the tabernacle. Luc. 1. To passe ouer other lighter offices translated from the Priestes to the Kyngs authoritie, as cōcernyng the orderyng of oblations in the Temple, and reparations of the Lordes house, kyng Salomon displaced Abiathar the high Priest, by his kyngly power, and placed Sadoch in his stede. 3. Reg. cap. 6▪ Also dedicatyng the temple of the Lord with all the people, blessed the whole congregation of Israell. 3. Reg. 8. Iudas Machabeus also elected Priestes, such as beyng without spot had a zeale to the law of the Lord, to purge the Temple, which the Idolatrous Gentiles had before prophaned. 1. Machab. 4.

Also kyng Alexander writyng to Ionathas, appointed him chief Priest in his coūtrey.* 1. Mac. 10. Demetrius ordeined Simon & Alchinus in the like office of Priesthood. Iosaphat likewise as in the whole lād did set Iudges, so also in Hierusalem he appointed Leuites & Priestes, and heades of families to haue the hearyng of causes, and to minister Iudgement ouer the people.* 2 Paral. 19. By these & many other is to be sene, the Kynges & Princes in the old tyme as well, when Priestes were borne Priestes, as whē they were made by election, had the dealyng also in Ecclesiasticall matters, as in callyng the people to Gods seruice, in cutting down groues, in destroying images, in gathering tithes into y^e Lordes house, in dedicating the tēple, in blessing the people, in castyng downe the brasen Serpēt within the tēple, in correcting & deposing Priestes, in cōstituting the order & offices of Priestes, in commaundyng such thynges as pertained to the seruice & worshyp of God, & in punishyng the contrary. &c. And in the new Testament what meaneth the exāple of Christ himselfe both geuing & teaching tribute to be geuen to Caesar? to Caesar I say, & not to y^e high Priest.* What meaneth his wordes to Pilate not denying power to be geuen to him from aboue?

And agayne declaryng the kynges of nations to haue dominiō ouer thē, & willing his Disciples not so to do, geuyng vs to vnderstād the difference betwene the regimēt of his spirituall kingdome, & of y^e kingdome of this world, willyng all worldly states to be subiect vnder the superiour rulers & Magistrates, in whose regiment is dominiō and subiectiō, & not in the other. Whereunto accordeth also the doctrine of S. Paule,* where it is written: let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers, vnder whose obedience neither Pope, Cardinall, Patriarch, Byshop, Priest, Frier nor Monke is excepted,* nor exempted, as Theophilactus expoūdyng the same place declareth, & sayth: Vniuersos erudit, siue sacerdos sit ille, siue monachus, siue Apostolus, vt se principibus subdant: that is, he teacheth all sortes, whether he bee Priest, or Monke, or els Apostle, that they should submit themselues vnder their Princes. &c. And S. Augustine writyng ad Bonifacium, sayth in much like sort: Quicun{que} autem legibus imperatoris,quae, pro Dei veritate feruntur, obtemperare non vult, acquirit grande supplicium, that is, whosoever refuseth to obey the lawes of the Emperor, which make for the veritie of God, incurreth the daunger of great punishmēt. &c. Also in an other place, writyng cō•ra Cresconium, hath these words: In hoc enim reges sicut eis diuini•us praecipitur, Deo seruiunt, in quantum reges, si in suo regno bona iubeant, mala prohibeant, non solū quae pertinent ad humanam s•cietarem, verumetiam quae ad diuinam religionē &c. that is, Kynges accordyng as it is inioyned them of Page 7 God, do serue God in that they are kynges, if they in their kyngdome commaunde those thynges that be good, & forbid thynges that be euill, such as appertaine not onely to humaine societie, but also to Gods Religion. &c. And yet to come more neare to the Popes owne Doctours, Thomas Aquine not much discrepant from the iniunction of the Apostle aboue alledged,* thus describeth y^e office of a kyng: Hoc inquit, officium rex se suscepisse cognoscat, vt sit in regno, sicut in corpore anima, & sicut Deus in mundo, &c. Let a kyng (sayth he) vnderstand, that he hath taken this office vpon him, to be as the soule within the body, and as God in the world. In like agreemēt with the holy Apostle S. Paule, ioyneth also S. Peter:* be you subiect (sayth he) to euery humaine creature, whether it be to the king, as most preeminent, or to other set ouer you. &c. Where the common Glose addeth thereto, to obey the same, whether they be good or euill. These places rightly pondered, let any mā now iudge whether the Pope hath done open wrong to the Emperour, in surprising aboue the iurisdiction of his lawfull Prince and Magistrat, notwithstanding whatsoever his owne Canon law sayth to the contrary.

And as it is sufficiently hetherto proued by Gods law, that all Ecclesiasticall persons owe their due subiection to their lawfull Princes, in matters as well tēporall, as spirituall: so no lesse euidēces may also be inferred out of mā's law, and examples of the oldest fathers, to proue the same. And first to begyn with the example of Gregory the great, who in his Epistle to Mauritius writeth thus: Dominus meus fuisti,quando adhuc Dominus omnium non eras: Ecce per me seruum vltimum suum, & vestrum respondebit Christus, &c. that is: You were thē my Lord, whē you were not the Lord of the whole Empire, behold Christ him selfe shall make you aūswere by me, which am his most simplest seruauēt and yours, &c. And before him Eleutherius his predecessour Byshop of Rome, writyng to Lucius, kyng of this Realme, calleth him by the name of Christes Uicare: But what needeth much confirmation of this matter, whē the Popes decrees & Canons be full of recordes hereof, testifiyng how the auncient Church of Rome not onely receaued, but also required of the Emperours, lawes & cōstitutions to be made, touchyng not onely such causes, but also such persons as were Ecclesiasticall. And here to omit by the way the chap. Principes seculi, also cap. Administratores, 23. q. 5. with diuers other beside, I will recite out of the Epistle of Boniface the 1. to the Emperour Honorius,* so much as serueth for our purpose, written dist 92. cap. Ecclesiae, cap. Victor. Where it is mentioned that the sayd Bonifacius Byshop of Rome sent an hūble supplication to the forenamed Emperour, desiryng him by his authoritie to prouide some remedy against the ambitious cōtentions of the clergie, concerning the bishoprike of Rome. Which Emperor Honorius incontinent at his request, directed & stablished a law, that none should be made Byshop of Rome through ambitiō, charging all Ecclesiasticall Ministers to surcease frō ambition, appointyng moreouer, that if two were elected together, neither of them both should be takē, but the election to proceed further to an other to be chosen by a full consent of voyces,* as is expressed. Dist. 79. cap. Si duo.

To this I adioyne also the law & constitution of Iustinian the Emperour, ratified and renewed afterward in the counsell of Paris, in tyme of king Ludouicus Pius. Where all Byshops & Priestes be expresly forbiddē not to excommunicate any mā, before his cause was knowen & proued to be such, as for the whiche the auncient Canons of the Church would him to be excōmunicate. And if any should otherwise proceede cōtrary to the same, thē the excōmunicate person to be absolved by y^e authoritie of an higher degree, & the excōmunicate to be sequestred frō the communiō, so long as should seeme conueniēt to him that had the executiō therof, as is expressed. 24. q. 3. De illicita. The same Iustinian moreouer in his lawes & cōstitutions,* how many thynges did he dispose & ordeine in Church matters, as to haue a determinate number of Churchmen or Clerkes in Churches. cōst. 3. Also cōcerning Monasteries & Mōkes. const. 5. how Byshops & Priestes should be ordeined. cōst. 6. concerning remouyng of Ecclesiasticall persons frō one Church to an other.* Also concernyng y^e constitution of the Churches in Affrike. And that the holy misteries should not be done in priuate houses, so y^t whosoever should attēpt the contrary, should be depriued. const. 57. Moreouer cōcernyng Clerkes leauyng their Churches. const. 58. Also concerning the order & maner of funerals. const. 59. And that Byshops should not keepe frō their flocke. const. 67. The same Iustiniā graūted to the Clergy of Constātinople the priuiledge of the secular court, in cases onely ciuile, and such as touched not the disturbaūce of the Byshop, otherwise in all criminall causes he left them to the iudgemēt of the secular court. const. 83. He geueth also lawes & decrees for breach of matrimonie. const. 117. & in diuers other places. And in his const. 123. after the doctrine of S. Paule, he commaūdeth all Byshops & Priestes to sounde out their seruice,* & to celebrate the misteries, not after a secrete maner, but with a loude voyce, so as they might not onely be heard, but also be vnderstand of the faythfull people, what was sayd & done, Whereby it is to be gathered, that diuine prayers and seruice then, was in the vulgar toung.

And as the said Iustinian, & other Emperours in those dayes had the iurisdiction and gouernement ouer spirituall matters & persons, the like examples also may be brought of other kyngs, in other lādes, who had no lesse authoritie in their Realmes,* then Emperours had in their Empire. As in Fraūce, Clodoueus the first Christened kyng at Orleans caused a Coūcell of 33. Byshops, where .33. Canons were instituted cōcernyng the gouernemēt of the Church,* within .200. yeares after Christ. Ex primo Tomo Concil. Carolus Magnus, beside his other lawes and edictes political, called v. Synodes, one at Mentz, the second at Rome, the third at Remes, the fourth at Cabilone, the fift at Ar•late, where sundry rites & ordinaūces were geuen to the Clergy, about .810. yeares after Christ. The same Carolus also decreed that onely the Canonickall bookes of Scripture should be read in the Church,* & none other. Which before also was decreed. an. 4.17. in the third generall Councel of Carthage. Item he exhorteth and chargeth Byshops and Priests to preach the word, with a godly iniūction: Episcopi verò vt siue per se, siue per vicarios, pabulum verbi diuini sedulò populis annuncient. Quia vt ait beatus Gregorius: Iram contra se occulti iudicis excitat Sacerdos si sine praedicationis sonitu incedit. Et vt ipsi clerum sibi commissum in sobrietate & castitate nutriant. Superstitiones quas quibusdam in locis in exequijs mortuorum nōnulli faciunt,eradicent, that is: That bishops either by them selues, or their deputies shall shew forth y^e foode of Gods word to the people with all diligēce. For as Gregory sayth, the Priest procureth against him the wrath of y^e secret iudge, which goeth without the sound of preaching. And also that they bring vp their Clergy to thē cōmitted in sobernes & chastitie. The superstitiō which in certaine places is vsed of some, about the Funerals of the dead, let them exterminate & plucke vp by the rootes, &c.

Moreouer, instructing & informyng the sayd Byshops & Priestes in the office of preaching, willeth thē, not to suffer any to fayne or preach to the people any new doctrine of their owne inuētion, & not agreing to the word of God, but that they them selues both will preach such thyngs as lead to eternall life, and also that they set vp other to do the same, & ioyneth with all a godly exhortation. Ideo, dilectissimi, toto corde praeparemus nos in scientia veritatis, & mox: vt diuina donante gratia verbum Dei currat & crescat, & multiplicetur, in profectum Ecclesiae Dei sanctae, & salutem animarū nostrarum, & laudem, & gloriam nominis Domini nostri Iesu Christi Pax praedicantibus, gratia obedientibus, gloria Domino nostro Iesu Christo, Amen. Furthermore, the said Carolus in his constitutions diuideth the goodes geuē to the Church so, that in y^e more welthy places, two partes should go to the vse of the poore, y^e third to the stipēd of the Clergy. Otherwise in poorer places an equall diuisiō to be made betwene the pouertie & the Clergy, vnles the gift had some speciall exception. Ex Ansegiso. lib. 1. cap. 80. And in the same booke a little after, cap. 83. the author declareth by the sayd Carolus to be decreed, that no Ecclesiasticall person or persons frō thenceforth should presume to take of any person, any such gift or donation, wherby y^e childrē or kinsfolkes of the sayd Donor should be defeited of their inheritance duly to them belongyng. Ludouicus Pius king of France, & after Emperour, was sonne to the foresaid Charles who being ioined together with the said Charles his father in y^e Empire,* ordained also with his father sundry actes & obseruaunces touchyng the gouernement of the Church, as in y^e author before alledged may appeare. As first, that no entry should be made into the Church by Symony:* Agayne, that Byshops should be ordained by the free electiō of the Clergie & of the people, without all respect of person or reward, onely for the merite of life, and gift of heauenly wisdomē.

Also the sayd Kynges & Emperours forbad that any free mā or Citizen should enter the professiō of Monkerie, without licence asked of the kyng before, & added a double cause wherfore. First, for that many not for meere deuotiō, but for idlenes and auoyding the kynges warres, do geue thē selues to Religiō: againe, for that many be craftely circumuēted & deluded by subtile couetous persons, seekyng to get frō them that which they haue. Lib. 1. cap. 114. ibidem. Itē that no young childrē or boyes should be shauē or enter any profession, without the will of their Parētes. And no young maydens should take the veale or profession of a Page 8 Nunne, before she came to sufficient discretion of yeres to discernē & chuse what they will follow. That none should be interred or buried thēce forth within the Church, which also was decreed by Theodosius & Valentinianus 40. yeares before them.* Item the sayd Carolus .22. yeares before this Emperour, enacted that murderers & such as were gilty of death by the law, should haue no sanctuary by flyng into the Church. &c. which also was decreed by Iustiniā .300. yeares before this Carolus. Ex Nouel. Iustinia.

Moreouer the foresayd Ludouicus Pius, with his sonne Clothari{us} (or as some call him, Lotharius) ioyned with him, among other Ecclesiasticall Sanctions, ordained a godly law, for laymen to cōmunicate the Sacrament of the body & bloud of the Lord in these wordes: Vt si nō frequētius, vel ter, laici homines communicent: nisi fortē grauioribus quibus•am criminibus impediātur. That laymen do communicate at least thrise, if not oftē, except they be let percase by some more haynous greuous offences. Anseg. lib. 2. cap. 43. Item they enacted that no goodes of the Church should be alienated vnder the payne Leoninae constitutionis. Unto this Lotharius French kyng and Emperour, Pope Leo the 4. writeth that Romana lex,* that is, the Romane law (meanynge the law of the Frēch Emperours) as it hath hetherto stode in force: Ita & nunc suum robur propriūm{que} vigorem obtineat, that is: so now it may continue still in his vigour and strength.*Ino Carnotensis. lib. 11. Decretorum, about the yeare of the Lord .848. After this Lotharius succeeded his sonne Ludouicus the second in the kyngdome & Empire of Fraunce, before whō the foresayd Pope Leo was brought into iudgement, & pleaded his cause of treason, and there was before the Emperour quyte and released. Which declareth that Popes and Byshops all this while were in subiection vnder their Kynges and Emperours.

Moreouer descendyng yet to lower tymes. an. 1228. Ludouicus 9. called holy Ludouike, made a law agaynst the pestiferous simonie in the Church, also for y^e maintenaūce of the libertie of the Church of Fraūce, established a law or decree, agaynst the new inuētions, reseruatiōs, preuētiōs, & exactions of y^e court of Rome, called Pragmatica sanctio, S. Ludouici,* the which Sāction was also practised lōg after in the kyngdome of Fraūce agaynst the popes collectors & vndercollectors, as appeareth by the Arestum of the coūsaile of Paris. an. 1463. ex Molinaeo in Cōmētarijs. Furthermore king Philip le Bel. 1303. set forth a law, called Philippina, wherein was forbid any exactiō of new tithes and first fruites, & other vncustomed collections, to be put vpon the Church of Fraūce. Carolus the v. named Sapiens. an. 1369. by a law cōmaūded, that no Byshops nor Prelates, or their Officials within his kyngdome of Fraūce should execute any censure of suspense, or excommunicatiō, at the Popes cōmaundemēt, ouer or vpō the Cities, or townes, corporations, or cōmons of his Realme, ex regist, antiquarū const. chart. 62.* Itē Carolus vi. an. 1388. agaynst y^e Cardinals & other Officials, & collectors of the Pope, reuoking againe the power which he had geuē to thē before, prouided by a law, that the fruites & rentes of benefices, with other pensions, & Byshops goodes that departed, should no more be exported by the Cardinals & the Popes collectours vnto Rome, but should be brought to the king, and so restored to them to whō they rightly did appertaine.

The like also may be inferred & proued by the stories & exāples of our kyngs here in Englād, as kyng Offa, kyng Egbertus, Edgarus, Aluredus, Athelwoldus, Canutus, Edwardus. William Conquerour, Wilhel. Rufus, Henricus the first, Henricus the second, till the tyme of kyng Iohn and after. Whose dealyng as well in Ecclesiasticall cases, as in tēporall, is a sufficient demonstration to proue what iniury the Popes, in these latter dayes, haue done vnto the Emperours their lawfull gouernours & Magistrates: in vsurpyng such fulnes of power & iurisdictiō ouer them, to whō properly they owe subiection, cōtrary to the steps & example of the old Romaine Byshops their aunciters, & therfore haue incurred the daūger of a Premunire, worthy to be depriued. Although it is not to be denyed, but that Ecclesiasticall ministers and seruitures haue their power also committed vnto thē, after their sort, of the Lord: yet it becommeth euery man to know his owne place & standyng, & there to keepe him, wherein his owne precinct doth pale him & not rashly to breake out into other mēs walkes. As it is not lawfull for a ciuile Magistrate to intermedle with a Byshops or a Preachers function: so vnseemely & vnorderly it is agayne that Boniface the viij. should haue borne before him the tēporall male, & the naked sword of the Emperour, or that any Pope should beare a triple crowne, or take vpon him like a Lord and Kyng. Wherefore let euery man consider the compasse & limitation of his charge, & exceede no farther. The office of a Bishop or seruiture Ecclesiasticall, was in the old law to offer sacrifice,* to burne incense, to pray for the people, to expounde the law, to minister in the tabernacle, w^t which office it was not lawfull for any Prince or mā els to intermedle, as we read how Ozias was punished for offering incense, & an other for touchyng the Arke: so now the office of Christian Ministers is to preach the word, to minister Sacramēts, to pray, to binde and loose, where cause vrgently requireth, to iudge in spirituall cases, to publishe & denounce free reconciliation, & remissiō in the name of Christ, to erect & comfort troubled consciences with the rich grace of the Gospell, to teach the people the true differēce betwixt the law and the Gospell, whereof the one belongeth to such as be not in Christ, and come not to him: the other pertaineth to the true beleuers in the sonne of God, to admonish also the Magistrates erryng or transgressing in their office. &c.

And as these properly belong to the functiō of the Ecclesiasticall sort: * so hath y^e ciuile gouernour or Magistrate agayne his proper charge & office to him assigned, whiche is, to see the administratiō of iustice & iudgement, to defend with power the right of the weake that suffer wrōg, to defend from oppression the poore oppressed, to minister with equalitie, that which is right and equall to euery man: to prouide lawes good & godly, to see the execution of y^e same as cause moueth: especially to see the law of God mainteined, to promote Christes glory & Gospell, in setting vp & sendyng out good Preachers, in mainteinyng the same, in prouidyng Byshops to be elected that be faythfull, in remouyng or els correctyng the same beyng faulty or negligēt, in congregatyng the Clergy whē neede is of any coūsell or electiō, to heare their learning in causes propouēded, & according to the truth learned, to direct his iudgemēt, in disposing such rites & ordinaunces for the church, as make to edification not to the destruction therof, in conseruyng the discipline of the Church, and setting all thynges in a congrue order. Briefly, the office of the ciuile ruler & Magistrate extendeth to minister iustice and iudgement in all Courtes as well temporall, as Ecclesiasticall: to haue correction ouer all trāsgressours, whether they be laymen or persons Ecclesiasticall. And finally all such thyngs as belong to the mouyng of y^e sword, whatsoeuer, that is to say, all outward punishment, is referred to the iurisdiction of the secular Magistrate, vnder whose subiection the ordinaunce of God hath subiected all orders and states of mē.

Here we haue the witnesse also of Hormisda Byshop of Rome, which being well weyed, maketh y^e matter plaine, that Princes haue to deale in spirituall causes also, not onely in temporall: where the sayd Hormisda writeth to Epiphanius, Patriarche of Constant. in this sort: Clara coelestis misericordiae demonstratio procedit, quando regēs seculi causas de fide, cum gubernatione politiae coniungunt. &c. ex Act. v. vniuers. concil. Constantini secundi. an. 528. And thus much, and to much peradventure concernyng the matter of iurisdiction, in which poynt this new Church of Rome hath swarued from the auncient Church of Rome, which was, as is sufficiently proued.

THE third point wherein the church of Rome hath broken and is departed from the Church of Rome, * is the forme of stile & title annexed to the Bishop of that Sea. As where he is called Pope, most holy father, vicare generall, & vicare of Christ, successour of Peter, vniuersall Byshop, Prince of Priestes. head of the Church vniuersall Summus orbis pontifex, Stupor mundi, head Byshop of the world, the admiration of the world, neither God nor mā, but a thyng betwene both. &c. for all these termes be geuen him in Popish bookes. Albeit y^e name Pope, beyng a Greeke name, deriued of < in non-Latin alphabet >, which soūdeth as much as Father, in the Syracusane speach, may peradventure seeme more tolerable, as which hath bene vsed in the old time among Byshops, for so Austen was called of the Coūcell of Aphrike, Hierome, * of Boniface & other. Also Cyprian Byshop of Carthage, was called Papa. 24. q. 1. cap. loquitur & dist. 50. cap. De eo tamen. Item Clodouaeus or (as Rheanus calleth him) Ludouicus, first Christiā king of Fraūce, calleth a certain simpler Byshop, Papam. Hierome also in his Epistle to Chromatius calleth Valerianus, by the name of Pope: & likewise writyng to Eustachium, and Fabiola, he calleth Epiphanius beatum Papam. In the Apologies of Athanasius, we read oft tymes that he was called Papa, and Archiepiscopus. Ruffinus also Lib. 2. cap. 26. calleth him. Pontificem maximum: Also Aurelius President in the vi. Councell of Carthage was called of the sayd Councell, Papa, ex cap. 4. vi. Concil. Carthag. And before this Eleutherius Byshop of Rome, writyng to kyng Lucius the first Christian kyng in this land, calleth him in his Epistle, the vicare of Christ. &c. But that any of these termes were so peculiarly applied to the Bishop of Page 9 Rome, that other bishops were excluded from the same, or that any one bishop about the rest, had the name of Oecumenicall, or vniuersall, or head, to the derogation of other Bishoppes, or with such glory as is now annexed to the same: that is not to be found neither in histories of the old tyme, nor in any example of the primitiue Church, nor in the testimonies of auncient approued Doctours. First before the Councell of Nice,^{} it is euident by Pope Pius the ij. that there was no respect had to the church of Rome, but euery church then was ruled by his owne gouernance, til the yeare of our Lord, 340. Then folowed the Councell of Nice, wherein was decreed, that throughout the whole vniuersitie of Christes Church, which was now far spread ouer all the world, certaine Prouinces or precincts to the number of foure were appointed, euery one to haue his head church, and chiefe bishop, called then Metropolitane or Patriarch, to haue the ouersight of such churches as did lie about him.^{} In the number of which Patriarches or Metropolitanes, the Bishop of Rome had the first place, The Bishop of Alexandria was the second. The Bishop of Antioche the third. The Bishop of Hierusalem was the fourth Patriarch. Afterward in the number of these Patriarches, came in also the Bishop of Constantinople in the roome of the bishop of Antioch. So these foure or fiue Metropolitanes or Patriarches, had their peculiar circuites and precincts to them peculiarly appointed, in such sort, as one of them should not deale within an others precinct, & also that there should be among them equalitie of honour, wherupon we read so oft in the decrees of the olde Councils, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,^{} that is, equall degree of thrones, and of honour among priests and ministers. Againe, speaking of the said Patriarches or Primates, we read in the 2. and 3. chap. of the Councel of Constant. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,^{} that is, That bishops should not inuade the Dioces of other bishops without their borders, nor confound together churches, &c. Moreouer, the old Doctours for the most and best part, do accord in one sentēce, that all bishops placed wheresoeuer, in the church of God, be eiusdem meriti & honoris, & successores Apostolorum, that is, to be of one merite, of like honour, and all to be successors together of the Apostles. Also, he that is the Author of the booke called Dionysius Areopagita, calleth all the Bishops 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , that is, of equall order, and of like honor, &c. All this while the Bishop of Rome was a Patriarch, and a Metropolitane or bishop called of the first sea, but no Oecumenicall Bishop, nor head of the vniuersall Church, nor any such matter. In so much, that he, with all other Bishops, was debarred from that, by a playne decree of the Councell of Carthage, Can. 39. in these wordes: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,^{*} that is, That the bishop of the first seat shall not be called the Prince of priests, or the high priest, or any such thing.

And least any here should take occasion of cauilling, to heare him called bishop of the first sea, here is to be expounded, what is ment by the first sea, and wherfore he was so called, not for any dignitie of the persō, either of him which succedeth, or of him whom he is said to succede, but onely of the place wherein he sitteth. This is plainly proued by the councell of Calcedone, cap. 28. Wherin is manifestly declared the cause why the sea of Rome among all other Patriarchall seas is numbred for the first sea by the auncient fathers.^{} For why, saith the Councell, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet › , that is, for that our forefathers did worthily attribute the chiefe degree of honour to the sea of old Rome, because the principall raigne or Emperie was in that Citie, &c. The same also is confirmed by Eusebius Caesariensis, declaring, quòd excellentia Romani Imperij extulit papatum Rom. Pontificis supra alias Ecclesias. That the excellencie of the Romaine Emperie did aduance the Popedom of the Romaine bishop aboue other churches, &c. Ex Gab. Biel. Moreouer, saith the said Caesariensis: Nicena synodus hoc contulit priuilegium Rom. pontifici, vt sicut Romanorum rex Augustus prae caeteris appellatur: ita Rom. pontifex prae caeteris Episcopis Papa vocaretur. That is, The Councell (saith he) of Nice gaue this Priuiledge to the Bishop of Rome, that like as the king of the Romaines is named Emperour aboue all other kings, so the bishop of the same citie of Rome should be called Pope aboue other bishops &c. By these places hitherto alledged (and such other, many more then be here alleaged) it appeareth that though these titles of superioritie had bene attributed to the Bishop of Rome, yet it remaineth certaine, that the said Bishop receiued that preferment Iure non diuino, sed humano, by mans law, not by the law of God. And so is the distinction of the Popes proued false,* where is said: Romanam Ecclesiam non a concilio aliquo, sed a diuina voce primatum accepisse, that the church of Rome, tooke not his primacie by any Councell, but onely by the voyce of God. And this is to be said although it were true, that these titles & termes were so giuen to the bishop of Rome in the olde time, yet how and by whom they were giuen, ye s•e. Now to trie this matter, as ioyning an issue with our aduersaries, whether those foresaid titles of soueraigntie, were applied in the old tyme of the Primitiue church, to the Bishop of Rome, as to be called the vicare generall of Christ, the hed of the whole church, and vniuersall bishop, remaineth to be proued. Wherunto this in my minde is to be answered, that albeit the bishops of Rome (of some peradventure) were so called by the names of higher preeminence of that citie, of some going about to please them, or to craue some helpe at their handes, yet that calling 1. First, was vsed then but of a few. 2. Secondly, neither was giuen to many. 3. Thirdly, was rather giuen, then sought for, of the most. 4. Fourthly, was not so giuen that it maketh or can make any generall necessitie of law, why euery one is so bound to call them, as the bishop of Rome now seeketh to be taken and called,* and that by necessitie of saluation, as the decree of Pope Boniface 8. witnesseth, where is said, quòd sit de necessitate salutis, vt credatur Primatus Ecclesiae Rom. & ei subesse. That it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation, to beleue the Primacie of the church of Rome, and to be subiect to the same, &c.

As touching therefore these titles and termes of preheminence aforesaide, orderly to set foorth and declare what histories of times doe saye in that matter, by the grace of Christ. First we will see what be the titles, the Bishop of [unspec 1] Rome doth take and chalenge to himselfe, and what is the meaning of them. 2. When the first came in, whether in [unspec 2] the primitiue time or not, and by whom. 3. How they were [unspec 3] first giuen to the Romane Bishops, that is, whether of necessary duety, or voluntary deuotion, whether commonly of the whole, or particularly of a few, and whether in respect of Peter, or in respect of the Citie, or els of the worthines of the Bishop which there sat. 4. And if the [unspec 4] foresayd names were then giuen of certaine Bishops, vnto the bishop of Rome: whether all the saide names were geuen, or but certaine, or what they were. 5. Or whether [unspec 5] they were then receaued of all Bishops of Rome, to whō they were giuen, or els refused of some. 6. And finally whether [unspec 6] they ought to haue bene refused beyng giuen, or not. Touching the discourse of which matters, although it appertaine to the profession, rather of Diuines, then hystoricians, and would require a long and large debating: yet for so much as both in these, & diuers other weighty controuersies of Diuinity, the knowledge of times and histories, must needs helpe Diuines disputing about the same so much as the grace of Christ shall assiste me therein, I wil ioyne to the seeking out of truth, such helpe as I may.

And first to begin with the names and titles,* now claymed and attributed to the sea and Byshop of Rome: and what they be, is sufficiently declared aboue, that is, the cheife Preist of the worlde, the Prince of the Church, Byshop Apostolicall, the vniuersall head of the Church, the head and Byshop of the vniuersall Church, the successor of Peter, most holy Pope, the vicar of God on earth, neither God nor man, but a mixt thing betweene both: the Patriarche or Metropolitane of the Church of Rome, the Byshop of the first sea. etc. Unto the which titles or stile is annexed a triple crowne, a triple crosse, two crossed keyes, a naked sword, seauenfold seales, in token of the seauenfolde giftes of the holy Ghost, he being carried pickbacke vpon mens shoulders, after the maner of heathen kynges, hauing all the Empire, and the Emperour vnder his dominion: & that it is not conuenient for any terrene Prince to reigne there, where he sitteth, hauing the plenary fulnes of power, as well of temporall things as spirituall things in his handes, that all thinges are his, and that all such Princes as haue gyuen him any thing, haue giuen him but his owne, hauing at his will and pleasure to preach indulgencies, and the crosse against Christen Princes whatsoever:* And that the Emperour, & certaine other Princes, ought to make to him confession of subiection at their coronation: hauing authoritie to depose, and that he de facto, hath deposed Emperours and the king of France: Also to absolue the subiects from their allegiance to their Princes, whom kings haue serued for footmen to lead his horse, and the Emperour to hold his stirrop, that he may and doth geue power to Bishops vpon the bodies of men, and hath graunted them to haue prisons,* without whose authoritie no general Councell hath any force. And to whom appellations in all maner Page 10 of causes may and ought to be made. That his decrees be equall with the decrees of Nicen Councel, and are to be obserued and taken in no lesse force, then if they had bene confirmed with the heauenly voyce of Sainct Peter himselfe ex fra. Barth. & alijs. Item that the sayd Byshop of Rome hath the heauenly disposition of thinges and therefore may alter and chaunge the nature of thinges, by applying the substance of one thing to an other.cap. Quando de transl. Epis. tit. 7. Item that he can of nothing make something, and cause the sentence, which before was none to stande in effect, and may dispence aboue the lawe, and of iniustice make iustice, in correcting and chaunging lawes, for he hath the fulnes of power. And againe. dist. 40. cap. Si Papa. If the Pope doe leade with him innumerable soules •• flockes into hell, yet no man must presume to rebuke his faultes in this worlde. Item that it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation to beleuee the Premacie of the sea of Rome, and to be subiect to the same. &c.

These thinges thus declared, now let vs see whether these names and titles, with the forme and maner of this authoritie and regalitie aboue rehearsed: were euer attributed of any in the primitiue tyme to the byshop of Rome. For al these, he doth chalenge and clayme vnto him by old possession from the time of S. Peter. And here a question is to be asked of our aduersaries the Papistes, whether they will auouch all these aforesaide titles, together wyth the whole forme and tenour of regalitie, to the same belongyng as is afore touched, or not? if they wil, let them come forth with their allegations, which they neuer haue done yet, nor euer shalbe able: if they will not, or can not auouch them all together in maner as is specified, then why doth the byshop claime them altogether so stoutly, vsurpe them so falsely, and obtrud them vpon vs so straitly. Moreouer if the sayd our aduersaries, being conuicted by plaine euidence of hystorye, and example of time, will yeld vnto vs (as they must needes) in part, and not in the whole, let vs come then to the particulars, and see what part of this regalitie they wil defend, and deriue from the auncient custome of the Primitiue Church (that is from the first fyue hundred yeares,* I meane after Christ.) First, in the Coōcell of Nyce, which was the yeare of our Lord. 340. and in the .vj. Canon of the sayd Councell, we finde it so decreed: that in euery prouince or precinct of some one Church,⁶ and Byshop of the same, was appointed and set vp to haue the inspection and regiment of other churches about him. Secundum morem antiquum, that is, after the ancient custome, as the wordes of the Councell do purport, so that the Byshop of Alexandria shoulde haue power of Lybia, & Pentapolis in Egypt, for as much as the Byshop of the Cytie of Rome, hath the like or same maner. And in like sort also in Antioch, & in other countreyes, let euery Church haue his due honor, & consequently y^t the Bishop of Ierusalem haue also his due honor to him reserued, so that such order be kept, that the Metropolitane Cities be not defrauded of their dignitie which to them is due and proper. &c. In this Councell and in the same Canon. vj. and vij. where the Byshops of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch, are ioyned together in on like maner of dignity, fyrst there appeareth no difference of honor to be ment therin. Secondlye for somuch as in the sayde two Canons after mention made of them, immediately followeth, that no Byshops should be made without consent of their Metropolitanes, yea and that the City also of Hierusalem should be vnder hys Metropolitane,* and that the Metropolitane should haue the ful power to confirme euery Byshop made in his prouince: Therfore it may be well suspected that the third Epistle decretall of Pope Anacletus, and of Pope Stephanus, with other mo are forged, wherein these Byshops, and especially the Byshop of Rome is exempted and desceuered from the name of a Metropolitane or an Archbyshop, to the name of a Patriarch or Primate:* as appeareth in the decrees. dist. 22. cap. Sacro sancta. wherefore as wee must needes graunt the Byshop of Rome to be called a Metropolitane or an Archbyshop by the Councell of Nice:* so we will not greatly sticke in this also, to haue him numbred with Patriarches or primates. which title seemeth in the old tyme to be common to mo Cities then to Rome, both by the Epistle of Anacletus, of Pope Stephanus, of Pope, Iulius, and Leo, &c.

After this followed a generall Councell in Aphricke, called the vj. Councell of Carthage, an. 420. where were congregated. 217. Byshops among whom was also, Augustinus, Prosper, Orosius, with diuers other famous persons. This Councell continued the space of v. yeares, wherein was great contention about the supremacie, and iurisdiction of Rome. The Byshop wherof then was Zosimus. This Zosimus the Romane Bishop had receaued the same time into the communion of the church without any examination, one that came to complaine to him out of Aprike,* named Apiarius, a Priest whom Aurelius the Metropolitane with the Councell of Aphrike had worthelye excommunicated for his detestable conditions before. Uppon this Zosimus after that hee hadde receaued and shewed such fauor to Apiarius, for that he did appele to him, sendeth to the Councell his messengers, to wit Fastinus Byshop of Potentine and two Priestes of the Church of Rome named Philippus and Asellus, with these foure requestes: first that Apiarius whom he had absolved might be receaued of them againe, and that it might be lawful for Byshops or Priestes to appeale from the sentence of their Metropolitans, & also of the Councell, to the sea of Rome.

Secondly, that Byshops should not saile ouer importunely ad comitatum. Thirdly, that if any Priest or Deacon were wrongfully excommunicate by y^e Byshops of their owne prouince, it should be lawfull for thē to remooue the hearing and iudgeing of their cause to their neighbour bishops. Forthly,* that Vrbanus there Byshop, either should be excommunicated, or els sent vp to Rome, vnlesse he would correct those things that were to be corrected. &c. For the approbation whereof, the sayde Zosimus alledged for him the words (as he pretended) taken out of Nicene Councell. The Councell of Carthage hearyng this, and remembring no such thing in the Councell of Nice to bee decreed, & yet not suspecting the Byshop of Rome to dare wrongfully to falsefie the wordes of that Councell: writeth againe to Zosimus, declaring that they neuer reade to their remembraunce, in their common Latine exemplare of Nicene Councell any such Canon, yet notwithstanding for quietnes sake, they woulde obserue the same tyll time they might procure the originall copies of that councell to be sent to them from Constantinople, Alexandria, and from Antioch. In like effect afterward they wrote to Pope Boniface, which then succeeded Zosimus.

And thirdly also to Celestinus, which shortly after succeeded Boniface. In the meane time this foresayd Councell sent their Legates, Marcellus and Innocentius to Atticus Patriarche of Constantinople, and to Cyrillus Patriarch of Alexandria, for the autentique copies in Greeke of Nicene Councell, which being sent vnto them, & they finding in the true originals no such Canon,* as the Bishoppe of Rome had falsely forged, they wrote a sharpe & an handsome letter to Celestinus Byshop of Rome, calling him in the said letter by the way: Domine frater: declaring to him, how they had perused all the copies of y^e Councell of Nice coulde finde no such Canon: as he and his predecessours had falsely alledged, and therewithall reciting the vj. Canon afore mentioned, declared how the decrees of Nicene Councell had committed all and singular persons Ecclesiasticall, as well Byshops, as other, vnto the charge of their Metropolitanes. Moreouer expounding the same decree, they shewed the reasons thereof. [unspec 1]

1. For that (sayd they) the fathers of that councell did well foresee,* to be most iust and conuenient, that all controuersies there be ended (in ijsdem locis) where they begin.
2. For that it is not to be supposed contrary, but that the grace of God wil be as prest and ready in one prouince as in other, to instruct his ministers both prudētly to vnderstand iudgement, and constantly to mayntayne the same.
3. For that there is no need to seeke further to any outlandish helpe, because especially that the party whosoeuer [unspec 2] is not contented with the determination of his iudges or [unspec 3] commissioners, may lawfully appeale either to the prouincial [unspec 4] or to any generall counsell.
4. That way to be better, then to runne to any forranine Iudge, it must needes be graunted, because it is not like that our God will inspire his iustice and truth of examining, vnto one Byshop, and denie it to a multitude congregated in a whole Councell.
5. Neither can it be, that any such outlandish iudgement [unspec 5] in hearing and determining causes,* can stand perfect and vpright, for that the necessary persons of witnesses, either for infirmitie of sexe of age, of sickenes, or some other impeachment, are not able to be present, by whom the truth of the sentence, should be directed. Wherefore as by these & other reasons they thought it not conuenient from them to bryng their matters ouer vnto Rome: so neither was it to be found, sayd they, by any councell of the old fathers decreed, that any Legates should be sent frō Rome to thē, for deciding of their matters. And therefore exhorted they the sayd bishop of Rome, that he would not induce fumosum typū, (or rather as I may call it) typhos seculi, in Ecclesiam Christi,quae lucem simplicitatis & humilitatis prefaert ijs qui Deum Diligunt, that is, that he would not induce the swelling pride of the worlde into the Church of Christ, Page 11 which church sheweth and giueth the light of simplicitie & of humilitie to such as loue to see God, &c. In these foresaid letters moreouer, is signified how y^e forenamed malefactor Apiarius, whom the bishop of Rome before had absolued & receiued to the communion of the church, was afterward found culpable, and therfore the councell proceded against him, brought him to open confession of his faults, & so enioined him due penance for his demerites, notwithstanding the absolution and inconsiderate clearing of the Bishop of Rome before proceeding.

[unspec 1] In summe, out of this Councell of Carthage these are to be noted. First, how glad the Bishops of Rome were to receiue such as came to them for succour.

[unspec 2] 2. What pride they tooke by the occasion therof, thinking and seeking thereby to haue all vnder their subiection.

[unspec 3] 3. To the intent to allure other to seeke to them, how redie they were to release and quit this Apiarius as guiltles, which after was tried culpable by his owne confession.

[unspec 4] 4. How contrary to the actes and doings of the Romish bishop, this Councell condemned him, whom the said bishop of Rome before had absolued, litle respecting the proceedings of the Romish church.

[unspec 5] 5. How the bishops of old time haue bene falsifiers of ancient Councils and writings, wherby it may be suspected, that they which shamed not to falsifie & corrupt the Councell of Nice, much lesse would they sticke to abuse and falsifie the decretall Epistles and writings of perticular Bishops & Doctors, for their owne aduantage, as no doubt they haue done many one.

[unspec 6] 6. In this foresaid Councell, whereat Augustine himselfe was present, & where Aurelius President of the same, was called Papa, the bishop of Rome was called expresly in their letters, but bishop of the citie of Rome, and Dominus frater, that is, brother Bishop.

[unspec 7] 7. Seuently, the dominion of this Romain Patriarch, in the said Council of Carthage. was cut so short, that neither it was permitted to thē of Affrike to appeale ouer the sea to him, nor for him to send ouer his Legates to them for ending their controuersies. Wherby it may sufficiently appeare, that the Bishop of Rome in those dayes, was not fully admitted to be the chiefe of all other Bishops, nor the head of the vniuersall church of Christ in earth, &c.

[unspec 8] 8. We heare in this Councell, fiue causes or reasons giuē, why it is not necessary nor yet conuenient for all forraine causes to be brought to one vniuersall head or iudge, as is before recited.

[unspec 9] 9. Lastly, by the said Councell of Carthage, we heare a vertuous exhortation to be giuen to the bishop of Rome, that he would not induce into the meeke & humble church of Christ, the fuming and swelling pride of the world, as is before declared, &c. In this, or in some other Councell of Carthage, it was moreouer prouided by expresse law, and also specified in the Popes decrees,* that no Bishop of the first sea, should be called the Prince of Priests, or the chiefe priest, or any such like thing but onely the bishop of the first seat, as followeth more in the said decree, Vniuersalis autem, nec etiam Rom. pontifex appelletur,* that is, Be it enacted, that no bishop, no not the Bishop of Rome be called vniuersall bishop, &c. And thus much cōcerning this foresaid Councell of Carthage.

Not long before this Council, was celebrate in Affrike an other Council, called Synodus Mileuitana, about the yere of our Lord, 442. at the which Councell also S. Augustine was present, where it was decreed vnder payne of excommunication, that no minister or bishop should appeale ouer the sea to the bishop of Rome, whereby it may appeare that the bishop of Rome all this space was not vniuersally called by the terme of Oecumenical or vniuersal bishop, but Bishop of the first sea: so that if there were any preferment therein, it was in the reuerence of the place, and not in the authoritie of the person. And yet it was not so in the place, that the place importeth the Cittie of Rome onely, but the first seate then was called Metropolitane Church, as by the woordes of Nicene Councell, and other constitutions moe, is to be seene where the foure Patriarches were called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, or 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, or 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, as namely, by the woordes of the Councell of Carthage may appeare, which be these: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉. that is, except he haue some special licēce or exception, by y^e consent of y^e first seat of y^e proper bishop in euery country, that is, of him that is the Primate in y^e said countrey,* &c. Also the woordes of the can. 39. of the Councell of Carthage, before touched be these, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, That is, that the bishop of the first sea, be not called Prince of Priestes, or head Priest, or els any such like. Againe Anicetus the x. bishop of Rome, and Pope Stephen & Pope Felix making a difference betwene Primate & Metropolitane,* writeth thus. Let no Archbishops bee called Primates, but onely such as haue the first seat, &c. Thus it is made plaine, how the bishop of the first seate, or first bishop, or Primate is none other, but he which was called Patriarch, and belonged not only to the church of Rome, but to all such cities & places, where as before among the Gentiles were primi flamines, &c. dist. 80. cap. vrbes & loca, & in illis.* Where, by the way is to be noted the repugnance or contrarietie of such as crastily, but falsly haue counterfaieted the Popes decretall epistles, which besides other great and many coniectures also hereby may be gathered. For where Clement, Anacletus, epist. 12. Anicetus and other, ioyning together the office of Patriarchs & Primates,* do deuide the same from the order of Metropolitanes or Archbishops, alledging therin the constitution of the Apostles and their successors, that is, to be found false by the Canōs of the Apostles, by the Councell of Nice, and by the councell of Antioche with other moe. For in the Canons of the Apostles, where in euery Canon almost, mention is made of Bishops, Priestes, and Deacons, no worde is there touched,* neither of any order aboue the Bishop, or lower then the Deacon, saue only in the 33. Canon, setting an order among bishops, the Canon willeth the Bishops of euery nation to know their first or chiefe bishop, & him to be taken for the head of them: he saith not the head of the church, or head of the world, but the head of those bishops. And where? not in Rome onely, but plainely and expresly in euery nation, for so the woordes purport, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉. That is, the bishops of euery nation ought to know the first or chiefe 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 them, &c. Moreouer, the Councell of Antioch reciting 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 foresaid Canon worde for worde, expoundeth the 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 plainly,* in stead of 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, writing 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: Which is as much to say, as Metropolitan: and in the end of the said Canon, calleth him 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Id est, Metropolitanum, 6. q 3. per singulas. Wherby it is concluded, that to be false, that Clement and Anacletus, and Anicetus bee reported (but falsedly) to put a difference betwene Primates or Patriarchs,* and Metropolitans or Archbishops. Whereas by sufficient authoritie it is to bee proued, that in the old church both Primates, first bishops bishops of the first seat, Patriarchs, Metropolitans, bishops of the Mother citie, and Archbishops were all one. First, that Primates and Metropolitans were both one, is before declared by the Canons of the Apostles,* & by the Councell of Antioch aforesaid. Agayne, that Patriarches and Archbishops were all one, it is euident Ex Nouella Iustiniani. cap. 23. where the sayd constitution reciting the 4. Patriarches (aboue mentioned) calleth them by the name of Archbishops. And a little after calleth the Patriarch of Constantinople, Archbishop, by these wordes: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , That is, which be vnder the Archbishop and Patriarch of Constantinople. And after speaking more plainly in the matter, setteth an other order, diuers from that of Clement, Anacletus and Anicetus, in placing these foresayd persons, first beginning with bishops,* then ouer them setteth the Metropolitane, and ouer him againe, the Archbishop, and there staieth, making no further mention of any other aboue him: whose wordes be these, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . That is, if a Bishop be accused, the Metropolitane to haue the examination of these things that are brought against him, if the Metropolitane be accused, then the Archbishop to haue the hearing therof, vnder whom he dwelleth & pertaineth, &c.

And in the same constitution moreouer, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . &c. If any sute or supplicaton be brought against a Bishop by a minister,* first the Metropolitane to haue the deciding of the matter, and if any default shall be found in the iudgement thereof, then the hearing and ending of the case to be brought before the Archbishop, &c.

In this constitution of Iustinian, although the Metropolitane be placed aboue the Byshop,* and the Archbishop aboue the Metropolitane: yet notwithstanding by this is sufficiently confuted the forged constitution of Clement Anacletus, Anicetus, Stephanus, & Felix: who in their Epistles Page 12 decretall, doe ioyn together in one forme and order, both Archbishop and Metropolitane,* and aboue them both do place the Patriarch, and aboue the Patriarch, the Apostolicall sea to wit the Bishop of Rome, as may appeare in reading the first Epistle of Clement. In illis autem ciuitatibus &c. the second Epistle of Anacletus. Art. 4. prouinciae. dist. 99. prouincie multo, and the Epistle of Anicetus art. 23. dist. 99 cap. Nulli Archiepiscopi. Also the Epistle of Pope Stephen the first, Art. 5. (where note by the way, that Gratianus referreth this place of the Epistle to Pope Lucius.) Item the Epistle of Pope Felix the second, Art. 12. in which all foresayd Epistles, this order and difference of degrees is taken, that the first and principall place is giuen to Primats or Patriarches, the second to Metropolitans or Archbishops, the third to Byshops, and finally aboue all these is extolled the Apostolicall sea of the Byshop of Rome,* contrary to all that which before hath bene alledged out of Iustinian, the Councell of Nice & of Antioch, &c. Whereby it may appeare that either Iustiniā in preferring Archbishops aboue Metropolitans, did not read these Epistles decretall, if they were vnfayned, or if they were forged, they which forged the said Epistles in their names, did not wel aduise that Iustinian had written in this matter before.

*Thus then these titles aboue recited, as Byshop, Metropolitane, Byshop of the fyrst seat, Primate, Patriarche, Archbyshop, that is to meane, chiefebyshop, or headbishop to other Byshoppes of his prouince, wee deny not but were in the olde time applyed, and myght be applyed to the Byshoppe of Rome lyke as the same also were applyed to other Patriarches in other chiefe Citties and prouynces.

As touching the name likewise of the high Priest, or hyghpriesthood, neither doe I denye but that it hath bene found in old monuments and recordes of auncient times, but in such wise and sort, as it hath beene common to Byshops indifferently, and not singularly attributed to any one Byshoppe or sea. Whereof testimony we haue out of the .viij. generall Councell. dist 38. cap. Omnes, where the Byshoppes office is called Summum sacerdotium,* the hygh Priesthood, in these wordes: Substantia summi sacerdotii nostri sunt eloquia diuinitus tradita .i. vera diuinarum Scripturarū disciplina. etc. That is, the substance (say they) of our hygh Priesthood is the word of discipline of holy scriptures geuen vs from aboue. &c.

And likewise the Councell of Agatha, maketh relation De pontificibus in sūmo sacerdotio constitutis, of Bishops set in the high Priesthood,* meanyng not of any one, but indiffynitly & indifferently of whomsoeuer. 12. q. 3. cap. Pontifices. Also Fabianus Byshop of Rome, an. 240. wryting in generall to his brethren, and to all Byshoppes and Ministers Ecclesiasticall doth attribute to them the same title of Summum sacerdotium, in these words, Deus ergo, fratres, qui praeordinauit vos,* & omnes qui Summo sacerdotio fūguntur. &c God which hath preordayned you brethren, and all them which beare the office of high priesthoode. 3. q. 1. cap. Deus ergo. With like phrase of spech, Anacletus also in his second Epistle,* speaking of Bishops in general, calleth them Summos sacerdotes: vnde, inquit, liquit quod summi sacerdotes. i. Episcopi a Deo sunt iudicandi. &c. The high priests, that is, Byshops, saith he. And moreouer in the same place calleth thē Apostles, and successours of the Apostles. &c, So doth Innocentius the first, an. 405. as appeareth. dist. 61. cap. Miserum. Item Zosimus Byshop of the sayd Citie of Rome, an. 420, as witnesseth. dist. 59. cap. 1. who speaketh de summo sacerdotio,* that is, of high priesthood, not onely of y^e church of Rome, but of all other churches. Vrbanus the first was Byshop of Rome, an. 226. who in his writinges alleaged by Gratian, referreth the name & place Summi pontificis, of the hygh Byshop, not onely to the seate of Rome, but vniiformely to euery Byshop, as appeareth in the wordes of the dist. 51. cap. Si officia. &c.

And thus much as touching the name or title of high Priest, or supreme Byshop. Which title as I doe not deny to haue bene vsed in maner & forme aforesayd: so do I denye this tytyle and style of Summus orbis pontifex, as it is now vsed in Rome, to haue bene vsed, or vsually receaued duryng all the primitiue tyme of the Church, that is v. hūdred yeares after Christ, after the manner and sort I mean of that authoritie and glory, which in these dayes now is vsed and is giuen to the same, vntil the time of Phocas, the wicked Emperour, which was after the yeare of the Lord 608. The which title as it is to glorious for any one Byshop in y^e church of Christ to vse: so is it not to be found in any of the approued and most auncient writers of y^e church namely these, as Cyprianus, Basilius, Fulgentius, Chrysostomus Hieronymus, Ambrosius, Augustinus, Tertullianus, but rather writeth against the same, especially of the last. And therefore not with out cause it is written and testified of Erasmus,* who speaking of the sayd name, of Summus orbis pontifex, denieth plainely the same to be hearde of among the olde writers, whose wordes be these: Certe nomen hoc nondum illis temporibus erat auditum, quantum ex veterum omniū scriptis licet colligere. &c. lib. Epist. 3. Epist. 1. art. 37. &c. as whosoever readeth the same authours shall finde to be true.

The like is to be affirmed also of other presumptuous titles of like ambition,* as the head of the vniuersal church, the Uicar of Christ in earth, Prince of Priestes, with such like, which all be new found termes, straunge to the cares of the old primitiue writers and Councels, and not receiued openly and commonly before the tyme of Boniface the third, and Phocas the aforesayd.

Now remaineth the name of the Pope, which of his nature, and by his first origine, being a word of the Syracusane speech called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,* and signifieth as much as Pater, Father, was then vsed and frequented of them in the old tyme, not so as proper onely to the Byshop of Rome, but common and indifferent to all other Byshops or personages, whosoever were of worthy excellēce, as is partly before declared. But nowe contrarily, the generalitie of this name is so restrayned and abused, that not onely it is appropriate to the Byshop of Rome, but also distincteth and disceuereth the authoritie and preminence of that Byshop alone from all other Byshoppes, for which cause it is now worthely come into contempt and execration. No lesse is to be reiected also the name of vniuersalis, or oecumenicus, pontifex, Summus orbis Episcopus, Caput vniuersalis Ecclesiae, Christi in terris, Princeps vicari{us} sacerdotū, &c. Al which termes and vocables, tending to the derogation of other Bishops & Patriarches, as they were neuer receaued nor allowed in Rome (if we beleeeue Gregory) during the tyme of y^e Primatiue church, so now are worthely of vs refused.

Although it cannot be denied,* but certaine were in the Primatiue time, which began priuately to pretende that proude and wicked title of vniuersall Byshop, as Menna, and especially Ioannes Patriarche of Constantinople, who calling a Counsell at Constantinople, went about to stablish and ratifie and to dignifie his throne by the consent of the Councell, and the Emperour of Constantinople, and obtained the same as appeareth in the v. generall Councell of Constantinople the 2. where both Menna is named Oichumenicus Patriarcharum and also Ioannes in the sayde Councell is titled Oicumenicus Patriarcha: ex Concil. general. 5. cap. Domino. Concerning the which title although it was then vsed to Constantinople through the sufferance of the Emperours, being then willing to haue their imperiall City aduanced: yet notwithstanding this foresayde title, all this while was not in the City of Rome. And in Constantinople it stode not then in force: Iure aliquo diuino, but onely by mans lawe. And thirdly it was then but onely, verbalis titulus: hauing no true dominacion vpon all other Churches, or any reall subiection belonging to the same. Forasmuch as neither y^e Bishop of Rome, nor any of the West churches were subiect or did acknowledge seruice vnto them but rather did repugne the same: namely Pelagius the 2. & Gregorius the 1. both Byshops at that time of Rome, whiche Pelagius writing to all Byshops, sayth playnely in these wordes:* that no Patriarch should take the name of vniuersalitie at any time, because that if any be called vniuersall, the name of Patriarch is derogate from all other. But let this be farre, saith he, from all faithfull men, to will to take that thing to him, wherby the honor of his brethren is diminished. Wherefore y^e sayd Pelagius chargeth all such Byshops, that none of them in their letters will name any Patriarche to be vniuersall, least he take from him selfe the honour due to him, while they giue that which is not due to another.* What can be more euidēt then these wordes of Pelagius, who was Bishop of Rome next before Gregory. an. 583? In lyke maner or more plainely, and more earnestly writeth also Gregory of this matter in his register, prouyng and disputing that no man ought to be called vniuersall Byshop. Moreouer with sharpe wordes and rebukes detesteth the same title, calling it new, folish, proude, peruerse, wicked, prophane, and such, as to consent vnto it, is as much, as to denye the fayth. He addeth further and saith, that whosoever goeth about to extoll himselfe aboue other Byshops, in so doing followeth the fact of Sathan, to whō it was not sufficient to be counted equall or like vnto other angels. In his Epistles how oft doth he repeate, and declare y^e same to repugne directly against the Gospell, and auncient decrees of Counsels? affirming that none of his predecessours did euer vsurpe to himselfe that style or title, and concludeth that whosoever so doth, declareth himselfe to be a forerunner of Antichrist. &c. With this iudgement of Gregory wel Page 13 well agreeth also the wordes of S. Augustine, Lib. 3▪ cap. 3. De Baptismo,* where reciting the wordes of Cyprian thus saith: Neque enim quisquam nostrum se Episcopum Episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannicomore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suns a•igit, &c. That is, for none of vs doth euer set himselfe to be Bishop of Bishops, or after a tyrannical maner doth subdue and bring vnder his fellowes vnto the necessitie of his obedience,* &c. By these woordes of Cyprian and Augustine, it is manifest, that in their tyme was no supremacie, or vniuersall title among Bishops receiued, nor that any greater respect was had to the bishop of Rome (as Pius the 2. saith, Epist. 301.) before the Councell of Nice. And after in that Councell the said Bishop of Rome had no further authoritie to him limited, then only ouer his prouince, and places suburbane, bordering about the Citie of Rome. Against whose primacie diuers cities also did resist long after that,* as the Church of Rauenna, Mediolanensis, and Aquilegiensis. Also the Greeke Churches long resisted the same, so did the churches of Asia, Rutenicae, Moscouiticae, Valachicae, and other moe.

But to returne againe to Gregory, who confirming the sentence of Pelagius his predecessour aboue mentioned, had no small conflicts about this title matter, both with the Patriarche, and with the Emperour of Constantinople▪ as witnesseth Antonius,* & other. &c. The historie is thus: After that Iohn beyng made of a Monke, Patriarche of Constantinople, by his flatterie & hypocrisie, had obtained of Mauritius the Emperour, to be extolled aboue other Bishops with the name of vniuersall Patriarche, and that he would write to Gregorie bishop then of Rome, for his consent concerning the same: Gregory abiding still in his constancie, did set himselfe stoutly against that Antichristian title, and would geue no place. At the same tyme the Lombards had inuaded the countrey of Italy, and the Citie of Rome, the Emperour keeping then at Constantinople, and setting in Italy an ouersear called Exarchus, to rule in Rauenna▪ Gregory perceiuing the Emperour Mauritius to bee displeased with him about the matter afore touched, writeth to Constantina the Empresse, arguing and declaring in his letters, that presumption and pride of him to bee vniuersall Patriarch, was both against the rule of the gospel, and decrees of the Canons, namely, the vj. Canon of Nicene Councell, and the noueltie of that newfound title to declare nothing els, but that the tyme of Antichrist was neere. Upon this, Mauritius the Emperour taking displeasure with him, calleth home his souldiours againe from Italy, and inciteth the Lombardes against the Romaines: who with their king Agilulphus, therupō contrary to their league made before, set vpon the citie of Rome, and besieged it a whole yeare together, Gregory yet notwithstanding still remaining in his former constancie. After these afflictions thus ouerpast, Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, writeth to the said Gregory in his letters, naming him vniuersall Pope, vnto whom Gregory refusing the same, answereth againe as followeth.

The letter of Gregorie, to the Patriarch of Alexandria.

BEhold in the Preface of your Epistle directed to me, ye haue vsed a worde of a proud name, calling me vniuersall Pope, which I pray your holinesse you will cease hereafter to doe, for that is derogated from you, whatsoever is attributed to an other more then right and reason requireth. As for me I seeke not mine aduauncement in wordes, but in maners: neither doe I account that any honour, wherein the honour of my brethren I see to bee hindred:. For my honour I take to be the honour of the vniuersall Church: my honour is the whole and perfect vigour of my brethren. Then am I honoured when to no man is denied the due honour which to him belongeth. For if your holinesse call me vniuersall Pope, in so doing you denie your selfe to be that, which ye affirme me to be vniuersal. But that God forbid, let these words therefore go, which do nothing but puffe vp vanitie, and wound charitie, &c.

It were too long here to inferre all such letters and Epistles of his, concerning this matter, written to the Emperour Mauritius, and Constantina the Empresse, but that shal more largely appeare hereafter (Christ willing) in the body of the history, when we come to the yeare and time of Gregory, which was well nie about vj. hundred yere after Christ. In the meane season this is sufficiēt to declare how the church of Rome with the fourme and maner of their title of vniuersall supremacie now vsed & maintained, hath vtterly swerued from the auncient steps of the primitiue church of Rome.

Now let vs see what the aduersarie side hath to obiect againe for the title of their vniuersalitie, or rather singularity. And first here commeth in a blind cauillation of a certaine Sophister,* who glosing vpon the wordes of Pelagius aboue recited, laboureth to colour the playne text with a subtile meaning, as though the sense of the Canon were this, not to deny there the state of supremacie: Sed negari ibi aliquem posse esse vniuersalem Episcopum, sub eo sensu duntaxat, quòd esset cuius{que} Ecclesiae proprius rector, ita quòd nullus alius esset Episcopus, &c. That is, but to denie there, that any may be vniuersall bishop after this sense and meaning only, so that he should be the proper Pastor of euery Church alone, and that there should be no other bishop beside him self, &c. Thus goeth this Sophister about to dash out this text, but he cannot so discharge the matter. For neither did Iohn the Patriarch then seeke any such thing, to be bishop and proper Pastor of euery church alone, nor if he had the Councell of Chalcedon, and the Emperor Iustinian, would neuer haue agreed therunto. Neither is it true, that this Gloser denieth Pelagius, here to forbid the primacie or supremacie of that Patriarch, which in deed is the onely intent of Pelagius in that Canon, witnessing as well other Historiographers, as namely, Anton. tit. 12. cap. 3. par. 13. & also the glose ordinary vpon the same Canon, &c.*

Out of the same fountaine springeth the like or very same reason of late renued by a certaine new start English Clarke in these our dayes, who aunswering to the places of Gregory touching the said matter, laboureth to auoide the cleare authoritie of him, by a like blind cauillation, saying, that Iohn bishop of Constantinople, by this title of vniuersall bishop, vnderstood himselfe onely to be a bishop, and none els. And that Gregory in resisting him, had none other meaning but the same. And to prooue this to be the very meaning of Gregory, he reciteth the wordes of Gregory written to the said Iohn Archbishop of Constantinople as followeth:*Qui enim indignum te esse fatebaris, vt Episcopus dici debuisses, ad hoc quando{que} perductus es, vt despectis fratribus Episcopus appetas solus vocari. That is to say, For thou (Iohn bishop of Constantinople) which sometime didst graunt thy selfe vnworthy the name of a bishop, art now come to this, that y^u doest seeke to be called a bishop alone, &c. Upō this word Episcop{us} solus, this gloser would groūd a surmise▪ that Gregory did find fault with the Archbishop, not for any primacie which he sought for aboue other Bishops, but onely, for that he coueted to be bishop and Pastor alone in euery Church, in such sort, as there should be no other Bishop nor Pastour els but himselfe onely. But as is said, that was neuer the Archbishops seeking, nor the matter of Gregories reprehension. For the said Archbishop of Constantinople, went not about to bee Bishop alone, (which was to much absurd, and also impossible) but to be vniuersall alone: nor to take away the office from other, but the honour from other: not to depose them, but to despise them. And therefore saith Gregory, vt despectis fratribus, not depositis fratribus, so that this worde solus, here noteth a despising of other, not a deposing of other, & importeth a singularitie in condition aboue other, and not the office or substaunce of ministration without other, that is, to be vniuersall among many, and not to bee one alone without any, nor to diminish the number of them, but only to encrease the honour to himselfe. For the more euident probation whereof (although the thing of it selfe is so euident, that it needeth no prooffe) what can be more playne, then the words themselues of Pelagius and Gregory wherwith they charge him for running before his brethren, for chalenging superioritie aboue them, for diminishing their honour, by taking more honour then to him was due, for following the aungell of pride in exalting himselfe, in admitting that to him, which the bishops of Rome and their predecessours had refused, beyng offered to them before, &c All which declare that he sought not to thrust out all other bishops out of their churches, and to be bishop himselfe alone. For that was neuer offered to the Bishops of Rome by the Councell of Chalcedon, that they should be bishops alone, and none other. Neither did Lucifer seeke to haue no mo angels in all heauen, but himself, but he to be aboue all other alone.

Likewise the word praecurrere, that is, to runne before other in the Epistle of Pelagius,* declareth that Iohn sought not to be bishop alone, but Bishop vniuersall. We say not that a man runneth before another, whē he runneth alone, and no mā followeth him, that is not properly praecurrere, but solus currere. Moreouer, in seeking to be superior to other bishops, he seeketh not to take away other Bishops, but to make other bishops inferior to him. For where no inferior is, there can be no superior, forasmuch as these together are correlatiues, & inferre necessary respect mutually. And if it were true as this Gloser sayth, that he had sought to be bishop alone, how would that Councel either Page 14 haue graunted that vnto him, or haue offered it to the Bishop of Rome before? or if they had, howe could it be possible for him alone to serue all Churches, without any felow Bishop to helpe him? And where this foresaid clerke standeth so much vpon the wordes of S. Gregory: Solus Episcopus Gregory therefore shall expound Gregory, and one Solus shall declare another. Wherefore if this diuine (whatsoever he be Doctour or Bacheler) either knoweth not, or would learne, what (onely Byshop) meaneth in this place: an other place of the sayde Gregory may instruct him, where Gregory wryting to Eulogius,* Patriarch of Alexandria, geueth this reason, why he refused the same title offered to him (which then was offered to the sayde Iohn Patriarche of Constantinople) saying: Quia videlicet si vnus Patriarcha vniuersalis dicitur, Patriarcharum nomen coeteris derogatur, sed absit hoc. &c. That is to say: For if one alone woulde be called Patriarch vniuersall, then should the name of Patriarches be derogated from all other. &c. Wherby two things are to be noted: First what thing it was which the Patriarche of Constantinople did seeke, for Gregory here findeth no other fault, but with the same which was geuen to Iohn, which was to be called Patriarche vniuersal. The seconde thing to be noted, is the cause why Gregory did rebuke this title, both geuen to Iohn, and offered to him, because (sayeth he) if one take vpon him the name of vniuersall Patriarch, then is the name Patriarche taken from the rest. As who would say: if I should take vpon me to be named vniuersal Patriarch, then should there be no other Patriarche• but I shoulde be Byshop Patriarche alone. And here commeth in your Solus Episcopus. &c.

*Furthermore, the same Gregory speaking of the sayde Solus, in an other place by, seemeth to declare there what he meaneth by this Solus here, in these wordes as follow: vt & nulli subesse, & solus omnibus praeesse videretur That is to say: so that he would be subiect to none, and would be chieftain to all other alone. &c. And so by this place, may the other place be expounded, vt solus Episcopus sit is, qui solus inter Episcopos praeesse appetat. That is, he that seeketh to be as bishop alone, who alone seeketh to be extolled aboue other byshops. But to be short in a matter that needeth not many wordes: he that thus cauilleth vpon this place Solus Episcopus in Gregory, must be desired here not to take Solus alone, but ioyne with all the word going before, which is, despectis fratribus, by the which might seeme sufficiently declared, what Gregory ment by Solus Episcopus, meaning, that to despise other bishops, & to diminish their honor, to set vp his owne, & to be subiect to none, but to preferre him selfe inequally before al other, is as much as to be counted bishop alone. And thus much touching this obiection.

*An other obiection of our aduersaries is this: although (say they) no Byshop of Rome was euer called, or would be called by the name of vniuersal Bishop: yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be heades of the vniuersall Church. Their reason is this:

As S. Peter had the charge of the whole Church (by the testimonie of Gregory) committed vnto him, although he were not called vniuersall Apostle:

So no more absurde it is, for the Pope to be called the head of the whole Church,* and to haue the charge thereof, although he be not called vniuersall Byshop. &c.

Wherein is a double vntruth to be noted. First in that they pretend Peter to be the head, & to haue the charge of the whole Church: if we take here (charge or head) for dominion or mastership vpō or aboue the Church, in all cases iudicarie, both spirituall & temporal: for the wordes of the Scripture be plaine. Non dominantes in clerum 1. Pet. Vos autem non sic. Luke. 22. That is. Not as maisters ouer the Clergy. &c. but you not so. &c. Againe that the Church is greater, or rather the head of Peter it is cleare: 1. Corrin. 3. All thinges are yours, whether it be Paule, or Apollo, or Cephas: either the world, death, or life, you be Christes, Christ is Gods. &c. In which wordes the dignitie of the Church no doubt is preferred aboue the Apostles, and aboue Cephas also. Moreouer as the dignitie of the wife is aboue the seruant, so must needes the honour and worthines of the Church (being the spouse of Christ) surmount the state of Peter or other Apostles, which be but seruants to Christ and to the Church, yea and though they were Princes of the Church,* yet after the minde of Baldus: Magis attenditur persona intellectualis, quàm organica. Otherwise if by this word (charge) he ment only the office and diligence of teaching: to that I aunswere: The same Lord that sayde to Peter, feede my sheepe, said also to the other, go & preach this Gospell to al nations. And he that said to Peter: what soeuer thou loosest, said also to the other: whatsoever ye remit in the earth. Moreouer if the matter goe by preaching, Paul the Apostle laboured more therin, then euer did Peter by his owne confession: Plus laboraui, also suffered more for the same, Plus sustinui, neither was his doctrine lesse sound. Yea and in one point he went before Peter, & was teacher and schoolmaister vnto Peter, whereas Peter was by him iustly corrected. Gal. 2. Furthermore, teaching is not always nor in all things a point of maistership, but sometime a point of seruice.* As if a Frenchman should be put to an Englishman to teach him French, although he excelleth him in that kind of facultie, yet it followeth not therefore, that he hath fulnes of power vpō him, to appoint his diet, to rule his houshold, to prescribe his lawes, to stinte his lands, and such other. Wherefore seing in trauail in teaching, in paines of preaching, in gifts of tongs, in largenes of commission, in operation of miracles, in grace of vocation, in receauing the holy Ghost, in vehemencie of tormentes and death for Christes name, the other Apostles were nothing inferiour to Peter:. Why Peter then should claime any special prerogatiue aboue the rest, I vnderstād no cause. As in deed he neuer claimed any, but the patrons of the Apostolicall sea do claime it for him, which he neuer claimed himself, neither if he were here, would no lesse abhorre it with soule and conscience, then we do now: & yet our abhorring now is not for any malice of person, or any vantage to our selues, but only the vehemencie of truth, & zeale to Christ and to his congregation. Moreouer, if these men would needes haue Peter to be the Curate and ouersear of the whole vniuersall Church (which was too much for one man to take charge vpon) and to be Prince of al other Apostles, then would I faine learne of them, what meaneth (Dextrae societatis) the right hand of societie betwene Peter,, Paul, & Barnabie, mentioned, Gal. 2. What taking of hands is there betwene subiects & their Prince, in way of fellowship? Or where fellowship is, what maistership is there? Or againe, what state of maistership is it like, that Christ would geue to Peter, who beyng in deede maister of all, tooke such little maistership vpon himselfe, and that not only in inward affection, but also in outward fact. Although I am not ignorant that Peter in places of the Gospell hath his commendation, neither doe I denie Peter to bee worthy of the same. But yet these wordes of commendation, geue to him no state of superioritie, or iurisdiction vpon all other, to haue all vnder his subiection. As if a Schoolemaister should haue more special charge to some one of his scholers for his riper towardnes: yet this geueth him no fulnes of authoritie, or power coactiue vpō the rest, vnlesse by special admission he be deputed therunto. Whereof, nothing can be gathered of Peter, for if it bee true that S. Augustine saith, that such things as were spokē to Peter,*, haue no lightsome vnderstanding, except they be referred to the church, wherof Peter did beare a figure: thē hath y^e person of Peter nothing to claime by these woordes, but all redoūdeth to the church, which being ment by Peter, hath power by this reason, both ouer the person of Peter, and all other persons in the Lord.

But here stumbleth in an argument of our aduersarie againe,, which he in the margent of his book calleth an inuincible argument drawen out of the bowels of S. Iohn Chrisostome. Lib. 2. De Sacerd. Wherby he supposeth to haue giuen a shrewd blow to the Protestants, and to haue gotten Hectors victory vpon a certaine English prisoner taken in plain field, and of all such as take his part. The text onely of Chrysostome he reciteth, but maketh no argument albeit he maketh mention of an inuincible argumēt in the margent. But because he either wist not, or list not to shew his cunning therein, I wil forme that in argumēt for him which he would haue done, but did not: and so will forme it (the Lord willing) as he himselfe must of necessitie bee driuen to do, if the matter euer come to the triall of act, and not to the trifling of wordes. First, he taketh his text out of Chrysostome,, as followeth: for what cause, I pray you, did Christ shed his bloud? Truely, to redeeme those sheep, whose charge he committeth to Peter, and to Peters successours. Upon this place of Chrysostome. this Clarke taketh his medium, Christes suffring. His conclusion is, that all which Christ died for, were committed to Peter, Wherfore the forme of the argument must needes stand thus in the third figure.

Christ suffred for all men.

Christ suffered for them whome hee committed to Peter.*

Ergo, All that Christ dyed for, were committed to Peter.

If this be the forme of his insoluble argument, as it seemeth to be, by the order of his reasoning, & also must needs be, taking that medium, and making that conclusion as he doth, (for els in the first figure, and first moode, the text of Chrysostome will not serue him) then must the forme and Page 15 violence of this inexpugnable argumēt be denied, for that it breaketh the rules of Logike, making his conclusiō vniuersall, which in that figure must needes be perticular, either affirmatiue or negatiue. And so this argument inuincible, falleth into one of these two straites, either cōcluding thus, the forme wil not serue him, or cōcluding in another figure, the wordes of Chrysostome will not aunswer to his purpose, to proue that all the world was committed to Peter. Which proposition as it is strange in scripture: so neither is it the proposition of Chrysostome. And though it were, yet both without inconuenience might be graunted of vs, and being graunted, serueth his purpose nothing, so long as the proposition is not exceptiue, excluding other Apostles. For the words of Chrysostom do not so sound, that the whole world was committed to Peter onely and to none other. Likewise then as it may be well affirmed of vs, that the world was committed to Peter, so can it not be denied of them, that the world was also committed to Iohn,James, Bartholomew, Paul, Barnabe, and other all and singular Apostles. For he that said to Peter, Feede my sheepe, said also to all and singular his Apostles: Go into all the world & preach, &c. Math. vlt. Moreouer, for as much as this man collecteth out of Chrysostome, that the whole world was committed to Peter, how shall we then ioyne this meaning of Chrysostome with S. Paule, which sayth that the Gospel was committed to Peter euer the circumcision, as was Paule ouer the vncircumcision? And here an answer to this doughtie argument, both to the forme, & to the matter thereof, albeit concerning the matter, here lacketh much to be said more of Peters successours in the text of Chrysostome. By the which successours is not ment the bishop of Rome onely (as the Papists would beare vs in hand) but all such true and faithfull Pastors, whom the Lordes calling sendeth, and setteth ouer his flocke, where so euer, or whatsoeuer they be. For as Peter beareth a representation of the church, by the testimonie of August. in Ioan. tract 124. Praefat. in Psal. 108. so the successours of Peter be all faithfull Pastors and ouerseers of Christes Church,* to whom Christ our Lord hath committed the charge of his flocke. Wherefore they are not a little deceiued, which looking vpō the rocke onely of the person, and not the rock of confession (contrary to the rule of Hilarie,De trinit. lib. 6.) doe tie the Apostleship or rocke of Peter, to one onely Bishop, and the succession of Peter to one onely sea of Rome: where as this being a spiritual office, and not carnall, hath no such carnall race or discent after any worldly or locall vnderstanding: but hath a more mysticall meaning, after a spirituall sense of succession, such as Hierome speaketh of, epist. ad Euagriū. Omnes, inquit, Apostolorum successores sunt &c. That is, All, saith he (speaking of Bishops) be successours of the Apostles, &c.

Of like force and fashion, and out of the same figure, the same Author patcheth moreouer another argument, proouing that the Bishop of Rome was tituled the head of Christes church, in the primitiue time of the old aunciters, before the age of Gregory. His argument procedeth thus, in the third figure.

*S. Peter was called by the auncient fathers, head of Christes church.

S. Peter was bishop of Rome:

Ergo, the bishop of Rome was called head of y^e Church in the old auncient tyme.

This argument expository, beyng clouted vp in the third figure,* and concluding singularly, hath rather a shew of an argumēt, then maketh any necessarie conclusiō, standing vpon no moode in the said figure, if the Author thereof were put to his triall. Albeit to leaue the forme, and to come to the matter of the argument. First, how wel he wil dispatch himselfe of the Maior, & prooue vs that S. Peter, although he were at Rome, and taught at Rome, and suffred at Rome: yet that he was bishop and proper Ordinarie of that citie and speciall sea of Rome? As touching the allegation of Abdias, Orosius, Ado, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, Optatius, and Augustine, brought forth for his most aduantage,* to prooue his Maior: thus I answer cōcerning Orosius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, and Augustine, that where they speake of S. Peters chaire, or planting y^e faith at Rome, straightway this man argueth there upon, that Peter was Bishop of Rome. But that doth not clarkely follow. For the office of the Apostles was to plant the faith in all places, and in euery regiō, yet were they not bishops in euery region. And as for the chaire, as it is no difference essentiall that maketh a bishop (for so much as a Doctour may haue a chaire, and yet be no bishop) so cannot he conclude by the chaire of Peter, that S. Peter was Bishop of Rome. For all this proueth no farther, but that Peter was at Rome, and there taught the fayth of Christ, as Paul did also, and peradventure in a chayre likewise: yet we say not that Paule was therefore Bishop of Rome. But that he was there as an Apostle of Christ, whether he taught there standing on his feete, or sitting in a chayre. In the Scripture commonly the Chaire signifieth doctrine or iudgement, as sitting also declareth such as teach or iudge, whether they sit in the chaire of Moyses, or in the chaire of pestilence. Planting likewise is a worde Apostolicall, and signifieth not onely the office of a Bishop. Wherefore it is no good consequent, he sate, he taught, he planted at Rome his chaire and seate was at Rome: Ergo, he was Bishop of Rome. And thus much touchyng Orosius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine.

As for Abdias, Ado, Optatus, and such other, although we should haue much wrong offered, and neuer should make an ende, if we should be prest with the authoritie of euery one that could or did mooue pen, in all the whole first age of the church, to be our iudges in euery ecclesiasticall matter: and much more wrong should haue, if the authors either corrupted, or countersaited, should be layd vnto vs, speaking not in the same sense, or in the same tongue, or in the same time wherin they wrote: yet to helpe and to faine the authorities of these authors so much as we may, I answer to their allegations, with this distinction of a bishop, which is to be taken either generally or specially. After the first,* a bishop is he to whom so euer the publike cure and charge of soules is committed, without any limitation of place. And so the name of Bishop is concident with the office of Apostle, or any publique Pastour, Doctour, or Curator of the vniuersall flocke of Christ. And thus may Paule, Peter, or any other of the Apostles be called Bishops. So also is Christ himselfe by expresse worde called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,* that is, Bishop and Pastor, 1. Peter. 2. And thus may Peter wel be named a bishop of these foresaid authors after this maner of taking. But this publike and generall charge vniuersally ouer the whole, without limitation, ceased after Christ and the Apostles. For then were bishops by places and prouinces appointed, to haue speciall ouersight of some perticular flock or prouince, and so to be resident and attendant onely vpon the same.

The other diuersitie of this name bishop, is to be taken after a more speciall sort, which is, when any person orderly called, is assigned, namely & specially to some one certain place, citie, or prouince, wherunto he is only bound to employ his office & charge, and no where els, according to the old Canons of the Apostles, and of the Councell of Nice. And this Bishop differing from the other,* is called Episcopus intitulus, hauing his name of his citie or Dioces. And thus we deny that Peter the Apostle was euer Bishop elected, installed, or intituled to the Citie of Rome, neyther doth Optatus, Abdias, Ado, or Hierome affirme the same. And if Ado say that Peter was bishop of Rome 25. yeares, vntill the last yeare of Nero, that is easilie refuted both by the Scriptures and Histories: for so we vnderstand by the declaration of Saint Paule, Gal. 1.2. that 14. yeares after his conuersion, Saint Paule had Peter by the hand at Hierusalem.

Moreouer, the said Paule in the foresaid Epistle, witnesseth, that y^e charge Apostolical was cōmitted vnto Peter ouer the Circumcised, and so was he intituled. Also S. Paule writing to the Romans, in his manifold salutations to them in Rome, maketh no mentiō there, of S. Peter, which doubtles should not haue bene vnremembred, if he had bene then in Rome. Againe S. Peter dating his Epistle from Babilon, was not then belike at Rome.

Furthermore, histories doe record, that Peter was at Pontus v. yeares, and at Antioch. 7. yeares. How could he then be 25. yeares at Rome? Finally, where our aduersary alleaging out of Ado, saith, that S. Peter was there 25 yerres, vntill the last yere of Nero: how can that stand, when S. Paule suffering vnder Nero, was put to death the same day tweluemonth, that is, a whole yeare after Peter, &c. But especially how agreeth this with Scripture, that Christ should make Peter an Apostle vniuersall to walke in all the world: Item per vniuersum orbem. Item, Eritis mihi testes vsque ad fines terrae. &c. And our Papists would needs make him a sitting Byshop, and intitle him to Rome. How accorde these: Apostolus and Episcopus ire and sedere. Omnes gentes, and Roma together?

And thus haue I resolved the first vntrueth of that Popish demonstration aboue rehearsed, Pag. 14. wherein they thinke to proue that as Peter, although hee was not called vniuersall Apostle, yet was the head of the whole Church: so the Pope might and hath had after him the charge of the whole Church, although he was not called vniuersall Bishop in the olde tyme. &c.

Now followeth the second vntrueth to be touched in the Page 21 same argument, which is, that because Peter was the head of the church:* so therfore the Pope must also be the head of the church, and was, albeit he was not called vniuersal bishop a long time. But this we do deny, yea the matter denieth it selfe, by their owne position, for being graunted by them, that the title of vniuersall bishop was not receiued at Rome, but refused to the time of Gregory: then mst it necessarily be graunted, that the Bishops of Rome before S Gregory, had not the charge of the whole church, neither could be admitted by that reason to be heads of the church. For so much as there can be no head, but which is vniuersall to the whole body, neither can any haue charge of the whole, but he must needes be vniuersal to all and singuler partes of that, whereof he hath the charge. As in sciences, whosoever hath knowledge & cunning in all the seuen liberal sciences, & all the partes therof pertaining to liberall knowledge, is said to be an vniuersall learned man: so in office, to whomsoever the publike charge of all Churches doth appertaine, how is he not to be called bishop vniuersal? Now if before S. Gregories time the name of vniuersall bishop, was repealed in Rome: how then can the name be refused, & the definition of the name be admitted? Or els let our aduersaries tell vs how they define an vniuersall Bishop, seing this word bishop is properly the name of office whereto is annexed charge. Wherefore, if a Bishop be he which hath the charge of all soules in his Dioces cōmitted to him, & must render account for thē al: then whose charge extendeth to all & singuler churches, & must render account for euery christian soule within the whole world, to him cā not be denied the name of an vniuersal bishop, hauing the office of an vniuersall bishop. Or if he be not an vniuersall bishop, he cannot then haue the charge of the whole that is, of all and singular churches of Christ. For such is the rule of true definition,Cui cōuenit definitio, conuenit & definitum, & contra. Cui adimitur definitio, eidem & definitum adimitur. Although this word vniuersall, in the Greeke writers, signifieth that, which we in our vulgar English tongue call catholike, yet I suppose our aduersaries here wil not take vniuersall in that sense. For after that meaning, as we doe not deny that the bishops of Rome may be vniuersall Bishops, so neither can they deny but other bishops also may be as vniuersall, that is, as catholike as they. But such as more distinctly & schoolelike discusse this matter,* define vniuersall or catholike by three things: to witte, by tyme, place, and person. So that whatsoeuer extendeth it selfe to times, all places, & to all persons that is properly vniuersal or catholike. And contrarywise, what thing is to be called vniuersal or catholike, reacheth to all those three aforesaid, cōprehending al places, times, & persons, & extendeth it selfe of his owne nature to the same,* or els it is not to be called properly vniuersal or catholike. And thus iij. things there be, which most commōly we cal catholike or vniuersal: that is, the church which is called the catholike church: Faith, which is called the catholike faith: A man, whome also we call a man catholike, because these iij. of their owne nature & disposition (no contrary obstacle letting) extend themselues so to all, that no time, place, nor persō is excluded. Which iij. conditions,* if they altogether cōcurre in the charge of y^e bishop of Rome, then is it an vniuersal, charge, and he an vniuersal bishop: if not, then is his charge neither vniuersall, nor he the head of the Church, nor yet vniuersall bishop. For how these three can be separated, I can not see, except the aduersary part do proue it more euidently, then yet they haue done.

And thus much to the obiection of our aduersaries, arguing thus: that as S. Peter being not called vniuersall Apostle, yet was the head of the vniuersal church: So the Pope although he was not first called vniuersall Bishop, had, and might haue the charge of the whole Church, and was the vniuersall head of the same. The which obiection conteining (as is said) a double vntruth, our aduersaries yet notwithstanding do busie themselues greatly to fortify by sunory testimonies and allegations, patched out of old and auncient Doctours,* but specially out of Theodoritus, Irenaeus, Ambrose, & Augustine, proouing by them, that the sea of Rome hauing the preeminence and principallitie, hath bene honoured aboue all other churches. Whereupon the said aduersarie before minded, groundeth this consequent.

Irenaeus, Ambrose, Augustine and Theodoritus affirme that the church of Rome is the chiefe of all other churches.

Ergo, the Bishop and head of that church is chiefe and head ouer all other bishops, & head of all other churches.

But this consequent is to be denied, for that the excellencie of the church or place doth not always argue the excellencie of the minister or bishop,* nor yet necessarilie doth cause the same. For in matters of the church which are spirituall, all preeminence standeth vpon spirituall & inward gifts,* (spiritualia enim spiritualibus comparantur) as fayth, pietie, learning and godly knowledge, zeale and feruencie in the holy ghost, vnitie of doctrine, &c. which giftes many tymes may excel in a church, where the minister or bishop is inferiour to bishops or ministers of other churches. As the most famous schoole in a realme hath not alway y^e most famous schoolemaister, neither doth make him thereby most excellent in learning aboue of all other: So if our aduersaries do meane by this preeminēce of the church of Rome, such inward gifts of doctrine, faith, vnitie and peace of religion: then say I, the excellencie hereof doth not inferre or argue the excellencie of the Bishop. And thus concerning the principallitie of the Church of Rome, commended at that time of the Doctors, it may be true, & so well expounded one way. And thus do I graunt the antecedent of this argument, and deny the consequent. But here will our aduersaries peraduenture reply againe and say,* that y^e principallitie of the church of Rome which is commended by the Doctours, is not ment here so much by inward gifts and induments belonging to a christian church, as by outward authoritie and domination ouer other churches, whereto is to be aunswered. First, what necessitie is there, or where did our Papists learne, to bring into the spiritual church of Christ, this outward forme of ciuile regimēt and pollicie? that as the Romaine Emperours in tyme past gouerned ouer all the world,* so the Romaine bishop must haue his monarchie vpon the vniuersall Clergy, to make all other churches to stoupe vnder his subiection. And where then be the wordes of our Sauour: Vos autem non sic, If they hold their affirmatiue, quòd sic where then is Christes negatiue, non sic? if they say, there must needes be distinction of degrees in the church, and in this distinction of degrees, superioritie must necessarily be graunted for the outward discipline of the church, for directing matters, for quieting of schismes, for setting orders, for commensing of Conuocations and Councels, as neede shall require, &c. Against this superioritie we stand not, & therefore we yeld to our superior power, kings, and princes, our due obedience, and to our lawfull gouernours vnder God of both regiments, Ecclesiasticall and Temporall. Also in the Ecclesiasticall state, we take not away the distinction of ordinarie degrees, such as by the Scripture be appointed, or by the primatiue church allowed. As Patriarchs, or Archbishops, Bishops, Ministers and Deacons, for of these foure, we especially read as chiefe. In which foure degrees as we graunt diuersitie of office, so we admitte in the same also, diuersitie of dignitie: neither denying that which is due to ech degree, neither yet maintaining the ambition of any singuler person. For as we geue to the minister place aboue the Deacon, to the bishop aboue the minister, to the Archbishop aboue the Bishop:* so we see no cause of inequalitye why one minister should be aboue an other minister: One bishop in his degree aboue an other bishop to deale in his Diocesse: or one Archbishop aboue another Archbishop. And this is to keepe an order duely & truly in the church, according to the true nature and definitiō of order by the authoritie of August. lib. De ciuit. Dei. Where he thus defineth that which we call order: Ordo, est parium disparium{que} rerum sua cui{que} loca tribuens dispositio. Order) saith he) is a discretion or di•position giuen to all things, according as they are matches, or not matches, proportionally to euery one his owne right and proper place.

This definition of S. Augustine, standing with the things before premised, now here ioyneth the questiō betwene vs and the Papistes, whether the Metropolitane Church of Rome, with y^e Archbishop of the same, ought to be preferred before other Metropolitane churches & Archbishops, through vniuersall Christendome or not? To the answer wherof, if the voyce of order might here be heard, it would say: geue to things that be matches & like, like honour, to things vnlike, vnlike honour, &c. Wherefore, seyng the sea of Rome is a Patriarchall sea appointed by the Primitiue Church, and the Bishop thereof an Archbishop limited within his owne bordering churches, which the Council of Nice calleth suburbicas Ecclesias, as other Archbishops be: he ought therefore orderly to haue the honor of an Archbishop (ordering himselfe thereafter) & such outward preeminence as to other Archbishops is due. More if he do require, he breaketh the rule of right order, he falleth into presumption, and doth wrong vnto his fellows, and they also do wrong vnto themselues, whosoever they be, which feeding his humour of ambition, geue more vnto him thē the foresaid rule of order doth require. For so much as they yeld to him more thē is his right, so much they take frō thē|selues, which is due to thē. And the same is the cause, why both Gregory and Pelagius his predecessour reprehendeth them, which gaue to the Archbishop of Constantinople, Page 17 that,* which now the bishop of Rome clauneth to himselfe charging them with the breach of order in these words: Nedum priuatim aliquod daretur vni, honore debito sacerdotes priuarentur vniuersi, that is, least that while any singular thing is giuen to due person,* all other Priestes be depriued of their due honour. And for the like case Pelagius exhorteth that no Priest do giue to any one Archbishop, the name of vniuersall bishop, ne sibi debitum subtrahat cum alteri honorem offert indebitum. That is, least (saith he) in so doing, he take from himselfe his due honour, while he yeldeth that; which is not due to another. And also in the same Epistle: Quia si summus Patriarcha vniuersalis dicitur, Patriarcharum nomen caeteris derogatur. For (saith he) if he be called the chiefe vniuersal Patriarch, then is the name of Patriarchs derogated from other. &c. Wherefore as is said, seing the bishop of Rome is an Archbishop, as other be. Order giueth that he should haue the dignitie, which to Archbishops is due, whatsoever is added more, is derogation to the rest. And thus much concerning distinction of degrees, and order in giuing to euey degree, his place and honour.

The second reason or answer to the obiectiō before moued, pag. 16. is this:* that beyng graunted to the Papists, that the Doctours aforesaid, speaking of the principalltie of the church of Rome, doe meane not onely of the inward vertues of that church, but also of the outward authoritie and iurisdiction of the same, aboue other churches: yet the cause wherfore they did attribute so much to the church, is to be expēded, which was this, as before was alledged out of the Councel of Calcedon, cap. 28. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that is,* for the title and Imperie which that citie of Rome had then aboue other cities, which cause being outward & carnall, was neither then cause sufficient, and now ceasing, importeth not to vs the like effect, according as they say: Sublata causa, tollitur effectus. So that by the reason therof, the foresaid principalltie of the church of Rome, did not hold then iure diuino, sed humano. And as it holdeth by mans law, so by mans law may be repealed againe.

Wherefore, be it admitted that both the Pope sitteth and succedeth in the chaire of Peter, and also that he is the Bishop of the greatest citie in the world: yet it followeth not therby that he should haue rule and lordship ouer all other bishops and churches of the world. For first touching the succession of Peter, many things are to be considered.

*First, whether Peter sate, and had his chaire in Rome, or not?

Secondly, whether he sate there as an Apostle, or as a Bishop?

Thirdly, whether the sitting in the outward seate of Peter, maketh successour of Peter?

Fourthly, whether he sitteth in the chaire & seat of Peter, which sitteth not in the doctrine of Peter?

Fiftly, whether the succession of Peter maketh rather an Apostle then a Bishop, & so should we call the Pope, the Apostle of Rome, and not the bishop of Rome?

Sixtly, whether Ecclesiasticall functions ought to be esteemed by ordinarie succession of place, or by Gods secret calling or sending?

Seuenthy and lastly, whether it stand by Scripture, any succession at all to be pointed in Christes Church, or why more from Peter, then from other Apostles?

All which Interrogatories being wel discussed (which would aske a long proces) it should wel appeare what litle hold the Pope hath to take this state vpon him, aboue all other Churches as he doth. In the meane tyme, this one argument by the way may suffice in stead of many, for our aduersaries to answer to at their conuenient leisure. Which argument thus I forme and frame in Camestres.

*Ca- All the true successors of Peter, sit in the chaire of the doctrine of Peter, and other Apostles vniformly.

me- No Popes of this latter Church of Rome, sitte in the chaire of Saint Peters and other Apostles doctrine vniformely.

stres. Ergo, no Popes of this latter church of Rome, be the true successors of Peter.

And when they haue well perused the Minor of this argument, and haue well conferred together the doctrine taught them of S. Peter, with the doctrine taught now by the Popes, of iustification of a Christen man, of the office of the law, of the strength and largenes of sinne, of mens merites, of free will, of works of supererogation, of setting vp images, of vij. Sacramentes, of auricular confession, of satisfaction, of sacrifice of the Masse, of communicating vnder one kinde, of eleuating and adoring the Sacramentall elements, of Latine seruice, of inuocation, of prohibitiō of meates and mariage, of vowing chastitie, of sectes & rules of diuers religions, of indulgences and pardōs: also with their doctrine taught now of magistrates, of the fulnes of power, and regalitie of the sea of Rome, with many other like to these, &c. then will I be glad to heare what they wil say to the premisses.

Secondly, if they would proue by the allegation of the Doctours, Irenaeus, Ambrose, Augustine, Theodoritus aforesaid, the Bishop of Rome to bee the chiefe of all Bishops, therfore, because the citie wherof he is bishop, is the chiefe and principall aboue all other Churches, that consequent is to be denied. For it followeth not (taking as I said, the principallitie of that church to stand 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 that is, vpon the principal dominion of that citie) no more then this consequent followeth.

London is the chiefe Citie in all England.

Ergo, the bishop of London is the chieftest of all bishops in the Realme.

Which argument were derogatory to the bishop both of Canterbury, and of Yorke.

Yea to graunt yet more to but aduersaries (which is all they can require) the minde of the foresaid Doctours Irenaeus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoritus, in giuing principallitie vnto Rome, to haue respect vnto y^e vertue of incession from Peter, and not vnto the greatnes of the Citie: yet notwithstanding, for all this their argument holdeth not, if it be rightly considered, to say.

The Apostolicall Sea of Rome,* hauing successiō from Peter, with the bishops therof, was chief then of all other churches, in the primitiue tyme of these Doctours.

Ergo, the Apostolicall sea of Rome, with the Bishops therof, hauing successiō from Peter, ought now to be chiefe of all other churches in these our dayes.

This consequent might well follow,* if the tymes were like, or if succession which gaue them the cause of principallitie, were the same now, which was then. But now the time and succession is not correspondent, for then succession in the time of these Doctours, was as well in doctrine Apostolicall, as in place Apostolicall.* Now the succession of doctrine Apostolicall hath not long ceased in the sea Apostolicall: and nothing remaineth but onely place, which is the lest matter of true spirituall and Apostolical succession. And thus much to the authoritie and testimonie of these forenamed Doctors.

Besides these obiections heretofore recited out of Irenaeus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoritus, our aduersaries yet object and heape vp against vs: moreouer, examples of the primitiue time of the church, testimonies of generall Councils, and opinions of auncient writers, taken out of the booke of Councils, & Epistles decretall, wherby their intent is to prooue, the foresayd termes (of the head of the church, ruler of the church, chiefe of all other Priestes) to bee applied not onely to Peter, but also to the Bishop of Rome within the compasse of the primitiue time. And here commeth in the testimonie cited of Vincentius Lirinensis.* Of the Epistle of Paschasius and his fellowes, writing to Leo from the Council of Chalcedon. The testimonie also of Iustinian the Emperour in his Codex: where Ioannes then Pope was called caput omnium Ecclesiarum Epist. inter claras cap. De summa Trinit & fide Cath. The testimonie also of Athanasius, with his fellow bishops of Egypt, of Thebaida, and Libia, in their Epistles to Pope Marcius, Liberius & Felix. Likewise the testimonie of Hierome, In praef. in 4. Euang. Item Epist. 42. Tom. 1. Item Epist. 41. Tom. 2. Of S. Ambrose, 1. Tim 3. Of S. Augustina to Boniface. Ad Bonifac. contra duas Epist. Pelagian. Lib. 1. cap. 1. Item, Lib. 2. De Baptism. cap. 1. Of Theodoritus in his Epistle to Pope Leo. Epist Commentar. in Pauli Epist. praefixa. Of Chrysostome, Epist ad Innocentium, Tom. 5. &c. By which testimonies our aduersaries would prooue S. Peter, and after him the Bishop of Rome to be called and taken for head of the church, chiefe bishop, prince and ruler of the whole Clergy. To all which obiections fully and exactly to aunswer in order, would require a whole volume by it selfe. In the meane time, leauing the rest vnto them vnto whom it doth more properly appertain, briefly with this one short distinction.* I answer these & all such other like places, where S. Peter with his successours are called: head of the church, chiefe of Bishops, Prince of the Apostles, &c. In which places, this worde head, chiefe, and Prince of the Apostles, may be taken two maner of waies: to note, either dominiō, or els commendation. For so we read sometime Caput,* and princeps, to be wordes not of authoritie, but of excellencie, wherby is declared the chiefeest and worthiest part among many parts, and not possessour and gouernour of the whole. Like as in the person of mā, the hed is the principal part of the whole body, being endued with reason, & furnished with most excellēt senses, by the which y^e whole body of mā is directed, Page 18 so thereof is deriued by a metaphor, to what man or thing soeuer nature or condition hath giuen the greatest excellēcie, of gifts and properties aboue other partes or mēbers, the same societie to be called of the said parties, Caput, or Princeps, head or Prince. And yet the same head or Prince so called, hath not alwayes dominion or iurisdiction of the rest. So we call in our vulgar speach the head or chiefe men of the parish, who for their riches, wisdom, or place, are most specially noted: After like phrase of speach we call the head man of the Inquest, him that hath the first place. And yet neither they nor these haue any dominion or iurisdiction vpon the residue. In a schoole the chieftest Scholer in learning, is not therefore the maister or gouernour of his fellowes.* Neither hath M. Cicero any title thereby to claime subiection and seruice of all other Oratours, because he is named Princeps eloquentiae, and goeth before them in that kind of phrase. The same Cicero. Lib. 1. offic. calleth Cratippū principem huius aetatis Philosophorum: as Homerus also may be called Poetarum Princeps: And yet neither Philosophers to Cratippus, nor Poetes to Homere, owe anye thing els, but onely fame and praise.

And what if S. Peter the blessed Apostle be called and counted of the old auncient Doctours, as head and Prince of the Apostles,* which is as much as Coryphaeus Apostolorum, for his excellent faith, for his deuine confession & singular affection to the Lorde Iesus: yet what Interest or charge either hath he to challenge ouer the Apostles, or the Pope after him ouer all other bishops & the whole church of Christ, although the Pope haue the like excellencie of Christes faith which Peter had, as would God he had? As concerning these allegations therfore out of the Doctors, two thinges are to be obserued: First, that neither these names and titles though they be geuen to Peter, doe geue him any state or dominion aboue other Apostles: nor yet the succession of him doth further any whit this celsitude and regalitie of the Pope to aduance him aboue his fellow Archbishops, as he now doth.

And if our aduersaries would needs prouoke vs to the numbring of testimonies, & deuiding the house (speaking of the writers and Counsels of the Primitiue age) for these aforesaid testimonies alleaged on their side, I could on the contrary part recite out of the witnesse of Doctours, out of the examples of Councils, & practises of Emperors, no lesse then 60. voices, much more repugnant against their assertion, then there is for the Pope. The tractation wherof for this present I do refer, either to them that haue more laisure at this time to discourse them, or els omit it to an other time, if the good pleasure of the Lord shall be, to graunt me further laisure in an other Booke to intreat thereof at large, in such order, as (if the Lord so graunt) shal appeare sufficient matter, to proue by the Doctors, general Councils, examples and histories of time, that the Bishops of Rome during the first 500. yeres after Christ, although for the greatnes of the Empire, were somewhat more magnified then the other, and therfore were sought of many, and were flattred of some, and they themselues diuers, did set forth themselues more then they should: yet by the commō consent of churches, were stopped of their purpose, so that by the consension of the most part, within the compasse of that age the Bishops of Rome had not this regall state of title, iurisdiction, and fulnes of power, which now they vsurpe, but were taken as Archbishops, of equal honour, of equal merite with other Archbishops & rulers of y^e church. And if any preferment was giuen vnto them some thing aboue the rest, yet neither was it so giuen of all, nor of the most part:* secondly, neither was it so giuen of them for any such necessitie of Gods worde, aut iure aliquo diuino, as which did so bind them thereunto, nor yet so much for the respect of Peter, & his succession: as for certaine other causes and respects, as may be gathered to the number of 13.

[unspec 1] Of which, the first is the greatnesse of the citie and Monarchie of Rome.

[unspec 2] The second, is the authoritie of the Emperour Constantine the great, first of the Emperours conuerted to the faith, and ruling in the same citie, by whom the vniuersal libertie of the church was first promooted, and the causes of the bishops being then at variance, were committed partly to the bishop of Rome, partly to other bishops nere by, to be decided, as appeareth Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

[unspec 3] The third, was the Councel of Nice, which confirmed the preeminence of that church to haue the ouersight of the churches bordering about it.

[unspec 4] The fourth cause of aduauncing the church of Rome, was the vnquiet state of the Greek church, much troubled in those dayes with sects, factions, and dissensions, wherof we may read, Socrat. lib. 2. cap 15. Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 8.

[unspec 5] The fift, when Synodes were called by other Metropolitanes, then if it chanced the bishops of Rome to be absent, and their sentence being absent to be required, by the occasion therof, they began at length to take their sentence for a Canon or rule Ecclesiasticall, & thereby to refuse other Synodes, where their decree or sentēce was not required.

An other cause was, that when any common matter [unspec 6] was in hand in other places, whatsoever was done, commonly the maner was to write to the Romaine bishop for his approbatiō in the same, for publike vnitie and consent to be had in Christes church, as appeareth Lib. 10. Epist. 78. Ambrosij ad Theophilum.

Item, for that the testimonie somtimes of the Romain [unspec 7] bishop was woont in those dayes also to be desired, for admitting teachers and bishops in other churches, whereof we haue example in Socrat lib. 4. cap. 37.

Moreouer, this was a great setting vp of that church, [unspec 8] when as their sentence not only was required, but also receiued diuers times of other bishops. And when Bishops of other prouinces were at any dissention among thēselues they of their owne accord appealed to the bishop of Rome, desiring him to cite vp both parties, and to haue the hearing and deciding of the cause, as did Macarius and Hesychius send to Iulius then bishop of Rome, &c.

Item, in that certaine of the Arrians returning from [unspec 9] their Arrianisme, offered vp and exhibited vnto the bishops of Rome their libels of repentance, and were of them receiued againe, as Vrsatius and Valens did to Iulius. Socra. lib. 2. cap 24.

The x. cause was also, for that Gratianus the Emperour [unspec 10] made a law, that all men should retaine that religiō which Damasus bishop of Rome, and Peter bishop of Alexandria did hold. Sozom lib. 7. cap. 4.

And also, if it happened the bishop of Rome to disallow [unspec 11] the ordering of any minister or ministers, the Popes perceiuing how diligent and redy they were to seeke their fauour, and to send vp their messengers to Rome for their purgation, tooke therby no little maner of exaltation. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 23.

Besides these aforesaid, the bishops of Rome had also [unspec 12] an other artificiall practise, that in sending out their letters abroad, as they did to many, in all their Epistles (if the Epistles be theirs, and not forged) euer they were harping of the greatnes of their name, and of their Apostolike sea, and of the primacie of S. Peter, their predecessor and prince of all the Apostles, &c. And this they vsed in euerie letter, when so euer they wrote to any, as appeareth in all their letters decretall, namely, in the letters of Miltiades, Marcellus, and Marcus, &c.

Againe, if any of the East church directed any writing [unspec 13] to them, wherein any signification was contained of neuer so little reuerence giuen vnto them (as learned men commonly vse for modesties sake) that was taken by & by and construed for plaine subiection, and due obediēce, as declareth the letter of Damasus, written to the bishops of the East Church, beginning thus: Quod debita reuerentia, &c. in English thus: but that your charitie yeldeth due reuerēce to the Apostolicall sea, you in so doing (deare children) do much for your selues, &c. Theodoret. Lib. 5. cap. 9. where as the Bishops of the East Church notwithstanding had shewed little or no reuerence in their Epistle to Pope Damasus before.

Thus haue ye the first and originall groundes, by the meanes wherof, the Archbishops of the Romish Sea haue atchieued to this their great kingdome and celsitude ouer Christes church, first beginning the mysterie of their iniquitie, by that which was modestly and voluntarily giuē them. Afterward by vse and custome claiming it ambitiously vnto them, of dutie & seruice, & lastly holding fast (as we see) that which once they had gotten into their possessiō, so that now in no case they can abide the birdes to cal home their fethers againe, which they so long haue vsurped.

And thus much concerning the life,* iurisdiction, & title of the Romain bishops: In all which (as is declared) they and not we, haue fallen from the church of Rome. To these I might also ioine the maner of gouernment, wherein the said Romish Bishops haue no lesse altered both from the rule of Scripture, and from the steps of the true church of Rome, which gouernment as it hath bene, and ought to be only spirituall: so hath the bishop of Rome vsed it of late yeres no otherwise, thē hath an earthly king or prince gouerned his realme & dominiōs, with riches, glory, power, terror, outward strēgth, force, prisō, death, executiō, lawes policies, promooting his friends to dignities, reuenging his affections, punishing and correcting faults against his person more then other offences against God committed, vsing and abusing in all these things the word of God for his pretext & cloke to worke his worldly purpose withall: Page 19 whereas indeede the word of God ministreth no such power to spirituall persons, but such as is spirituall: according to the saying of the Apostle. Arma militiae nostrae non sunt carnalia, sed spiritualia. &c. The armour and artillery, sayth S. Paule, of our warfaire is not carnall, but spirituall: such as serue not against flesh and bloud, nor against the weake person of man: but against Sathan, agaynst the gates of hell, and the profundities of the wicked power. &c.

Which armour as it is al spiritual, so ought they, which haue the dealing therof, to be likewise spirituall, well furnished with all such giftes and graces of the holye Ghost, meere for the gouernance of his spiritual Church: as with wisdom and knowledge in the Scripture, to instructe the ignorant: with inward intelligence & foresight of the craftye cogitations and operations of Sathan, with power of the spirit to resist the same: with practise and experience of tentations, to comfort such as be afflicted and oppressed of Sathan: with heavenly discretion to discern spirits, and truth from vntruth: with iudgment and knowledge of tounge and learning to conuict error: wyth zeale of Gods glory, with feruencye of prayer, with patience in persecution: with a minde contented with all cases and states incident, with teares and compassion on other mens greeues: with stoutnes and courage against proud and stout oppressours: with humilitie toward the poore and miserable: with the counsaile of the Lorde Iesus, by his word and spirite to direct him in all things to be done with strength against sinne: with hatred of this worlde: with gift of fayth: power of the keyes in spirituall causes, as to minister the word, the Sacraments and excommunication when the worde biddeth, that the spirite may be saued, and to reconcile againe, as case requireth. &c. These and such like are the matters wherin consisteth the sinews and strength of the church, and the true gouernance of the same. But cōtrary to these aforesaid both y^e Bishop & clergie of this latter Church of Rome, proceeding in their administration and gouernaunce, as who vnder the name and pretence of Christ and his word, haue exercised of long time nothing els but a worldly dominion, seeking indede their owne glory, not the glory of Christ: riches of the world, not the lucre of soules: not feeding the flocke, but fylling the purse: reuenging their owne wronges, but neglecting gods glory: stryuing against man onely, and killing him, but not killing the vice, nor confuting the error of man: strong against flesh and bloude, but weake against the Deuill, stout against the simple, but meeke against the mightie: briefly, doing almost all thinges preposterously, more like to secular Princes, then spirituall Pastours of Christes flocke, with outward forcement, and feare of punishment, wyth prysoning, famishyng, hanging, racking, drowning, headyng, slaying, murdering, and burning, and warring also: on the other side with his riches and treasures, wyth his garde and gardiance, with strength of men, with Court and Cardinals: with pomp and pride about them, with their triple crowne, with the naked sworde: with theyr ordinary succession: with their lawes, and executions: their promotions and prefermēts: their biddings and commandings: threatninges and reuenginges. &c.

*In fine, to compare therefore the Images of a worldly kingdome, with this kingdome of the Pope, there is no difference, saue onely that this kingdome of the Pope, vnder hypocrisie maketh a face of the spirituall word, which is the worde of God: but in verie deede doth all things with the temporall sworde, that is with outwarde forcement and coaction: differing nothing from ciuile and secular regiment in all properties and conditions, if it be well considered. For as in an earthly kingdome first there is a Prince or some chiefe Magistrate appointed, hauing dominion ouer his nobles and commons, conteining all his subiects vnder his statutes and lawes, with the which lawes notwithstanding he dispenseth at his pleasure: vnder whom all other inferior Magistrates haue their order and place to them appointed to rule ouer the subiects, and yet to be subiect vnder him: So if the state and forme of the Pope be well aduised, we shall see it altereth nothing from the same, but onely in the names of the persons. In ciuile gouernment, al subiectiō is referred to one head ruler, whose authoritie surmounteth all the rest, and kepeth them vnder obedience: In like maner the gouernement of the Popish Church is committed to one man, who as chiefe steward, ouerseer and ruler of Christes houshold in his absence, hath supream power ouer all Churches, to moderate and direct all the affaires thereof. But here stādeth the difference, in ciuill policy he is called a Kyng or Prince: here he is called a Pope.

The King hath next vnto him his Dukes & Earles▪ The Popes nobilitie standeth in his Cardinals,* and Legats, who though they be no Dukes in name, yet in pōpe and prid will not onely giue checke to them, but also mate to Kings themselues, it they might be suffered, as did Theodorus, Lancfrancus, Ancelmus, Thomas Becket, and so would Thomas Woulsey haue done, had not the King giuen him a necke to his mate betime.* In ciuile policie next to Dukes & Earles foloweth the order of Lords, Barons, Knights Esquiers, Gentlemen, with Mayors, Sheriffes, Cōstables, Bayliffes, Wardens. &c. The like race is to be seene also, although vnder other names, in the Popes policie: of Primates, Bishops, Suffraganes, Prouostes, Deanes Canons, Uicars, Archdeacons, Priests, Deacons, Subdeacōs, Acolites, Exorcists, Lectors, Dorekeepers, Singsters, with other Clerks. And as in the other vnder wardens cometh the order of Scauingers: so neither doth the Popes Monarchy lacke his kaynilrakers, to whome may well be compared the rablement of Abbotes, Prouincials, Priors, Monkes, Friers, with their Couentes and Nonneries.

Moreouer from Iustices,* Iudges, Laweyers, Sergeants, Attorneyes, which be necessary offices in the cōmon wealth, what differeth the Popes Inquisitors, Canonistes, Doctours and Bachelers of the Popes lawe, Comissaries, Officials, Proctors, Promoters, with such other, which serue no lesse in spirituall Court, & in the consistorie, then the other aforesaid doe in temporall Court, or in the Yeldhall. Now who so list to compare the glory and magnificence of the one, with the glory of the other:* also the power and strength of the one regiment, with the power of the other: and so the ryches of the one, wyth the ryches of the other, I suppose he shall see no great ods betweene them both, taking the Popes kingdome as it hath stood in his full ruffe, & yet doth stande, where Churches are not reformed.* As for subiltie and politike practise, there is no man that doubteth, that is indifferent, nor that seeth not, that hath his eyes, but that the Popes hierarchie in holding vp their state, far excelleth all y^e kingdomes of worldly Princes, of whome all other may take example to learne.

Thus in comparing the Popes regiment with ciuile gouernance as they doe little or nothing disagree asunder:* So in comparing againe the same with the order of scriptures, or with the regiment that was in the old auncient Church of Rome, we shall see no resemblaunce betwene them. As we read in the Apostles time, all the armour of Christes ministers was spirituall and full of godly power against the spirituall enimies of our saluation,* gouerning the Church then with peace, patience, humilitie, true kn•ledge of God, the sword of the spirite, the shielde of fayth, the breastplate of righteousnes, harty charitie, sincere faith, and good conscience: so after the Apostles in the time of Ambrose,* by his owne testimonie is to be vnderstand, that the armour of Churchmen was then, preces & lachrymae, prayers and teares: where now the armour of the popes Priesthoode is nothing els but ignis & ferrum, i. fire and sword, wherewith they keepe all things vnder their subiection.* And here commeth the enorme and horrible abuse of excommunication, suspension, and interdiction in cases friuolous, or worldly, and for such, as for which the ciuile magistrate will not commit any Citizens to the stockes, the Popes censure will not sticke to commit a Christian to the deuill:* not to speak of their other vsurped dealings and doings in matters, that belong to y^e ciuile sword, & be to them impertinent. As in punishing whoredome and adultery, in administration and probates of testaments, in bearing ciuile office, as popes to be Senators of Rome and Emperour also sede vacante. Cardinals to be Capitaines in warre, and rulers of regions: Byshoppes to be Presidentes or Chauncelours, Priestes to be stewards in great mens houses, or maysters of minutes, or Clerkes of y^e market, or gardiners to Gentlemen. &c. All which here I ouerpasse referring thē to y^e deeper consideratiō of such as haue more leisure to mark y^e order of their doings, & so to iudge of the same with indifferencie, according to y^e rule of truth, touched with Gods worde, and publike examples of y^e auncient Church of Christ in the primitiue tyme.

Thus hauing discoursed, sufficiently so much as concerneth the maner of life,* title, iurisdiction, and gouernement of the Popes sea (in all which pointes is to be sene how this latter Church of Rome hath receded from the true auncient Church of Rome) now remaineth, according to my promise, and order prefixed, consequentely to proceede to the fourth and last point, which is of doctrine: wherein consisteth the chieftest matter that maketh with vs and against them, in such sort as (their doctrine standing Page 20 as it doth) neither they are to be reputed for true Catholikes being altered so far from them: nor we otherwise then heretikes if we shoulde now ioyn with these. For the more triall whereof,* let vs examine the doctrine & rites of the sayd Church of Rome now vsed, and compare the same with the teaching of the auncient Catholikes, to the intent that such simple soules as haue beene hetherto, and yet seduced by the false visour and image of this pretenced and bastardly church, perceauing what lieth within it, may be warned by tyme, either to eschue the perill, if they list to be instructed: or if not, to blame none but thēselues for their owne wilfull destruction. And albeit I coulde here charge the newfangled Church of the Pope with vij. or viij. heynous crimes, as blasphemy, Idolatry, heresie, superstition, absurditie, vanitie, crueltie, and contrarietie (as which neither agreeth with the old learning of their forelders, nor yet with thēselues in sundry points) yet after a more temperate sort to passe this matter wyth them, these ij. things, I will & dare boldly affirme, that in this doctrine of the Pope nowe taught in the Church of Rome, is neither any consolation of conscience, nor saluation of mans soule.* For seeing there is no life nor soule health but onely in Christ, nor any promise of saluation or comfort made, but only by faith in the sonne of God, what assurance then can there be of perfect peace, life, or saluatiō where that which onely maketh all, is least made of, and other things which make least are most esteemed? For to say the simple truth, what els is the whole course and body of the popes law now set foorth,* but a doctrine of laws, a heape of ceremonies, a teaching of traditions, a meditation of merites, a foundation of new Religions: al which conferre not one iote to the iustification of our soules before the terrible iudgement of God.

And therefore (as it may be truely saide) this doctrine of the Pope to be voyd of all true comfort and saluation: so likewise it seemeth that these which addict themselues so deuoutly to y^e popes learning, were neuer earnestly afflicted in conscience, neuer humbled in spirite nor broken in hart, neuer entred into any serious feeling of Gods iudgement, nor euer felt the strength of the law & of death. For if they had,* they shoulde soone haue seene their owne weakenes and be driuen to Christ: then should they haue seene what a horrible thing it is to appeare before GOD the father, or once to thinke on him (as Luther saith) without christ. And on the contrarye side, then shoulde they know what a glory,* what a kingdome, what liberty and life it were to be in Christ Iesus by faith, holding their inheritance, not with the bondsonne of Agar, but with the free sonne of Sara: by promise and not by y^e law: by grace, and not by works: by gift and not by deseruing, that god onely might be praysed and not man.

And thus were the olde Romaines first taught by S. Paule writing to the Romanes. The same did Cornelius the Romaine, and first that was Baptised of all the Gentiles, learne of S. Peter when he receaued the holy Ghost, not by the deedes of the law, but onely by hearing the faith of Iesus preached. And in the same doctrine the sayd Church of the Romaines many yeares continued, so long as they were in affliction. And in the same doctrine, the byshop of Rome with his Romanes now also should still remayne, if they were such auncient Catholickes as they pretende, and woulde follow the old mother Church of Rome,* and holde the first liquor wherewith they were first seasoned. But the sweete verdor and sent of that liquor and pleasant must is nowe cleane put out through other vnsauery infusions of the Popes thrusting in, so that almost no tast nor peece remaineth of all that primitiue doctrine which S. Paule and other Apostles first planted among the Gentiles. And what maruell if the Romanes now in so long tract of time haue lost their first sap,* seying the Church of the Galathians then in the very time of S. Paule their Schoolemaister, he being amongst them, had not so soone turned his backe a little, but they were all turned almost from the doctrine of fayth, and had much a doo to be recouered againe.

Of this defection and falling from faith. S. Paule expressly foretelleth vs in his letters both to the Thessalonians, and also to Timothe, where he sheweth: that a defection shall come, and that certaine shall depart from the faith,* attending to spirits of errour. &c. 1. Tim. 4. And to know what errours these shall be, the circumstance plainly leadeth vs to vnderstande in the same place, where the sayd Apostle, speaketh of marked consciences, forbidding men to marry, and to eate meates ordeined of God to be taken with thanks giuing, for mans sustenance, most euidently as with his finger, pointeth out vnto vs y^e church of Rome, which not in these pointes onely but also in all other conditions, almost is vtterly reuolted from the pure originall sincerity of that doctrine which Saint Paule planted in the Church of the Romanes, and of all other Gentiles.

The Summe of S. Paules doctrine deliuered to the Gentiles.

1. First,* the doctrine of S. Paule ascribeth all our iustification freely & meerly to faith onely in Christ as to the onely meanes and cause immediate, whereby y^e merites of Christes passion be applyed vnto vs, without any other respect of worke or workes of the law, whatsoever? and in this doctrine the Church of the Romanes was first planted.
2. Secondly,* the same doctrine of S. Paule cutting of and excluding all glory of mans deseruing, stayeth onely vpon Gods promise and vpon grace, not mans merites, vpon mercy, not mans labouring or running: vpon election and calling, not mans willing. &c.
3. Thirdly,* the same doctrine casting downe the strength of man and his integra naturalia (as the scholes doe terme them) concludeth all fleshe vnder sinne, and maketh the same destitute of the glory of God.
4. Item,* it maketh manifest difference betweene the law and the Gospell, declaring the vse and ende of them to be diuers: the one to kill, the other to quicken, the one to cōdemne, the other to iustifie: the one to haue an ende and a tyme, the other to be perpetuall. &c.
5. Item,* the same doctrine of S. Paule, as it sheweth a difference betweene the law and the Gospell: so it maketh no lesse difference betweene Iusticia Dei, and Iusticia propria, that is, the righteousnes of God and the righteousnes of man, abhorryng the one, that is, mans owne righteousnes, comming by the law and works: and embracing the other which God imputeth freely and graciously to vs for Christ his sonnes sake,* in whom we beleue.

6. Item, it wipeth away al traditions, and constitutions of men whatsoeuer, especially from binding of conscience, calling them beggerly elements of this world.

7. Likewise it reiecteth and wipeth away al curious subtilities, and superfluous speculations, & knoweth nothing els but Christ onely Crucified, which is onely the obiect whereunto our faith looketh.

8. Furthermore, as the same doctrine of S. Paule defineth al men to be transgressours by disobedience of one Adam,* though they neuer touched the Aple, comming of his stocke by nature: so doth it prooue all men to be iustified by the obedience of one, though they did not his obedience, being likewise borne of him by spirituall regeneration and faith.

9. And therefore as all men comming of Adam be condemned originally, before they grow vp to commit anye sinne agaynst the law, so all men be saued originally being regenerated by fayth in Christ, before they begin to do any good worke of charitie, or any other good deede.

10. Item, the doctrine of S. Paule perpending the high glory of a Christen mans state in Christ Iesus by faith, first setteth him in a perfect peace with almightie God.* Rom. 5. Secondly exempteth him from all condemnatiō. Rom. 8. Thirdly it matcheth him with aungels, it equalleth him with Saints and felow citizens of heauen, it nūbereth him with the housholde of God,* and inheriteth him with Iesus Christ himselfe. Ephes. 2. Fourthly it adopteth him from the state of a seruaunt, to the state of the sonne of God, crying Abba father. Gal. 4. Fiftly, it openeth to him a bolde accesse and entraunce to the high maiestie and throne of grace,* Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. Sixtlye, it subiecteth all thinges vnder him: as ministers, yea, the Apostles themselues in their hiest office, death, life, thinges present, thinges to come, with the whole worlde besides, and assigneth him no spirituall head, but onely Christ, saying. And you are Christes,* and Christ is Gods. 1. Cor. 3. Seuently, it aduaunceth and setteth him in a spirituall liberty or freedome, aboue all terrours of spirite, rising either of Gods lawe or mans lawe, aboue all dreadfull feares of sinne, damnation, malediction, reiection, death, hell, or purgatory: aboue al seruile bondage of ceremonies, mens precepts, traditions, superstitious vses, yokes, customes, or what els soeuer oppresseth and intangleth the spirituall freedome of a conscience with Christ hath set at libertie: And requireth moreouer that wee walke and stande stout in that liberty with the free sonne of Sara, whereto we are brought, and not suffer our selues any more to bee clogged with any such seruile bondage: that is to meane, although we must be content to subiect our bodies to all seruice & to all men, yet that we yeld not our spirituall consciences Page 20 <1 page duplicate> Page 16 and soules as slaues and seruants to be subiect to the feare or bondage of any terrene thing in this world, forasmuch as we are in that part made Lordes and Princes ouer all things whatsoeuer can harme or binde, or terrifie vs. Ga. 4. Colloss. 2.

*11. Item, the right vayne of S. Paules doctrine putteth no difference nor obseruation in dayes and tymes. Gal. 4. Col. 2.

12. Item, it leaueth all meates to be indifferent, wyth thanks giuing, to serue the necessitie of the body, and not the body to serue them. Col. 2. 1. Tim. 4.

13. Item, it permitteth marriage without restraint or exception, lawfull and also expedient for all men, hauyng neede thereof. 1. Cor. 7.

14. Item, it admitteth no sacrifice for sinne but the sacrifice of Christ alone, and that done once for all with bloude. For without blood there is no remission of sinne whiche onely is applied to vs by fayth, & by nothing els. Heb. 9.

15. Item, as touching the holy Communion, by the letters of S. Paule to the Cor. 11. we vnderstande, that the vse then amongst them was, to haue the participation of the bread called the Lordes body, and of the cup called the Lordes bloud, administred not at an altar, but at a plaine bord or table, the congregation there meeting together after the time of their supper, where not the minister alone did receaue and the other looked on, but the whole congregation together did cōmunicate with reuerence & thanks giuyng, not lifting ouer the Priestes head, nor worshipyng, nor kneeling, nor knocking their brestes, but eyther sittynge at the supper, or standing after the supper. According to which forme the Muscouites yet to this day followyng the old rite of the Country (although being drowned otherwise in much superstition) vse to receaue it after they be risen from their diner standing. Experience wherof was seene here at London the first day of October. 1569.

*16. Item, the sayde Apostle, besides the sacramentall supper maketh mention of Baptisme, or washing of regeneration, although he himselfe Baptised but few. 1. Cor. 1. of the other sacraments he maketh no mention.

17. Item, by the same doctrine of S. Paule no tongue is to be vsed in the congregation which is not knowen and doth not edifie. 1. Cor, 14.

18. Item, the rule of S. Paules doctrine subiecteth euery creature vnder the obedience of Kinges and Princes and ordinary Magistrates ordeined of God to haue the sword and authoritie of publike regiment to order and dispose in all thinges not contrary to God, whatsoever pertaineth to the maintenance of the good, or to the correction of the euil: from whose iurisdiction there is no exemption of vocations of persons, whether they be Ecclesiasticall or politicall. And therefore to this office appertaineth to preserue peace, to set things in lawfull order, to conserue Christian discipline in the Church of Christ, to remooue offences, to bridle the disobedient, to prouide and procure wholesome and faithfull teachers ouer the people, to maintaine learning and set vp schooles, to haue ouersight not onely of the people, but also of all Ecclesiastical ministers to see to euery one to do his dutye, & to remooue or punish such as be negligent: also to call Councels and Synodes, & to prouide the Church goodes to be faithfullye dispensed by the handes of true dealers, to the sustentation of the Church, of true teachers, & to the publike necessitie of the poore, &c.

*19. Furthermore, by S. Paules doctrine, the Ministers and superintendentes of Christes Church haue their authoritie and armour likewise to them limited, which armour is onely spiritual, and not carnal, wherby they fight not against flesh & blood, but against the power of darkenes, errour, and sinne against the spirituall seduction and crastines in heauenly things, against the works and proceedings of Sathan the Prince of this worlde, in comforting weak consciences against the terrors of the deuill, and desperation, and finally against euery cogitation lifted vp against Christ, to subdue euery celsitude to the subiection and power of Christ Iesu the sonne of God.

An other briefe recapitulation of the same

BRiefly and in a compendious summe to reduce the whole doctrine of S. Paule,* in these fiue pointes chieflie it consisteth.

1. First, in setting foorth the grace, great loue and good\will, and free promises of God the Father in Christ Iesus his sonne to mankinde, which so loued the worlde, that he hath giuen his owne sonne for the redemption thereof. Iohn 3. which gaue his sonne to die for vs being his enimies. Rom. 5. which hath quickned vs being dead in sinne Ephes. 2. which so mercifully hath reconciled the world to himselfe by his sonne,* and also by his ambassadours desireth vs to be reconciled vnto him, 2. Cor. 5. who hath giuē his owne sonne to be sinne for vs. 2. Cor. 5. to be accursed for vs. Gal. 3. which by firme promise hath assured vs of our inheritance.* Rom. 4. which not by the works of righteousnes that we haue done, but of his owne mercy hath sauēd vs by the washing of regeneration. Tit. 3. &c.

2. The seconde point consisteth in preaching and expressing the glorious and triumphant Maiestie of Christ Iesus the sonne of God,* and the excellency of his glory, who being once dead in the infirmitie of flesh rose againe wyth power, ascending vp with maiestie, hath led away captiuitie captiue, Eph. 4. sitteth and reigneth in glory on the right hand of God in heauenly thinges, aboue all principates and potestates, powers and dominations, & aboue euery name that is named, not only in this world, but also in the world to come, Ephe. 1. In whose name euery knee hath to bende both in heauen and in earth, and vnder the earth, and euery tongue to confesse our Lord Christ Iesus to be of the glory of God the Fathee.* Phil. 2. In whome and by whome all things are made both in heauen and in earth, things visible & inuisible, whether they be thrones or dominations, or principates, or potestats, al are by him and for him created, and he is before all, & all thinges consist in him, who is the head of his body the Church, the beginning and first borne from the dead, in whome dwelleth all fulnes.* Col. 1. To whome the Father hath giuen all iudgement, and iudgeth no man himselfe any more. Ioh. 5. To whom the Father hath giuen all things to his hands Iohn. 13.* To whome the father hath giuen power of all flesh. Iohn. 17. To whome all power is giuen in heauen and in earth. Math. vlt. In whome be all the promises of God. Est. & Amen. 2. Cor. 1.

3. Thirdly,* he declareth the vertue of his Crosse & Passion, and that what exceeding benefites proceede to vs by the same. By whose blood we haue redemption & remission of our sinnes. Ephes. 1. By whose strypes we are made whole. Eay. 53. By whose Crosse all thinges are pacified, both in heauen and in earth. Col. 1. By whose death wee are reconciled. Ro. 5. Who hath destroyed death, & brought life to light. 1. Timot. 1. Who by death hath destroyed him which had the power of death, that is the diuell, and hath deliuered them which liued vnder feare of death all theyr life in bondage. Heb. 2. By whose obedience we are made iust: by whose righteousnes we are iustified to life. Rom. 5. By whose curse wee are blessed, and deliuered from the malediction of the law. Gala. 8. By whose blood we that once were farre of, are made neere vnto God. Ephes. 5. Who in one body hath reconciled both Iewes & Gentiles vnto God. Eph. 2. Who by his flesh hath taken away the diuision and separation betweene God and vs, abolishing the law which was set against vs in preceptes & decrees. Ephes. 2.* Who is our peace, our aduocate, and propitiatio for the sinnes of the whole worlde. 1. Iohn. 2. Who was made accursed,* & sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnes of God in him. 2. Cor. 5. Who is made of God for vs,* our wisdom and righteousnes, & sanctification, and redemption. 1. Cor. 1. By whom we haue boldnes, and entraunce with all confidence through faith in him.* Ephes. 3. Who forgiveth all our sinnes, and hath torne a peeces the obligation or handwriting, which was against vs in the law of commaundements, and hath crucified it vpon the Crosse,* & vtterly hath dispatched and abolished the same, and hath spoiled principates and potestates, as in an open shew of conquest, triumphing ouer them openly in himselfe. Col. 2. Who iustifieth the wicked by faith. Ro. 4. In whom we are made full and complete. Col. 2. &c.

4. The fourth branch is,* to teach and informe vs (to whō these benefites of Christes Passion and victory do apperteine) by what meanes the same is applied & redoundeth vnto vs: which meanes is onely one, that is onely faith, in Christ Iesu,* and no other thing. Which faith it pleaseth almightie God, to accept for righteousnes. And this righteousnes it is, which onely standeth before God and none other, as we are plainly taught by the Scriptures, and especially by the doctrine of S. Paule. Which righteousnes thus rising of faith in Christ. S. Paule calleth the righteousnes of God, where he speaketh of himselfe, vtterly refuseth the other righteousnes which is of the lawe, that the might be found in him, not hauing his own righteousnes which is of the law, but the righteousnes of Christ, which is of faith. Phil. 3.* Againe, the saide Apostle writing of the Iewes, which sought for righteousnes and found it not: and also of the Gentiles which sought not for it, and yet found it, sheweth the reason why: because (saith he) the one sought it as by workes and the lawe, and came not to Page 22 it, who not knowing the righteousnes of God, and seeking to set vp their owne righteousnes,* did not submit themselues to the righteousnes whiche is of God: The other, which were the Gentiles, and sought not for it, obtained righteousnes, that righteousnes, which is of faith. &c. Ro. 9. Also in an other place, Saint Paule in the same Epistle writing of this righteousnes which commeth of faith, calleth it the righteousnes of God, in these wordes. Whome God (saith he) hath set vp for a propitiatio by faith in his blood,* whereby to make manifest the righteousnes, which is of himselfe in tollerating our sinnes. &c. Rom. 3. By the which righteousnes it is euident that S. Paule meaneth the righteousnes of faith,* which almightie God nowe reuealeth & maketh manifest by preaching of the Gospell. Wilt thou see yet more plainely this righteousnes of God howe it is taken in S. Paule, for the righteousnes of faith, & therefore is called the righteousnes of God, because it is imputed onely of God to fayth, and not deserued of man? In the same Epistle to the Romanes and in the 3. chap. aforesayd, his wordes be manifest: The righteousnes of God (sayth he) is by faith of Iesus Christ,* in all, and vpon al that doe beleue. &c.

Wherefore whosoever studieth to be accepted with God and to be found righteous in his light, let him learne diligently by the doctrine of S. Paule to make a difference & a separation, as farre as from heauen and earth, betweene these two, that is betweene the righteousnes of workes, & righteousnes of faith: & in any wise beware he bring no other meanes for his iustification, or remission of his sins, but onely faith apprehending the body or person of Christ Iesus crucified. For as there is no way into the house but by the doore, so is there no comming to God but by Christ alone, which is by faith. And as the mortall body, without bodely sustenance of bread & drinke can not but perishe so the spiritual soule of man hath no other refreshing but only by faith in the body and bloude of Christ,* whereby to be saued.* With this faith the Idolatrous Gentiles apprehēded Iesus Christ, and receaued therby righteousness. Cornelius (the first Baptised Ramane) so sooone as he heard Peter preache Christ, receaued straightway the holy Ghost, Peter himselfe confessed, and for his confession, hadde the keyes of heauen. Math. 16. Zacheus receaued the person of Christ into his house,* and withal receaued saluation both to him and his whole houshold. Luc. 19 What a sinner was Mary,* which had no lesse in her then vij. deuils, & yet because she set her hart and affectiō vpon that person, many sinnes were forgien her. Luc. 7. The right hand theefe,* how farre was he from all works of the law, & yet by faith entred he iustified into Paradise y^e same day with christ. Luc. 23. In like maner, although the poore Publicane came to the Church with lesse holines after the law, yet went he home to his house more iustified then the Pharisie with all his workes,* and all by reason of fayth. Luc. 18, The parable of the prodigal sonne which was lost yet reuiued agayne: Also of the lost groat, and of the lost sheepe which went astray and was found againe, what do these declare but that which is lost by the lawe, to be recouered by faith and grace? And how oft doe we reade in the Gospels:Thy faith hath saued thee. &c. Iesus seing their beliefe &c. He that beleueth in me I will raise him vp in the last day. &c. Beleue also in me &c. He that beleueueth in me hath euerlasting life. &c. Without me ye can do nothing. &c. He that is in me. &c. He that looueth me. &c. He that heareth me. &c. He that abideth in me. &c. He that receaueth me. &c. Onles ye eate my flesh: and drinke my bloud.&c. That they may receaue remission of sinnes by their faith in me. &c. Act. 26. To him al the Prophets giue witnes, to haue remission of sinnes, whosoener beleueueth in his name &c. Act. 10. He that beleueueth & is baptised. Mat. vlt. He that beleueth in me shall do the works that I do, & greater then these. &c.

And likewise in the writings of S. Paule, how often doe we heare the name of Christ, almost in euery thirde or fourth line,* where hee still repeateth: In Christo Iesu per Christum Iesum, Per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum. &c. Qui credunt in ipso. &c. Omnes qui credunt in eo. &c. Credentes illo, in eum credentes illi, in nomen eius, in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, &c. Beleue, (saith S Paule to the Iaylor) in the Lorde Iesus, and thou shalt be saued and thy whole house, &c. Actes. 16.

Thus then thou seest as the passion of Christ is onely the efficient or personall cause immediate of our saluation: so is faith onely the instrumentall or meane cause that maketh the merits of Christ to vs auailable. For as the Passion of Christ serueth to none but such as do beleue: so neither doth faith (as it is onely a bare qualitie or action in mans minde) it self iustifie,* vnles it be directed to the body of Christ crucified, as to his obiect, of whom it receueth all his vertue.* And therefore these ij. must alwayes ioyntly concurre together, faith, and Christ Iesus crucified. As for example, when the children of Israel were byd of Moses to looke vp to the brasen Serpent,* neither could y^e Serpent haue helped them, except they had looked vp, nor yet their looking vpward haue profited them, vnles they had directed their eyes vpon the said Serpent, as the only obiect set vp to the same purpose for them to behold. So our faith in like case directed to the bodye of Iesus our Sauour is onely the meanes wherby Christes merits are applied vnto vs, and we now iustified before God, according to the doctrine of S. Paule, who in expresse wordes, defining to vs what this faith is, and how it iustifieth, sayth: If thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus,*and beleue with thy hart, that God raised him from death, thou shalt be saued.

&c. Rom, 10. Besides this, what action or qualitie soeuer is in man,* either, hope, charitie, or any other kinde of faith and beleeuing, be it neuer so true except it apprehend this object (which is) the body of Christ, the sonne of God it serueth not to iustification. And that is the cause why we adde this particule Onely,* to faith, and say that faith, Onely, in Christ iustifieth vs, to exclude all other actions, qualyties, giftes, or works of man, from y^t cause of iustifying for so much as there is no other knowledge nor gift giuen of God to man, be it neuer so excellent, that can stand before the iudgement of God to iustification, or wherevnto any promise of saluation is annexed: but onely this faith lookyng vp to the brasen Serpent, that is to the body of Christ Iesus for vs crucified.

As for example,* when the Turke sayth, that he beleeueth in one liuyng God that made heauen & earth, his beleife therin is true, yet it iustifieth him not, because it lacketh the right object, which is Christ. So when the Iewe saith that he beleeueth in one God maker of heauen and earth,* and beleeueth also the same God to be omnipotent, merciful, iust, and true of promise, and that he hath elected the seede of Abraham: true it is that he beleeueth, and yet all this serueth him not, because Christ y^e sonne of God is not ioyned to all.* And though y^e said Iew should be neuer so deuout in his prayers, or charitable in almose, or precise in keeping y^e law, & beleueed neuer so stedfastly y^t he is elect to be saued: yet he is neuer the neerer to saluation for all this, so long as his faith is not grounded vpon y^r head cornerstone, which is the person and body of Christ Iesus the true Sauour. After like sort, it may be sayd of the Papist, when he saith that he is Baptised, and beleueth in the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, three persons and one God, and also confesseth Iesus Christ to be the sonne of God, which died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our righteousnes. &c. his beleife therin is true, & indede would saue him, if he did stay his saluation in this faith, and vpon Christ his Sauour, Onely. according to the promise and grace of God, and go no farther. But that he doth not: for neither doth he admit Christ onely to be his perfect Sauour without the helpe of the patrons, heades, aduocates, and mediators, nor yet permitteth his faith in Christ, Onely to be the meanes of his iustification, but setteth vp other by meanes, as hope, charitie, sacrifice of the Masse, confession, penance, satisfaction, merites, and pardons, supposing thereby to worke his iustification before God, contrary to the word of promise, to the Gospell of grace, & to the doctrine of S. Paule whereof we shall see more (the Lord willing) hereafter,

And thus much of the true causes of our iustification after the doctrine of S. Paule.* Concerning which causes this distinctiō furthermore by the way is to be added, that as touching the originall causes of our saluation, which be diuers and sondry, some are externall, & without vs: some are internall,* and within vs. Of the external causes which are without vs, the first and principal is the mercy & grace of god. Of this foloweth predestination and election. Thē cōmeth vocation. The last and next cause to vs is the deth and bloudshed of christ wherby we are redemed, & al these be external causes, because they are without vs. Of internall causes that be in man through the gift of God, there is but one, & no mo in scripture apointed, that is, our faith in Christ, which is the gift of God in vs. Beside this there is no gift of God giuen to man, vertue, work, merite, nor any thing els, that is any part or cause of saluation, but only this gyft of fayth,* to beleue in Christ Iesu. And this is the cause why we hold that faith onely iustifieth, meanyng, that amongst all the workes, deedes, actions, labours, and operations, whatsoever man doth, or can doe, there is nothing in that man that worketh saluation but onely his fayth gyuen to hym of God to beleue in Christ his sonne, following therein the trade of S. Pauls teaching: who in precise wordes so ascribeth iustification to fayth, that he excludeth all other actions of man, & works of the law: And therefore in the same Epystle to the Romanes, Page 23 S. Paule resoning of the glory of iustifyng, asketh this question how this glory is excluded: whether by the law of works? and concludeth no: ascribing onely y^e glory thereof to the law of faith,* And consequently vppon the same he inferreth: Colligimus enim iustificari hominem per fidem sine operibus legis. We hold that a man is iustified by faith. without the deedes of the law.

And how then can that he accounted for any part of our iustification, which S. Paule vtterly debarreth and excludeth in that behalfe? of which like exclusiues and negatiues the whole course of S. Paules doctrine is full, where he still concludeth: Sine operibus, absque operibus legis, non ex operibus, Dei donum est,non ex operibus ne quis sed secundū misericordiā gloriatur, Ephe 2. Non ex operibus iustitiae quae fecimus nos sed secundū propositi suum & grati•m &c. Titi. 3. Non secundum opera nostra.&c. Timot 1. That is to say, It is the gift of God, not of works, that no mā should glory. &c. Not of the workes of righteousnes, which we haue done, but of his own mercy. &c. Not after our workes, but after his owne purpose, & grace which is giuen to vs,*&c., Agayne Gal 2. Non iustificatur homo ex operibus. &c. That is, A man is not iustified by works &c. Item,Ei qui non operatur credenti autē in eū qui iustificat impium fides imputatur ad iustitiam &c. Rom. 4. To him that worketh not, but beleueth in him which iustifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed to righteousnes.&c. By these exclusiues, and negatiues in Saint Paules doctrine what doth he els meane, but vtterly to seclude all kinde of mans merits, and works of the law from the office & dignitie of iustifying? And although he expresseth not y^e word, Onely, yet vpon his exclusiues and negatiues, this exceptiue must needes be inferred. For in all Logike the cōsequent is necessary and formall, as one man is suffered, to come into the house: and no person els is suffered but one Ergo, one man only is suffered to enter into the housé. And thus much concerning faith in Christ, prooued to be the onely meane, or instrumentall, or conditionall cause of our saluation, and no other besides the same alone, by the doctrine of S. Paule taught to the ancient Romanes.

5. The fift branch, which I note in S. Paules doctrine, is this: that after he hath thus established vs in certainty of our saluation through faith in Christ, then after that, he exhorteth vs vehemently and with all instaunce of good workes, shewing the true vse and ende of good workes: which is, first to shewe our obedience, and dutifull seruice (as we may) vnto God, who hath done so great thinges for vs. Secondly to relieue our neighbours with our charitie and kindes, as God hath bene kinde to vs his enimies. Thirdly, to stirre vp other by our example, to praise God, to embrace the same Religion, & to do the like. For requisite it is, that as God hath bene so merciful to vs and gracious in eternal giftes, we should be merciful likewise to other in temporall cōmodities. And seeing it hath pleased him of his fatherly goodnes (of our partes so litle deserued) to call vs to so high a vocation, to giue the bloud of his sonne for vs, to forgiue vs al our sinnes, to deliuer vs from this present wicked worlde, to make vs Citizens of heauen, yea his children, more then seruaunts: little then can we doe, and well may we thinke those benefites ill bestowed, if we forgiue not our neighbours, and shewe some thing againe worthy that holy calling wherewith he hath called vs, in mortifying our worldly lustes here, & studying after heauenly thinges: and finally if we being prouoked with such loue & kindnes, reder not againe some loue for loue, some kindnes for kindnes, seeking how to walke in the steps which he hath prepared for vs to walke in, seruing him (so much as we may) in holines & righteousnes all the daies of our life. And though our obedience shall alwaies be imperfect, doe the best we can: yet reason would that some obedience we should shew as louing children to such a louing father.

And this is the cause why S. Paule is so vehement & vrgent to call vpon good workes, not that workes should iustifie, but that we being iustified so mercifully & tenderly through his grace, should not abuse his grace in vayne, but endeouour our selues to our vttermost to render our seruice againe to him, in such conuersation of life as may most make to his glorye, and profite of our neighbour. And though the words of our sauour seme in some places to attribute to our obedience and charitie here in earth, great rewards in heauen, that is of his owne free grace & goodnes so to impute small matters for great deserts, and not for vs to claime any meede thereby or thanke at hys hande, as by any worthines of our dooings, no more then the seruauant when he commeth from the plough and seruing the cattell in the field, serueth first his master at home and waiteth vpon his table: the master is not bound (saith Christ) to thanke his seruauant therefore, and bid him sit downe: So you (saith he) when you haue done that is cōmanmanded you, say ye are vnprofitable seruants: ye haue done but what your bound duety was to doe. Luc. 17.

Againe, here also is to be vnderstand, that where such rewardes be ascribed vnto mens deedes, it is not for the worthines of the deede it selfe, but for the faith of the doer, which faith maketh the worke to bee good in Gods sight: for els if an infidell should do the same worke that the christian doth, it were nothing but meere sinne before god. In that therefore the christian mans worke is accepted be it neuer so small (as to giue a cup of cold water) the same is onely for his fayth sake that doth it,* and not for the worke which is done. Whereby againe we may learne how faith onely doth iustifie a man, and that three maner of wayes.

First it iustifieth the person in making him accepted, and the child of God by regeneration, before he begin to doe any good worke.

Secondly, it iustifieth a man from sinne, in procuring remission and forgiuenes of the same.

Thirdly, it iustifieth the good deedes and workes of man, not onely in bringing foorth good fruites, but also in making the same workes to be good and acceptable in the sight of God,* which otherwise were impure and execrable in his sight.

The office therfore of faith and works is diners, and must not be cōfounded. Faith first goeth before, and regenerateth a man to God, & iustifieth him in the sight of god, both in couering his yll deedes, and in making his good deedes acceptable to God, clyming vp to heauen, & there wrastling with God and his iudgement for righteousness, for saluation, and for euerlastins life. Workes and charitie, folow faith, and are exercised here vpon the earth, & glorieth onely before man,* but not before God, in shewing foorth obedience both to God & to man. Further then this our good works doe not reach, nor haue any thing to doe in the iudgement of God touching saluation. I speake of our good workes (as S. Paule speaketh Rom. 7.) as they be ours & imperfect. For els if our workes could be perfect according to the perfection of the lawe, as Christ wrought them in the perfection of his flesh, that is if we could perfect them, as it is sayd: Qui fecerit ea viuet in eis. But now seeing the imbecilitie of our flesh cannot attaine thereto it foloweth thereof that all glory of iustifying is taken from workes, and transferred onely to faith.

And thus much concerning the principall contents of S. Paules doctrine. Wherein the Church of the auncient Romanes first was grounded & planted, and so continued in the same, or at least did not much alter, during the prymityue state of the Church. Likewise the same forme of doctrine the latter Romanes also that followed shoulde haue maintained,* and not haue fallen away for any mans preaching, but hold him accursed, yea if he were any Apostle or an Angell from heauen,* teaching any other doctrine besides that institution which they haue receaued. Gal. 1, for so were they warned before by the Apostle S Paule, to doe. And yet notwithstanding all this forewarning & diligent instruction of this blessed Apostle of the Gentiles, what a defection of faith is fallen among the Gentiles, especially among the Romanes, whereof the sayde Apostle also foretold them so long before, forepropheciying: That the day of the Lord shall not come,except there come a defectiō before, and that the man of sinne should be reuealed, the proude aduersary of God. &c. Thei. 2, meaning (no doubt) by this defection, a departing and a falling from that faith which the holy ghost had then planted by his ministry, among the Gentiles. As we see it now come to passe in the Church of Rome. Which Church is so gone from the faith that S. Paule taught, that if he were now aliue, and saw these decrees and decretals of the Bishop of Rome, these heapes of ceremonies & traditions, these masse bokes, these Portuses, these Festiuals and Legendes, these Processionals, Dymmes and Sequences, these Beades and Graduals, & the maner of their inuocation, their Canons, Censures, & latter Councels, such swarmes of superstitious Monkes and Friers, such sectes of so many dyuers religions, the Testament of S. Fraunces, the rule of S. Benedict, of S. Brigit, of S. Anthony. &c. the intricate subtel•ies & labyrynthes of the scholemen, the infinite cases and distinctiōs of the Canonistes, the Sermons in Churches, the assertions in schooles, the glory of the Pope, the pride of the clergie, the cruelty of persecuting Prelates with their officials and promotors: he woulde saye this were not a defection, but rather a plaine destruccion and ruine of fayth: neyther that this were any true Church of Christ, but a newe found Religion, or paganisme rather, brought in vnder the shadow of Christianity, wherein remaineth almost no"thing els but the name onely of Christ, and the outwarde Page 24 forme of hys religion, the true vayne, and effect whereof is vtterly decayed, as to them which list to examine all the parts of this new Romish religion, may some appeare.

For saue onely that they pretend the solemne forme and wordes of the Crede, and are Baptised confessing y^e name of the father the sonne & holy ghost: As touching all other points and true sincerity of the Christian faith which they outwardly professe, they are vtterly degenerated from that which S. Paule & the word of God first had taught them,

First, they cōfesse the father in word, but his will in his word expred they renounce,* his grace they acknowledg not, his benefits and promisses giuen vnto vs in his sonne they receaue not, the vigor of his law they feelee not, the terrour of his iudgements earnestly they feare not, his commaundementes they obserue by the traditions and commaundements of their owne.

Likewise the name of Christ his sonne in worde they confesse, but his office indede they deface and deminish: his glory they seeke not, but vnder his name they do seke their owne: the power of his bloud and passion they know not or els dissemble it, who neither they admit to be the head of his Church alone, nor sauour alone, nor only to be our patrone & aduocate; but match with him our Lady, and other patrons, so that euery Parish almost in christendome hath his peculiar patrone besides Christ to hold by.

In like maner they confesse the name of the holy Ghost, But God himselfe knoweth how farre they are from the comfort, knowledge, and tast of the holy ghost, as wel may appeare by their counsels, by their expounding of Scripture, by their superstitious ceremonies, by their outward worshipping and Idolatrous inuocation to stockes and stones and dead creatures,* by their scrupulous obseruatiō of dayes, tunes, places, numbers & gestures: And no lesse also by their doctrine, which defraudeth the poore harts of simple Christians, of their due consolation, ioy and liberty in the holy Ghost, & kepeth them still in a seruile bondage, and a doubtfull incertainty of their saluation, contrary to the working of the holy spirite of God.

And thus the Church of Rome pretending onely the name of Christ and of his Religion,* is so farre altered from the truth of that which it pretendeth, that vnder the name of Christ, it persecuteth both Christ & his Religion: working more harme to the Church of Christ, then euer did the open tirants and persecuting Emperours among the heathen: not much vnlike herein to the olde Sinagoge of the Scribes and Phareseis, who vnder the name of God, crucified the sonne of God,* and vnder pretence of the law, fought against the Gospell, and vnder the title of Abrahams children, persecuted the childrē of Abraham. And as they bragging so highly of the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lorde, did in deede destroye the true Temple of the Lord: right so these pretended Catholikes in these dayes, after they haue rayased vppe a Catholike Churche of their owne,* and haue armed the same with lawes, and haue gathered vnto them a power of Priestes, Prelates, Abbats, Priors, of religious men, of Cardinals, and also of secular Princes to take their part, now vnder the name of the Catholicke Church, they persecute the true Catholike church, and coloring their procedings still with In nomine Domini, most cruelly they put to death, which die pro nomine Domini, condemning them for heretikes, schismatikes, and rebles, not which deny any part of the creede, which they themselues professe, nor such whome they can conuince by any Scripture, but onely such which will not ioyne wyth their errors and heresies contrary to the honour of God and truth of his worde.

And lest any should thinke this that we here protest a'gainst the corrupt errors & manifold deformities of this latter Church of Rome, to proceede of any raucor or affection, rather then grounded of necessary causes, and demōstrations euident, my purpose is (by the Lordes leaue) to take herein some litle paine, that as I haue collected a litle before, the summe & cōtents of S. Paules doctrine, where with the old Church of Rome was first seasoned and acquainted, so now as in a like summary table, to discrye the particular braunches and contents of the Popes doctrine now set foorth, to the intent that all true Christian readers comparing the one with the other may discern what great alteration there is betwene the church of Rome that now is, and the church of Rome that then was, planted by the Apostles in the primitiue time. And to the ende to open to the simple reader some waye whereby he may the better iudge in such matters of doctrine, & not be deceaued in discerning truth from error, first we wil propound certeine principles or general positions, as infallible rules or truthes of the Scripture, wherby al other doctrines & opinions of men being tried and examined as in the touchstone, may the more easely be iudged whether they be true or cōtrary, & whether they make agaynst the scripture, or no.

Certeine Principles or generall verities grounded vpon the truth of Gods word.

The first principle.

1. AS sinne and death came originally by the disobedience of one to all men of his generation by nature: * so righteousnes and life come originally by the obedience of one to all men regenerated of him by faith & Baptisme, Rom. 5.
- The 2. Principle.
 2. The promise of God, was freely giuen to our first parentes without their deseruing, that the seede of a woman should breake the Serpents head. Gen. 3.
- The 3. Principles.
 3. * Promise was giuen freely to Abraham before he deserued any thing, that in his seede all nations should be blessed. Gen. 12.
- The 4. Principle.
 4. To the worde of God neither must wee adde, nor take from it. * Deut. 4.
- The 5. Principle.
 5. He that doth the workes of the law, shall liue therein. Leuit. 18. Gal. 3. *
- The 6. Principle.
 6. Accursed is he, which abideth not in euery thing that is written in the booke of the law. Deut. 27. Gal. 3.
- The 7. Principle.
 7. God onely is to be worshipped. Deut. 6. Luc. 4.
- The 8. Principle.
 8. * All our righteousnes is like a defiled cloth of a woman Esay. 64.
- The 9. Principle.
 9. In all my holy hill, they shall not kill, nor slay saith the Lord. Esay. 11.65. *
- The 10. Principle.
 10. God loueth mercy and obedience, more then sacrifice. * Osee. 6.1. Reg. 15.
- The 11. Principle.
 11. The lawe worketh anger, * condemneth, and openeth sinne. Rom. 3.
- The 12. Principle.
 12. The end of the law is Christ, to righteousnes to euery one that beleueth, Rom. 10. *
- The 13. Principle.
 13. Whosoeuer beleeueth and is Baptised, shall be sauēd. Mat. vlt. *
- The 14. Principle.
 14. A man is iustified by faith without workes freely by grace, not of our selues. Gal. 2. Ephes. 2. *
- The 15. Principle.
 15. There is no remission of sinnes without bloud. * Heb. 9
- The 16. Principle.
 16. Whatsoeuer is not of faith is sinne. Rom. 14. without faith it is impossible to please God. * Heb. 11.
- The 17. Principle.
 17. One Mediatour betweene God & man Christ Iesus. 1. Tim. 2. & he is the propitiatiō for our sinnes. * 1. Iohn. 2.
- The 18. Principle.
 18. Who soeuer seeketh in the law to be iustified, is fallen from grace. *
- The 19. Principle.
 19. In Christ be all the promises of God, * Est & Amen. 2. Cor. 1.
- The 20. Principle.

20. Let euery soule be subiect to superiour powers, gyuyng to Caesar that which is Cesars,* & to God that which is Gods. Rom. 13.

These principles and infallible rules of the Scripture, as no man can denie, so if they be granted, the doctrine thē of the Popes Church must needes be found not to be Catholike, but rather full of errours and heresies, as in the sequele folowing remaineth more expressely and particularly by the grace of Christ to be conuincd.

Here foloweth a Summary collection of the errours, heresies, and absurdities conteyned in the popes doctrine, contrary to the rules of Gods vvord, and the first institution of the Church of Rome.

Of Faith and Iustification.

First,* as touching the onely meanes and instrumentall cause of our iustificatiō, wherby the merites of Christes Page 25 Passiō be applied to vs & made ours,* ye heard before how S. Paule onely ascrybeth the same to faith: as appeareth by all his letters, especially to the Romanes. Where he excluding al kind of works, ascribeth al our saluation, iustification, righteousness, reconciliation, and peace with god onely to faith in Christ. Contrary to which doctrine the Pope and his church hath set vp diuers and sondry other meanes of their owne deuising,* whereby the merites of Christes passion (they saye) are applyed to vs and made ours, to the putting away of sinnes, and for our iustification, as hope, charitie, sacrifice of the Masse, auricular confession, satisfacion, merites of Saintes, and holy orders, the Popes pardons, &c. So that Christs sacrifice, stripes, and sufferynge, by this teaching doth not heale vs, nor is not beneficiall to vs, though we beleue neuer so well, vnles wee adde also these workes and merites aboue recited. Which if it be true, then is it false that Esay the prophet doth promise:* chap. 53. In his stripes all we are made hole. &c. This error and heresie of the Church of Rome, though it serue at fyrst sight to the naturall reason of man to be out of small importaunce yet if it be earnestly considered, it is in very deede the most pernicious heresie that euer almost crept into the Church, vpon the which as the onely foundation, all, or the most part of all the errours, absurdities, and inconueniences of the Popes Church are grounded. For this being once admitted, that a man is not iustified by his fayth in Christ alone, but that other meanes must be sought by our owne working and merites to apply the merites of Christes Passiō vnto vs, then is there neither any certainty left, of our saluation, nor end in setting vp newe meanes and merites of our owne deuising,* for remission of sinnes. Neyther hath there beene any heresye that eyther hath rebelled more presumptuously against the high Maiestie of God the Father, nor more perniciously hath iniuried the soules of the simple, then this doctrine.

First of all it subuerteth the will and testament of God. For where almighty God of mercy hath giuen vs his son to dye for vs, and with him hath giuen out his full promise, that whosoever beleueueth vpō him should be sauēd by their fayth, & assigneth none other condition either of the lawe or any works, but onely of fayth, to be y^e meanes betweene his sonne and vs: these men take vpon them to alter this testament that God hath set, and adioyne other conditions, which the Lord in his word neuer appointed nor knew. To whom the wordes of Hierome may be well applyed vpon the Epistle to the Gal. speaking of such. Qui de Euangelio Christi faciunt hominis Euangelium, vel quod peius est, Diaboli, &c. That is, Which make of the Gospell of Christ, the Gospell of men, or rather the Gospell of the deuill &c.

*Secondly, whereas the Christian reader in the Gospell, reading of the great grace and swete promises of god gyuen to mankinde in Christ his sonne, might thereby take much comfort of soule, and be at rest and peace with the Lorde his God: commeth in the pestiferous doctrine of these heretikes, wherewyth they obscure this free grace of God, to choake the sweete comforts of man in the holy Ghost, and oppresse Christen libertie, and bring our spirituall into bondage.

Thirdly, as in this their impious doctrine they shew themselues manifest enimies to Gods grace:* so are they no lesse iniurious to Christen men, whom they leaue in a doubtfull distrust of Gods fauour and of their saluation, contrary to the worde and will of God, and right institutiō of the Apostolicke doctrine.* And wheras our new schoolemen of late, to mayntaine the sayde wicked point of doctrine, doe object vnto vs that wee rather leaue mens consciences vncertaine, for so much as, if lyfe (saye they) were not a due rewarde, it were vncertaine. And nowe for somuch as due debt is certaine, and mercy or fauour is vncertaine,* therefore (say they) we leauing mens consciences to the mercy of God, doe leaue them in a doubtfull vncerteintie of their saluation. To this I aunswere that due debt, if it be proued by the law duely deserued, it must be certaine. But if the lawe shall prooue it vnperfect or vnsufficiently due, then is it not certaine, neither can there be any thing duely claymed. Nowe as touching mercye, so long as it remaineth secret in the Princes wyll, and not knowne to his subiectes, so long it is vncertaine, But when this mercy shall be openly published by proclamation, ratified by promise, conferred by will and Testamēt,* established in bloude, and sealed wyth Sacraments, then this mercy remayneth no more doubtful, but ought firmly to be beleued of euery true faythfull subiect. And therefore Saint Paule, to establish our harts in this assuraunce, and so aunswere to this doubte, in his Epistle to the Romaines doth teach vs, saying: And therefore of fayth, that after grace the promise might be firme & sure to the whole seede of Abraham. &c. Rom. 4. Meanyng hereby, that workes haue nothing to doe in this case of Iustifying,* and noteth the reason why. For then our saluation should stande in a doubtfull wauering, because in working we are neuer certaine whether our desertes be perfect and sufficient in Gods iudgement or no. And therefore (sayeth Saint Paule) to the intent our saluation should be out of all doubt,* and certaine, it standeth not of workes, in deseruing, but of fayth in apprehending, and of Gods free grace in promising.

Fourthly,* as in this their sinister doctryne they break this principle of Christian Religion, which sayth that a man is iustified by fayth wythout workes, so agayne it breaketh an other principle aboue rehearsed. For this rule beyng graunted that nothing is to be added to gods word nor taken from it: then haue these men done wickedly in adding (as they doe) to Gods worde.* For where the word of god lymiteth to our iustification no cōdition but fayth: Beleeue (sayth he) in the Lorde Iesu and thou shalt be sauēd, and thy whole house, &c. Act. 16. these Iusticiaries doe adde thereto dyuers and sondry other conditions besides, and such as the worde also precisely excludeth, as hope, charitie, the sacrifice of their Masse, the work of the Priest Ex opere operato, auricular confession, satisfaction, meritorious deedes. &c. And thus much concerning the doctrine of fayth and iustification. Whereby it may appeare to what horrible blindnes and blasphemie, the Church of Rome is now fallen: where this kinde of doctrine is not only suffered, but also publicly professed, which speaking against fayth, thus blasphemously dare say: Fides illa qua quis firmiter credit,*& certo statuit propter Christum sibi remissa esse peccata, sese{que} possessurum vitam aeternam, non sides est, sed temeritas: non spiritus sancti persuasio, sed humanae audaciae presumptio. That is, That fayth wherewith a man firmly beleueth and certeinly assureth himselfe, that for Christes sake his sinnes be forgyuen him, and that he shall possesse eternal life, is not faith but rashnes: not the perswasion of the holy Ghost, but presumption of a mans boldnes.

Of workes, and the law.

AS touching the doctrine of good workes and the lawe,* what the teaching of Saint Paule was to the Romanes, yee hearde before. Who although hee excludeth good workes from the office of Iustifying, yet excludeth he them not from the practise and c••uersation of Christen life, but most earnestly calleth vpon all faythfull beleeuers in Christ, to walke worthye their vocation, to laye downe their olde conuersation, to gyue theyr members seruauntes of ryghteousnes, to offer their bodyes vppe to God a liuelye Sacrifice, &c. The like example of whose teachyng, if the Churches nowe reformed doe not folowe, let their Sermons, their Preachynges, wrytinges, exhortynges, and lyues also beare recorde. who although they can not say with Christ. Which of you can blame me of sinne, yet they may say to the aduersaryes, whosoever of you is wythout fault, cast the fyrst stone of reproch agaynst vs.* Wherefore Hosius, Pighius, wyth their fellowes, doe them open wrong, and slaunderously belye them in comparing them in this behalfe to Aetius Eunominus, and other heretikes called Anomaei, who taking the good sentences of S. Paule, did abuse the same to filthy licence of the flesh, and corruption of wicked life, &c.

But to let these slaunders passe, nowe what the errorrs be of the Church of Rome, touching this part of doctryne, remayneth to be declared. Whose error first standeth in this, that they misunderstanding the definition of good workes, doe call good workes, not such as properly are commaunded by the lawe of God, but such as are agreable to the Popes law: As buylding of Abbayes and churches, gyuing to the high altar, founding of trentales, fynding of chauntries, gylding of Images, hearing of Masses, going on pilgrimage, fyghting for the holye crosse, keeping of vowes, entryng to orders, fastyng of vigiles, creepyng to the Crosse, praying to Saintes, &c. All which are not onely reputed for good workes, but so preferred also before all other workes, that to these is gyuen pardon from the Pope, double and triplefolde more, then to any other good worke of charitie commaunded in the law of almightie God.*

An other errorr also may be noted in the Papists, touching the efficient or formall cause of good workes. For albeit they all confesse in their bookes, that Gratia dei gratis data, is the chiefe principall cause thereof, and worketh in vs iustitiam primam (as they call it) yet the good workes after regeneration,* they refer to other subordinate causes vnder God, as to fre wil, or to habitum virtutis, or ad integra Page 26 naturalia, & nothing at all to faith, when as faith onelye next vnder God, is the roote and fountaine of all well dooyng: as in the fruites of a good tree, albeit the planter or the husbandman be the principall agent thereof, and some cause also may be in y^e good ground, yet the next and immediate cause is the roote that maketh the tree fruitefull. In like maner the grace of God, in a soft & repentaunt mollified hart planteth the gift of fayth. Fayth as a good roote can not lye dead or vnoccupied, but springeth foorth and maketh both the tree fruitefull, and also the tree thereof to be good.* which otherwise had no acceptatiō nor goodnes in them, were it not for the goodnes of the roote from whence they spring. So Paule although he had certeine workes in him such as they were, before his conuersion, yet had he no good workes before the grace of Christ had rooted fayth in him. So Mary Magdelene the sinner, and Zacheus the Publicane. So all the nations of the Gentiles began to bryng foorth frute, and especially good fruit, when they began to bee ingrafted in Christ,* and to receaue the roote of hys fayth, whose fruites before that were all damnable and vnsauery. As touchyng the cause therefore of good workes,* there is no other in man but fayth, whose office as it is to iustifie vs in heauen so the nature of it is here in earth to worke by loue, as the roote worketh by the sappe. For as a man seeth and feeleth by fayth, the loue and grace of God toward him in Christ his sonne:* so begynneth he to loue agayne both God and man, and to doe for his neyghbour as God hath done to him. And hereof properly springeth the runyng fountaine of al good works and deedes of charitie.

Thirdly, as they erre in the cause of good works, so do they erre much more in the ende of the lawe, and of good workes: for where Saint Paule teacheth the lawe to be gyuen to thys vse and ende, to conuict our transgressions, to prooue vs sinners, to shewe and condemne our infirmitye, and to dryue vs to Christ: they take and applye no other ende to the lawe, but to make vs perfect, to keepe vs from wrath, and to make vs iust before God. And likewise where Saint Paule prooueth al our good works to be vnperfect, and vtterly secludeth them from the ende of Iustifying, they contrariwise doe teache, as though the ende of good workes were to merite remission of synnes, to satisfye vnto God, to deserue grace, to redeeme soules from Purgatory, and that by them the person of the regenerate man doth please God, and is made iust before God. For so they teach most wickedly and horribly, saying. That christ suffered for originall sinne, or sinnes going before Baptisme, but the actuall sinnes, which followe after Baptisme, must be done away by mens meryts. And so they assigne to Christ the begynning of saluation, or obteyning of the fyrst grace (as they call it) but the perfection or cōsūmation of grace, they giue to works & our own strēgth. Neither can they in any case abide, that we be iustified frely by the mercy of God through fayth onely apprehending the merites of Christ. Howbeit neyther doe all Papistes in this their erreue agree in one. For some make distinction and say:* that we are iustified by Christ principaliter .i. principally: & minus principaliter .i. lesse principally, by the dignitie of our owne deedes, contrary to the eight principle before mentioned, page. 24. Other holde that we are made ryghteous before God, not by works that go before fayth: but by our vertues that follow after. Some againe do thus expound y^e saying of Saint Paule: We are iustified by faith: y^t is (say they) by fayth, preparing vs or setting vs in a good way to be iustified.* Other expōde by it y^e figure Sinecdoche, that is, by faith conioyned together with other vertues. Other thus: by faith, that is, being formed with charytie, &c. Thus all these doe derogate from the benefite of Christ, and attribute vnto works a great or the greatest part of our iustification, directly against the true veine of Saint Pauls doctryne and first institution of the auncient Church of Rome, and against all the principles of holy Scripture.

Furthermore, as touching the sayde doctryne of the lawe and good workes, they erre in misunderstanding the nature of the lawe and workes. For where Saint Paule disputeth that the lawe is spirituall, and requireth of vs perfect obedience of the whole power of man, which wee beyng carnall are neuer able to accomplish: they affirme otherwise that the lawe doth require but onely outward obedience of man, and therewith is contented: And this obedience they say, man is not onely able to performe, but also to do more and greater things then the law requireth. Wherof riseth y^e works of supererogatiō, contrary to y^e 6. and 8. principles aboue specified, page. 24. Also there be say they, among other certaine workes of the lawe, which pertayne not to all men, but are consilia, counsayles, left for perfect men,* as matter for them to merite by, and these they call opera perfectionis, or opera indebita, adding also to these newe deuises to serue God after their owne traditions besides the worde of God, as Monasticall vowes, wilfull pouerty,* difference of meates and garmentes, pilgrimage to reliques and Saints, worshipping of y^e dead, superstitious ceremonies, rosaries, &c. With such like, and these they call workes of perfection, which they preferre before the other commaunded in the lawe of God. In so much that in comparison of these, the other necessary duties commaunded and commended by the worde of God (as to beare office in the common wealth, to liue in y^e godlye state of matrimony, to susteine the office of a seruant in a house) is contemned,* and accounted as prophane in cōparison of these, contrary to the 10. principle aboue mentioned. pag. 24.

 Of Sinne.

OF Sinne likewise they teach not rightly,* nor after the institution of the Apostles, and the auncient Church of Rome, while the consider not the deepenes and largenes of sinne, supposing still to be nothing els but inwarde actions with consent of will, or outwarde, such as are agaynst will: whereas the strength of sinne extendeth not onely to these, but also comprehendeth the blyndnes and ignorance of the minde, lacke of knowledge and true feare of God, the vntowardnes of mans minde to Godwarde, the priuy rebellion of the hart against the lawe of God, the vndeliting will of man to God and his worde. The sense of flesh S. Paule also calleth an enimie against God, and feeleth in himselfe, that is, in his fleshe nothing dwelling but sinne.

As touching also originall sinne,* wherein we are borne which is the destruction of original iustice, and of gods Image in vs (remayning in vs and bringing foorth in vs wicked cogitations, affections, and motions of naughtynes, against the law of God, and neuer ceaseth so long as man liueth) this originall sinne the Popes doctrine doth not deny, but yet doth much extenuate the same and holdeth that this inwarde concupiscence & vicious affections not brasting out in vs with consent of will,* are no mortall nor damnable sinne, but only fomes peccati: And say moreouer, that this concupiscentia in vs, is no deprauation of the higher, but onely of the lower partes of man, beyng as a thing 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, indifferent, and no lesse naturall in vs then is the appetite to eate and drinke,* and that the same is left to remaine in the Saintes after Baptisme, to be to them occasion of more meriting, &c.

 Of Penaunce, or Repentaunce.

OF Penaunce,* this latter Latterane Church of Rome, of late hath made a Sacrament (contrary to the fourth principle before pag. 24.) which penaunce say they, standeth of three partes. Contrition, Confession, and Satisfaction canonicall. Contrition (as they teach) may be had by strength of free will, without the lawe, and the holy Ghost per actus elicitos, through mans owne action and endeuour.* Which contrition first must be sufficient, and so it meriteth remission of sinne. In confession, they require a full rehearsall of all sinnes,* whereby the Priest knowing the crymes, may minister satisfaction accordingly. And this rehearsing of sinnes, ex opere operato deserueth remission, contrary y^e to 14. principle before, pag. 24. Satisfactiones they call opera indebita,* enioyned by the ghostly father. And this satisfaction (say they) taketh away, and chaungeth eternall punishment, into temporall paynes, which paines also it doth mittigate. And againe, these satisfactions may be taken away by the Popes indulgence. &c.

This vnsauery and hethenish doctrine of penance farre differeth from the true teaching of holie Scripture.* By the which teaching repentaunce properly containeth these three partes, contrition, fayth, and new life. Contrition is called in Scripture the sorrow of hart, rysing vpō the consideration of sinne committed and of the anger of God prouoked, which sorrowe dryueth a man to Christ for succour: wherevpon ryseth fayth. Fayth bringeth, afterward amendement or newenes of life, whiche wee call newe obedience, working fruites worthye of repentaunce.

Difference betweene the law and the Gospell.

AS there is nothing more necessary and cōfortable for troubled consciences,* then to be well instructed in the Page 27 difference betweene the lawe and the Gospell: so is the Church of Rome much to blame in this behalfe, because it confoundeth together those two, beyng in nature so dyuers & contrary one from another: as threatninges and promises, thynges temporall wyth thinges eternall, sorrowfull thinges wyth glad tydinges, death wyth lyfe, bondage with freedome, &c. Teaching the people, that whatsoever the lawe sayth the Gospell confirmeth, and whatsoever the Gospell sayth the same is agreeable to the lawe, and so make they no difference betweene Moses and Christ, saue onely that Moses (they saye) was the gyuer of the olde lawe, Christ is the gyuer of the newe and a more perfect lawe. And thus imagine they the gospell to be nothyng els but a newe lawe gyuen by Christ, bynding to the promises thereof, the condition of our dooynges and deseruinges, no otherwise then to the olde lawe. And so denyde they the whole lawe after this destinction, into three partes, to wytte, the law of Nature, the lawe of Moses, and the lawe of Christ. And as for the Gospell (they saye) it is reueled for no other cause, but to shew to the world more perfect preceptes and counsailes, then were in the olde lawe: to the fulfylling whereof they attribute iustification, and so leaue the poore consciences of men in perpetuall doubt, and induce other many folde errors: bryngyng the people into a false opinion of Christ, as though he were not a remedy against the law, but came as an other Moses, to gyue a newe lawe to the worlde.

Furthermore, as they make no difference betweene the nature of the lawe and nature of the Gospell, confoundyng Moses and Christ together: so neyther doe they distinct or discern the tyme of the lawe, and the time of the Gospell a sonder. For where S. Paule, bryngeth in the law, to be a schoolmaster, & limiteth him his tyme vnto Christ: & saith that Christ is the end of the law, that is, wheras y^e law ceaseth, there Christ beginneth, & where christ beginneth there the law endeth, they cōtrary make y^e law to haue no ende nor ceasing,* but gyue to it immortall life & kingdome equall with Christ, so that Christ and the lawe together do reigne ouer the soule and conscience of man. Which is vntrue. For either Christ must giue place, and the lawe stande: Or els the law (the condemnation and malediction of the lawe I meane) must ende, and Christ reigne. For both these, Christ and the lawe, grace and malediction, can not reigne and gouerne together. But Christ the Sonne of God which once dyed, can die no more, but must reigne for euer. Wherefore the lawe with his strēgth styng, and curse, must needes cease and haue an end. And this is it that S. Paule speaking of the tryumph of Christ, saith, that he ascendyng vp led away captiuitie captiue, & hath set man at lyberty, not at libertie to liue as flesh listeth, neither hath freed him from the vse & exercyse of the law, but from the dominion and power of the lawe, so that there is nowe no condemnation to them that bee in Christ Iesu, which walke not after the flesh, &c. Romaines, 8, And in an other place Saint Paule speaking of the same power and dominion of the lawe, sayth, that Christ hath taken the oblygation written against vs in decrees, and hath nayled it vpon the Crosse, tryumphing ouer all, &c. so that as the kyngdome of Christ fyrst began vpon the Crosse, euen so vpon the same Crosse, and at the same time the kingdome of the lawe expired, and the malediction of the lawe was so crucified vpon the Crosse, that it shall neuer ryse agayne, to haue any power agaynst them that be in Christ Iesu. For lyke as if a woman be discharged from her first husband being dead, & hath maryed an other man, the first husbāde hath no more power ouer her: * euen so we nowe beyng espoused vnto Christ our seconde husbāde, are discharged vtterly from our first husbād the law: (& as S. Paule in an other place sayth) are no more vnder the law, that is, vnder the dominion & malediction of the lawe, but vnder grace, * that is, vnder perpetual remission of al sinnes, cōmitted not only before our Baptisme, but as well also after Baptisme, and duryng all our lyfe long. For therein properly consisteth the grace of God, in not imputyng sinne vnto vs, so often as the repenting sinner rising vp by fayth flyeth vnto Christ, * and apprehendeth Gods mercy and remission promised in him, according to the testimonie both of the Psalme: Blessed is the man to whome the Lord imputeth no sinne. &c. & also of all the Prophets, which (as Saint Peter saith) giue recorde to him that through his name all that beleue in him shall receaue remission of their sinnes, &c. Actes. 10. Which being so, as it can not be denied, then what needeth these priuate and extraordinary remissions to be brought into the Church by eare confession, by meritorious deedes, and by the Popes pardons? for if there be no condemnation but by the law: and if this law it selfe be captiued, crucified, abolished, and departed, which was the first husbāde, what condēnation thē can there be to thē that be in Christ Iesu, or by whome should it come? If there be no condemnation, but a free and generall deliuerance for all men, once gotten by the victorie of Christ, from the penalty of y^e lawe: what nedeth thē any particular remission of sinnes, * at sondry tymes to be sought at the Priestes handes or the Popes pardons? He that hath a generall pardon needeth no particular. If remedy for sinne be generall and perpetuall once gotten for euer, to all them that be in Christ Iesu, what needeth any other remedy by auricular confession? If it be not generall and perpetuall, howe then, is it true that Saint Paule sayth: the lawe is crucified, and condemnation abolished? or howe standeth redemption perpetuall and generall, * if remission be not generall? For what is redemption els, but remission of sinnes, or sinnes bought out? or what is els to kill the lawe, but to discharge vs from condemnation for euer? He that deliuereth his friende for a time out of his enimies hande, doth him a pleasure: but he that killeth the enimie once out of the way giueth perpetuall safety. So if remission of sinnes by Christ were for some sinnes and not for all, the lawe then must needes liue still. But nowe the kylling and crucifying of the law importeth full remission to be absolute, * and our safety to be perpetuall. But here percase will be obiected of some: how standeth remission of sinnes certeine and perpetuall, seeyng newe offences being daily committed, doe daily require newe remission? * Hereto I aunswere? albeit sinnes doe daily growe, whereby wee haue neede dailie to desire God to forgiue vs our trespasses (&c. yet notwithstanding the cause of our remission standeth euer one and perpetuall, * neither is the same to be repeted any more, nor any other cause to be sought besides that alone. This cause is the sacrificed body of Christ once vpon the Crosse for all sinnes that either haue or shall be committed. Beside this cause, there is no other, neither confession, nor mens pardons that remitteth sinnes. *

Furthermore, as the cause is one and euer perpetuall, which worketh remission of sinnes vnto vs: so is the promise of God euer one, once made and standeth perpetuall that offereth the same to the faith of the repenting sinner. And because the sayde promise of God is alwayes sure and can not fayle, * which offereth remission to all them that beleue in Christ, being limited neyther to time nor number, therefore we may boldly conclude, that what time soever a repenting synner beleueeth, and by fayth applyeth to him the sacrifice of Christ, he hath by Gods owne promise remission of his sinnes, whether they were done before, or after Baptisme.

And moreouer,* for so much as the said promise of God offereth remission to the repentaunt synner, by no other meanes nor condition. but onely one, that is, by fayth in Christ: therefore excluding all other meanes and conditions of mans working, we say, that what repenting sinner soever beleueeth in Christ, hath already in him selfe (and needeth not to seeke to any Priest) perpetuall assuraunce of remission,* not for this time or that time onely, but for euer and a day. For the promise fayth not, he that beleueeth in Christ shall be pardoned this tyme, so he sinne no more: neyther doth it say, that the law is stayde, or the sentence repriued, but sayth playnely, that the law with her condemnation and sentence her selfe is condemned and hanged vp, and shall neuer ryse agayne to them that be in Christ Iesu: and promiseth indeterminatelye, without limitation,* remission of sinnes, to all that beleue in his name. &c, Actes. 10. and likewise in an other place the Scripture speaking absolutely, saith, Sinne shall not preuaile ouer you, & addeth the reason why: saying: Because ye are not vnder the law but vnder grace. Rom. 6. Adding this lesson withall, (as it followeth in the same place) not that sinners shoulde sinne more therefore, because they are vnder grace, but onely that weake infirmities myght be releued,* broken consciences comforted, and repenting sinners holpen from desperation, to the prayse of Gods glory. For as God forgiueth not synners because they should sinne: so neither doth infirmite of falling diminish the grace of Christ, but rather doth illustrate the same, as it is written: My strength is made perfect in infirmite. 2. Cor. 12. and againe: Where sinne aboundeth, there superaboundeth also grace.

In remission of synnes therefore, these foure thinges must concur together: the cause that worketh (which is the sacrifice of Christes body) 2. the promise that offereth, 3. fayth that apprehendeth. 4. the repenting sinner that receaueth. And although sinnes daily do grow, which daily prouoke vs to craue remission, yet as touching the cause Page 28 that worketh remission of our daily sinnes: & the meanes which apprehendeth and applieth the sayd cause vnto vs, they remayne alwaies one & perpetuall: besides which no other cause nor meanes is to be sought of man. So that to them that be repenting sinners & be in Christ Iesu there is no law to condemne them, though they haue deserued condemnation: but they are vnder a perpetual kingdome and a heauen full of grace and remission to couer their sins and not to impute their iniquities, through the promise of God in Christ Iesu our Lord.

And therefore wicked and impious is the doctrine of them, fyrst which seeke any other cause of remission, then onely the bloud of our Sauour. Secondly, which assigne any other meanes to apply the bloudshedding of Christ vnto vs, besides onely faith. Thirdly and especially, which so limite and restraîne the eternall priuiledge of Christs passion, as though it serued but only for sinnes done without and before faith: and that the rest after Baptisme committed must be done away by confession, pardons, and satisfactory deedes. And al this riseth, because the true nature of the law, & of the Gospell is not knowen, nor the difference rightly considered betwene the times of the one, and of the other. Neither againe doe they make any distinction betwene the malediction of the law, and vse of the law. And therefore whensoever they heare vs speake of the law (meanyng y^e malediction of the law) to be abolished, therevpon they maliciously slaunder vs, as though we speak against the good exercises of the lawe, and giue liberty of fleshe to carnall men to liue as they list. Whereof more shalbe sayd (by the Lordes grace) as place and time shall hereafter require.

Of free will.

COncerning free will, as it may peraduenture in some case be admitted that men without the grace may doe some outward functions of the law, and keepe some outward obseruaunces or traditions: so as touching thinges spirituall & apperteining to saluation, the strength of man being not regenerate by grace, is so infirme and impotent that he can performe nothing,* neither in dooing well nor willing well. Who after he be regenerated by grace may worke and doe wel, but yet in such sort, that still remaineth notwithstanding a great imperfection of flesh, & a perpetuall repugnaunce betwene the flesh and spirit. And thus was the originall Church of the auncient Romanes first instructed. From whome see now howe farre this latter Church of Rome hath degenerated, which holdeth and affirmeth, that men without grace may performe the obedience of the law,* & prepare themselues to receaue grace by working, so that those works may be meritorious, and of congruitie obtaine grace. Which grace once obtained, then men may (say they) perfectly performe the full obedience of the law, and accomplish those spirituall actions, and workes which God requireth,* and so those workes, of cōdignitie, deserue euerlasting life. As for the infirmity which still remaineth in nature, that they nothing regarde nor once speake of.

Of Inuocation, and Adoration.

*OUer and besides these vncatholike and almost vnchristian absurdities and defections from the Apostolicall faith aboue specified, let vs consider the maner of theyr Inuocation, not to God alone, as they should, but to dead men saying: that saintes are to be called vpon tanquam mediatores intercessionis: as Mediatours of intercession: Christum vero tanquam mediatorem Salutis, and Christ as the Mediator of Saluation. And affirme moreouer, y^t Christ was a Medyatour onely in time of his Passion. Which is repugnaunt to the wordes of S. Paule writing to the old Romanes chap. 8. where he speaking of the intercession of Christ: Which is (saith he) on the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for vs, &c. And if Christ be a Mediatour of saluation, what needeth then any other intercession of the Saintes for other sutes? for saluation being once had what can we require more? or what lacketh he more to be obtained of the Saintes, which is sure to be saued only by Christ? And yet in their Catholicke deuotions: why doe they teach vs thus to pray to the blessed virgine: Salua omnes qui te glorificant, i. Saue all them that glorifie thee, &c. if saluation onely belong to Christ? vnles they study of purpose to seeme contrary to themselues.

Hetherto also pertaineth the worshipping of reliques, and the false adoration of Sacramentes, that is, the outward signes of the things signified, cōtrary to the 7. principle before, page▪ 24. Adde to this also the prophanation of the Lordes Supper, contrary to the vse for which it was ordeined,* in reseruing it after the Communion ministred, in setting it to sale for money, and falsely perswading both them selues and other, that the Priest doth merite both to him selfe that saith, and to him that heareth, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis, &c. That is, Onely by the meere doing of the worke, though the partie that vseth the same, hath no good motion in him. &c.

 Of Sacramentes, Baptisme and the Lordes Supper.

AS touching Sacramentes, their doctrine likewise is corrupt and erroneus.*

1. First they erre falsely in the number. For where the institution of Christ ordeineth but two, they (contrary to the fourth principle aboue prefixed) haue added to the prescription of the Lords worde, fine other Sacraments.

2. Secondly, in the cause finall they erre. For where the word hath ordeined those Sacraments to excite our faith, and to giue vs admonitions of spiritual things: they contrariwise doe teach that the Sacramentes doe not onely stirre vp faith, but also that they auayle and are effectuall without faith, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis &c. as is to be founde in Thom. Aquine, Scotus, Catharinus, and other moe.

3. Thirdly,* in the operation & effect of the Sacramentes they faile: where the contrary to the minde of the Scriptures, doe say, that they giue grace & not onely do signifie, but also conteine and exhibite that which they signifie, to wytte grace and saluation.

4. Fourthly, they erre also in Application, applying their Sacramentes both to the quicke and the dead, to thē also that be absent, to remission of sinnes, and releasing of payne. &c.

In the Sacrament of Baptisme they are to be reprooued,* not onely for adding to the simple wordes of Christs institution, diuers other newfound rites & phantasies of men: but also where the vse of the olde Church of Rome was onely to baptise men,* they Baptise also Belles, and applye the wordes of Baptisme to water, fire, candels, stockes, and stones. &c.

But especially in the Supper of the Lord their doctrine most filthely swarueth from the right minde of the Scripture,* all order, reason, and fashion, most worthy to be exployded out of all Christen Churches. Touching y^e which Sacrament, the first errour is their Idolatrous abuse by worshipping, adoring, sensing, knocking and kneelyng vnto it, in reseruing also and carying the same about in pompe and procession in townes and fieldes. Secondly also in the substance thereof their teaching is monstrous,* leauing there no substance of bread and wine to remayne, but onely the reall body and bloud of Christ, putting no difference betweene calling, and making. Because Christ called bread, his body therfore, say they, he made it his body, and so of a wholesome Sacramēt, make a perilous Idole, & that which the old Church of Rome did euer take to be a mistery,* they turne into a blind miste of meere accidentses to bleare the peoples eies, making them beleeeue they see that they see not:* & not to see y^t which they see: & to worship a thing made, for their maker, a creature for their creator: and that was threshed out of a wheaten sheffe they set vp in the Church, & worship for a Sauour: and when they haue worshipped him, then they offer him to his father: and when they haue offered him, then they eate him vp, or els close him fast in a pixe. Where if he corrupt & putrifie before he be eaten, then they burne him to powder & ashes. And notwithstanding they know wel by the scriptures, that the body of christ can neuer corrupt and putrifie, yet for all this corruption, will they needes make it the body of Christ, and burne all them which beleeeue not that, which is against true Christian beleefe.

Of Matrimony.

What order and rule S. Paule hath set for mariage in his Epistle to the Corinthians it is manifest.* Wheras he preferreth single life in such as haue the gift of continence, before the married state, so againe in such as haue not the gift he preferreth the coupled life before the other: willing euery such one to haue his wife because of fornication. Furthermore, how the said Apostle alloweth a Byshop to be the husband of one wife (so he excede not to the maner of the Iewes, which were permitted to haue many) & how vehemently he reprobeth them that restraine mariage,* his letters to Timothy do record. Moreouer, what degrees be permitted by the law of God to marry, in the booke of Leu. Page 29 is to be seene. cha, 18. Also how children ought not to marry without consent of their parents,* by manifest examples of the Scriptures it is notorious.

Contrary to these ordinaunces of the Scripture, the new Catholikes of the Popes church,* first doe repute and call mariage a state of imperfection, & preferre single lyfe, be it neuer so impure, before the same, pretending y^t where the one replenisheth the earth, the other filleth Heauen. Further, as good as y^e third part of Christendome, if it be not more both men and women, they keepe through coacted vowes from mariage, hauing no respect whethy they haue the gift or no. Ministers and Priestes, such as are found to haue wiues, not onely they remove out of place, but also pronounce sentence of death vpon them & account their children for bastardes & illegitimate. Again, as good as the iij. part of the yeare they exempt & suspend from liberty of mariage. Degrees of copulation forbidden they extend farther then euer did the law of God, euen to the fift or sixth degree. Which degree notwithstanding they release againe when they list for money. Ouer and besides al this they haue added a new found prohibition of spiritual kindred, that is, that such as haue bene gossips, or godfathers and godmothers together in christening an other mans child, must not by their law mary together. Briefly and finally in this their doctrine and cases of Matrimony they gaine and rake to themselues much money from the people, they augment horrible Sodomity, they nourish wicked adultery and much fornication. They fill the worlde with offenses, and bastardes, and giue great occasion of murdering infants.

Of Magistrates and ciuill gouernement.

YE hard before what rules and lessons S. Paule gaue to the old Romanes concerning Magistrats, to whose authoritie he would all humaine creatures to be subiected and how they are the ministers of God, hauing the sworde giuen vnto them, wherewith they ought to repress false doctrine and idolatry, and maintaine that which is true & right. Rom. 13. Now let vs suruey a litle the Popes proceedinges, and marke how farre he transgresseth in this, as he doth in al other points almost from true christianity.

1. First, the Pope with all his clergy exempt themselues from all obedience ciuill.
2. They arrogate to themselues authoritie to ordeine and constitute, without all leaue or knowledge of the ordinary Magistrate.
3. Yea, they take vpon them to depose, and set vp rulers and Magistrates whom they list.

Of Purgatory.

*The Paradoxes, or rather the phantasies of the latter Church of Rome concerning purgatory, be monstrous, neither old nor Apostolicall.

1. First, (say they) there is a Purgatory, where soules do burne in fier after this life.
2. The paine of Purgatory differeth nothing from the paynes of hell, but onely that it hath an end, the paines of hell haue none.
3. The painefull suffering of this fier fretteth and scoureth away the sinnes before committed in the body.
- *4. The time of these paines indureth in some longer, in some lesse, according as their sinnes deserue.
5. After which time of their paines being expired, then the mercy of God doth translate them to heauenly blisse, which the body of Christ hath bought for them.
6. The paines of purgatory be so great, that if al the beggars of the world were seene on the one side, and but one soule of Purgatory on the other side, the whole worlde woulde pitie more that one, then all the other.
7. The whole time of punishment in this Purgatory must continue so long, till the fier haue cleane fretted and scoured away the rusty spots of euery sinnefull soule there burning, vnlesse there come some release.
8. Helpes and releases that may shorten the time of their purgation, be the Popes pardons and indulgences, sacrifice of the alter, dyrges, and trentals, prayer, fasting meritorious deedes out of the treasure house of the Church, almes, and charitable deedes of the liuing in satisfiying gods Iustice for them, &c.
9. Lacke of beliefe of Purgatory, bringeth to hell.

Many other false errorrs and great deformities, heresies, absurdities, vanities, & follies, besides their blasphemous raylinges and contumelies, may be noted in the said latter church of Rome,* wherein they haue made manifest defection from the old faith of Rome, as in depriuing the Church of one kinde of the Sacrament, in taking from the people the knowledge and reading of Gods word, in praying and speaking to the people and administring sacramentes in a tongue vnknowne, in mistaking the authoritie of the keyes, in their vnwritten verities, in making y^e authority of scripture insufficient, in vntrue iudgement of the Churche and the wrong notes of the same, in the supremacy of the sea of Rome, in their wrong opinion of Antichrist.

But because these with all other partes of doctryne are more copiously and at large comprehended in other bookes both in Latine and Englishe set foorth in these our dayes, I shall not need further herein to trauell, especially seeing the contrariety betweene the Popes Church, and the Church of Christ, betweene the doctrine of the one, and doctrine of the other, is so euident that he is blind that seeth it not, and hath no handes almost, that feeleth it not.

For (briefely in one note to comprehende,* which may suffice for all) where as the doctrine of Christ is altogether spirituall, consisting wholly in spirite and veritie, and requireth no outwarde thing to make a true Christen man but onely Baptisme (which is the outwarde profession of fayth) and receauing the Lordes supper:* let vs now examine the whole religion of this latter Church of Rome, and we shall finde it wholly from toppe to toe, to consist in nothing els but altogether in outwarde and ceremoniall exercises, as outward confession, absolution at the Priests hand, outward sacrifice of the Masse, buying of pardons, purchasing of obites,* externe worshipping of Images and reliques, pilgrimage of this place or that: building of Churches, founding of Monasteries, outward workes of the law, outwarde gestures, garments, colours, choise of meates, difference of times and places, peculiar rytes, and obseruauncies, set prayers and number of prayers prescribed, fasting of vigiles, keeping of holidayes, comming to Church, hearing of seruice, externe succession of Bishops,* and of Peters sea, externe forme and notes of the Church. &c. so that by this religion to make a true Christian and a good Catholike, there is no working of the holy Ghost almost required: As by example to make this matter more demonstrable, let vs here define a Christen man after the Popes making: whereby we may see the better what is to be iudged of the scope of his doctrine.

A Christen man after the Popes making defined.

After the Popes Catholike Religion,* a true Christen man is thus defined: first to be baptised in the Latine tongue (where the Godfathers professe they can not tell what) then confirmed by the Byshop: the Mother of the childe to be purified. After he be growen in yeares, then to come to the Church, to keepe his fasting dayes, to fast the Lent, to come vnder benedicite. that is, to be confessed of the Priest, to doe his penance, at Easter to take his rites to heare Masse, and diuine seruice, to set vppe candels before Images to creepe to y^e Crosse, to take holy bread and holy water, to go on processio, to cary his palmes & candle, and to take ashes, to fast the Ember daies, Rogation daies, & vigiles, to keepe the holy dayes, to pay his tithes and offeringe daies, to go on pilgrimage, to buy pardons, to worship his maker ouer the Priestes head, to receaue the Pope for his supream head and to obey his lawes, to receaue S. Nicolas Clerks, to haue his beades, & to giue to the high altar, to take orders, if he will be Priest, to saye his Mattens,* to sing his Masse, to lift vp fayre, to keepe his vow, and not to marry. When he is sicke to be anneeld and take the rites of holy Church, to be buried in y^e church yard, to be rong for, to be song for, to be buried in a Fryers coule, to finde a soule Priest. &c.

All which pointes being obserued, who can denie but this is a deuoute man and a perfecte Christian Catholike, and sure to be saued, as a true faithfull childe of the holye mother Church.

Now looke vpon this definition, and tell me (good reader) what faith or spirite, or what working of the holye Ghost in all this doctrine is to be required. The grace of our Lord Iesus giue the true light of his Gospell to shine in our hartes, Amen.

〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

The first booke contayning the 300. yeares next after Christ.

THEse things before premised, hauing thus hitherto prepared y^e way vnto our story, let vs now (by the grace and speede of Christ our Lord) enter into the matter: y^t as we haue heretofore set forth in a generall descriptiō the whole state as wel of the primitiue as of the latter times of this Church of Rome: so now consequently to discourse in particular sort the Actes and doings of euery age, by it selfe, in such order [unspec 1] as is afore prefixed.

First, to declare of the suffering time of the Church, which conteineth about the time of three hundreth yeares [unspec 2] after Christ.

Secondly, the flourishing & growing time of the same: [unspec 3] conteyning other 300. yeares.

Thirdly the declining time of the Church, and of true [unspec 4] Religion, other 300. yeares.

Fourthly, of the time of Antichrist, raigning & raging [unspec 5] in the Church, since the loosing of Sathan.

Lastly, of the reforming time of Christes Church in these latter 300. yeares.

In the tractation of all which things our chiefe purpose and indenor shalbe (so neare as the Lord will giue vs grace) not so much to intermedle with outward affaires of Princes, or matters ciuile,) except sometime for example of life) as specially minding (by the helpe of the Lorde) to prosecute such thinges, which to the Ecclesiasticall state of the Church are appertaining: as first to entreat of the stablishing of Christian faith, then of the persecutions of tyraunts, the constancy and patience of Gods Saintes, the first conuersion of Christen Realmes to the faith of Christ namely of this Realme of England & Scotland: first beginning with king Lucius, and so forward following the order of our English kings here in this land, to declare the maintenaunce of true doctrine, the false practise of Prelates, the creping in of superstition, and hipocrisie, the manifold assaultes, warres and tumults of the princes of this world, against the people of God. Wherein may appeare the wonderfull operation of Christes mightie hand, euer working in his church, & neuer ceasing to defend the same against his enimies, according to the verity of his owne word, promising to be with his Church while the worlde shal stand, so as by the proces of this story may welbe proued, and be testified in the sequell thereof.*

In the traction of all which things 2. especiall pointes I chiefly commend to the reader, as most requisite and necessary of euery Christen man to obserue & to note for his owne experience and profite, as first the disposition & nature of this worlde: secondly the nature & condition of the kingdome of Christ, the vanitie of the one, and stablishment of the other: The vnprosperous and vnquiet state of the one,* ruled by mans violence & wisdom: And the happy successe of the other euer ruled by Gods blessing & prouidence. The wrath and reuenging hand of god in the one and his mercy vpon the other.* The world I call al such as be without or against Christ, eyther by ignoraunce not knowing him, or by heathenish life not following him, or by violence resisting him. On the otherside the kingdome of Christ in this world I take to be all them which belong to the faith of Christ, & here take his part in this world against the world. The nūber of whom although it be much smaller then the other and alwaies lightly is hated & molested of the world,* yet it is the number, which the Lorde peculiarly doth blesse and prosper, and euer will. And this number of Christes subiects is it,* which we cal the visible Church here in earth. Which visible Church hauing in it selfe a difference of 2 sorts of people, so is it to be deuided in two parts, of which the one standeth of such as be of outward profession only, the other which by election inwardly are ioyned to Christ, the first in words & lips seemeth to honor Christ, and are in the visible Church onely, but not in the Church inuisible, & partaketh the outward Sacraments of Christ, but not the inward blessing of Christ: the other are both in the visible & also in the inuisible Church of Christ, which not in wordes onely and outward profession, but also in hart doe truely serue & honour Christ, partaking not onely the Sacramentes, but also the heauenly blessings and grace of Christ.

And many times it happeneth, that as betweene the world, and the kingdome of Christ there is a continual repugnaunce: so betweene these two partes of this visible Church aforesaid, oft times groweth great variaunce and mortal persecution, insomuch that sometime y^e true church of Christ hath no greater enimes, than of their owne profession and company, as happened not onely in the time of Christ,* and his Apostles, but also from time to time almost continually, Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 1. But especially in these latter daies of the Church vnder the persecution of Antichrist and his retinue, as by the reading of this volume more manifestly hereafter may appeare.

At the first preaching of Christ, and comming of the Gospel: who should rather haue knowen & receaued him, then the Phariseis and Scribes of that people, which had his law? And yet who persecuted and reiected him more, then they themselues? What followed▪ They in refusing Christ to be their king, and chosing rather to be subiect vnto Caesar, were by the sayde their owne Caesar at length destroyed: when as Christes subiectes the same time escaped the daunger. Whereby it is to be learned, what a dangerous thing it is to refuse the Gospell of God, when it is so gently offered.

The like example of Gods wrathful punishment is to be noted no lesse in the Romanes also themselues.* For when Tiberius Caesar, hauing receaued by letters frō Pontius Pilate, of the doings of christ, of his miracles. Resurrection, and ascention into heauen, & how he was receiued as God of many, was himselfe also mooued with beliefe of the same, and did conferre thereof with the whole Senate of Rome, to haue Christ adored as god: but they not agreyng therunto refused him, because that contrary to the law of the Romanes, he was consecrated, (said they) for God, before the Senate of Rome had so decreed & approued him.* &c. Tertul. Apol. cap. 5. Thus the vaine Senate following rather the law of man, then of God, & which were contented with the Emperour to reigne ouer them, were not cōtented with the meeke king of glory the sonne of God to be their king. And therefore after much like sort to y^e Iewes were scourged and intrapped for their vniust refusing, by the same way which they themselues did preferre. For as they preferred the Emperour, and reiected Christ, so the iust permission of God, did stirre vp their owne Emperours against them in such sort, that both the Senatours themselues were almost all deuoured, & the whole Citye most horrible afflicted the space almost of 300. yeares together. For first the same Tiberius, which for a great part of his reigne was a moderate and a tollerable Prince, afterward was to them a sharpe and heauy tyraunt, who neyther fauoured his owne mother, nor spared his owne newewes, nor the Princes of the City, such as were his own counselors, of whom to y^e number of xx, he left not past two or three aliue,* & so cruell was he to the Citye, that as the story recordeth: Nullus a paena hominum cessabat dies, ne religiosus quidem ac sacer. Suet. reporteth him to be so sterne of nature and tirannical, that in time of his reigne, very many were accused and condemned with their wiues & children, Maydes also first defloured, then put to death. In one day he recordeth .xx. persons to be drawn to y^e place of execution. By whom also, through the iust punishment of God Pilate vnder whom Christ was crucified, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed, then banished to the towne of Lyonce, and at length did slaye himselfe. Neither did Herode and Cayphas long escape,* of whome more followeth hereafter. Agrippa also by him was cast into prison, albeit afterward he was restored. In y^e raigne of Tiberius the Lord Iesus the sonne of God, in the xxxiiij. yeare of his age, which was the xvij. of this Emperour by the malice of the Iewes, suffered his blessed passion for the conquering of sinne, death, and Sathan the Prince of this world,* and rose againe the third day. After whose blessed Passion & resurrertiō, this foresayde Tiberius Nero (otherwise called) Liberius Mero,* liued vj. yeares, duryng which time no persecution was yet stirring in Rome against the Christians,* through y^e commaudemēt of the Emperour.

In the raigne also of this Emperour, and yeare which was the next after the passion of our Sauior, or somewhat more,* S. Paule was conuerted to the faith. After the death of Tiberius: whē he had raigned 23. yeares, succded C. Caesar Caligula,* Claudius Nero, and Domitius Nero: which 3. were likewise such scourges to the Senate and people of Rome that the first not onely tooke other mens wiues violentlye from them, but also defloured three of his owne sisters. and afterward banished them.* So wicked he was that he cōmaunded himselfe to be worshipped as God, and temples to be erected in his name, and vsed to sit in the temple among the Gods, requiring his images to be set vp in all temples, and also in the temple of Ierusalem whiche caused great disturbaunce among the Iewes, and then began the abomination of desolation to be set vp in y^e holy place, Page 31 spoken of in the gospel. His cruel condition, or els displeasure was such toward the Romaines,* that he wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that hee at hys pleasure might destroy such a multitude. By this sayd Caligula, Herode the murtherer of Iohn Baptist, and condemner of Christ, was condemned to perpetuall banishment, where he died miserably. Cayphas also which wickedly sat vpon Christ, was the same tyme remoued from the high Priests roome, and Ionathan set in his place. The raging fierceness of this Caligula incensed agaynst the Romaines, had not thus ceased, had not he bene cut of by the handes of a Tribune, and other gentle men, which slew him in the 4 yeare of hys raigne. After whose death was found in his closet. 2. litle libels, one called a sword, the other the daggar. In the whiche libels were contayned the names of those Senatours, and noble men of Rome, whom he had purposed to put to death.* Besides this sword and daggar, there was sound also a cofer, wherein diuers kindes of poyson were kept in glasses and vessels, for the purpose to destroy a wonderful number of people. Which poysons afterward being thrown into the sea,* destroied a great number of fish. Gotfr. Viterb.

But that which this Caligula had onely conceaued, the same did the other two, which came after, bring to passe, Claudius Nero,* who raygned xiii. yeares with no little cruelty. But especially the third of these Neroes, called Domitius Nero.* Whiche succeeding after Claudius, rayned 14. yeares, with such fury and tyranny, that he slewe the most part of the Senats,* he destroyd the whole order of knighthood in Rome. So prodigious a monster of nature was he, more like a beast, yea rather a deuill then a man, that he seemed to be borne to the destruction of man.* Such was his monstrous vncleannes, y^t he abstayned not from hys owne mother, his naturall sister, nor from any degree of kindred. Such was his wretched cruelty, that he caused to be put to death his mother, his brother in law, his sister, hys wyse great with childe, also his instructor Seneca and Lucane, with diuers moe of his owne kindred and consanguinitie. Moreouer, he commaunded Rome to be set on fire in vii. places, and so continued it 6. dayes and 7. nights in burning, while that he to see the example how Troy burned, sang the verses of Homere. And to auoide the infamie therof, he layd the fault vpon the Christian men, & caused them to be persecuted. And so continued this miserable Emperour in his reigne 14. yeares, till at last the Senate proclaiming him a publike enemie of mankind, condemned him to be drawn through the citie, and to be whipped to death. For the feare whereof, he flying the hands of his enemies,* in the night fled to a manor of his seruants in the countrey, where he was forced to slay himselfe, complayning that he had then neither friend nor enemie left, that would do so much for him. In the latter end of this Domitius Nero,* Peter also and Paul were put to death for the testimonie and faith of Christ. an. 69.

Thus ye see, which is worthy to be marked, how the iust scourge and heauie indignation of God from tyme to tyme euer followeth there, and how all things there go to ruine, neither doth any thing well prosper, where Christ Iesus the sonne of god is contemned, and not receiued, as by these examples may appeare, both of Romains which not only were thus consumed and plagued by their owne Emperors, but also by ciuile warres, wherof three were fought in two yeres at Rome, after the death of Nero, and other casualties (as in Sueton is testified) so y^t in the dayes of Tiberius aforesaid, 5000. Romains were hurt and slaine at one time by fal of a Theatre. And also most especially by the destruction of the Iewes, which about this same tyme, an. 73. and 40. yeres after the passion of Christ, and the third year after the suffering of S. Peter and Paule,* were destroyed by Titus & Vespasian his father, (who succeeded after Nero in the Empire, to the number of xi. hundred thousand besides them which Vespasian slue in subduing the country of Galilie, ouer and beside them also which were sold and sent into Egypt and other prouinces, to vile slauery, to the number of 17. thousand, 2000. were brought with Titus in his triumph,* of which, part he gaue to be deuoured of the wild beasts, part otherwise most cruelly were slaine. By whose case al nations and realmes may take exāple, what it is to reiect the visitation of Gods veritie being sent, and much more to persecute thē which be sent of God for their saluation.

And as this wrathfull vengeance of God thus hath ben shewed vpō this rebellious people both of the Iewes and of the Romains, for their contempt of Christ, whome God so punished by their own Emperours, so neither the Emperors themselues, for persecuting Christ in his members escaped without their iust reward. For amongst so many Emperours, which put so many christian Martyrs to death, during the space of these first 300. yeares, fewe or none of them scaped either not slaine thēselues, or by some miserable end or other, worthily reuenged. First, of y^e poisoning of Tiberius, & of the slaughter of the other thre Neroes after him, sufficiently is declared before. After Nero, Domitius Galba. within 7. monthes was slaine by Ottho. And so did Ottho afterward slay himselfe, being ouercome by Vitellus. And was not Vitellus shortly after drawn through the citie of Rome, and after he was tormēted, was thrown into Tiber Titus a good Emperor, is thought to be poysoned of Domitian his brother. The said Domitian after he had bene a persecutor of the christians, was slaine in his chamber, not without the consent of his wife. Likewise Commodus was murdered of Narcissus.* The like end was of Pertinax and Iulianus. Moreouer, after that Seuerus was slayne here in England, and lieth at Yorke, did not his sonne Bassianus slay his brother Geta, and he after slaine of Martialis▪ Macrinus with his sonne Diadumenus were both slayne, of their owne souldiours. After whom Heliagabolus that mōstrous bellypanch, was of his owne people slain, & drawn through the citie, and cast into Tiber. Alexander Seuerus, that worthy and learned Emperour, which sayd he would not feede his seruants doing nothing, with the bowels of the common wealth, although in life and vertues, was much vnlike other Emperours, yet prooued the like ende, beyng slayne at Mentz, with his godly mother Mammea by Maximinus whom the Emperour before of a Muletore had aduanced to great dignities. The which Maximinus also after three yeres was slaine himselfe of his souldiours. What should I speake of Maximus, and Balbinus, in like sort both slaine in Rome? Of Gordian slaine by Philip: of Philip the first christened Emperour, slaine or rather martired for the same cause? of wicked Decius, drowned, and his sonne slaine the same time in battail? Of Gallus and Volusianus his sōne, Emperours after Decius, both slaine by conspiracie of Aemilianus, who rose against them both in warre, and within three monthes after was slaine himselfe? Next to Aemilianus succeded Valerianus and Galianus his sonne, of whome Valerianus (who was a persecuter of the Christians) was taken prisoner of the Persians, and there made a ridyng foole of Sapore their king, who vsed him for a stoole to leap vp vpon his horse, while his sonne Galienus sleepeing at Rome, either would not, or could not once proferre to reuenge his fathers ignominie. For after the taking of Valerian, so many Emperours rose vp as were prouinces in the Romaine Monarch: At length Galienus also was killed by Aureolus, which warred against him. It were too long here to speake of Aurelianus an other persecuter, slain of his Secretarie: Of Tacitus and Florinus his brother, of whom the first raigned 6. months, and was slaine at Pontus, the other raigned two months, and was mured at Tarsis. Of Probus, who although a good ciuill Emperour, yet was he destroyed by his souldiers. After whom Carus the next emperour was slaine by lightning. Next to Carus followed the impious and wicked persecuter Dioclesian, with his fellowes Maximian, Galerius, Maximinus, Maxentius, and Licinius, vnder whom all at one time (during the life of Dioclesian) the greatest and most grieuous persecution was moued against the Christians x. yeares together. Of which, Dioclesian and Maximian deposed themselues frō the Empire. Galerius the chiefe minister of the persecution, after his terrible persecutions, fell into a wonderfull sicknesse, hauing such a sore risen in the neather part of his belly, which consumed his priue members, and so did swarme with wormes, that being not curable, neither by Surgerie nor Phisike, he confessed, that it happened for his crueltie toward the Christians, and so called in his proclamations against them. Notwithstanding, he not able to sustain (as some say) the stench of his sore slue himselfe. Maximinus in his warre being tormented with payne in his guttes, there died. Maxentius was vanquished by Constantine, and drowned in Tiber. Licinius likewise beyng ouercome by the said Constantine the great, was deposed from his Empire, and afterward slaine of his souldiours. But on the other side, after the tyme of Constantine, when as the fayth of Christ was receiued into Imperiall seate, we read of no Emperour after the like sort destroyed or molested, except it were Iulianus or Basilius which expelled one Zeno, & was afterward expelled himselfe: or Valende, besides these we read of no Emperour to come to ruine, as the other before mentioned. Ex lib hist. tripart.

And thus haue we in a briefe summe collected out of the Chronicles, the vnquiet and miserable state of the Emperours of Rome, vntill the tyme of Christian Constantine, with the examples no lesse terrible then manifest, of Gods seuerer iustice vpon them, for their contemptuous refusing Page 32 and persecuting the faith and name of Christ their Lord.

Moreouer, in much like sort and condition, if leisure of tyme, or haste of matter, would suffer me a little to digresse vnto more lower tymes, and to come more nere home, the like examples I could also inferre of this our countrey of England, concerning the terrible plagues of God against the churlish and vnthankfull refusing or abusing the benefite of his truth. First, we read how that God stirred vp Gildas to preach to the old Britains,* and to exhort thē vnto repentance and amendment of life, and afore to warne thē of plagues to come, if they repented not. What auayled it? Gildas was laughed to scorne and taken for a false prophet, and a malicious preacher. the Britains with lusty courages, whorish faces, and vnrepentant hartes, went forth to sinne, and to offend the Lord their God. What followed? God sent in their enemies on euery side, & destroyed them, and gaue the land to other nations. Not many yeres past, God seing idolatry, superstition, hipocrisie, and wicked liuing vsed in this Realme, rayased vp that godly learned man Iohn Wickliffe, to preach vnto our fathers repentance, and to exhort them to amend their liues, to forsake their Papistry & Idolatry,* their hypocrisy, superstition, and to walke in the feare of God. His exhortations were not regarded. He with his Sermons was despised. His bookes and he himself after his death were burnt, what followed? they slue their right king, and set vp three wrong kings on a rowe, vnder whom all the noble bloud was slaine vp, & halfe the commons thereto, what in Fraunce, & with their own sword in fighting among themselues for the crowne, and the Cities and townes decayed, and the land brought halfe to a wildernes, in respect of that it was before. O extreme plagues of Gods vengeance. Since that tyme euen of late yeares, God once againe hauing pitie of this realm of England, raised vp his prophets, namely, William Tindall, Thomas Bilney, Iohn Frith, Doctor Barnes, Ierome Garret, Anthonie Person, with diuers other, which both with their writings and sermons earnestly laboured to call vs vnto repentaunce, that by this meanes the fierce wrath of God might be turned away from vs. But how were they intreated? how were their painfull labours regarded? they themselues were condemned and burnt as heretikes, and their bookes condemned and burnt as heretical. The time shall come saith Christ, that whosoeuer killeth you, will thinke that he doth God hie good seruice. Whether any thing since that tyme hath so chaunced this Realme worthy the name of a plague, let the godly wise iudge. If God hath deferred his punishment, or forgeuē vs these our wicked deedes, as I trust he hath, let vs not therefore be proud and hie minded, but most humbly thanke him for his tender mercies, and beware of the like vngodly enterprises hereafter. Neither is it here any neede to speake of these our lower and latter tymes,* which haue ben in king Henry and king Edwards dayes, seeing the memory thereof is yet fresh, and cannot be forgotten. But let this passe, of this I am sure, that God yet once againe is come on visitation to this church of England, yea and that more louingly & beneficially then euer he did afore. For in this his visitation he hath redressed many abuses, and cleansed his church of much vngodlines and superstition, and made it a glorious Church, if it be compared to the olde forme and state. And now how gratefull receiuers we be, with what hart, study and reuerence we embrace that which he hath giuen,* that I referre either to thē that see our fruits, or to the sequele, which peradventure will declare. But this by the way of digression. Now to regresse againe to the state of the first former tymes. It remaineth, that as I haue set foorth the iustice of God vpon these Romain persecutors: so now we declare their persecutions raised vp against the people and seruauntes of Christ, within the space of 300. yeares after Christ. Which persecutions in number commonly are coūted to be tenne, besides the persecutions first mooued by the Iewes in Hierusalem and other places against the Apostles. In the which,* first S. Steuen the Deacon was put to death, with diuers other moe, in the same rage of tyme either slaine, or cast into prisō. At the doing wherof, Saule the same tyme playd the doughtie Pharisie, beyng not yet cōuerted to the fayth of Christ, wherof the history is playne in the Actes of the Apostles set forth at large by S. Luke.

After the Martyrdome of this blessed Steuen, suffered next Iames the holy Apostle of Christ,* and brother of Iohn. Of which Iames, mention is made in the Actes of the Apostles the xii. chap. Where is declared, how that not long after the stoning of Stephen, king Herode stretched forth his hand, to take and afflict certaine of the cōgregation: among whome Iames was one, whom he slew with the sword, &c. Of this Iames, Eusebius also inferreth mention, alleaging Clement, thus writing a memorable story of him. Thus Iames (saith Clement) when hee was brought to the tribunall seat,* he that brought him (& was the cause of his trouble) seeing him to be condemned, and that he should suffer death: as he went to the execution, he being mooued therewith in hart and conscience, confessed himselfe also of his owne accord to be a Christian. And so were they both led foorth together, where in the way he desired of Iames to forgiue him that he had done. After that Iames had a little paused with him vpon the matter,* turning to him Peace (sayth he) be to thee brother, and kissed him, and both were beheaded together, an. 36.

Dorotheus in his booke named Synopsis testifieth, that Nicanor one of the vii. Deacons, with 2000. other, which beleued in Christ, suffred also the same day, when as Steuen did suffer.

The faith Dorotheus witnesseth also of Simon,* an other of the Deacons, Bishop afterward of Bostrum in Arabie, there to be burned. Parmenias also an other of the Deacons suffred.

Thomas preached to the Parthians, Medes, and Persians: Also to the Germans, Hiraconis, Bactris, & Magis. He suffred in Calamina a Citie of Iudea, being slaine with a dart.

Simon Zelotes preached at Mauritania, and in the Countrey of Affrike. And in Britania hee was lykewise crucified.

Iudas brother of Iames, called also Thaddeus, and Lebeus, preached to the Edessens, and to all Mesopotamia. He was slayne vnder Augarus. king of the Edessens in Berito.

Simon called Cananeus, which was brother to Iude aboue mentioned, and to Iames the younger, which all were the sonnes of Mary Cleopha, and of Alpheus, was Bishop of Hierusalem after Iames, and was crucified in a Citie of Egypt in the tyme of Traianus Emperour, as Dorotheus recordeth.* But Abdias writeth, that hee with his brother Iude, were both slayne by a tumult of the people in Suanyr a citie of Parsidis.

Marke the Euangelist,* and first Bishop of Alexandria, preached the Gospell in Egypt, and there drawen with ropes vnto the fire, was burned, and afterward buried in a place called there Bucolus, vnder the raigne of Traianus Emperour.

Bartholomeus is sayd also to preach to the Indians,* and to haue conuerted the Gospell of S. Mathew into their tonge, where he continued a great space doing many miracles. At last in Albania a citie of greater Armenia, after diuers persecutions, he was beaten doune with staues, then crucified, and after being excoriate, he was at length beheaded. Ioan. De Monte Regali.

Of Andrew the Apostle and brother to Peter, thus writeth Ierome in his booke De catalogo scriptorum Eccles. Andrew the brother of Peter (in the tyme and raigne of Vespasianus, as our aunceters haue reported) did preach in the 80. yeare of our Lord Iesu Christ to the Scithians, Sogdians to the Saxons, and in a Citie which is called Augustia, where the Ethiopians do now inhabite. He was buried in Patris a citie of Achaia, being crucified of Egeas the gouernour of the Edessians: hitherto writeth Ierome Although in the number of yeares he semeth a little to misse, for Vespasianus reached not to the yere 80. after Christ. But Bernard in his second Sermon, and S. Cyprian in his booke De duplici Martyrio, doe make mention of the confession and Martyrdome of this blessed Apostle, wherof partly out of these, partly out of other credible writers we haue collected after this maner: that when as Andrew being conuersant in a Citie of Achaia called Patris, through his diligent preaching had brought many to the faith of Christ: Egeas the gouernour knowing this, resorted thither to the intēt he might constraine as many as did beleue Christ to bee God, by the whole consent of the Senate, to doe sacrifice vnto the Idols, and so geue diuine honor vnto them. Andrew thinking good at the beginning to resist the wicked counsaile,* and the doings of Egeas, went vnto him, saying in this effect vnto him: that it behoued him which was Iudge of men, first to know his Iudge which dwelleth in heauen, and then to worship him being knowen, and so in worshipping the true God, to reuoke his mynd from false Gods and blynd Idols. These wordes spake Andrew to the Consul.

But he greatly therewith discontented, demaunded of him whether he was the same Andrew that did ouerthrow the Temple of y^e gods,* and perswaded men of that superstitious sect, which the Romaines of late had commaunded to be abolished and reiected. Andrew did plainly affirme that the Princes of the Romans did not vnderstand the truth, & that the sonne of God comming from heauen Page 33 into the world for mans sake, hath taught & declared how these Idols, whom they so honoured as Gods, were not only not gods, but also most cruell Deuils, most enemies to mankind, teaching y^e people nothing els, but that wherwith God is offended, and being offended turneth away and regardeth them not, and so by the wicked seruice of the Deuill doe fall headlong into all wickednesse, and after their departing, nothing remaineth vnto them, but their euill deedes.

But the Proconsul esteeming these thinges to bee as vayne, especially seing the Iewes (as he said) had crucified Christ before, therfore charged and commaunded Andrew not to teach and preach such thinges any more, or if he did, that he should be fastened to the crosse with all speede.

Andrew abiding in his former mynd very constāt, answered thus concerning the punishment which he threatened, he would not haue preached the honour and glory of the crosse, if he had feared the death of the crosse. Wherupon sentence of condemnation was pronounced, that Andrew teaching and enterprising a new sect, and taking away the religion of their gods ought to be crucified.* Andrew commyng to the place, and seying a farre of the crosse prepared, did chaunge neither countenance nor colour, as the imbecillitie of mortal men is woont to do, neither did his bloud shrinke, neither did he faile in his speech, his body faynted not, neither was his mynd molested, his vnderstanding did not fayle him, as it is the maner of men to do, but out of the aboundance of his hart his mouth did speake.* And feruent charitie did appeare in his words as kindled sparckles. He said, O crosse most welcome and long looked for with a willing mynde, ioyfully and desirously I come to thee, beyng the Scholer of him which did hang on thee: Because I haue bene alwayes thy louer and haue coueted to embrace thee. So beyng crucified, he yelded vp the Ghost and fell on sleepe, the day before the Calendes of December.

Mathew otherwise named Leui, first of a Publicane made an Apostle, wrote his gospell to the Iewes in y^e Hebrue tongue, as recordeth Eusebius, lib. 3.24.39. lib 5. cap. 8. cap. 10. Also Iraeneus, lib 3. cap. 1. Item Hieronymus in Catalogo script. Ecclesiast. concerning the doings and decreementes of this blessed Apostle and Euangelist, diuers things bee recorded by Iulius Africanus, vnder the pretensed name of Abdias. Also of Vincentius, Perionius, and others, but in such sort, as by the contents may greatly be suspected, the matter not to lacke some craftie forgerie, for the more establishment of latter decretals, and Romish doctrine, as touching merites, consecration of Nunnes, the superstitious prescription of Lent fast, not onely in abstainyng from all fleshmeates, but also from all matrimoniall copulatiō betwene man and wife, during the said tyme of holy Lent. Item, the straight prohibition not to taste any bodily sustenance, before the receiuing of the Lordes supper. In ordaining of Masse, and that no Nunne must marry after the vowe of her profession, with such other like.

*Ioan de Monte Regali, testifieth of Mathias, that after he had preached to the Iewes, at length he was stoned & beheaded. Some other record that he died in Ethiopia.

Philippus the holy Apostle, after he had much laboured among the barbarous nations in preaching the worde of saluation to them, at length he suffered as the other Apostles did, in Hierapolis a citie of Phrygia, being there crucified and stoned to death, where also he was buried, & his daughters also with him. Isido.

 Of Iames the brother of the Lord, thus we read in the story of Clement and Egesippus.

AFTER that Festus had sent the Apostle Paul vnto Rome after his appellatiō made at Caesaria, & that the Iewes by the meanes thereof had lost their hope of performing their malicious vow against him conceiued, they fel vpon Iames the brother of our Lord, who was bishop at Ierusalem, against whom they being bent with like malice, brought him forth before them, and required him to denye before all the people the faith of Christ. But he otherwise: then they all looked for, freely and with a greater constancie before all the multitude, confessed Iesus to be the sonne of God, our Sauour, and our Lord. Whereupon, they not being able to abide the testimonie of this man any longer, because he was thought to be the iustest among all, for the highnes of deuine wisdom, and godlinesse, which in liuing he declared, they killed him, finding the more opportunitie to accomplish their mischief, because the kingdom the same tyme was vacant. For Festus being dead in Iewrie, the administration of that prouince was destitute of a ruler, and a deputie. But after what maner Iames was killed,* the words of Clement do declare, which writeth that he was cast doune from the pinnacle of the temple, and being smitten with the instrument of a Fuller was slain, but Egesippus which liued in the tyme next after the Apostles, describeth this cause diligently, in his fift Commentarie, after this maner as followeth.

Iames the brother of our Lord, tooke in hand to gouern the Church after the Apostles (beyng counted of all men from the tyme of our Lord to be a iust and perfect man.) Many and diuers other Iameses there were beside him, but this was borne holy from his mothers wombe, he dronke no wine, nor any strong drinke. neither did he cate any liuing creature, the razor neuer came vpon his head, he was not annointed with oyle, neither did he vse bathe, to him onely was it lawfull to enter into the holy place, neyther was he clothed with woollen cloth; but with silke; and he onely entred into the temple, falling vpon his knees, asking remission for the people, so that his knees by ofte kneling, lost the sence of feeling, being benumbed & hardened like the knees of a Camell. He was (for worshipping God and crauing forgiuenes for the people) called iust, & for the excelencie of his iust life named Oblas, which (if you do interprete it) is the sauegard, and iustice of the people as the Prophets declare of him: therefore when as many of the heretikes which were among the people asked him what maner of dore Iesus should be, he aunswered that he was the Sauour. Wherof some do beleue him to be Iesus Christ, but the aforesaid heretikes neither beleue the resurrection, neither that any shall come, which shal render vnto euery man according to his workes, but as many as beleue, they beleued for Iames cause. When as many therefore of the Princes did beleue,* there was a tumult made of the Scribes, Iewes, and Phariseis, saying: it is daungerous least that all the people do looke for this Iesus, as for Christ, therefore they gathered themselues together, & sayd vnto Iames: We beseech thee restrain the people, for they beleue in Iesus, as though he were Christ. We pray thee perswade them all which come vnto the feast of the Passeouer of Iesus, for we are all obedient vnto thee, and all the people do testifie of thee that thou art iust, neither that thou doest accept the person of any man, therefore perswade the people that they be not deceiued in Iesus, and all the people, and we will obey thee, therefore stand vpon the pillar of the temple, that thou mayest be seene from aboue, and that thy wordes may be perceiued of all the people, for to this passeouer all the tribes do come with all the countrey. And thus the forenamed Scribes, and Phariseis did set Iames vpon the battlements of the Church, and they cried vnto him and sayd, thou iust man whom all we ought to obey, because this people is led after Iesus, which is crucified, tell what is the dore of Iesus crucified: and he aunswered with a great voyce, what do you aske me of Iesus y^e sonne of man, seeyng that he sitteth on the right hand of God in heauen, and shall come in the cloudes of the skie? But whō many were persuaded of this, they glorified God vpon the witnes of Iames, and sayd: Osanna in the highest to the sonne of Dauid. Then the Scribes and the Phariseis sayd among themselues, we haue done euill that we haue caused such a testimony of Iesus. But let vs go vp and let vs take him, that they being compelled with feare, may deny that faith. And they cried out, saying: O, O, this iust man also is seduced, and they fulfilled that Scripture which is spoken of in Esay.* Let vs take away the iust man, because he is not profitable for vs: Wherfore let them eat the fruits of their workes. Therefore they went vp to throwe doune the iust man, and said among themselues: let vs stone this iust man Iames, & they toke him to smite him with stones for he was not yet dead whē he was cast doune, but he turning, fell doune vpon his knees, saying: O Lord God, Father, I beseech thee to forgeue them, for they know not what they do.* But whē they had smitten him with stones one of the priests of the children of Rechas, the sonne of Charobim, spake to them the testimonie which is in Ieremie the Prophet: leaue off, what do ye? The iust man praieth for you. And one of those which were present, tooke a Fullers instrument, wherwith they did vse to beat and purge cloth, and smote the iust man on his head, and so he finished his Martyrdome, and they buried him in the same place, & his pillar abideth yet by the temple. He was a true testimonie to the Iewes and the Gentiles. And shortly after Vespasianus the Emperour destroying the land of Iewrie, brought them into captiuitie. These thinges being thus written at large of Egesippus, do well agree to those which Clement did write of him. This Iames was so notable a man, that for his iustice he was had in honour of all men, in so much that the wise men of the Iewes shortly after Page 34 his Martyrdome did impute the cause of the besieging of Ierusalem and other calamities which happened vnto thē to no other cause, but vnto the violence and iniurie done to this man.* Also Iosephus hath not left this out of his historie, where he speaketh of him after this maner: These things so chanced vnto the Iewes for a vengeance because of that iust man Iames which was the brother of Iesu, whō they called Christ, for the Iewes killed him although he was a righteous man.

The same Iosephus declareth his death in the same booke and chapter, saying: Caesar hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus the Lieuetenant into Iewrie, but Ananus the yonger, being bishop, and of the sect of the Saduces, trusting that he had obtained a conuenient tyme, seing that Festus was dead, and Albinus entred on his iourney, he called a Councell, and calling many vnto him, among whom was Iames by name the brother of Iesu which is called Christ, he stoned them, accusing them as breakers of the law.

*Whereby it appeareth, that many other besides Iames also the same tyme were Martyred and put to death amōg the Iewes, for the faith of Christ.

A description of the X. first persecutions in the Primitiue Church.

*These thinges being thus declared for the Martyrdome of the Apostles, and the persecutiō of the Iewes. Now let vs (by y^e grace of Christ our Lord) comprehend with like breuitie, the persecutions raised by the Romaines, against the Christians in the Primitiue age of the Church, during the space of 300. yeares, till the comming of godly Constantine, which persecutions are reckoned of Eusebius, and by the most part of writers, to the number of x. most speciall.

Wherin meruailous it is, to see and read the numbers incredible of Christian innocents that were slaine and tormented, some one way, some an other. As Rabanus saith, & saith truly. *Alij ferro perempti. Alij flammis exusti. Alij flagris verberati. Alij vectibus perforati. Alij cruciati patibulo. Alij demersi pelagi periculo. Alij viui decoriati. Alij vinculis mancipati. Alij linguis priuati. Alij lapidibus obruti. Alij frigore afflicti. Alij fame cruciati. Alij truncatis manibus, aliisue caesis membris spectaculum contumeliae, nudi propter nomen Domini portantes, &c. That is, Some slaine with sword. Some burnt with fire. Some with whips scourged. Some stabbed in with forkes of iron. Some fastned to the crosse or gibbet. Some drowned in the sea. Some their skinnnes pluckt of. Some their tongues cut off. Some stoned to death. Some killed with cold. Some starued with hunger. Some their hands cut off or otherwise dismembred, haue bene so left naked to the open shame of the world, &c. Whereof Augustine also in his booke De Ciuit. 22. cap. 6. thus saith: *Ligabantur, includebantur, caedebantur, torquebantur, vrebantur, laniabantur, trucidabantur, multiplicabantur, non pugnantes pro salute, sed salutem contemnentes pro seruatore. Whose kindes of punishments although they were diuers, yet the maner of constancie in all these Martyrs was one. And yet notwithstanding the sharpenes of these so many and sundry tormēts, and like cruelnes of the tormentors: yet such was the nūber of these constant Saintes that suffered, or rather such was the power of the Lord in his Saints, that as Hierome in his Epistle to Chromatius, *and Heliodorus saith: Nullus esset dies qui non vltra quin{que} millium numerum Martyrum reperiri posset ascriptus excepto die Kalendarum Ianuarij. That is, There is no day in the whole yeare, vnto which the nūber of fine thousand Martyrs cannot be ascribed, except onely the first day of Ianuary.

The first Persecution.

The first of these x. persecutions, was stirred vp by Nero Domitius,¹ the vj. Emperour before mentioned, about the yeare of our Lord, 67. The tyrannous rage of which Emperour, was so fierce against the Christians (as Eusebius recordeth) Vs{que} adeò vt videres repletas humanis corporibus ciuitates,^{}iacentes mortuos simul cum paruulis senes: foemi. narúm{que} abs{que} vlla sexus reuerentia nudata in publico,^{}reiectá{que} starent cadauera. That is, In so much that a man might then see cities lye full of mens bodies, the old there lying together with the yong, and the dead bodies of women cast out naked,^{*} without all reuerence of that sexe in the opē streets. &c. Likewise Orosius writing of the said Nero, saith, that he was the first which in Rome did raise vp persecution against the Christians, and not onely in Rome, but also through all the prouinces therof, thinking to abolish and to destroy the whole name of Christians in all places, &c. Whereunto accordeth moreouer the testimonie of Hierome vpon Daniel, saying: thàt many there were of the Christians in those dayes, which seyng the filthy abominations, and intollerable crueltie of Nero, thought that he should be Antichrist, &c.

In this persecution,^{} among many other Saintes the blessed Apostle Peter was condemned to death, and crucified as some doe write, at Rome, albeit othersome, and not without cause doe doubt thereof, concerning whose lyfe and hystory, because it is sufficiently described in the text of the Gospell, and in the Actes of S. Luke. chap. 4.5. 12. I neede not heere to make any great repetytion therof. As touching the cause and maner of hys death, diuers ther be,^{} which make relation, as Hierome, Egesippus, Eusebius, Abdias, and other: although they doe not all precisely agree in the tyme. The wordes of Hierome be these: Simon Peter the sonne of Iona, of the prouince of Galile, and of the Towne of Bethsaida, the brother of Andrew. &c. After hee had bene Byshop of the Church of Antioch, and had preached to the dispersion of them that beleued, of the Circumcision in Pontus, Galacia, Capadocia, Asia, and Bithinia in the second yeare of Claudius, the Emperour, (whiche was about the yeare of our Lord. 44.) came to Rome, to withstand Simon Magus, and there kept the priestly chayre, the space of ^{} 25. yeares, vntill the last yeare of the foresayd Nero, which was the 14. yeare of hys raygne, of whome he was crucified, hys head being downe, and his feete vpward, himselfe so requiring, because he was (he sayd) vnworthy to be crucified after the same forme and maner, as the Lord was. &c. Egesippus, prosecuting this matter something more at large, and Abdias, also, (if any authoritie is to be geuen to hys booke, who following not onely the sense, but also the very forme of wordes of Egesippus in this Hystory, seemeth to be extracted out of him, and of other authors) sayth, that Simon Magus being then a great man with Nero, and his president and keeper, of hys life, was required vpon a tyme to be present at the raysing vp of a certayne noble young man in Rome,^{} of Neros kindred, lately departed. Wheras Peter also was desired to come to the reuiuing of the sayd personage. But when Magus in the presence of Peter could not doe it: Then Peter calling vpon the name of the Lord Iesus, dyd rayse him vp, and restored him to hys mother, wherby the estimation of Simon Magus, began greatly to decay, and to be detested in Rome. Not long after the sayd Magus threatned the Romaynes, that he would leaue the Citie and in their light flye away from them into heauen. So the day being appoynted Magus taking hys winges in the Mounte Capitolinus, began to flye in the ayre. But Peter by the power of the Lord Iesus brought him downe with his winges headlong to the ground, by the whiche fall hys legges and ioyntes were broken, and he thereupon dyed. Then Nero sorrowing for the death of him, sought matter agaynst Peter to put hym to death. Which when the people perceiued, they entreated Peter with much a doe, that he would flye the Citie. Peter through their importunitie at length perswaded, prepared himselfe to auoyd. But comming to the gate he sawe the Lord Christ come to meete him, to whom he worshipping sayd: Lord whether doest thou goe? To whome he aunswered and sayd, I come agayne to be crucified. By this Peter perceauing hys suffering to be vnderstanded, returned backe into the Citty agayne. And so was he crucified, in maner as is before declared. And this out of Egesippus.

Eusebius moreouer, writing of the death not onely of Peter,* but also of his wife, affirmeth, that Peter seeing his wife goyng to her Martyrdom (belike as he was yet hanging vpon the crosse) was greatly ioyous and glad thereof, who crying vnto her with a loud voyce,* and calling her by her name, bade her remember the Lord Iesus. Such was then (saith Eusebius) the blessed bonde of Mariage among the Saintes of God. And thus much of Peter.

Paule the Apostle, which before was called Saule, after his great trauail and vnspeakable labours in promootng the Gospell of Christ, suffred also in this first persecution vnder Nero, and was beheaded. Of whom thus writeth Hierome in his Booke De viris illustr. Paule, otherwise called Saule, one of the Apostles, yet out of the number of xij. was of the tribe of Beniamin, and of a towne of Iewrie called Gisealis:* which towne beyng taken of the Romans, he with his parents fled to Tharsus a town of Cilicia. Afterward was sent vp by his parents to Hierusalē, Page 35 and there brought vp in the knowledge of the law, at the feete of Gamaliel,* and was at the death of Stephen a doer. And when he had receiued letters from the high Priest to persecute the Christians, by the way going to Damascus, was stricken downe of the Lordes glory, and of a persecutor, was made a professor, an Apostle, a Martyr, a witnesse of the Gospell, and a vessell of election.

Among his other manifold labors & trauails in spreading the doctrine of Christ, he wan Sergius Paulus, the Proconsul of Cyprus, to the faith of Christ, whereupon he tooke his name as some suppose,* turned from Saulus to Paulus. After he had passed through diuers places and countries in his laborious peregrinations, he tooke to him Barnabas, and went vp to Hierusalem, to Peter, Iames, and Iohn, where he was ordained and sent out with Barnabas to preach vnto the Gentils.

And because it is in the Actes of the Apostles sufficiently comprehended, concerning the admirable conuersion, & conuersation of this most worthy Apostle, that which remaineth of the rest of his history, I will here adde, how the sayd Apostle Paule, the 25. yere after the passion of the lord, in the second yeare of Nero, what tyme Festus ruled in Iewrie, was sent vp in bondes to Rome,* where he remaining in his free hosterie two yeares together, disputed daily against the Iewes, proouing Christ to be come. And here is to be noted, that after his first answer or purgation there made at Rome, the Emperor Nero, not yet fully confirmed in his Empire, & yet not bursting out into those mischiefs, which histories report of him, he was at that tyme by Nero discharged, and dismissed to preach the Gospell in the West partes and about the coastes of Italy, as he himselfe writing vnto Timothie, afterward in his second apprehension, in his second Epistle witnesseth,* saying: In my first purgation, no man stode with me, but did all forsake me, the Lord lay it not to their charge. But the Lord stood with me, & did comfort me, that the preaching of his word might proceed by me, & that all the Gentiles might heare and be taught, and I was deliuered out of the Lions mouth, &c. In which place by the Lion he plainly meaneth Nero. And afterward likewise saith: I was deliuered from the mouth of the Lion, &c. And againe, the Lord hath deliuered me out from all euill workes, and hath saued me vnto his heauenly kingdom, &c.

speaking this, because he perceiued thē the tyme of his Martyrdome to be nere at hand. For in the same Epistle before. he saith: I am now offred vp, and the tyme of my dissolution draweth on.

Thus then, this worthy preacher and messenger of the Lord, in the 14. yeare of Nero, and the same day in which Peter was crucified (although not in the same yeare as some write, but in the next yeare following) was beheaded at Rome for the testimonie of Christ, and was buried in the way of Ostia.* The yeare after the passion of the Lord 37. He wrote ix. Epistles to seuen Churches: to the Romans one, to the Corinthians two, to the Galathiās one, to the Ephesians one, to the Philippians one, to the Colossians one, to the Thessalonians two. Moreouer, he wrote to his Disciples, to Timothie two, to Titus one, to Philemon one.

The Epistle which beareth the title to the Hebrues, is not thought to be his, for the difference of the stile & phrase, but either iudged to be written of Timothie, as Tertullian supposeth, or of S. Luke as other do thinke: or els of Clement afterward Bishop of Rome, who as they say, was adioyned with Paul, and compiling together his sayings and sentences, did phrase them in his stile and maner. Or els,* as some do iudge, because S. Paul wrote vnto the Hebrues, for the odiousnes of his name among that people, therefore he dissimuled, and confessed his name in the first entre of his salutation, contrary to his accustomed condition. And as he wrote to the Hebrues he being an Hebrue, so he wrote in Hebrue, y^t is, in his own tongue more eloquently. And that is thought to be the cause why it differeth from his other Epistles, and is after a more eloquent maner translated into the Greeke, then his other Epistles be.* Some also read the Epistle written to Laodicea, but that is exploded of all men. Thus much Hierome.

As touching the tyme and order of the death and Martyrdome of S. Paule, as Eusebius, Hierome, Maximus and other authors doe but briefly passe ouer: So Abdias (if his booke be of any substāiall authoritie) speaking more largely of the same doth say:.* that after the crucifying of Peter, & the ruine of Simon Magus, Paule yet remayning in free custody, was dismissed and deliuered at that time from Martyrdome by Gods permission, that all the Gentiles might be replenished with preaching of the Gospell by him.

And the same Abdias proceeding in his story, declareth moreouer, that as Paule was thus occupied at Rome, he was accused to the Emperour, not onely for teaching new doctrine,* but also for stirring vp sedition against the Empire. For this he being called before Nero, and demaunded to shew the order and maner of his doctrine, there declared what his doctrine was, to teach all men peace and charitie how to loue one an other, how to preuent one an other in honor,* rich mē not to be puft in pride, nor to put their trust in their treasures, but in the liuing God. Meane men to be contented with foode and rayment, and with their present state. Poore mē to reioyce in their pouertie with hope. Fathers to bring vp their children in the feare of God. Children to obey their parents. Husbandes to loue their wiues. Wiues to be subiect vnto their husbands. Citizens and subiects to giue their tribute vnto Caesar and to be subiect to their magistrates. Maisters to be curteous not currish to their seruants. Seruants to deale faithfully with their maisters. And this to be the summe of his teaching, which his doctrine he receiued not of men nor by men, but by Iesus Christ, and the father of glory, which spake to him from heauen, the Lord Iesus saying to him, that he should goe and preach in his name, and that he would be with him, and would be the spirit of life to all that beleued in him, and that whatsoever he did or said, he would iustifie it, &c. After that Paule had thus declared vnto the Emperour, shortly after sentence of death was pronounced against him,* that he should be headed. Unto whose execut•ō then Nero sent two of his Esquiers Ferega, and Parthemius to bring him word of his death. They comming to Paule, instructing then the people, desired him to pray for them that they might beleue. Who told them that shortly after they should beleue, and be baptised at his Sepulchre (as Abdias writeth.)* This done, the souldiours came and led him out of the Citie to the place of execution, where he after his prayers made, gaue his necke to the sword. Abdias reporteth,* that as his head was strokē off, in stead of blood issued out white milke, and that at laying downe his head he signed himselfe with the signe of a crosse in his forehead, but this being found in no other historie,* Abdias semeth either to adde of his own, or els to borow out of the Legend as he doth many other things beside, wherof more shalbe sayd (Christ willing) hereafter. Although the same miracle of milke flowing out of his necke, is referred also vnto Ambrose, who in his sermon 68. (if it be not counterfaieted) seemeth to affirme the same. Of the tyme and yeare when these blessed Apostles did suffer, histories doe not all agree. They that follow the commō opinion,* and the Popes decrees say, that both Peter and Paul suffred both in one day and in one yeare, which opinion semeth to be taken out of Dionysius bishop of Corinth. Hierome in his booke De viris illustr. affirmeth that they suffred both in one day, but he expresseth not the yeare.* So doth Isodorus and Eusebius. Symon Metaphrastes bringeth in the opinion of some, which thinke that Paul suffred not with Peter, but after Peter. Prudentius in his Peristephanō, noteth that they both were put to death vpon the same day, but not in the same yere, and saith that Paule followed Peter a yeare after.

Abdias aboue mentioned, recordeth that Paule suffered two yeares after Peter. Moreouer, if it be true which Abdias saith, that after the crucifyng of Peter, Paul remained in his fyare custody at Rome, mētioned in the Actes of the Apostles, which was as Hierom witnesseth the 3. or 4. yere of Nero, then must it be x. yeare betwixt the Martyrdome of Peter and of Paule, for as much as it is by all writers confessed, that Paule suffered the 14. yeare, which was the last yeare of Nero. And so Abdias seemeth neither to agree with other authors, nor with himselfe. And thus much of the first persecution.

The second Persecution.

THE first Romaine persecution beginning vnder Nero, as is aforesaid,* ceased vnder Vespasianus who gaue some rest to the poore Christians. After whose raigne was mooued not long after the second persecution,* by the Emperor Domitian brother of Titus. Of whome Eusebius and Orosius so write, that he first beginning mildly, afterward did so farre outrage in pride intollerable, that he commaunded himself to be worshipped as God, and that images of gold and siluer in his honour should be set vp in Capitolio.* The chieftest nobles of the Senators, either vpon enuy, or for their goodes, he caused to be put to death, some openly, and some he sent into banishment, there causing them to be slaine priuilie.

And as his tyranny was vnmeasurable, so the intemperancie of his life was no lesse.* He put to death all the nephewes of Iuda, called the Lordes brother, and caused to be sought out, and to be slayne all that could be found of the Page 36 stocke of Dauid (as Vespasian also did before him) for feare least he were yet to come of the house of Dauid,* which should enioy the kingdome. In the tyme of this persecutor, Symeon Bishop of Hierusalem, after other torments, was crucified to death, whom Iustus afterward succeeded in that Bishopprike.

In this persecution Iohn the Apostle and Euangelist was exiled by the sayd Domitianus into Pathmos.* Of whō diuers and sundry memorable actes, be reported in sundry Chronicles. As first how he was put in a vessell of boiling Oile,* by the Proconsul of Ephesus. The Legend and Perionius say, it was done at Rome. Isidorus also writing of him and comprehending many things in few wordes, declareth that he turned certaine peeces of wood into gold, and stones by the seaside into Margarites, to satisfie the desire of two, whom he had before perswaded to renounce their riches: And afterward they repenting that for worldly treasure, they had lost heauen, for their sakes agayne he changed the same into their former substance. Also, how he raised vp a widow and a certaine yong man from death to life. How he dronke poison, and it hurt him not, raising also to life two which had dronke the same before. These and such other miracles, although they may be true, & are foūd in Isidorus & other writers mo,* yet because they are no articles of our Christian belief, I let them passe, and only content my selfe with that which I read in Eusebius, declaring of him in this wise: That in the 14. yeare after Nero, in the second persecution, in the dayes of Domitian, Iohn was banished into Pathmos for the testimonie of the word,an. 97. And after the death of the foresaid Domitian being slaine, & his actes repealed by the Senate, Iohn was againe released vnder Pertinax the Emperour, & came to Ephesus, an. 100. Where he continued vntill the tyme of Traianus, & there gouerned the Churches in Asia, where also he wrote his Gospell, and so liued till the yeare after the Passion of our Lord, 68. which was the yeare of his age. 99.

Moreouer, in the foresayd Ecclesiasticall story of Eusebius, we read that Iohn the Apostle and Euangelist,* whō the Lord did loue, was in Asia, where he being returned out of Pathmos, after the death of Domitian, gouerned the Churches and congregations. Irenaeus in his second booke thus writeth: And of him all the Elders do witnes, which were with Iohn the Disciple of the Lord in Asia, that he spake and wrote these thinges, &c. for there he continued with them vnto the tyme of Traianus, &c. Also the said Irenaeus, Lib. 3. Hypothes. in like wordes declareth,* saying: The Church of the Ephesians being first founded by Paul, afterward beyng confirmed of Iohn, (who continued in the same Citie vnto the tyme of Traianus the Emperour) is a true witnesse of this Apostolicall tradition, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus moreouer noteth, both the tyme of this holy Apostle, and also addeth to the same a certain history of him, not vnworthy to bee remembred of such which delite in things honest and profitable.* Of the which historie Sozomenus also in his Commentaries maketh mention. The wordes of the author setting forth this historie, be these: Heare a fable, and not a fable, but a true report which is told vs of Iohn the Apostle, deliuered and commended to our remembrance. After the death of the tyrant, whē Iohn was returned to Ephesus, from the Ile of Pathmos: he was desired to resort to the places bordering neare vnto him, partly to constitute bishops, partly to dispose the causes and matters of the church, partly to ordaine and set such, of the Clergy in office, whom the holy ghost should elect. Wherupon, when he was come to a certaine citie not farre of, the name of which also, many do yet remember, and had among other thinges comforted the brethren, he looking more earnestly vpon him which was the chiefe bishop among them, beheld a yong man mighty in body, and of a beautiful countenance, and of a feruent mind. I commend this man (saith he) to thee with great diligence, in the witnesse here of Christ and of the Church.

When the Bishop had receiued of him this charge, and had promised his faithfull diligence therein. Agayne the second tyme Iohn spake vnto him and desired him in like maner and contestatiō as before. This done, Iohn returneth againe to Ephesus. The Bishop receiuing the yong man, commēded & commicteth to his charge, brought him home, kept him and nourished him, and at length also did illuminate, (that is) he baptised him. And in short tyme through his diligence, brought him into such order and towardnes, that he cōmitted vnto him the ouersight of a certaine cure in the Lordes behalfe. The yong man thus hauing more his libertie, it chanced that certaine of his companions & old familiars being idle, dissolute, & accustomed of old time to wickednes, did ioynē in company with him. Who first brought him to sumptuous & riotous bankets. Then entised him forth with them in the night to rob and steale.* After that, he was allured by thē vnto greater mischiefe and wickednesse. Wherin by custome of tyme by litle and litle, he being more practised, and being of a good wit, and a stout courage, like vnto a wild or an vnbrokē horse, leauing the right way & running at large without bridle, was caried headlong to the profunditie of all disorder and outrage. And thus being past all hope of grace, vtterly forgetting and reiecting the wholesome doctrine of saluatiō, which he had learned before, began to set his mynde vpon no small matters. And forasmuch as he was entred so farre in the way of perdition, he cared not how further he proceded in the same. And so associating vnto him the company of his companions, and fellow thieues, tooke vpon him to be as head and captaine among them, in committing all kynd of murther and felony.

In the meane time it chaunced, that of necessitie Iohn was sent for to those quarters againe, and came. The causes being decided, and his busines ended, for the which he came, by the way meeting with the Bishop afore specified, requireth of him the pledge, which in the witnes of Christ and of the congregation then present, he left in his handes to keepe. The bishop something amased at the woordes of Iohn, supposing he had meant of some money committed to his custody, which he had not receiued, and yet durst not mistrust Iohn, nor contrary his woordes could not tell what to aunswer. Then Iohn perceauing his doubtyng, and vtterlyng his mynde more plainely: The yong man (saith he) and the soule of our brother committed to your custody, I do require. Then the bishop with a loude voice, sorrowing and weeping, said, he is dead: to whom Iohn said, how? And by what death? The other said, he is dead to God: for he is become an euill man, and pernicious, to be briefe, a thiefe: & now he doth frequent this mountaine with a company of villains and thieues,* like vnto himselfe against the Church. But the Apostle renting his garmēts, and with great lamentation, said, I haue lett a good keper of my brothers soule. Get me a horse, and let mee haue a guide with me, which being done, his horse and man procured, hasted from the Churche as much as he could, and comming to the same place, was taken of theeues y^e watched. But he neyther flying, nor refusing sayd: I came for this same cause hither, lead me (sayd he) to your captayne. So he being brought, the captaine all armed, fiercely begā to looke vpon him. And eftsoones comming to the knowledge of him, was stroken with confusion and shame, and began to flie. But the olde man followed him as much as he might, forgetting his age and crying: My sonne, why doest thou flie from thy father? an armed man, from one naked,* a yong man, from an olde man. Haue pitie on me my sonne, and feare not, for there is yet hope of saluation, I will make an answer for thee vnto Christ, I will dye for thee if neede be, as Christ hath died for vs. I will giue my life for thee, beleue me, Christ hath sent me. He hearing these things, first as in a mase stood still, and therewith his courage was abated. After that he cast downe his weapons, by and by he trembled, yea and wept bitterly: and comming to the old man, embraced him, and spake vnto him with wepyng (as well as he could) beyng euen then baptised a fresh with teares, only his right hand beyng hid and couered. Then the Apostle, after that he had promised and firmly ascertained him that he should obtain remission of our Sauour, and also prayed falling downe vpon his knees, & kissed his murdering right hand, which for shame he durst not shew before: as now purged through repentaunce, brought him to the congregation, and when he had prayed for him with continuall prayer and daily fastings, and had comforted and confirmed his mynde with many sentences, went not from him (as the author reporteth) before he had restored him to the congregation againe, and made him a great example and triall of regeneration, and a token of the visible resurrection.

Moreouer, the foresayd Irenaeus in Lib. 3. cap. 3. and Eusebius, Lib. 3. cap 28. and Lib. 4. cap. 14. prosecuting the historie of Iohn, declare in these wordes, saying, that there were certaine which heard Policarpus say; that Iohn the disciple of our Lord,* goyng into Ephesus to be washed, seying Corinthus within, he leaped out of the bathe vnbathed, because he feared the bathe should haue fallen, seing that Cerinthus an enemy to the truth, was within. Such feare had the Apostles (saith Irenaeus) that they would not communicate a word with them that adulterate the truth.

And forasmuch as we are here in hand with the story of Iohn the blessed Euangelist, commeth in matter and occasion, not geuē by him, but takē of other, of a great doubt and difficulty, such as hath occupied all the Catholike, subtile, illuminate, and seraphicall Doctors of the Popes Catholike Page 48 Church, these 500. yeares. The difficultie is this: that for so much as auricular confession hath bene,* & is yet receiued in the Popes Catholike Church for an holy and necessary Sacrament, extending vniuersally to al & singular creatures Christian. Here then riseth a question, who was our Ladies confessour, or ghostly father? But that is decreed and confessed with full consent of all the Catholikes to bee S. Iohn. Whosoeuer denieth or doubteth of this,* is straight wayes ipso facto an heretike. This then so determined, ariseth an other question or doubt, that seeyng our Lady was without all originall sinne, and also actuall or mortall: what need then had she of any Confessour? or what should she confesse vnto him? For if she had confessed any sinne, when she had none: then had she made herselfe a lyer,* & so had sinned in deede. Here therefore gentle Reader, in this perplexitie, these our illuminate Doctours stād in neede of thine ayde, to helpe at a pinch. Magnus Albertus y^e great diuine, denieth not, but that she in deede, although most pure, yet was confessed to her ghostly father, to keepe the obseruances of the law, appointed for such as had that neede, which she had not. And therfore (sayth he) necessary it was that she should confesse with mouth. But then here is to be asked, what did she say in her confession, when she had nothing to confesse? To this Albertus aunswereth agayne, and telleth vs plainely what she sayd in her confessiō which was this:* that she had receiued that great grace, not ex condigno, that is, not of any dignitie of her own, but yet notwithstanding of congruitie. And this was it (sayth Albert) that she sayd in her confession. Albert cap. 74. super Euang. Missus est, &c.

Moreouer, to helpe this case out of all doubt, commeth in famous Thomas of Watring,* & thus looseth the knot, much after like effect, saying: that as Christ, although he did owe nothing to the law, yet notwithstanding receiued he Circumcision, to geue to other example of humilitie and obedience: In like maner would our Lady shew her selfe obedient to the obseruaunce of the law, albeit there was no cause, why she had any neede thereof. And thus hast thou (gentle Reader) this doubtful questiō mooued and soluted, to the intent I would reueale to thee some part of the deep diuinitie of our Catholike Maisters, that haue ruled and gouerned the Church in these their late Popish dayes.

But breaking of this matter, to returne againe where we left, that is, to this foresayd 2. persecutiō vnder Domitianus. In which persecution besides these afore mentioned, and many other innumerable godly Martyrs, sufferiſg for the like testimonie of y^e Lord Iesus, was Flauia y^e daughter of Flauius Clemens, one of the Romaine Consuls, which Flauia with many other was banished out of Rome into the Isle Pontia, for the testimony of the Lord Iesus by the Emperour, Domitianus, Euseb. Lib. 3.

This Domitianus feared the comming of Christ as Herode did, & therefore commaunded them to be killed which were of the stocke of Dauid in Iewry. There were remaining alieue at that tyme certayne of the Lordes kindred, which were the nephewes of Iude, that was called the Lordes brother after the flesh. These when the Lieuetenānt of Iewry had brought vp to Domitian to be slayn: the Emperour demaunded of thē, whether they were of the stocke of Dauid: which when they had graūted, he asked againe, what possessions, and what substaunce they had. They aūswered, y^t they both had no more betweene them in all, but xxxix. acres of grounde, & how they gat their liuing & sustained their families with the hard labours of their hādes shewing forth their hands vnto the Emperour, being hard and roughworne with labours, to witnes that to be true which they had spoken. Then the Emperour inquiring of them concerning the kingdome of Christ, what maner of kingdome it was, how and when it should appeare: they aunswered that his kingdome was no worldly nor terren thing, but an heauenly and Aungellicall kingdome, & that it should appeare in the consummation & end of the world what tyme he comming in glory, should iudge the quicke and the dead, and render to euery one according to his deseruinges. Domitian, the Emperour hearing this (as the saying is) did not condemne them, but despising them as vile persons, let them go, & also staid the persecution then mooued against the Christians. They being thus discharged and dismissed, afterward had the gouernmēt of Churches, beyng taken for Martyrs, and as of the Lords stock, and so consumed in good peace till the tyme of Traianus. Haec Egesip. & Euseb Lib. 3. cap. 20.

By this story here recited may appeare, what were the causes why the Emperours of the Romaine Monarchie did so persecute the Christians: which causes were chiefly these: feare, and hatred: 1. feare, for that the Emperours and Senate of blinde ignoraunce, not knowing the maner of Christes kingdome, feared and misdoubted least the same would subuert their Emperie. Like as the Pope thinkeeh now that this Gospel wil ouerthrow his kingdom of maiestie. And therefore sought they all means possible, how by death and all kindes of torments vtterly to extinguish the name and memorie of the christians. And therupon semeth to spring the old law of the Romaine Senate: Non debere dimitti Christianos qui semel ad tribunal venissent, nisi propositum mutent. i. That the Christians should not bee let goe, which were once brought to the iudgement seate, except they chaunged their purpose, &c. Euseb. Lib. 5. cap. 21.2. Hatred, partly for that this world of his owne naturall condition hath euer hated and maliced the people of god, from the first beginning of the world. Partly agayne, for that the Christians beyng of a contrary nature and Religion, serueng only the true liuing God, despised their false gods, spake against their idolatrous worshippings, and many tymes stopped the power of Sathan, working in their Idoles. And therefore Sathan the Prince of this world, stirred vp the Romaine Princes & blynd Idolaters to beare the more hatred and spite against them.

Upon these causes and such like, rose vp these malicious slaunders, false surmises, infamous lies & slanderous accusations, of the Heathen idolaters against the Christian seruaunts of God, which incited the Princes of this world the more to persecute them: for what crimes so euer malice could inuent, or rash suspicion could minister, that was imputed to the Christians, as that they were a people incestuous, that in the night in their concourses, puttyng out their candles, they ranne together in all filthy maner, that they killed their owne children, that they vsed to eate mans flesh, that they were seditious and rebellious, that they would not sweare by the fortune & prosperitie of Caesar, that they would not adore the Image of Caesar in the market place, that they were pernicious to the Emperie of Rome. Briefly, whatsoever mishappened to the Citie or Prouinces of Rome, either famine, pestilence, earthquake, warres, wonders, vnseasonablenes of weather, or what other euils soeuer hapned, it was imputed to the Christians, as Iustinus recordeth. Ouer and beside al these, a great occasion that stirred vp the Emperours against the Christians came by one Publius Tarquinius the chiefe Prelate of the idolatrous sacrifices,* and Mamertinus the chiefe gouernour of the Citie, in the tyme of Traianus, who partly with money, partly with sinister and pestilent counsa•e, partly with infamous accusations (as witnesseth Naucerus) incensed the mynde of the Emperour so muche against Gods people.

Also among these other causes abouesaid, crept in some piece of couetousnes withal (as in all other things it doth) in that the wicked promotors and accusers for sucre sake, to haue the possessions of the christians, were the more redy to accuse them to haue the spoyle of their goods.

Thus hast thou (Christian reader) first the causes declared of these persecutions.* 2. The cruell law of their condemnation. 3. Now heare more what was the forme of inquisition, which was (as is witnessed in the second Apologie of Iustinus) to this effect: that they should sweare to declare the truth, whether they were in very deed Christians or not: and if they confessed then by the law the sentence of death proceeded. Iust. Apol. 2.

Neither yet were these tyrants and organes of Sathā thus contented with death onely,* to bereaue the life from the bodye. The kindes of death were diuers, and no lesse horrible then diuers. Whatsoever the cruelnesse of mans inuention could devise for the punishment of mans body, was practised against the Christians (as partly I haue mentioned before, and more appeareth by the Epistle sent from the brethren of France,* hereafter following. Craftie traynes, outcries of enemies, imprisonments, stripes and scourgings, drawings, tearings, stonings, plates of iron layd to them burning hote, deep dungeons, racks, strangling in prisons, the teeth of wild beasts, gridirons, gibbets and gallows, tossing vpon the hornes of Bulls: Moreouer, whē they were thus killed, their bodies laid in heaps, and dogs there left to keep them, that no man might come to bury them, neither would any prayer obtayne them to be interred and buried. Ex Epistola fratrum Viennensium ac Lugdunensium. &c.

And yet notwithstanding for all these continual persecutions,* and horrible punishments, the church of the christians daily increased, deeply rooted in the doctrine of the Apostles,* and of men Apostolicall, and watered plenteously with the bloud of Saintes, as saith Nicephorus. Tib. 3.

Whereof let vs heare the worthy testimony of Iustinus Martyr in his Dialogue with Tripheus: And that none (saith he) can terrifie or remoue vs which beleue in Iesus, Page 38 by this it daily appeareth: for when we are slaine, crucified, cast to wild bestes,* into the fire, or geuen to other torments, yet we goe not from our confession: but contrary, the more crueltie and slaughter is wrought against vs, the mo they be that come to pietie and faith by the name of Iesus: no otherwise then if a man cut the vine tree, the better the branches grow. For the vine tree planted by God and Christ our Sauour, is his people. Haec Iust.

To comprehend the names and number of all the Martyrs that suffered in all these ten persecutions (which are innumerable) as it is vnpossible, so it is hard in such varietie and diuersitie of matter, to keepe such a perfect order and course of yeares and times, that either some be not left out, or that euery one bee reduced into his right place, especially seeing the Authors themselues, whome in this present worke we follow, doe diuersly disagree, both in the tymes, in the names, and also in the kynd of Martyrdome of them that suffered. As for example, where the common reading and opinion of the Church, and the Epistles Decretall doe take Anacletus to succeed after Clement,* next before Euaristus. Contrary Eusebius, Lib. 3. & Lib. 5. cap 6. making no mention of Cletus, but of Anacletus, sayth that Euaristus succeeded next to Clement. Likewise Ruffinus and Epiphanius, speakyng nothyng of Anacletus, make mention of Linus and of Cletus, next before Clement, but say nothing of Anacletus,* whereby it may appeare that Cletus and Anacletus were both one. Sabellicus Aenead. 7. Lib. 2. speaketh of Linus and of Cletus, and sayth that they were ordained helpers vnder Peter, while he laboured in his Apostleship abroad,* and so sayth also Marianus Scotus. Contrary Irenaeus Lib. 3. contra Haeres. speaketh of Anacletus, making no mention of Cletus. Wherby it may appeare by the way, what credite is to be geuen to the Decretall Epistles whom all the latter hystories of the Popes Church do follow in this behalfe, &c. Moreouer, where Antoninus, Vincentius, Iacobus in Supplemento, Symoneta, Aloysius, with other, declare of Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Anacletus, Euaristus, Alexander, bishops of Rome, that they died Martyrs. Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history writing of them, maketh therof no mention.

And first as touching Clement (whom Marianus Scotus calleth the first Bishop of Rome after Peter) they say that he was sent out in banishment of Traianus, beyond Ponticus, with 2000. christians, where he opened to them a welspring, whiche in the wilderness were condemned to the Mines. Afterward being accused to the Emperor, he was throwne into the sea with a Milstone fastened about his necke, and that not long after his body was cast vp & buried (as Platina saith) at the place where the wel was made. Some say it was found first in the dayes of Pope Nicholas the first, Fascicul. tempor. But forasmuch as I finde of his Martyrdome no firme relation in the auncient authors, but onely in such new writers of latter tymes, which are woont to painte out the liues and histories of good men, with fained additions offorged miracles, therefore I count the same of lesse credite, as I do also certaine Decretall Epistles, vntruely (as may seeme) ascribed and intituled to his name. Eusebius in his third booke, writing of Clemens, geueth no more of him, but thus: After he had gouerned the Church of Rome ix. yeares, the sayd Clement left y^e succession thereof to Euaristus.

Of which Euaristus next Bishop of Rome, thus we find in Irenaeus,Lib 3. cap. 3. Peter and Paule (sayth he) cōmitted the charge of that church to Linus. After whom came Anacletus, then succeeded Clemens, next to Clemens followed Euaristus, after whome came Alexander, and then Sixtus the vj. Bishop of Rome after the Apostles. After Sixtus sate Telesphorus, then Higinus, then Pius, then Ani•etus. And when Soter tooke the place after hym, then the xij. Bishop of Rome was Eleutherius. Thus after Clement followed (as is sayd) Euaristus in the second or third yeare of Traianus as sayth Eusebius, or as Nicephorus sayth, the fourth yeare of the sayd Emperour. But howsoever the counte of the yeares stand, little or nothing remayneth of the Actes and Monuments either of this, or of other Bishops of Rome in those dayes. Whereby it may appeare that no great accompt was then made of Romain Bishops in those daies, whose actes and deedes were then either so lightly reputed, or so slenderly committed to history. Notwithstanding certaine Decretal Epistles are remayning, or rather thrust vpon vs in their names, containing in them litle substance of any doctrine, but all together stuffed with lawes, iniunctions, and stately decrees, litle to the purpose, and lesse sauoring of the nature of that time then present. Amongest whō also are nūbred the two epistles of this Euaristus. And when he had geuen these orders, & had made vi. Priestes, two Deacons, and fiue Byshops, for sondry places (sayth the story,) he suffered Martyrdome, but what kinde of death, for what cause he suffred, what constancy he shewed what was the order or conuersation of hys life, is nothing touched, and seemeth therefore the more to be doubted that which our new historyes do say: because the olde auncient writers haue no remembraunce thereof, which otherwise would not haue passed such thinges ouer in silence, if they had bene true.* Agayne, neyther do the authors fully agree in the tyme of hys martyrdome, which Nauclerus witnesseth to be in the last yere of Traianus: but Platina thinketh rather that he suffered vnder. Hadrianus: Fascicul temporum, referreth it to the third yeare of Hadrian, Volateranus, to the begynning of the reigne of Hadrian, Contrary, Eusebius, comming neare to the simple trueth (as seemeth) doth affirme that Euaristus succeeded Clement in the third yeare of Traianus, and so geuing to him .ix. yeares, it should follow thereby that Euaristus deceased the xii. yeare of Trianus.

After whome succeeded next Alexander,* in the gouernaunce of that Church, of whose tyme & death the like discrepance is among the writers, Marianus Scotus, sayth, he was the fourth Byshop from Peter, but that could not be. Some say he was the sixt & some the vii. but they likewise were deceiued.* For the most part all do graunt Sixtus to be the vi. Damasus affirmeth that hee was in the reigne of Traiane. And how can that be, when the sayd Damasus affirmed before that Euaristus hys predecessour suffered in the last yeare of Traiane, and then the Byshopricke stood at least a moneth voyde, except hee meane that the sayd Alexander succeeded Euaristus in the last yeare of Traianus? But then how can that stand with Bede and Marianus Scotus, which say, that he suffered vnder Traianus, or with Otto Frisingensis, which sayth he suffered the fourth yeare of Hadrian, whē he had bene Byshop ten yeares, by the generall consent of most writers?

They which write of the deedes and doynge of thys blessed Byshop, as Bergomensis, Antoninus, Equelinus and such as follow them, declare that he had conuerted a great part of the Senators to the fayth of Christ, amongst whom was Hermes a great man in Rome, whose sonne being dead, Alexander raysed agayne to lyfe, and likewise restored sight to hys mayd being blinde. Hadrian the Emperour then absent hearing this, sent word to Aurelianus gouernour of Rome, to apprehend Alexander, with Euentius and Theodulus,* otherwise called Theodorus, as Platina sayth, hys two Deacons, and Hermes, and to commit them to warde with Quirinus the Tribune: whiche being done as their story recordeth, Alexander inclosed in a diuers prison from Hermes. Notwithstanding by the guiding of an Aungell through three doores w^t three lockes a peece, was brought with candle light to the lodging of Hermes. And so returning to the prison agayne: cured the daughter of Quirinus his keeper, named Balbina. by reason whereof the sayd Quirinus, with his whole houshold were all Baptised, and suffered also for the fayth of Christ.

Thus then sayth the story, about the second yeare of Hadrian, Aurelianus the ruler tooke Alexander the Byshop, with Hermes, hys wife children, and hys whole houshold, to the number of a M, CC.L. and threw them in prison. And not long after the sayd Alexander with Euentius his Deacon, and Hermes and the rest were burned in a fornace, Theodulus an other Deacon of Alexander, seeyng and rebuking the crueltie of the tyrant, suffered also the same Martyrdome.

Quirinus also the same tyme (as sayth Antoninus) hauyng first his tongue cut out,* then his hands and feete, afterward was beheaded and cast to the dogs. Equilinus saith that he was beheaded and cast into Tyber in the raigne of the Emperour Claudius, but that cannot be. Albeit Platina maketh relation but onely of Alexander with his two Deacons aforesayd.* Declaring moreouer, that in the tyme of this Bishop, Saphira of Antioch, and Sabina a Romaine suffred Martyrdome.

Florilegus, the Author of Flores Historiarum, affirmeth that Alexander Byshoppe of Rome was beheaded seuen myles out of Rome, where he lyeth buried, anno. 105. but that agreeth not with the Chronicles aboue recited. Eusebius recordeth of him no more, but that in the third yeare of Hadrian, he ended his life and office, after he had bene bishop ten yeares.

Diuers miracles are reported of this Alexander, in the Canon Legends, and liues of Saintes: which as I deny not but may be true: so because I cannot auouch them by any graue testimony of auncient writers, therefore I dare not affirme them, but dd referre them to the authors & Patrons thereof, where they are founde. Notwithstandyng, whatsoeuer is to be thought of his miracles. this is to bee Page 39 affirmed and not doubted, but that he was a godly & vertuous Bishop.

And as I say of his miracles, the like iudgement also I haue of the ordinaunces both of him and of Euaristus his predecessour testified in the Popes Decrees, by Gratianus, as 93. Dist. cap. Diaconi, where is sayd that Euaristus deuided diuers titles in the Citie of Rome to the Priestes, also ordeined in euery Citie vij. Deacons to associate and assist the bishop in his preaching, both for his defence, and for the witnes of truth. Notwithstāding, if probable coniectures might stand against the authoritie of Gratianus and his decrees, here might be doubted whether this absolute ordination of Priestes was first forbidden by Euaristus, and whether the intitulation of Priestes was first by hym brought in or not: wherein an instance may be geuen to the contrary, that this intitulation seemeth to take his first beginning at the Councell of Chalcedon,* and of Pope Vrbane in the Councell of Placent. In the which Councell of Chalcedon the wordes of the Canon (making no mention of Euaristus at all) doe expressly forbid, that any Ecclesiasticall person eyther Priest or Deacon should be ordayned absolutely, otherwise the imposition of handes without some proper title of the party ordayned, to stād voyde and frustrate. &c. And likewise Vrbane in the counsell of Placentia,* doth decree the same, alledging no name of Euaristus, but the statutes of former Councils.

Moreouer in the time of Euaristus the Church then being vnder terrible persecutions, was deuided in no peculiar Parishes or Cures, wherby any title might rise, but was scattered rather in corners and desertes, where they could best hide themselues. And as the Church of Rome, in those dayes was not deuided into seuerall Parrishes or Cures (as I suppose) so neyther was then any such open or solemne preaching in Churches, that the assistaunce or testimony of vii. Deacons eyther could auayle among the multitude of the Heathen, or els needed amongst the christian secret congregations. Agayne the constitution of vii. Deacons seemeth rather to spring out of the counsell of Neocesaria long after Euaristus,* where it was appoynted that in euery Citie were it neuer so small, there should be vii. Deacons after the rule. And this rule the sayd Councel taketh out of the booke of the Actes of the Apostles, making no word or mentiō of Euaristus at all Dist. 93. but these (as is said) be but onely coniectures, not denying y^t which is commonly receiued, but onely shewing what may bee doubted in their Epistles Decretall.

More vnlike it seemeth to be true that is recorded and reported of Alexander,* that he should be the first founder and finder of holy water mixt with salt, to purge and sanctifie them vpon whom it is sprinckled. The wordes of the Dist. be these: Aquam sale conspersam in populis benedicimus, vt ea cuncti aspersi sanctificentur & purificentur, quod omnibus sacerdotibus faciendū esse mandamus, &c. That is, We blesse water mixt with salte among the people, that all men being sprinckled therewith may be sanctified and purified. And this we commaund all Priests to do,* &c.

The opinion is also, but how true I haue not to affirme, that by him first was ordained, water to bee mixte with wine in the chalice.

Item, that by him was brought in the piece of the Masse Canon,* beginning: Qui pridie, &c. And thus much of these foresayd Bishops of Rome, martired in the dayes of Traian and Hadrian.

The third Persecution.

BEtwene the second Romain persecution and the third, was but one yeare, vnder the Emperour Nerua. After whom succeeded Traianus. And after him followed the third persecution. So the second and the third, are noted of some to be both one, hauing no more difference but one yere betwene them. This Traianus if we looke well vpon his politike and ciuill gauernance, might seeme in comparison of other, a right worthy and commendable Prince. Much familiar with inferiors, and so behauing himself toward his subiectes, as he himselfe would haue y^e Prince to be to him, if he himselfe were a subiect. Also he was noted to be a great obseruer of iustice, in so much that when he ordained any Pretour, geuing to him the sword, he would bid him vse the sword against his enemies in iust causes, and if he him selfe did otherwise then iustice, to vse then his power against him also.* But for all these vertues, toward christian Religion, he was impious and cruel, who caused the third persecution of the Church. In the which persecution Plinie the second, a man learned and famous, seyng the lamentable slaughter of Christians, and moued therewith to pitie, wrote to Traianus of the pitifull persecution: certifiyng him that there were many thousāds of them daily put to death, of which none did any thing contrary to the Romaine lawes worthy persecution, sauing that they vsed to gather together in the morning before day, and sing Hymnes to a certaine God, whom they worshipped, called Christ. In all other their ordinaunces they were godly and honest. Werby the persecution by commaundement of the Emperour, was greatly stayd and diminished. The forme and copy of which Epistle of Plinie I thought here not inconuenient to set downe as followeth.

The Epistle of Plinie an Heathen Philosopher to Traiane the Emperour.

IT is my propertie and maner (my soueraigne,*) to make relation of all those thinges vnto you wherein I doubt. For who can better, either correct my slackenesse, or instruct mine ignorance then you? I was neuer yet present my selfe, at the exaamination and execution of these Christians. And therefore what punishment is to be administred, and how farre, or how to proceede in such Inquisitions, I am plaine ignoraunt, not able to resolue in the matter, whether any difference is to bee had in age and person, whether the young and tender ought to be with like crueltie intreated as the elder and stronger, whether repentance may haue any pardon, or whether it may profite him or not, to denie which hath bene a Christiā, whether the name onely of Christians without other offences, or whether the offences ioyned with the name of a Christian ought to be punished. In the meane season, as touching such Christians as haue bene presented vnto me, I haue kept this order, I haue inquired the second and third time of them, whether they were Christians, manacing them with feare of punishment, and suche as did perseuere, I commaunded to execution. For thus I thought, that what so euer their profession was, yet their stubburnenesse and obstinacie ought to be punished. Whether they were also of the same madnesse, whom because they were Citizens of Rome, I thought to send them backe againe to the Citie. Afterward, in further processe & handling of this matter, as the sect did further spread, so the more cases did thereof ensue.

There was a libell offred to me bearing no name, wherein was contained the names of many which denied themselues to be Christians, contented to doe sacrifice with incense, and wine to the Gods and to your Image (whiche Image I for that purpose caused to be brought) and to blaspheme Christ: whereunto none such as were true Christians in deede could be compelled, and those I did discharge and let goe. Other some confessed that they had bene Christians,* but afterward denied the same, &c. Affirming vnto me the whole summe of that sect or error, to consist in this, that they were woont at certain times appointed, to conuent before day, and to sing certaine Hymnes to one Christ their God, and to confederate among themselues to abstaine from all theft,* murther, and adulterie, to keepe their faith and to defraude no man: which done, then to departe for that time, and afterward to resort againe to take meate in companies together both men and women, one with an other, & yet without any acte of euils.

In the truth whereof to be further certified whether it were so or not,* I caused two maidens to bee laied on the Racke, and with tormentes to bee examined of the same. But finding no other thing in them, but onely lewde and immoderate superstition, I thought to surcease of further inquirie, til tyme that I might be further aduertised in the matter from you, for so the matter seemed vnto me worthy and needefull of aduisement, especially, for the great number of those that were in daunger of your statute. For very many there were of all ages and states, both men & women which then were & more are like hereafter to incurre the same perill of condemnation. For that infection hath crepte not onely in Cities, but Villages also and Boroughs about, which seemeth that it may be staied and reformed For as much as we see in many places that the Temples of our Gods whiche were woont to be desolate, beginne now againe to be frequented, and that they bring sacrifices from euerie parte to be solde, whiche before verie fewe were founde willing to buie them. Whereby it may easilie be coniectured, what multitudes of men may bee amended, if space and tyme bee giuen them, wherein they may be reclaimed.

The Epistle of Traianus to Plinie.

The Acte and Statute my Secundus, concernyng the causes of the Christians whiche ye ought to followe,* ye haue rightlye executed. For no suche generall lawe can be enacted, wherein all speciall cases particularly can be comprehended. Let them not be sought for, but if they be brought and conuicted, then let them suffer execution: So notwithstanding that whosoever shall Page 40 deny himselfe to be a Christian, and that he do it vnfaignedly in open audience, and do sacrifice to our Gods, howsoever he hath bene suspected before, let him be released vpon promise of amendment. Such libels as haue no names, suffice not to any iust crime or accusation, for that should geue both an euill President, neither doth it agree with the example of our tyme.

Tertullian writing vpon this letter of Traianus aboue prefixed, thus saith: O sentence of a confused necessitie: He would not haue them to be sought for as men innocent, & yet causeth them to be punished as persons guilty. And thus the rage of that persecutiō ceased for a tyme, although notwithstanding many naughty disposed men and cruell officers that were, which vpon false pretence to accomlishe their wicked myndes, ceased not to afflict the Christians in diuers prouinces. And especially if any occasiō were geuē neuer so litle for the enemies to take hold, or if any commotion were raised in the Prouinces abroad, by and by the fault was laid vpon the christians. As in Hierusalem after that the emperor Traianus had sent doune his commaundement,* that whosoever could be found of the stocke of Dauid, he should be enquired out and put to death: vpon this Egesippus writing, saith, that certaine sectaries there were of the Iewish nation, that accused Simeon the bishop then of Ierusalem and sonne of Cleophas to come of the stocke of Dauid, and that he was a Christian. Of the which his accusers it happened also (saith the said Egesippus) that certaine of them likewise were apprehended and taken to bee of the stocke of Dauid, and so right iustly were put to execution themselues, which sought the destruction of other. As concerning Simeon the blessed bishop, the foresayd Egesippus thus writeth: That Simeon the lordes nephew, whē he was accused to Attalus the Proconsul, by the malicious sect of the Iewes,* to be of the line of Dauid, & to be a christian, was scourged, during the space of many dayes together, beyng of the age of an hundred and twentie yeres. In which his Martyrdome he indured so constant, that both the Consul and all the multitude did meruaile to see him of that age so constantly to suffer, and so at last being crucified finished his course in the Lord, for whome he suffered, as partly before also is recorded.

In this persecution of Traianus aboue specified, (which Traianus next followed after Nerua) besides the other afore mentioned,* also suffred Phocas bishop of Pontus, whome Traianus because he would not do sacrifice to Neptunus, caused to be cast into an hote Limekilne: and afterward to be put into a skalding bathe, where the constant godly Martyr, in y^e testimony of Christ ended his life, or rather entred into l•e. Anton. Equil. Fascic. temporum.

In the same persecution suffered also Sulpitius and Seruilianus, two Romans.* Whose wiues are sayd to bee Euphrosina and Theodora, whom Sabina did cōuert to the faith of Christ, and after were also Martyred. Of which Sabina Iacobus Philippus author of the booke called Supplementum, reporteth that in the mount of Auentine in Rome, she was beheaded of Clepidus the gouernour, in the dayes of Hadriā. Under whom also suffred Seraphia a virgin of Antioche, as Hermannus witnesseth.

The forenamed authors Anton. and Equilius make mētion moreouer of Nereus and Achilleus, who in this persecution of Traiane, had the crowne of Martyrdom, being put to death at Rome.

Eusebius in his iiij. booke cap. 26. maketh mention of one Sagaris, who about the same tyme suffered Martyrdome in Asia, Seruilius Paulus beyng then Proconsul in that Prouince.

In this persecution beside many other, suffred the blesed Martyr of Christ Ignatius, who vnto this day is had in famous reuerence among very many. This Ignatius was appointed to the bishoprike of Antioch next after Peter in succession. Some do say, that he beyng sent from Syria to Rome,* because he professed Christ, was giuen to the wilde beasts to be deuoured. It is also sayd of him, that when he passed through Asia, being vnder the most straight custody of his garders, he strengthned and confirmed the parishes through all the cities as he went, both with his exhortations and preaching of the word of God: and admonished them especially and before all other things, to beware and shunne those heresies risen vp, and sprong newly among them, and that they should cleaue and sticke fast to the traditiō of the Apostles, which he for their better safeguard, beyng about to denoūce or put in writing, thought it a thing very necessary to trauaile in. And thus when he came to Smyrna, where Polycarpus was, he wrote one epistle to the congregation of Ephesus,* wherin he made mention of Onesimus their Pastor, & an other he wrote to the congregation of Magnesia, beyng at Meandre, wherein also he forgetteth not Dama their Bishop. Also an other he wrote to the congregation of Trallis: the gouernour of which Citie at that time he noteth to be one Polibius. Unto which congregation he made an exhortation, lest they refusing Martyrdome, should loose the hope that they desired.

But it shalbe very requisite that I aledge somewhat thereof to the declaration of this matter.* He wrote therefore as the wordes lye in this sort. From Syria (saith he) euen till I came to Rome had I a battell with beastes, as well by sea, as land, both day & night, being bound in the midst of ten cruell Libardes (that is, the company or band of the souldiers) which, the more benefites that they receaued at my hands, became so much the woorse vnto me. But I being exercised and now wel acquainted with their iniuries, am taught euery day more and more: but hereby am I not yet iustified. And would to God I were once come to y^e beasts, which are prepared for me. Which also I wish with gaping mouthes were ready to come vpon me, whō also I will prouoke that they without delay may deuoure me, and forbear me nothing at all, as those whome before they haue not touched or hurt for feare. And if they wyll not vnlesse they be prouoked, I will then inforce them agaynst my selfe. Pardon me I pray you. How much beneficiall it is to me, I knowe. Now begin I to be a scholer I force or esteeme no visible thinges,* nor yet inuisible thinges, so that I may get or obtaine Christ Iesu. Let the fire, the galowes, the deuouring of wild beastes, the breaking of bones, the pulling a sunder of my members, the broosing or pressing of my whole body, and the tormentes of the deuill or hell it selfe come vpon me, so that I maye winne Christ Iesus.

And these things wrote he from the foresayde Citye, vnto the congregations which we haue recited. And when he was euen now iudged to be throwne to the beastes, he spake for y^e burning desire that he had to suffer,* what tyme he heard the Lyons roaryng: I am the wheat or grayne (sayth he) of Christ, I shall be ground wyth the teeth of wylde beastes, that I may be found pure bread. Hee suffered in the xj. yeare of Traian the Emperour. Haec Eusebius, & Hieronym.

Besides this godly Ignatius, manye thousandes also were put to death in the same persecutiō, as appeareth by the letter of Plinius secundus aboue recited, written vnto the Emperour.

Hierome in his booke intituled De viris illustrib,^{*} maketh mention of one Publius Byshop of Athens, who for the sayth of Christ, the same time during this persecution was put to death and martyred.

Hadrian Emperour.

NExT after this Traianus succeeded Hadriā the Emperor, vnder whom suffered Alexander the Bishop of Rome, with his two Deacons: Euentius and Theodorus: Also Hermes, and Quirinus, with their families, as latly before was declared.

It is signified moreouer in the historyes, y^t in the time of this Hadrian,^{} Zenon a noble man of Rome with ten thousand, two hundreth and three, were slayne for Christ. Henr. de Erfordia, and Bergomensis, Lib. 8. make mention of tenne thousand, in the daies of this Hadrian, to be crucified in the mount Ararath, crowned with crownes of thorne, & thrust into the sides with sharpe Dartes, after the example of the Lordes passion. Whose Captaines (as Antonin us, & Vincentius in spec. histor. declareth (were Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, and Carcerius, &c. Whether this story be y^e same with the other aboue of Zenō,^{} or not, it is doubted. As touching the miracles done, and the speaking of the angell, I referre the certainty therof to Vincentius and such other like authors where mo things seme to be told, then to be true.

There was one Eustachius a Captaine, whom Traianus in tyme past had sent out to warre against the Barbarians. After he had by Gods grace ualiantly subdued his enemies, and now was returning home with victory: Hadrian for ioymeting him in his iourney, to bring him home with triumph, by the way first would do sacrifice to Apollo, for the victory gotten, willing also Eustachius to doe the same with him. But when Eustachius could by no meanes therto be inforced, being brought to Rome, there with his wife and children suffred Martyrdome vnder the foresayd Hadrian. It were a long processe here to recite all the miracles contained or rather suspected in this story of this Eustachius concerning his conuersion and death. How the crucifixe appeared to him betwene the hornes of an Hart. Of the sauing of his wife frō the shipmen. Of one of his sōnes saued from the Lion, the other saued from y^e wolf. Of their miraculous preseruacion from the wild beasts, frō the torments of fire mentioned in Bergomensis, and Vincētius and Page 41 other. All which as I find them in no ancient records, so I leaue them to their authors and compilers of the Legēds.^{*}

We read also of Faustinus and Iobita, citizens of the Citie of Brixia, which suffered Martyrdome with like grievous torments. At the sight wherof, one Calocerius seeing their so great pacience, in so great torments, cried out with these wordes: Verè Magnus Deus Christianorum. That is, verily great is the God of the Christians. Which woordes being heard, forthwith he was apprehended, and being brought to the place of their executiō, was made partaker of their Martyrdome. Ex Ant. Equilin.

^{*}The history of Nicephorus maketh mention of Anthia a godly woman, who committed her sonne Eleutherius to Anicetus bishop of Rome, to be brought vp in the doctrine of Christian faith, who afterward beyng Bishop in Apulia, was there beheaded with his foresayd mother Anthia, Onomast.

Iustus also and Pastor two brethen, with like Martyrdome ended their liues in a citie of Spaine called Gomplutum, vnder the said Hadrian the Emperour.

Likewise Symphorissa the wife of Ge•ulus the Martyr, with her vij. children, is said about the same time to suffer: who first was much, and oft beaten & scourged, afterward was hanged vp by the haire of her head. At last hauing an huge stone fastened vnto her, was throwne headlong into the riuer, & after that her seuen childrē in like maner, with sundry & diuers kindes of punishment diuersly were martyred by the tirants.

The story of M. Hermannus, and Antoninus, and other, report of Sophia,* with her three children also. also of Serapia and Sabina, to suffer vnder the said Emperour, about the yeare of our Lord, 130.

As concerning Alexander bishop of Rome, with his ij. Deacons, also with Hermes, Quirinus, Saphyra, and Sabina▪ Some writers, as Bede, and Marianus Scotus recorde that they suffred vnder Traianus. Others againe, as Otto Frisingensis with like mo, report that they suffred in the iiij. yeare of this Emperour Hadrian, but of these Martyrs sufficiently hath bene sayd before.

While Hadrian the Emperour was at Athens, he purposed to visite the countrey of Eleusina,* and so did: where he sacrificing to the Gentiles Gods, after the maner of the Grecians, had geuen free leaue & libertie, whosoeuer would to persecute the Christians. Whereupon Quadratus a man of no lesse zeale excellent, as of famous learning, being thē Bishop of Athens, and Disciple of the Apostles, or at least succeeding incontinent the age of the Apostles, and following after Publius (who a litle before was martyred for the testimony of Christ) did offer vp and exhibite vnto Hadrian the Emperour, a learned and excellent Apologie in the defence of the Christian Religion. Wherein he declared the Christians without all iust cause or desert, to be so cruelly entreated and persecuted,* &c. The like also did Aristides an other no lesse excellēt Philosopher in Athens, who for his singular learning and eloquence being notified to the emperor, and comming to his presence, there made before him an eloquent Oration. Moreouer, did exhibite vnto the said Emperour a memorable Apologie for the christians, so ful of learning and eloquence, that as Hierome sayth, it was a spectacle and admiration to men in his tyme, that loued to see wit and learning. Ouer and besides these, there was also an other named Serenus Granius a man of great nobility, who likewise did write very pithy & graue letters to Hadrian the Emperour, shewing and declaring therein, to be consonant with no right nor reason, for the bloud of innocents so to be geuen to the rage and fury of the people, and so to be condemned for no fault, onely for the name and sect that they followed.

Thus the goodnes of God being mooued with the prayers and constant labour of these so excellent men, so turned the hart of the Emperour, that he beyng better informed concerning the order & profession of the christians, became more fauorable vnto them. And immediatly vpō the same directed his letters to Minutius Fundanus (as is partly before mencioned) Proconsul of Asia,* willing him frō henceforth to exercise no more such extremitie against the Christians, as to condemne any of them hauing no other crime objected against them but onely their name. The copy of which his letter, because that Iustine in his Apologie doth alleage it, I thought therefore to expresse the same in his owne wordes as followeth.

The letter of Hadrian the Emperour, to Minutius Fundanus.

I Haue receiued an Epistle writen vnto me from Serennius Granianus, our right worthy and welbeloued, whose office you do now execute.* Therefore I thinke it not good to leaue this matter without further aduisement and circumspection to passe, least our subiects be molested, and malicious sycophants boldned and supported in their euill: Wherefore if the subiects of our prouinces, doe bring forth any accusation before the iudge agaynst the Christians, and can prooue the thing they object against them, let them doe the same, and no more, and otherwise for the name onely, not to impeach them, nor to cry out against them. For so, more conuenient it is, that if any man will be an accuser, you to take the accusation quietly, and iudge vpon the same. Therefore, if any shall accuse the Christians, and complaine of them as malefactors, doing contrary to the law, then geue you iudgement according to the qualitie of the crime But notwithstanding who so euer vpō spite and maliciousnes shal commence or cauil against them, see you correct and punish that man, for his vnordinate and malicious dealing.

Thus by the mercifull prouidence of God,* some more quiet and rest was geuen to the Church, although Hermannus thinketh these Alcione dayes did not very long continue, but that the Emperour changing his Edict, began to renue agayne persecution against gods people, albeit this soundeth not to be so by the wordes of Melito in his Apologic to Antoninus hereafter ensuing.* In the meane tyme this is certain, that in the dayes of this Hadrian, the Iewes rebelled agayne & spoyled the country of Palestina. Against whom the Emperour sent Iulius Seuerus, who ouerthrew in Iurie, 50. castels, and burnt and destroyed 980. villages and Tounes, and slue of the Iewes 50. thousand, so that with famine, sickenes, sword, and fire, Iuda was almost desolate. But at length Hadrian the Emperour, which otherwise was named Aelius, repaired and enlarged the Citie agayn of Hierusalem, which was called after his name Aeliopolis, or Aelia Capitolina, the inhabitaunce whereof, he graunted only to the Gentiles, and to the Christians, forbidding the Iewes vtterly not to enter into the Citie.

After the death of Hadrian, who died by bleeding at the nose, succeded Antoninus Pius, about the yeare of our Lord, 140. and raigned 23. yeres.* Who for his clemency and modest behaiour, had the name of Pius, and is for the same in histories commended. His saying was, that he had rather saue one Citizen, then destroy a thousand of his aduersaries. At the beginning of his raigne,* such was the state of the Church, as Hadrian his predecessour had left it, as in which, although there was no Edict set forth to persecute the Christians: yet the tumultuous rage of the Heathen multitude for the causes aboue specified, did not cease to disquiete and afflict the quiet people of God, impu•ing and ascribing to the Christians whatsoever misfortune happened contrary to their desires. Moreouer, inuentynge agaynst them all false crimes and contumelies wherein to accuse them. By reason whereof, diuers there were in sundry places much molested, and some put to death: albeit, as it is to be supposed, not by the consent of the Emperour, who of nature was so mylde and gentle, that either he raysed vp no persecution agaynst the Christians, or els he soone stayed the same beyng mooued. As well may appeare by his letter sent doune to the countreys of Asia, the tenor whereof here insueth.

The Epistle of Antoninus Pius, to the Common of Asia.

EMperour and Caesar,* Aurelius, Antoninus, Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune eleuen tymes, Consull thrise, vnto the commons of Asia greeting.

I am very certayne, that the Gods haue a care of this, that they which be such, shall be known, and not lye hid. For they doe punish them, that will not worship them more then you: which so vexes and trouble them, confirming thereby the opinion which they haue conceaued, and doe conceaue of you, that is, to bee wicked men. For this is their ioy and desire, that when they are accused, rather they couet to dye for their God, then to lyue. Whereby they are Victorers, and doe ouercome you,* geuing rather their lyues, then to bee obedient to you, in doying that which you require of them. And here it shall not be inconuenient to aduertise you of the Earthquakes, which haue, and doe happen among vs, that when at the sight of them you tremble and are afraide, then conferre your case with them. For they vpon a sure confidence of their God, are bolde and fearelesse, much more then you: who in all the tyme of this your ignoraunce, both doe worship other Gods, and neglect the Religion of immortalitie, and such Christians as worship him, them you doe driue out, and persecute them vnto death. Of these and such like matters, many Presidents of our Prouinces, did write to our father of famous memorie heretofore. To whome he directed his aunswere agayne, willing them in no case to molest the Christians, except they were found in some trespasse preiudiciall against the Empire of Rome. Page 42 And to me also many there be, which write, signifiyng their mind in like maner.* To whome I haue aunswered agayne, to the same effect and maner as my father did. Wherefore, if any hereafter shall offer any vexatiō or trouble, to such, hauing no other cause, but onely for that they are such, let him that is appeached, be released and discharged free, yea although he be founde to bee such, (that is a Christian) and let the accuser sustaine the punishment, &c.

This godly Edict of the Emperour was proclaymed at Ephesus, in the publique assēbly of all Asia, wherof Melito also Byshop of Sardis, who florished in the same tyme, maketh mention in his Apologie written in defence of our doctrine to M. Antoninus Verus as hereafter (Christ willing) shall appeare. By this meanes then the tempest of persecution in those daies began to be appeased, through the mercifull prouidence of God, which woulde not haue hys Church vtterly to be ouerthrowne, though hardly yet to growe.

The fourth Persecution.

After the decease of the foresayd quiet and milde Prince Aurelius Antonius Pius (who among all other Emperours of that tyme made the most quiet end, followed his sonne M. Antoninus Verus, with Lucius his brother, about the yeare of our Lord .162. a man of nature more sterne and seuerer. And although in study of Philosophy, & in ciuile gouernement no lesse commendable: yet to ward the Christians sharpe and fierce, by whome was moued the fourth persecution after Nero. In whose tyme a great number of them which truely professed Christ, suffered most cruel tormentes, and punishments,* both in Asia and in Fraunce. In the number of whome was Policarpus, the worthy Bishop of Smyrna. Who in the great rage of this persecution in Asia, among many other most constant Saintes was also Martyred. Of whose end and Martyrdome I thought it here not vnexpedient to cōmit to history, so much as Eusebius declareth to be taken out of a certaine letter or Epistle, written by them of hys owne Church, to the brethren of Pontus the tenor of which Epistle here followeth.

The congregation which is at Smyrna, to the congregation which is at Philomilium,* and to all the congregations throughout Pontus, mercy to you, peace, and the loue of God our father, and of our Lord Iesu Christ, be multiplied, Amen. We haue written vnto you brethren of those men which haue suffred Martyrdome, and of blessed Polycarpus which hath ended and appeased this persecutiō, as it were by the shedding of his own bloud. And in the same epistle, before they enter into farther matter of Polycarpus,* they discourse of other Martyrs, describing what patience they abode and shewed in suffring their torments: which was so great and admirable (saith the Epistle) that the lookers on were amased,* seeing and beholding. how they were so scourged and whipped, that the inward vaynes & arteries appeared, yea euen so much that the very intrailes of their bodies, their bowels and members were seen, & after that, were set vpon sharp shels taken out of the sea, edged, and sharpe,* and certaine nailes and thornes for the Martyrs to go vpon, which were sharpned and pointed called Obelisci. Thus suffred they all kind of punishment and torment that might be deuised: and lastly, were throwne vnto the wild beasts to be deuoured. But especially in the foresayd Epistle, mention is made of one Germanicus, how he most woorthily perseuered and ouercame by the grace of God,* that feare of death which is ingrafted in the common nature of all men, whose notable patience & sufferance was so notable, that the whole multitude wondring at this beloued Martyr of God, for this his so bold constancie, and also for the singular strength and vertue proceeding of the whole multitude of the Christians: began sodenly to cry with a loud voyce, saying: destroy the wicked men, let Polycarpus be sought for. And whilst a great vprore and tumult began thus to be raised vpon those cries: A certaine Phrigian named Quintus,* lately come out of Phrigia, who seyng and abhorring the wilde beasts, and the fierce rage of them, of an ouer light mynd betrayed his own safetie. For so the same letter of him doth report, that he, not reuerently but more malipertly then requisite, was together with others rushed into the iudgement place, and so being takē, was made a manifest example to all the beholders, that no man ought rashly and vnreuerently with such boldnesse, to thrust in himself, to entermeddle in matters, wherewith he hath not to do.

But now we will surcease to speake more of them, and returne to Polycarpus, of whome the foresayd letter consequently declareth as foloweth: How that in y^e beginning, when he heard of these things, was nothing at all afrayd nor disquieted in mynd, but purposed to haue taried stil in the Citie, till beyng perswaded by the intreatie of thē that were about him (which desired him instatly that he would conuey himselfe away) hid himselfe in a grange or village not farre of from the Citie,* and there abidyng with a fewe more in his company, did nothing els (night nor day) but abode in supplication, wherin he made his humble petitiō for the obtaining of peace vnto all y^e congregatiōs through out the world.* For that was his accustomed maner so to doe. And as he was thus making his prayers three dayes before he was apprehended, in a vision by night he saw the bed set on fire vnder his head, and sodainly to be cōsumed. And when he awaked,* he told by and by & expounded vnto them that were present, his vision, and told them before what thing should come to passe, that is, how that in y^e fire he should lose his life for Christes cause. It is further mentioned. that whē they were hard at hand, which so narrowly sought for him, that he was inforced for the affection and loue of his brethren,* to fleet into an other village, to which place notwithstanding within a little while alter the pursuers came, and when they had taken a couple of children that dwelt therabouts, they so beat one of them w^t whips, y^l by the bewraying or confession of him, they were brought to the Inne where Polycarpus was. And they say that the pursuers making no great hast to enter, found him in the vppermost place of the house,* from whence he might haue escaped into other houses, if he would, but this he would not do, saying: the wil of God be done. Furthermore, whē he knew that they were come, as the said history sheweth: he came downe, and spake vnto them with a very chereful and pleasant countenaunce, so that it was a wonder to see those which a while agoe knew not the man, now beholding & viewyng his comely age, and his graue & constant countenaunce, lamented that they had so much employed their labour, that so aged a man should be apprehēded. To conclude, he commaunded that straightway without any delay the •able should be layd for them, and persuaded thē that they would eate and di•e well, and required of them boldly, that he might haue an houres respite to make his prayers.* Which thing after it was graunted, he arose and went to pray, so being replenished which the grace of God, that they which were present, and hearyng the prayers that he made, were astonied at it, and now many of them were sory that so honest and godly an aged man should be put to death.

After this, the foresaid Epistle or letter, prosecuting the historie, addeth more as followeth: After he had made an end of his prayers, & had called to his remēbrance al those things which euer hapned vnto him, and to the vniuersal catholike church throughout all the world (whether they were small or great, glorious or els inglorious) and that the houre was now come in which they ought to set forward, they set him vpon an Asse, and brought him to the Citie vpon a solemne feast day. And there met him Irenarchus Herodes, and his father Nicetes, which causing him to come vp into the chariote where they sate, persuaded him & sayd:* What hurt I pray thee shall come thereof to thee, if thou say (by the way of salutation.) My Lord Caesar, and to do sacrifice, and thus to saue thy selfe? But he at the beginning made them none aunswere. Till that when they inforced him to speake, he sayd: I wil not do as ye counsail me I should. When that they sawe he could not be persuaded, they gaue him very rough language, & of purpose molested him, that in goyng doune the chariot from them, he might hurt or breake his legs. But he forcing very light of the matter, as though he had felt no hurt, went merily and diligently forward, making hast vnto the place appointed. And when there was such vprore in the place of execution,* that he could not be heard but of a very few, there came a voyce from heauen to Polycarpus, as he was going into the Stage or appointed place of iudgement, saying: be of good cheare Polycarpus and play the man. No man there was, which saw him that spake, but very many of vs heard his voyce. And when he was brought in, there was a great noise made by them which vnderstood that Polycarpus was apprehended. The Proconsul asked him whē that he was come,* whether his name was Polycarpus or not, and when he said, yea it was, he gaue him counsail to deny his name, and said vnto him, be good vnto thy selfe, and fauour thyne old age, and many other such like words which they accustome to speake. Sweare saith he, by the Emperours good fortune, looke vpō this matter, say thou with vs: Destroy these naughtie men. Then Polycarpus beholding with constant countenance the whole multitude which was in the place appointed, and geuing a great sigh, looked vp to heauen, saying: Thou, thou it is that wilt destroy these wicked naughty men. And the Proconsul thus being earnestly Page 43 in hand with him, sayd, take thine othe, and I will dyscharge thee, desye Christ, Polycarpus aunswered: fourescore and syxe yeares haue I beene his seruauent,* yet in all this tyme hath he not so much as once hurt me: how then may I speake euill of my king & souereigne Lorde, which hath thus preserued me: Then the Proconsull againe inforced him and sayd: Sweare thou I aduise thee by Caesars prosperity. Polycarpus replieth, if thou require of me this fonde word of vaine boasting,* teyning not to know (as y^u saiest) who I am, I doe thee to wit, that I am a Christian: And if thou desire to know the doctrin of Christianity, appoint a day, & thou shalt heare. Perswade the people to this said the Proconsul: Truly sayth Policarpus, I haue thought it my part, thus to say vnto you, for so much as we are commaunded to giue vnto the gouernours & powers ordayned of God,* the honor meete & due to them, and not hurtfull vnto vs: but as for those I doe iudge them vnworthy, to purge my self vnto them. Hereupon the proconsul stode vp, I haue, saith he, wilde beasts, to whom I will throwe thee, vnles thou take a better way: Whereunto Policarpus answered let thē come: we haue determined with our selues that we will not by repentance turne vs from the better way, to the worse, but rather conuenient it is, that a man turne from the thinges that be euill, to that which is good and iust.* Agayne sayth the Proconsul, I will taine thee with fire, if that thou set not by the wilde beastes, nor yet repent. Then said Policarpus you threaten me with fyre which shal burne for the space of an houre, & shalbe within a litle while after put out & extinguished, but y^u knowest not the fire of the iudgement that is to come and of euerlasting punishment, which is reserued for the wicked & vngodly. But why make you all these delayes, giue me what death soeuer ye lift. These & many other such like thinges being by him spoken, he was so replenished with ioy, and boldnes, and his countenaunce appeared so full of grace & fauour, that not onely he was not troubled with those things which y^r Proconsul spake vnto him, but contrarily the Proconsul himselfe began to be amased and sent for the crier, which in the middle of the stage was commaunded to cry 3. times, Policarpus, hath confessed himself to be a Christian, which wordes of the cryer, were no sooner spoken, but that all the whole multitude both of the Gentiles and Iewes inhabiting at Smyrna, with a vehement rage and loude voice cried. This is that Doctour or teacher of Asia, the father of the Christianes, and the destroyer of our gods, which hath instructed a great nūber that our Gods are not to be worshipped, & after this they crid vnto Philip the gouernour of Asia, and required him that he would let loose the Lion to Policarpus. To whom he made aunswere that he might not so doe, because he had already his praye. Then they cried againe altogether with one voice that he woulde burne Policarpus a liue. For it was requisite that y^r vision which he saw as concerning his pillow or bolster should be fulfilled: which when he had seene burnt, as he was in his prayer, he turned himselfe vnto the faithful sort which were with him, saying by the way of prophecie, it will so come, that I shall be burned a liue. And the Proconsul had no sooner spoken, but it was out of hande performed. For why the multitude by and by brought out of their shops, workehouses, and baynes, woode and other dry matter for that purpose and especially the Iewes were most seruiceable for that matter, after their wōted maner. And thus the pile being layd, and that now hee had put of his garments & vndone his girdel, and was about to pul of his shooes, which he had not done before, for that all the faithfull sort amongst themselues striued (as it were) who should first touch his body at their farewell,* bicause for the good conuersation of his life, yea, from his yonger age, he was had in great estimation of al men. Therefore straightway those instruments which are requisite to such a bonfire, were brought vnto him, & when the would haue nayled him to the stake with yron hoopess, he said, let me alone as I am, for he that hath giuen me strength to suffer and abide the fire, shal also giue power, that without this your prouision of nayles, I shall abide, & stirre not in the midst of this fire or pyle of woode. Which thing when they heard,* they did not nayle him, but bounde him. Therefore when his handes were bounde behinde him, euen as the chiefest Ramme taken out of the flocke, he was sacrificed as an acceptable burnt offering to God saying: O father of thy wel beloued and blessed sonne Iesus Christ, by whom we haue attained the knowledge of thee, the God of aungels and powers, and of euery creature, and of al iust men which liue before thee,* I giue thee thanks, that thou hast vouchsafed to graūt me this day that I may haue my part amongst the number of the Martyrs in the cup of Christ vnto the resurrection of eternall life both of body & soule, through the operation of the holy spirit, among whome I shalbe this day receaued into thy sight for an acceptable sacrifice: & as thou hast prepared, and reueled the same before this time, so thou hast accomplished the same. Which canst not lye, O thou most true God. Wherefore Im lyke case for all things prayse thee, blesse thee, and glorifie thee by our euerlasting Bishop Iesus Christ to whom be glory euermore.*Amen.

And assoone as he had ended this word Amen, and finished his prayer, the tormentors began to kindle the fire, & as the flame flashed out vehemently: we to whom it was giue to discern the same, saw a marueilous matter, which were also to this purpose preserued, that we might shewe the same to other.* For the fier being made like to ar•fe or vaute of a house, and after the maner of a shipmans •yle, filled with wind, compassed about the body of the Martir as with a certaine wall, and he in the middle of the same, not as flesh, that burned, but as gold and siluer whe• it is tried in the fier. And surely we smelt a sauour so swete as if Myrre or some other precious balme had giuen a sent. At the last when those wicked persons sawe y^e hys body could not be consumed by fire, they commaunded one of the tormentors to come vnto him, & thrust him through with his sworde.* Which being done, so great a quantitie of bloude ran out of his body that the fire was quenched therewith, & the whole multitude marueyled that there was so much diuersitie betwene the infidels and the elect, of whom this Policarpus was one, being a Disciple of the Apostles, and a propheticall instructour of our times, and Bishop of the Catholique Church of Smyrna, for what worde soeuer he spake both it was and shalbe accomplished. But the subtil and enuious aduersary, when he saw the worthines of his martirdome, & that his conuersation euen from his yoüger yeares could not be reprovied, and that he was adourned with the crowne of martirdome, and had now obtained that incomparable benefite, gaue in charge, that we should not take & deuide his body. For feare least the remnaunts of the dead corps should be taken away, & so worshipped of the people. Whervpon diuers whispered Niceta the father of Herode, and his brother Dalces in the eare, to admonish the Proconsul, that in no case he should deliuer his body, least (saith he) they leaue Christ & begin to worship him.* And this spake they because the Iewes had gyuen them secret warning & prouoked them thervnto, who also watched vs that we shoulde not take him out of the fire. not being ignoraunt how that we ment, at no time to forsake Christ, which gaue his life for the saluation of the whole world, (as many I meane as are elected to saluatiō by him) neither yet that we could worship any other. For why? him we worship as the sonne of God, but the Martirs do we loue as disciples of the Lord (& that worthely) for their aboundaunt loue towards their king and maister,* of whom we also desire and wish to be companions, & to be made his disciples. Whē therfore the Centurion saw & perceaued the labour of the Iewes, the corps being layd abroad, they burnt the same, as was their maner to doe.

Thus good Policarpus with xij. other that came from Philadelphia,* suffered Martyrdome at Smyrna, which Policarpus specially aboue the rest is had in memory, so that hee in all places among the Gentiles is most famous. And this was the ende of this worthy disciple of the Apostles. Whose hystory the brethren of the congregation at Smyrna, haue wrytten in this their Epistle as is aboue recited.

Iraeneus in his 3. booke against heresies,* the 3. chap. and Eusaebius in his 4. booke, and 14. chap. of his Ecclesiasticall history reporteth this worthy saying of Poticarpus: This Policarpus (sayth hee) meeting at a certeine time Martion, the heretick, who said vnto him, doest thou not know me? made answere, I know that thou art the first begotten of Sathan. So great feare what euil might ensue therof, had the Disciples of the Apostles, that they would not speake to them whom they knew to be the deprauers of the verytie, euen as Paule saith: The hereticke after the first and second admonition, shonne, and auoyd: Knowing that he which is such one, is peruerse or frowarde, and damneth himselfe. This most holy confessor and Martyr of Christ Policarpus,* suffered death in the fourth persecution after Nero, when Marcus Antonius, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus raigned, an. Dom. 167. as Vrsperg. affirmeth, an. 170. as Eusebius witnesseth in his Chronicles the 7. before the Calendes of Februarie.

Of Germanicus mention is made aboue in the storye of Policarpus of whome writeth Eusebius Lib. 4. cap. 15.* notyng him to be a younge man, and most constantly to perseuere in the profession of Christes doctrine, whom whē the Proconsul went about to perswade, to remember his age, and Page 44 to fauor him selfe, being in the floure of his age, he woulde nor be allured: but constātly and boldly, and of his owne accorde incited and prouoked the wild beast to come vpon him, and to deuour him, to be deliuerd more spedely out of this wretched life. Haec Eusebius, an, 170.

Thus haue you heard out of the Epistle of the brethren of Smyrna, the whole order and li•e of Policarpus, wherby it may appeare that he was a very aged mā who had serued Christ, lxxxvj. yeares since the first knowledge of him, and serued also in the ministry about the space of 70. yeares. This Policarpus was the schooler and hearer of Iohn the Euangelist, and was placed by the sayde Iohn in Smyrna. Of him also Ignatius maketh mention in his Epistle which he wrote in his iourney to Rome, going toward his martyrdome, and commended to him the gouernement of hys Church at Antioch, whereby it appeareth that Policarpus then was in y^r ministry. Likewise Irenaues writeth of the sayd Policarpus after this maner.* He alwaies taught (sayd he) those things which he learned of the Apostles, leauing them to the Church, and are onely true. Wherevnto also at the Churches that be in Asia, and all they which succeeded after Policarpus to this day beareth witnes, And the same Irenaues witnesseth also that the sayd Policarpus wrote an Epistle to the Phillipians,* which whether it be the same that is now extant and read in the name of Policarpus, it is doubted of some: notwithstanding in the sayd Epistle diuers things are founde very wholesome and Apostolicke: as where he teacheth of Christ, of iudgement and of the resurrection. Also he writeth of faith very worthily, thus declaryng that by grace we are saued,* and not by works, but in the will of God by Iesus Christ.

In Eusebius we reade in like maner a part of an Epistle written by Irenaues to Florinus,* wherein is declared how that the said Irenaues being yet yong, was with Policarpus in Asia: at what time he saw & well remembred, what Policarpus did, and the place where he sat teaching, his who•e order of life and proportion of his body, with the sermons & wordes which he said to the people. And furthermore, he perfectly remembred howe that the saide Policarpus often times reported vnto him those thinges which hee learned and heard them speake of the Lord,* his dooinges, power, and doctrine, who heard the worde of life with their owne eares, all which were more consonant and agreeable to the holy Scripture. Thus with much more hath Irenaues, concerning Policarpus.*

Hierome also writing of the same Policarpus, hath howe he was in great estimation throughout all Asia, for that he was scholer to the Apostles and to them which did see and were conuersant with Christ himselfe, whereby it is to be coniectured his authority to be much not onely with them of his owne Church, but wyth all other Churches about him.

Ouer and besides, it is witnessed by the sayd Irenaeus, that Policarpus came to Rome in the time of Anicetus Byshop of Rome about the yere of our Lord. 157. in y^r raigne of Antoninus Pius, whose cause of his comming thether appeareth to be about the controuersie of Easterday: wherein the Asians and the Romanes somthing disagreed amonge thēselues. And therefore the said Policarpus in the behalfe of the brethren and Church of Asia, tooke his long iourneye thether to come and conferre with Anicetus. Wherof wryteth also Nicephorus Lib. 4. declaring that Policarpus and Anicetus, something varied in opinions and iudgement about that mater. And that notwithstanding, yet both frēdly communicated either with the other. insomuch that Anicetus in his Church gaue place to Policarpus to minister the Communion and Sacrament of the Lordes Supper for honour sake, which may be a notable testimony now to vs, that the doctrine concerning the free vse and liberty of ceremonies, was at that time retained in the church without any offence of stomacke, or breach of Christian peace in the Church.

This Policarpus (as is aboue mentioned) suffered his Martyrdome euen in his owne Church at Smyrna, where he had laboured so many yeares in planting of the Gospel of Christ, which was about the yeare of our Lorde 170. as Eusebius rekoneth in his Chronicle, and in the 7. yeare of Antoninus Verus his raigne:* wherby it appeareth that Socrates in Historia tripartita was much deceaued saying that Policarpus suffered in the time of Gordianus.

In this fourth persecution beside Policarpus and other mentioned before, we read also in Eusebius of diuers other, who at the same time likewise did suffer at Smyrna.

Ouer and besides in the said persecution suffered moreouer Metrodorus a ministr: who was giuen to the fier, & so consumed. An other was worthy Pionius, which after much boldnes of speeche, with his Apologies exhibited, & his sermons made to the people in the defence of christian sayth, and after much reheuyng and comforting of such as were in prisons, and otherwise discōforted, at last was put to cruell torments and afflictions, then giuen likewise to the fire, so finished his blessed martyrdome.

After these also suffered Carpus Papyrus, and Agathonica, a woman who after their most constaunt and worthy confessions were put to death at Pergamopolis in Asia, witnessing Eusebius Lib. 4, cap 7.

And as these suffered to in Asia, so in Rome suffered Felicitas with her 7,* children, who vnder this M. Antoninus Verus, sustayned also the cruelty of this persecution. The names of whose children Bergomensis and other histories doe thus recite, Ianuarius. Felix, Philippe, Siluanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis. Of whom her first and eldest sonne Ianuarius after he was whipped and scourged with roddes, was prest to death with leaden waightes. Felix and Phillippe had their braynes beaten out with maules. Siluanus was cast downe headlong, and had his necke broken. Furthermore, Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis was beheaded. Last of all Felicitas the mother (otherwise then the accustomed maner was, for such as hadde borne Children) was slayne with the sword. Ex Supplem.

In the rage of this fourth persecution, vnder the raigne of Antonius Pius,* suffered also good Iustinus, a man in learning and Philosophy excellent, & a great defender of Christian Religion. Who first exhibited unto the Emperour & to the Senate, a booke or Apologie in the defence of the Christians,* and afterward himselfe also dyed a Martyr. Of whom in the history of Euseb. Lib. 4. cap. 16. it is thus recorded: That about what tyme, or a little before that Polycarpus with other diuers Sainctes suffered Martyrdome in Pargamopolis, a Cittie of Asia, this Iustinus (as is aforesayd) pre•ented a booke in defence of our doctrine to the Emperour, to wit vnto Antonius, and to the Senate. After which he was also crowned with like Martyrdome vnto those, whome he in his booke had defended, through the malicious meanes, and crafty circumuention of Crescens.

This Crescens was a Philosopher confirming hys lyfe and maners to the Cynical sect,* whom for because this Iustinus had reproofed in open audience, and had borne away the victory of the trueth which he defended, he therefore as much as in him lay, did worke & procure vnto him this crowne of Martyrdome. And this did also Iustine him selfe a Philosopher, no lesse famous by hys profession, foresee and declare in hys foresayd Apology, telling almost all those thinges before hand which should happen vnto him, by these words saying: And I looke after this good turne, that I be slayne goyng by the way, eyther of some of those whom I haue named, and to haue my braynes beaten out with a bat, or els of Crescens, whom I cannot call a Phylosopher, but rather a vayne boaster. For it is not conuenient to call him a Philosopher, whiche openly professeth thinges to him vnknowne, and whereof he hath no skil, saying and reporting of vs, that the Christians be vngodly & irreligious: And all to please and flatter them, which are reduced by errorr.

For whether he obieteth against vs the doctrine of the Christians whiche he hath not read,* yet is he very malicious, and worse then the vnlearned ideotes, who for the most part vse not to dispute or iudge of thinges they know not, and to beare witnes of the fame. Or put case that he had read them, yet vnderstandeth he not the maiestie of the matters therein contained, or if peradventure he vnderstandeth them, and doth it for thys purpose, that he would not be counted as one of them: then is he so much the more wicked and malicious, and the bondslaue of vyle & beastly both fame and feare. For this I testifie of him, geuing you truely to vnderstand that for a truth,* which I declare vnto you, how that I haue apposed him, and haue put vnto him many questions, whereby I know and perceaue, that he vnderstandeth nothing. But if so be that this our disputatiō with him, hath not come vnto your eares, I am ready to communicate vnto you agayn those questions which I demaunded of him,* whiche things shall not be vnfit for your Princely honour to heare. But if ye knowe and vnderstand both what thinges I haue examined him of, as also what aunswere he hath made, it shal be apparant vnto you, that he is altogether ignoraunt of our doctrine and learning, or els if he knoweth the same, he dare not vtter it for feare of hys auditors, which thing, as I sayd before, is a prooffe that he is no Philosopher, but a slaue to vayne glory, which maketh none accompt of that, which his own Mayster Socrates had in so great estimation. And thus much of Iustine, out of Iustine himselfe.

Now to verifie that, which Iustine here of him selfe doth prophecie, that Crescens would and did procure his death, Page 45Tacianus (a man brought vp of a childe in the institutions of the Gentiles,* and obtayned in the same not a little fame, and which also left behinde him many good monumentes and Commentaries) writeth in hys booke agaynst y^e Gentiles in this sort: And Iustine sayth he, that most excellent learned man, full well spake and vttered his minde, that the afore recited men were lyke vnto theeues or lyers by y^e high way side. And in the sayd book speaking afterward of certaine Philosophers, the sayd Tacianus inferreth thus: Crescens therefore (sayth he) when he came first into that great Cittie, passed all other in the vicious loue of children, and was very much geuen to couetousnes, and where he taught that men ought not to regard death, he himself doth feare death, that he did all his indeuour to oppresse Iustine with death, as with the most greatest euill that was, and all because that Iustine speaking trueth, reproued the Philosophers to be men onely for the belly and deceauers,* and this was the cause of Iustines Martyrdome. Hierome in his Ecclesiasticall Catalogue thus writeth: Iustine when in the Cittie of Rome he had his disputations, and had reproued Crescens the Cinike, for a great blasphemer of the Christians: for a bellygod and a man fearing death, and also a follower of lust and lechery:* at the last by his indeuour and conspiracie was accused to be a Christian, and for Christ shed his bloud in the yeare of our Lord. 154. vnder Marcus Antonius, as the Cronicles doe witnes, Abb Vrsperg: and Eusebius in his Cronicle in the xiii. yeare of the Emperour Antoninus.

Among these aboue recited is also to be numbred Praxedis a blessed virgine, the daughter of a Citizen of Rome, who in the tyme of Anicetus there Byshop, was so brought vp in the doctrine of Christ, and so affected to hys religion, that she with her sister Potentiana, bestowed all her patrimony vpon the relieuing of poore Christians, geuing all her time to fasting and prayer, and to the burryng of y^e bodyes of the Martyrs. And after she had made free all her famelie with her seruauntes, after the death of her sister, she also departed and was buried in peace.

Under the same Antoninus also suffered Ptolomeus, and Lucius for the confession of Christ, in a Cittie of Egipt called Alexandria,* whose history because it is described in the Apology of Iustinus Martyr, I thought therefore so to set forth the same, as it is alledged in Eusebius, declaring the manner and occasion therof. Lib. 4 cap. 17. in wordes and effect as followeth, &c.

*There was (sayth he) a certayne woman maryed vnto a husband, who was geuen much to laciuiusnes, whereunto she her selfe in tymes past was also addict. But she afterward being instructed in the Christian religion, became chaste her self and also perswaded her husband to liue chastly: often times telling him that it was written in the preceptes of the Christians, that they should be punished eternally, which liued not chastely and iustly in this life. But he still continuing in his filthines, thereby caused his wife to estraunge her selfe from his company. For why? the woman thought it not conuenient to continue in her husbandes company, which contemning the lawe of nature, sought otherwise to satisfie hys filthy appetite. Therefore she was purposed to be deuorced frō him. But her neighbours and kinsfolkes prouoked her, by promising hys amendment, to keepe company agayne with hym, and so she did. But he after this, tooke hys iourney into Alexandria and when it was shewed her, that there hee liued more licenciously, then at any time before, for that she would not be counted partaker of his incestuous lyfe by coupling her selfe any longer with him, she gaue him a letter of diuorce, & so departed frō him. Then her husbād, who ought rather to haue reioyced to haue so honost and chaste a wife, which not onely would not commit any dishonest thing her selfe, but also could not abide any lewde or misordered behauour in her husband, and that by this her seperation shee went about to reclayme hym from hys incest and wickednes to better amendment of lyfe: He in recompence to hys wyfe agayne, accused her to be a Christian, whiche at that tyme was no lesse then death. Whereupon she being in great perill and daunger deliuered vp vnto the Emperour (as Iustinus in his Apology writing to the Emperour him selfe declareth) a supplication, desiring and crauing of hys maiesty, first to graunt her so much licence as to set her familie in order, and that done, afterward to come agayne & make aunswere to all that might or should be layd agaynst her: whereunto the Emperour condescended. Then her husband seing that he could haue no vantage agaynst her deuised w^t himselfe, how he might bring Ptolomeus (which was her instructor in the fayth of Christ) in trouble and accusation: vsing the meanes of a certayne Centurion who was hys very frend, whom he perswaded to examine Ptolomeus whether he were a Christian or not. Ptolomeus (as one y^e loued the trueth, & not thinking good to hide hys profession) confessed no lesse then to the examinour, openly declaring that he had (as truth was) taught and professed the veritie of Christian doctrine. For who so denyeth him selfe to be that he is, eyther cōdemneth in denying that thing that he is, or maketh himselfe vnworthy of that, the confession whereof he flyeth, whiche thing is neuer found in a true and sincere Christian. Thus thē he being brought before Vrbicius the iudge and by him condemned to suffer: One Lucius being also a Christian, standing by, and seing the wrong iudgement, and hasty sentence of the Iudge, sayd to Vrbicius: what reason, I pray you or equitie is this, that this man, who neyther is adulterer, nor fornicator, nor homicide, nor fealon, neyther hath committed any such crime, wherein hee may be charged, thus is condemned onely for hys name and confession of a Christian. This cōdemnation and these maner of Iudgementes (O Vrbici) are neither seemely for the vertuous Emperour, nor to the Philosopher hys sonne, nor yet for the estate of hys Senate of Rome.

Which wordes being heard, Vrbicius making no farther examination of the matter,* sayd vnto Lucius: me thinketh thou art also a Christian. And when Lucius had geuen him to vnderstand that he was also a Christian, the Iudge without further delay commaunded him to be had away to the place of execution. To whom he aunswered: I thanke you with al my hart,* that you release me from most wicked gouernours, and send me vnto my good and most louing father, being also the king of all Gods. And in like maner the third man also, comming vnto him, and vsing the like libertie of speeche,* had also the like sentence of death and condemnation, and crowned also with the same crowne of Martyrdome. And thus much out of the Apology of Iustinus, by the which story it may appeare not to be true, that Gratianus attributeth vnto Higynus Byshop of Rome,* the deciding of causes matrimoniall, seeing that in Iustinus tyme (who was in the same age of Higynus) the deuorcement of this woman in this history aboue touched, was not decided by any Ecclesiasticall law, or brought before any Byshop, but was brought before a Heathen Prince, and determined by the law ciuill.

Henricus de Erfordia recordeth out of the Martyrologe of Isuardus,* of one Concordus a minister of the Citie of Spolete, who in the reigne of this Antoninus Verus, because he would not sacrifice vnto Iupiter, but did spit in the face of the Idole,* after diuers and sundry punishments sustaynd, at last with the sword was beheaded. Vincentius in hys x. booke, chap. 108. reciteth a long story of his actes and life, wherof some part perhappes may seeme tollerable. But this verily appeareth to be false and fabulous, concerning the water flowing besides his sepulchre in the forenamed Cittie of Spolete, vnto the whiche water was geuen (sayth Vincentius) by the vertue of hym,* for whose name hee suffered, to restore sight to the blinde, to heale the sicke, and to cast out deuils. &c. Which kinde of vertue to open the eyes of the blinde, and to expell deuils, neither doth God geue to any creature of water, neither is it like that Concordius the blessed Martyr did or would require any such thing at the handes of God.*

Isuardus and Bede, Vincentius, and Henricus de Erfordia, with other authors moe, make relation of diuers other Martyrs that by sondry kindes of tormentes were put to death,* vnder the foresayd Antoninus Verus: the names of whome be Simmetrius, Florellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipodus, Victor, Corona, Marcellus, Valerianus. The cause or whose Martyrdome was the reprehending of Idolatry and because at the Emperours cōmandement, they would not sacrifice to Idols. Many sortes of punishmentes and of miracles are tolde of them, but at length the end of them all is this, that they were beheaded. Whereby it may be the more suspected, the histories of these writers not to be certayne or true, aswell touching these, as also other Martyrs, as may appeare in Vincentius, in Petrus de Natalibus, & other authors of like sort. In which authors they which list to read more of their miracles, there may finde them.

A little before, pag 41 mention was made of Symphorissa, otherwise named Symphorosa, wife of Getulus, with her vii. sonnes. This Getulus or Getulius, was a minister or a teacher (as witnesseth Martyrol. Adonis) in the Cittie of Tyber, which Getulus with Cerealis, Amantius, and Primitiuus, by the commaundement of Adria were condemned to the fire, wherein they were Martyred and put to death. The names moreouer of the seuen sonnes of this Symphorosa, I finde to be Crescens, Iulianus, Nemesius, Primitiuus, Iustinus Statteus, and Eugenius, whom the Chronicle of Ado declareth to be put to death at the commaundement of Hadrian, Page 46 being fastened to viij. stakes, and so racked vp wyth a pulley,* and at last were thrust through, Crescens in the necke, Iulianus in the brest, Nemesius in the hart, Primitiuus about the nauell, Iustinus cut in euery ioynte of his bodye, Stateus run through with speares, Eugenius cut a sonder frō the brest to the lower partes, and then cast into a deepe pyt, hauyng the name by the Idolatrous Priestes, intituled Ad septem Biothanatos. After the martirdome of whō also Symphorosa the mother did likewise suffer, as is before declared.

Under the sayd Antoninus Verus, and in the same persecution, which raged not in Rome and Asia onely,* but in other countryes also, suffered the glorious & most cōstant Martirs of Lyons and Uienna, two Cities in Fraunce, gyuing to Christ a glorious testimony, & to all Christian men a spectacle, or example of singular constancie, and fortitude in Christ our sauour. The history of whom, because it is written and set forth by their owne Churches, where they did suffer, mentioned in Euseb. Lib. 5. cap. 2. I thought here to expresse the same in the forme and effecte of their owne wordes, as there is to be seene. The title of which their Epistle written to the brethren of Asia and Phrigia thus beginneth.

 The seruauntes of Christ inhabiting the Cities of Vienna and Lyons, to the brethren in Asia and Phrigia, hauing the same faith and hope of redemption with vs: peace, and grace, and glory, from God the father, and from Iesus Christ our Lorde.

*The greatnes of this our tribulation, the furious rage of the Gentiles against vs, & the tormentes which the blessed martyrs suffered, neither can we in wordes, nor yet in writing exactly, as they deserue, set forth. For the aduersary with all his force gaue his endeour to the working of such preparatiues, as he himselfe listed, against his tyrannous comming, & in euery place practised he and instructed his ministers, how in most spitefull maner to set them against the seruantes of God: so that not onely in our houses shoppes and markets we were restrained, but also were vniuersally cōmaunded, that none (so hardy) should be sene in any place. But God hath alwaies mercy in store and tooke out of their hands such as were weake amongst them, and other some did he set vp as firme and immoueable pillers, which by sufferance were able to abide all violent force, and valiantly to withstand the enemie, induring all their opprobrious punishment they could devise: to cōclude, they fought this battell for that intent to come vnto Christ, esteeming their great troubles but as light: therby shewing that al that may be suffered in this present life, is not able to counteruayle the great glorye which shall be shewed vpō vs after this life. And first they patiently suffered whatsoeuer the multitude of frantike people running vpon head did vnto them, as railings, scourgings, drawynges and hailings, flynging of stones, imprisoninges, & what other thing soeuer the rage of the multitude are wōt to vse and practise against their professed enemies. Then afterwarde they being led into the marked place, and there iudged of the Captayne and rest of the Potentates of the Citie, after their confession made openly before the multitude were commaunded againe to prisō, vntil the returne of their chiefe gouernor. After this they being brought before him, and he vsing all extremity that possibly he might against them: * One Vetius Epagathus, one of the brethren, replenished with feruent zeale, both towards god and his brethren (whose conuersation, although he were a young man was counted as perfect, as was the life of Zachary the Priest, for he walked diligently in al the commaundements and iustifications of the Lord, and in all obedience towards his brethren blamles) he hauing within him the feruent zeale of loue, and spirit of god, could not suffer that wicked iudgement which was giuen vpon the Christians but being vehemently displeased, desired that the Iudge woulde heare the excuse which he was minded to make in the behalfe of the christians, in whom saith he is no impietie founde, But the people cryed againe to those that were assistentes w^t the chiefe Iustice, that it might not be so (for indede he was a noble man borne) neither did the Iustice graunt him his lawfull request, but onely asked him whether he himselfe were a Christian or not. And he immediatly with a loude and boulde voice, * answered and sayde, I am a Christian. And thus was he receiued into the felowship of the martirs, and called the aduocate of the Christians. And he hauing the spirite of God more plentifully in time, then had Zachary, the abundaunce thereof he declared, in that he gaue his life in the defence of his brethren, being a true disciple of Christ, following the Lamb whersoever he goeth.

By this mans example the rest of the Martirs were the more animated to martirdome, and made more ioious with al courage of mind to accomplish the same. Some other there were vnready and not so well prepared, * and as yet weak, not well able to beare the vehemency of so great conflict: of whom x. there were in number, that faynted, ministring to vs much heauines & lamentation. Who by their example caused the rest which were not yet apprehēded, to be lesse willing thereunto. Then were we all for the variablenes of confession not a litle astonied: not y^t we feared the punishment intended against vs, but rather as hauing respect to the ende, and fearing least any shoulde fal. Euery day there were apprehended such as were worthy to fulful the number of them which were fallen. In so much that of two churches, such as were chieftest, & which were the principall gouernors of our Churches were apprehended. With these also certeine of the Ethnicks, being our men seruaunts, were apprehended (for so the gouernour commaunded, that all of vs ingenerall without any respect, should be taken) which seruants being ouercome by Sathan, and fearing the torments which they saw the Saintes doe suffer, being also compelled thereunto by the meanes of the souldiers, fained against vs that we kept the feastinges of Thiestes,* and incest of Oedipus, and many such other crimes, which are neither to be remembred, nor named of vs, nor yet to bee thought that euer any man would commit the like.

These things being now bruted abroad, euery man began to shewe crueltie against vs, insomuch that those which before for familiarities sake were more gentle toward vs,* now vehemently disdained vs, and waxed mad against vs. And thus was now fulfilled that, which was spoken by Christ, saying, the time will come that whosoever killeth you, shall thinke that he doth God great good seruice. Thē suffered the Martirs of God such bitter persecution as is passing to be tolde: Sathan still shooting at this marke, to make them to vtter some blasphemy by all meanes possible. Marueilous therefore was the rage both of the people & Prince, specially against one Sanctus, which was Deacon of the congregation of Uienna, and agaynst Maturus, being but a litle before baptised, but yet a worthy souldiour of Christ, and also against Attalus, being borne in Pergama, which was the foundation and pyller of that congregation, and also against Blandina, by whome Christ sheweth, that those things which the world esteemed vyle and abiect, to be glorious in Gods sight, for the very loue which in hart and deede they beare vnto him, not in outward face onely. For when all we were afrayd, & specially her mistres in flesh, who also was her selfe one of the nūber of the foresayd martirs, least happely for the weakenes of body she would not stande strongly to her confession, the foresaid Blandina was so replenished with strength & boldnes,* that they which had the tormenting of her by course from morning to night, for very werines gaue ouer & fell downe, & were themselues ouercome, confessing that they could do no more against her, & marueiled that yet she liued hauing her body so torne and rent. And testified that any one of those torments alone without any moe had ben inough to haue plucke the life from her body. But that blessed woman, fighting this worthy battell, became strōger & stronger, & as often as she spake these words) I am a Christian, neither haue we committed any euill) it was to her a marueilous comfort and bolding to abide the torments.

Sanctus also another of the Martyrs,* who in the midst of his tormentes, induring more paines, then the nature of a man might away with, also at what time y^e wicked supposed, to haue heard him vtter some blasphemous words, for the greatnes & intollerablenes of his torments & paines, that he was in, abode notwithstanding in such constancy of mind,* that neither he told them his name, nor what countryman he was, nor in what Citie brought vp, neither whether he was a free man or a seruaunt, but vnto euery question y^t was asked him, he aunswered in the Latine tounge, I am a Christian, and this was al that he confessed both of his name, citie, kinred, and all other thinges in the place of execution, neither yet could the Gentils, get any more of him: whereupon both the Gouernour & tormentours, were the more vehemently bent against him. And when they had nothing to vexe him with all, they clapped plates of Brasse red hote, to y^e most tenderest parts of his body, wherewith his body indede being schorched, yet he neuer shronke for the matter, but was bold and constant, in his confession,* being strengthened and moystened with the fountaine of liuely water, flowing out of Christs side. Truely his body was a sufficient witnes, what torments Page 47 he suffered for it was all drawne together and most pitifully wounded and scoarched, so that it had therwith lost the proper shape of a man, in whose suffering Christ obtained inspeakeable glory, for that he ouercame his aduersa•y, and to the instruction of other declared, that nothing els is terrible, or ought to be feared where the loue of God is, nor nothing greeuous, wherein the glory of Christ is manifested.

And when those wicked men, began after a certayne time againe to torment the Martyr, & hoped well to bring it to passe, that either they should ouercome him in causing him to recant, by rei•erating his torments, now whē his body was so sore & swollen, that he might not suffer a man to touch him with his hande, or els that if hee died vnder their handes,* yet that thereby they should strike such feare into the harts of the rest, to cause them to deny Christ. But they were not only disappointed here in, but also contrary to the expectation of men, his bodye was in the latter punishment & torments soupled & restored, and toke the fyrst shape and vse of the members of the same, so that the same his second torment was by the grace of Christ (in steede of punishment) a safe medecine.

Also Sathan now thinking to haue setteled himselfe in the hart of one Byblides, being one of them which had denied Christ,* and thinking to haue caused her, beyng a weake and feable woman in faith, to haue damned her soule, in blaspheming the name of God, brought her to the place of execution: inforcing to wrest some wicked thing out of the mouth of the Christians. But she in middle of her torments, returning to her selfe, and waked as it were out of her dead slepe, by that temporall paine, called to her remembraunce the paynes of hell fire, and against all mens expectations reuiled the tormentors, saying. How should we Christians eate young infants (as ye reported of vs) for whom it is not lawfull to eate the bloud of any beast▪ Upon that so soone as she had confessed her selfe to bee a Christian, she was Martyred with the rest. Thus when Christ had ended those tyrannicall torments, by the patience & sufferance of our Saintes, the diuell yet inuented other engynes and instruments. For when the Christians were cast into prison,* they were shut vp in darke and ougly dongeons, and were drawne by the feete, in a racke or ingine made for that purpose, euen vnto the fift hole. And many other such punishmentes suffered they which the furious ministers stirred vp with deuilish furye, are wont to put men vnto: so that very manye of them were strangled & killed in the prisons, whom the Lorde in thys maner would haue to enioy euerlasting life, & set forth his glory. And surely these good men were so pittifully tormented, that and if they had had all the helpe, & medicines in the world, it was thought impossible for them to lyue, & to be restored. And thus they remaining in prison destitute of al humaine helpe, were so strengthened of the Lord, and both in body and minde confirmed, that they comforted & stirred vp the myndes of the rest,* the yonger sor•e of them, whiche were latter apprehended, & put in prison, whose bodies had not yet felt y^e lash of y^r whip, were not able to in•dure y^e sharpness of their imprisonment, but died of y^e same.

The blessed Photinus, who was a Deacon to the bishop of Lyons, about. 90. yeares old, and a very feeble or weake man, & could scarcely draw breath for the imbecilitie of his body: yet was he of a liuely courage & spirit. For the great desire he had of martyrdome, when he was brought vnto the iudgement seate: although his bodye was feeble and weake, both because of his old age, and also through sicknes, yet was his soule or life preserued to this purpose, that by the same Christ might triumph & be glorified. He, being by the souldiers brought to the place of iudgement, many Citizens & men of great ability following him, and the whole multitude cried vpon him diuersly, as though he had beene Christ himselfe, gaue a good testimony. For being demaunded of the chiefe ruler, what was the Christian mans God, he aunswered: If thou be worthy to know thou shalt know. He being with these words somewhat neere touched, caused him to be very sore beaten. For those that stood next him, did him all the spit & displeasure y^t they could both with hand and foote, hauing no regarde at all to his olde age or white heares. And they which were further of, whatsoeuer came next to hande, they threwe at him, & euery man thought y^t he did very wickedly reframe that withheld his hande from not doing the like. For by this meanes they thought that they did reuenge the quarell of their Gods. Photinus, now euen as it were gasping after life, was throwen into prison, and within two daies after dyed.

And here is the mighty prouidence of God, and the inspeakable mercy of Iesus Christ declared, which prouidence being assured amongst a fraternity, is neuer destitute of the aide of Iesus Christ. For those which in theyr first persecution denied Christ, they also were put in pryson, and made pertakers of the others affliction. Neither yet did it any whit at all at that time helpe them that had demed Christ, but they which confessed him, were imprisoned as christians, neither was there any other crime ob'jected against them, but the other sort taken like homicides and wicked doers, were layd hand on, and had double more punishment then the others had.* These mē were refreshed with the ioy of martyrdome, the hope • Gods promises, the loue toward Christ, and the spirite of God: The other their consciences accused them, & that very sore in so much that by their ga•e, their countenances bewra•ed vnto the rest their gi••ie consciences. For the Christians went forth hauing cheerefull co•ntenaunces, very much adourned with glory and grace, insomuch that the verye bondes wherewith they were dyed, set them out are men in seemely apparel: and like as brides when they be decked in gorgeous and gay garments, and therewithal laud•ed as of the redolent smell of Christ, so that it might be suppo•ed them to be annointed with some sweete ba••e: whereas the other were doubtfull and 〈...〉, filled, w^t al shame, and furthermore related of the Gentils themselues, as wretches, degenerate, hauing the crime of 〈◇〉 and dest•u• of the most precious, glo•ious, and likely calling o• the Christian name. And truly by th•se lightes the rest were confirmed, & being apprehended, conf••ing christ without any 〈◇〉, no• hauing so much as y^e thought of any such 〈...〉 of 〈◇〉. And in the same Epistle of the foresayd brethren of Fraunce, writing to the brethren of Asia, it followeth in this maner, After these things done, the Martirdome of these holy Sai•ts were deuie•d diuers•y. into diuers kindes and formes, as the offering to God the Father a garland decked with diuers and sundry kinds of colours and 〈◇〉. For it so behoued the wor•hy Champions of God, after they had suffered diuers kindes of torments, and so winning a triumphaunt victory to obtaine great reward of immortalitie.

Then Maturus Blandina, and Attalus together were brought to the cōmon 〈◇〉, there in the face of the people to be cast & deuoured of the beasts. And Maturus with Sanctus being brought y^e second time to the scaffold, suffered againe all kinde of torments, as though hetherto they had suffered nothing at all, yea rather as though y^e aduersarye being oftentimes put to the worst, they as striuyng for the crowne,* suffered againe more scourginges. the tearing of wilde beastes, & what thing els soeuer the frantike people on euery side cryed for and willed. And aboue al the rest they brought an yron chayre, in the which their bodies being set,* were so •ryed and scorched as on a gridiron fried vpon the coales, filled with the sauour of the frying all the people that stode by. And yet for all that the tormentours cea•ed not, but waxed more fierce and mad against thē, laboring to ouercome the patience of the Saints. Notwithstanding al this they could not get out of Sanctus mouth any other thing but the confession which at the beginning he declared. And thus these holy men, after they had long continued alieue in this their most horrible conflicte, at the length were slaine, being made al that whole day a spectacle vnto the worlde in place and in stede of the games and sightes, which were woont to be exhibited to the people. And thus much concerning Maturus and Sanctus.

Now concerning Blandina, who being fastened vpon a stake, was cast to the rauening beastes to be deuoured, which thing was not done without the determinate wyll of God: * to this ende that while she seemed to hang vpon a crosse (as it were) by the feruentnes of her praier, she much cōforted the rest of the saints, as beholding vnto her christ, with their bodily eyes, which in that agonie suffered for them all, and that al which beleue in him, and suffer for the glory of Christ, might be assured to liue with him for euer. And when they sawe that no beast woulde come neare her thus hanging, they toke her downe from the tree, and cast her againe into prison till an other time, that she hauing y^e victory of many battels, might triumphe ouer that ang•y Serpent the deuill, & that she being a weake and fely woman, and not regarded, armed with Christ the inuincible conquerour, might incourage her brethren, and by the induring of this battaile might winne a crowne of incorruptible glory.

Now to Attalus, who being also required and cald for of the people to punishment, already prepared (for his conscience sake) commeth forth to the •ight. For he being worthely exercised in the Christian profession, was alwayes a witnes and a mayntayner of our doctrine. Therfore when the presse of people was about the scaffold, and the table Page 37 caried before him, wherein was written in the Romaine tounge. * This is Attalus the Christian. Then the people were in a marueilous rage against him, but the gouernor vnderstanding y^t he was a Romane, commaunded him againe to prison, with the rest of his prison fellowes: whereof he wrote to the Emperour, and waited for aunswere what his pleasure herein was. The prisoners were not ydle in y^e meane seasō, nor vnprofitable to their brethrē, but by their patience the vnspeakable mercy of Christ shined out. For those which were dead before, were now reuiued by them that liued and they which were Martyrs, profited them which were none, & the Church did much reioyce, as receiuing them againe aliue, whō she had lost before as dead For many of them which before had denied, * now by theyr denial were restored and stirred vp, and learned to be confessours. And now being reuiued and strengthned, and tasting the sweetenes of him which desireth not the death of a sinner, but is mercifull to the penitent, came of their own accorde to the iudgement seate againe, that they might bee examined of the Iudge. And for that the Emperour had written backe againe to him, that all the confessors should be punished and the other let go, and that the Sessions or Sises were now begun, which for the multitude that had repayre thether out of euery quarter, was marueilous great: he caused all the holy martirs to be brought thether, that the multitude might beholde them, & once againe examined them, and as many of them as he thought had the Romane fredome, he beheaded, the residue he gaue to the beastes to be deuoured. And truely Christ was much glorified by those which a little before had denied him, which againe contrary to y^e expectation of the Infidels, confessed him euen to the death. For they were examined a part frō the rest. because of their deliuery, which being found Confessours, were ioined to the company of the martirs, & had with them their part. But there were then abroade, which had no saith at all, neither yet so much as the feeling of the wedding garment, nor any cogitation at all, of the feare of God, but blasphemed his waies, by the lewd conuersatiō of their life, euen such as were the children of damnation. Al the residue ioined thēselues to the congregation: which whē they were examined one Alexander a phrigian, borne, and a Phisition, * which had dwelt long in Fraunce, and knowen almost of euery man, for the loue he had to God, & boldnes of speaking (neither was he voide of the Apostolicall loue) this Alexander standing somewhat neare to the barre, by signes and beκες perswaded such as were examined to confesse Christ: so that by his countenance somtime reioising, and some other while sorrowing, he was descryed of the standers by. The people not taking in good part to see those which now recanted, by and by againe to sticke to their first confession, they cried out against Alexander, as one that was the cause of all this matter. And when he was inforced by the Iudge and cōmaunded what Religion he was of, he aunswered: I am a Christian. He had no sooner spoken the worde, but he was iudged to the beastes, of them to be deuoured.

The next day following, Attalus, of whome I made mention a litle before, and Alexander, were brought foorth together (for the gouernour graunting Attalus vnto the people, was baited againe of the beastes.) When these men were brought to the scaffold, and had taken a tast of all the instruments that there were prepared for their execution, and had suffered the greatest agonie they could put thē to, were also at the length slaine: Of whome Alexander neuer gaue so much as a sigh, nor held his peace, but frō the bottome of his hart praised and praied to the Lorde.* But Attalus when he was set in the yron chaire, and began to frye, and the frying sauour of his burning body began to smell, he spake to the multitude in y^e Romane language: Behold (sayth hee) this is to eate mans flesh which you doe, for we neither eate men, nor yet cōmit any other wickednes. And being demaunded what was the name of their God: our God (saith he) hath no such name as men haue. Then said they, now let vs see whether your God can helpe you, and take you out of our handes or not.

After this, being the last day of the spectacle, Blandine againe, & one Pōticus, a child of xv. yeare old was brought forth, and this was euery day, to the intent they seing the punishment of their fellowes, might be compelled thereby to sweare by their Idoles. But because they constantly abode in their purpose, & defied their idols, the whole multitude was in a rage with them, neither sparing the age of the child, nor fauoring the sexe of the woman, but put them to all the punishment and paine they could deuise, & often times inforced them to sweare, & yet were not able to cōpel them therevnto. For Ponticus so being animated of his sister, as the Heath•ikes standing by did see, after he had suffered all torments and paynes gaue vp the ghost. This blessed Blandina therefore being the last that suffered, after she had like a worthy mother giuen exhortations vnto her children, and had sent them before as conquerours to their heauenly k•ng, and had called to her remembrance al their batels & conflicts, so much reioiced of her childrens death, & so hastened her owne, as though she had bene bidden to a bridall, & not in case to be throwne to the wilde beastes. After this her pittifull whipping,* her deliuey to y^e beastes, & her tormentes vpon the gridiron, at the length she was put in a net, and throwne to the wild Bull, and when she had bene sufficiently gored & wounded with the hornes of the same beast, & felt nothing of all that chaunced to her, for the great hope and consolation she had in Christ & heauen•y thinges, was thus slaine, insomuch that the verye Heathen men themselues confessed that there was neuer woman put to death of them that suffered so much as this woman did. Neither yet was their furious crueltie thus asswaged against the Christians. For the cruel barbarous people, like wilde beastes when they be moued, knew not when the time was to make an ende, but inuented new & sundry torments euery day against our bodies. Neyther yet did it content thē when they had put the Christians to death,* for y^t they wanted the sense of men: for which cause both the magistrate & people were vexed at the very harts that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, he that is wicked, let him be wicked stil, and he that is iust let him be more iust. For those which in their prisons they strangled they threw after to the dogs setting keepers both day and night to watch them, that they shoulde not be buried, and bringing forth the remnaunt of their bones & bodies, some halfe burnt, some left of the wilde beasts, & some also be mangled, also bringing forth heads of other which were cut of, and like maner committed by them to the charge of the keepers to see them remaine vnburied.

The Gentiles grinded & gnashed at the Christians with their teeth, seeking which way they might amplifie their punishment: some other flouted and mocked them, extolling their idoles, attributing vnto them the cause of thys crueltie and vengeance shewed to vs. Such which were of the meeker sort, and seemed to be moued with some pyty, did hit vs in the teeth, saying, where is your God, that you so much boast of: & what helpeth this your religion: for which you giue your liues? These were the sundrye passions and affects of the Gentiles, but the Christians in the meane while were in great heauines, that they might not burye the bodies and reliques of the holy Martirs. Neither could the dark night serue them to that purpose, nor any intreaty, nor waging them with money, whiche were appointed for watchmen: but they so narrowly looked vnto the matter, as though they should haue gotten great benefite and profite thereby.

Thus were the bodies of the martirs made a wonderying stocke, and laye sixe dayes in the open streetes, at the length they burned them, & threwe their ashes into y^e riuer of Rods, so that there might appeare no remnaunt of thē vpō the earth. And this did they as though they had beene able to haue pulled god out of his seat, & to haue let the regeneration of the Saintes, and taken from them the hope of the resurrection, whereof they being perswaded (sayd they) bring in this newe and straunge Religion, and set thus light by death and punishment. Atque haec: haec ex Epistola Viennensium. &c.

Amongest other that suffered vnder Antoninus,* mention was made also of Iustinus, who as it is said before, exhibited two Apologies, concerning the defence of christian doctrine, the one to the Senate of Rome, and the other to Antoninus Pius the Emperour, cōcerning whose suffering, and the causes therof is partly before declared: this Iustine was borne in Neapoli, in the countrey of Palestine, whose father was Priscus Bachius, as he himselfe doth testifie. By whom in his youth he was set to schole to learne,* wherin processe of time he became a famous and worthy Philosopher, o• whose excellency many learned & notable men doe record, For first, he being altogether inflamed and rauished with desire of knowledge, would in no wise be satisfied in his mind, before he had gotten instructors singularly seene in all kinde of Philosophy, wherevpon he writeth of him selfe in the beginning of his Dialogue Cum Tripone, thus declaring,* that in the beginning he being desirous of that sect and societie, applied himselfe to be the scholer to a certaine Stoicke, & remaining with him a time, when he nothing profited in diuine knowledge (wherof the Stoicke had no skill, and affirmed the knowledge therof not to be necessary) he forsoke him, and went to another of the sect of the Perepatetick, a sharp witted man, as he thought with whom after he had beene a while, he demaunded of him a Page 49 stipend• for his teaching, for the better confirmatiō of their familiaritie. Whereupon Iustine accōpting him as no Philosopher left him,* & departed. And yet not satisfied in mind but desirous to heare of further learning in Philosophie. adioyned himselfe to one that professed y^e Pithagorian •ect, a man of great fame, and one who made no small accompt of himselfe. Who after he had followed a time, his maister, demaunded of him whether he had any sight in Musicke, Astronomy, and Geometry, wythout the sight of whiche science, he saide he coulde not be apte to receiue the knowledge of vertue and felicitie, vnles before he had vsed to apply his minde from sensible matters to the contemplation of things intellible. And speaking much in the commen•ation of these sciences, how profitable and necessary they were: after that Iustine had declared him selfe not to bee sene therin, the Philosopher gaue him ouer, which greued Iustine not a little, & so much themore because he thought his master to haue some knowledge in those sciences. After this Iustine considering with himselfe what time was requisite to the learning of these sciences, and thinking not to di•erte any longer, thought best to resort to the secte of the Platonistes for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore he chose vnto him a singuler learned man of that secte,* which lately was come to those parties & so remaining w^t him seemed to profite not a litle in contemplation of supernall things, & inuisible formes, insomuch that he thought shortly to aspire to such sharpnes of witte and wisdom, that out of hand he might atchiue to the comprehension & contēplation of god,* which is the end of Plato his Philosophie. And in this maner he bestowed his youth: but afterward he growing to a riper age, howe & by what meanes the said Iustine came to the knowledge & profession of chritianitie, it foloweth likewise in his saide first Apologie: where he affirmeth of him selfe (as witnesseth Eusebius in his fourth booke) that when he did behold the christians in their torments and sufferinges to be so constaunt in theyr profession,* was therewith maru•ilously mooued: after this maner reasoning with himselfe, that it was impossible for that kinde of people to be subiect to any vice or carnalitie, which vices of their owne nature are not able to sustayne any sharpe aduersitie,* much lesse the bytternesse of death. The sight wherof helped him not a litle (being of his own nature inclined to the searching of true knowledge & vertue) to begin thereby to loue and imbrace Christian Relygion, for so he doth witnes of himselfe in the ende of y^e fyrst Apologie: signifiyng there how it was his seking and indeuor to attaine to Christianitie: Understanding how the Christians by malice of wicked persons were cōpelled to suffer wrong and tormentes,* and to be euill spoken of. By sight whereof, as he saith himselfe, he became a Christian, through this occasion, for being thus afflicted in his minde as is aforesaid, it came in his head for his more quietnes to go aside to some desert and solitary place void of concourse of people, vnto a village or graūge neare to y^e seaside: whither as he approched, thinking there to be al alone, there meeteth with him an old auntient father of a comly visage and gentle behauior,* who folowing him a litle of began to reason with him, where after lōg disputation, when y^e old man had declared vnto him that there was no knowledge of truth amongst the Philosophers, which neither knewe God, neither were aided by the holy Ghost: & further had reasoned w^t him of y^e immortality of y^e soule, of the reward of the godly, & punishment of the wicked: then Iustine being confirmed with his reasons and arguments, yelded to him of his owne accorde, and demaunded of him by what meanes he might attaine to that true knowledge of God, Wherof he had spoken.* Who then counsailed him to read & searche the Prophetes, adioyning therewith prayer: but what master, quoth Iustine should I vse for the instruction therof. & who shalbe able to helpe vs if these philosophers (as you say) lacke the truth, & are voide of the same? To whom the old father aunswering, there haue bene saide he many yeres before these philosophers, other more aūtient then all these, which beyng accompted for Philosophers were iust and beloued of God:* who spake by the spirite of God, foreseeing and prophesiying these thinges which wee see now come to passe, & therefore they are called Prophets. These only haue knowen the truth and reueled it to men, neither fearing nor passyng for any: who were seduced w^t no opinions of mans inuention, but only spake & taught those things which they themselues both heard and sawe, being inspired with the holy spirit of god:* whose writings and works yet to this day remaine. Out of which the reader may receiue great profite & knowledge of thinges, as concerning the first creation of the worlde & end of y^e same, with al other things necessary to be knowne of euery true Philosopher which wil giue credite vnto them. Neither in their teaching they do vse any demonstration, as being more certaine o^r themselues, then that they neede any such demonstration to be made. For asmuch as the accomplyshing and the end of things both paste,* & now present constraineth vs of necessitie to beleue the words and doctrine which they taught: which men not only therefore are to be beleued, but also for their miracles and wonders done are worthy of credite, for that they both preached of God the maker and creator of all thinges: And also did prophesye before of Christ his sonne to be sent of him, The which the false Prophets being seduced with false and wicked spyrits, neither haue done, nor do, but onely take vpon them to worke certaine prodigious wonders for men to gase at, setting out thereby to the worlde false & vncleane spirites: But then afore all thinges make thy prayer, that y^e gate of light may be opened vnto thee, for otherwise these things cannot be attained vnto of euery man, but onely of such, to whom God and his Christ giueth vnderstanding. These thinges with much more (which now leasure serueth not, to prosecute) after the foresaid old father had declared vnto him he departed: exhortyng him well to follow the thinges which he had spoken. And after that Iustine as he himselfe witnesseth, saw him no more. Immediatly after thys Iustine being all inflamed as with fyre kindled in his breast, began to conceiue a loue & zeale toward the Prophets and all such as were fauoured of Christ. And thus he reuoluing in his mind more and more these wordes, found only this Philosophie among all other professions, both sure and profitable,* and so became he a Philosopher, & in time by these meanes afterwards he was made a Christian and Baptised. But where he receiued this holy Sacrament of Baptisme, it is not read of, nor yet by what occasiō he left his country and came to Rome. This only we read in Ierome that he was in Rome, & there vsed certaine exercises which he called Diatribas, disputing there with Crescens, a Cynical philosopher,* as is before touched. But this is certaine how that Iustine after he had receaued the professiō of Christian Religiō, became an earnest defēder of the same, traueiling and disputing against al the aduersaries thereof fearing neither peril of life nor daunger of death whereby he might maintaine the doctrine of Christ, against the malicious blasphemers and also augment the number of Christian beleuers.* As may appeare by his vehement disputations against y^e heathen Philosophers. Also moreouer aswell appeareth in that long disputatiō which he had with one Tripho at Ephesus: as also in his confutations of heretikes.* Furthermore his conflictcs and Apologies which with great courage & security he exhibited against the persecutors of the Christians, both the Emperour and the Magistrates, yea and the whole Senate of Rome, doe testifie the same.

Of the which Apologies the first he wrote to the Senate of Rome,* and after to Antoninus Pius the Emperour as is before mentioned, where, in the fyrst writing wyth great liberty to the Senate he declared: that of necessitie he was compelled to write and vtter his minde and consciēce to them. For that in persecuting of the Christians they did neglect their duety, and highly offended God, and therefore neede they had to be admonished. And further writing to Vrbinius liefetenaunt of the Citie, sayd, that hee put men to death and tormentes for no offence committed, but for the confession onely of the name of Christ: which proceedinges and iudgementes neyther became the Emperour nor hys sonne, nor the Senate: defending moreouer in the sayd Apology and purgyng the Christiāns of such crimes as falsely were layd and obiected agaynst them by the Ethnikes.

And likewise in hys second Apology writing to Antoninus the Emperour and his successours,* with like grauity and free libertie, declareth vnto them how they had the name, cōmonly beyng reputed & taken as vertuous Philosophers, mayntayners of iustice, louers of learning, but whether they were so, their actes declared. As for him neither for flattery nor fauour at their hands, he was cōstrayned thus to write vnto them, but onely to sue vnto thē and desire a serious & righteous kind of dealing in their iudgements and sentences. For it becommeth Princes to folow vprightnes & pietie in their iudgements, not tyranny and violence: & also in playne wordes chargeth as wel the emperour as the Senate with manifest wrong. For that they did not graunt the Christians, that which is not denied to all other malefactors, iudging men to death not conuicted but onely for the hatred of the name: Other men which be appeached (said he) in iudgement, are not condemned, before they are cōuicted: but on vs you take your name only for the crime, when as indeede you ought to see iustice done vpō our accusers. And againe (saith he) if a Christian being accused onely denie that name, him you release beyng Page 50 not able to charge him with any other offence. But if he stande to his name, onely for his confession you may cast him, where indeede it were your duety rather to examine their maner of life what thing they confesse or denye, and according to their demerites to see iustice done.

*And in the same further he saith, you examine not the causes, but incensed with rash affections as with the spur of fury, ye slay & murder them not conuicted, without any respect of iustice. And further he addeth: Some peraduenture wil say certaine of them haue bene apprehended & taken in euill doinges, as though (saith he) you vsed to enquire vpō them being brought afore you, & not commonly to condemne thē before due examination of their offence for the cause aboue mentioned. Where also in the ende of y^e said Apology after this maner he reprehendeth thē. You do degenerate (quoth he) from the goodnes of your predecessours, whose exāple you followe not: for your father Adrian of famous memorye, caused to bee proclaymed that Christians accused before the iudge, should not be cōdemned, vnles they were found guilty of some notorious crime I finde that all his vehement and graue Apologie stādeth vpon most strong & firme probations: denying y^t the christians ought by conscience at the will & commaundement of the Emperour & Senate to doe sacrifice to the Idols. For the which they being condemned, affirme y^t they suffer open wrong: approuing moreouer that the true & only Religion, is the Religion of the Christians: whose both doctrine and conuersation hath no fault. Iustinus although with these and such like perswasions did not so preuayle with the Emperour to cause him to loue his Religion & become a christian (for that is not written) yet thus much he obtained, that Antoninus writing to his Officers in Asia in the behalfe of the Christians, required and cōmaunded them, that those Christians which onely were founde gilty of any trespasse, should suffer, and such as were not conuicted, should not therfore onely for the name be punished, because they were called Christians. By these it is apparant with what zeale and faith this Iustinus did striue against the persecutors, which (as he said) could kill onely but could not hurt.

*This Iustinus by the meanes and malice of Crescens the Philosopher as is before declared, suffered Martyrdome vnder Marcus Antoninus Verus a little after that Polycarpus was martired in Asia, as witnesseth Eusebius. Lib. 4. Here is to be gathered how Epiphanius was deceiued in the time of his death, saying that he suffered vnder Rusticus the president, and Adrian the Emperour, being of xxx. yeares of age, which indeede agreeth not neither with Eusebius, nor Ierome, nor Swide, nor other moe, which manifestly declare and testifie how he exhibited his Apology vnto Antoninus Pius which came after Adrian. Thus hast thou good Reader the li•e of this learned & blessed martir although partly touched before, yet now more fully & amply discoursed, for the better commendatiō of his excellent & notable vertues of whose small ende thus writeth Photius saying that he suffering for Christ died cheerefully & with honor.

*Thus haue ye heard the whole discourse of Iustinus and of the blessed Saints of Fraunce, Vetius, Zacharias, Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Blandina, Alexander, Alcibiades, with other, recorded and set foorth by the writing of certaine Christian brethren of the same Church & place of Fraunce. In the which foresaid writing of theirs moreouer appeareth the great meekenes and modest constancie of the said martirs described in these words: such folowers were they of christ who when he was in the forme of God thought it no robbery to be equal with god, being in y^e same glory with him, that they not once nor twise, but oft times suffered martyrdome, & taken againe from the beastes & bearing wounds tearinges and skarres in their bodies, yet neither woulde counte them selues Martirs, neyther woulde they suffer vs so to cal thē: but if any of vs either by word or letter woulde call them Martirs, they did vehementlye rebuke them: saying that y^e name of martirdome was to be gyuen to Christ the faithfull and true martir, the first borne of the dead, & the captaine of life, testifiyng moreouer that martirdome belongeth to such, who by their martirdome were already passed out of this life, and whom as christ by their worthy confession hath receiued vnto him selfe and hath sealed vp their Martirdome by their ende finished: * As for thē, which were not yet consūmated, they (said they) were not worthy the names of martirs, but only were humble and worthy confessours, desiring also their brethren with teares, to praye without ceasing for their confirmation. Thus they performing in deede that whiche belonged to true Martirs, in resisting the heathen with much lybertie, and great patience, without all feare of man, being replenished with the feare of God, refused to be named of their brethren for martirs. And after in the said writing it followeth more: they humbled themselues vnder the mightye hand of God, by which they were greatly exalted. Then they rendred to all men a reason of their faith, they accused no man, they loosed all, they bounde none. And for them which so euill did intreate them, they praied, following the example of Stephen the perfect Martir, which sayde: O Lord impute not their sinne to them. And after againe: Neither did they proudly disdaine against them which fell but of such as they had, they imparted to them that lacked bearing toward them a motherly affection, shedding their plentifull teares for them to God the Father, and prayed for their life and saluation, and as God gaue it them, they also did communicate to their neighbours. And thus they as conquerers of all thynges departed to God. They loued peace, and leauing the same to vs; they went to God, neither leauyng any molestation to their mother, nor sedition or trouble to their brethren, but ioye, peace, concorde, and loue to all.

Out of the same writyng moreouer concernyng these Martyrs of Fraunce afore mentioned, is recorded also an other history, not vnworthy to be noted, taken out of the same booke of Eusebius. cap. 3. Which history is this.

There was among these constaunt and blessed Martirs, one Alcibiades,* as is aboue specified: which Alcibiades euer vsed a very straight diet, receiuing for his foode and sustenance nothing els but only bread and water: when this Alcibiades now •eing cast into prison, went about to accustome the same straightnes of diet, after his vsual maner before it was reueiled by God to Attalus afore mentioned, one of the said company, being also the same time imprisoned after his first conflict vpon the scaffold that Alcibiades did not well in that hee refused to vse and take the creatures of God: & also thereby ministred to other a pernicious occasion of offense example. Whereupon Alcibiades being aduertised, & reformed, began to take al thinges boldly and with giuing thankes, whereby may appeare to all scrupulous consciences,* not only a wholesome instruction of the holy Ghost, but also here is to be noted how in those dayes they were not destytute of the grace of God: but had the holy spirite of God to be their instructor, Haec Euseb.

The foresaide martirs of Fraunce also the same tyme, commended Irenaeus newly then made minister,* with their letters vnto Eleutherus Bishop of Rome: as witnesseth Euseb. in the x. thap. of the same booke, which Irenaeus fyrst was the hearer of Polycarpus, then made minister (as is sayde) vnder these Martyrs. And after their death, made Byshop afterward of Lyons in Fraunce and succeded after Photinus. Besides this Iustinus there was also the same time in Asia, Claudius Apolinaris, or Apolinarius Byshop of Hierapolis, And also Melito Bishop of Sardis an eloquent & learned man, much commended of Tertullian, who succeeding after the time of the apostles, in the reigne of this Antoninus Verus, exhibited vnto him, learned and eloquent Apologies, in defence of Christes Religion, like as Quadratus and Aristides aboue mentioned, did vnto the Emperour Hadrian whereby they mooued him somewhat to stay, the rage of his persecution. In like maner did this Apolinaris and Melito (stirred vp by God) aduenture to defende in writing the cause of the christians vnto this Antoninus. Of this Melito, Eusebius in his fourth booke making mention, excerpeth certaine places of his Apologie,* in these wordes as followeth. Nowe saith he which was neuer seene before, the godly suffereth persecution by occasion of certaine Proclamations & Edictes proclaimed throughout Asia, for vilanous Sichophantes, robbers & spoylers of other mens goods grounding them selmes vpon those Proclamations, and taking occasion of them, robbe openlye night and daye, and spoyle those which doe no harme: And it followeth after: which if it be done by your commaundement, be it so well done. For a good Prince wyll neuer commaund but good things. And so we wil be contented to sustaine the honor of his death. This onely wee most humblye beseech your Maiestie, that callyng before you and examining the authors of this tumult and cōtention, then your grace would iustly iudge whether we are worthy of cruell death or quiet life. And then if it be not your pleasure, and that it proceedeth not by your occasion (which indeede against your barbarous enimies were to badde) the more a great deale we are petitioners to your hyghnes,* that hereafter you wyll vouchsafe to heare vs thus so vexed and oppressed with these kinde of vylanous robberies. And verily our Philosophy & doctryne did first among the barbarous take place, which doctrine fyrst in the daies of Augustus your predecessor, when it did raygne and florish, thereby your Empire became most famous & Page 51 fortunate: and from that time more and more the state of the Romane Empire increased in honor wherof you most happely were made successour,* and so shall your sonne to. Honor therefore this Philosophie, which with your Empire sprang vp and came in with Augustus whiche your progenitors aboue al other honored & most esteemed. And verily this is no small argumēt of a good beginning, that since our doctrine flourished in the Empire, no misfortune or losse happened frō Augustus time: but contrary alwaies victory, good and honorable yeres, as euer any mā would wishe. Onely among all, and of all Nero and Domitian beyng kindled by diuers naughty and spitfull persons cauillingly obiected against our doctrine, of whom this Sicophanticall slaundring of vs by naughty custome first came and sprang vp. But your godly fathers espying the ignoraunce of these, oftentimes by their writing corrected their temerous attemptes in that behalfe. Among whom your granfather Adrian w^t many other is read of, to haue wrytten of Fundayne the Proconsul and Lieutenāt of Asia. And your father, your own father I say, with whom you ruled in al things, wrote to the Cities vnder his signet, as the Laersens, Thessalonicenses, Athenienses and Grecians rashly to innouate or alter nothing of your highnes: therefore, who in this case is of that sect as your predecessours were, yea & of a more benigne & Philosophicall minde, we are in good hope to obtaine our peticion and request.

*Thus much out of the Apologie of Melito, who writing to Onesimus, geueth to vs this benefite to knowe the true Catalogue, & the names of al the autentike bookes of the olde Testament, receaued in the auncient time of the prymitiue Church. Concerning the number & names wherof the said Melito in his letter to Onesimus declareth, howe that he returning into the parts where these things were done and preached, there hee diligently inquired out the bookes aprooued of the old Testament, the names wherof in order he subscribeth & sendeth vnto him as followeth: The fiue bookes of Moses, Genesis, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, Deuteronomi, Iesus Naue, The Iudges, Ruth, Foure bookes of Kings: Two bookes Paralipomenon. The Psalmes Prouerbes of Salomon The booke of Wisedome: The Preacher. The song of songs. Iob. The Prophets, Esay, Hieromie, twelue Prophetes in one booke, Daniel, Ezechiel, Esdras. And thus much of thys matter, which I thought here to record, for that it is not vnprofitable for these latter times to vnderstande what in the first times was receaued, and admitted as autentike, and what otherwise.

But from this little digression to returne to our matter omitted, that is, to the Apologies of Apolinarius and Melito, in the story so it followeth, that whether it was by the occasiō of these two Apologies, or whether it was through the writing of Athenagoras a Philosopher, and a Legate of the Christians, it is vncertaine: but this is certaine that the persecution the same time was staid. Some do thinke, which most probably seeme to touch the truthe, that the cause of staying this persecution, did rise vpon a wonderfull myracle of God, shewed in the Emperours campe by the Christians the story wherof is this: At what time the two brethren Marcus Antonius, and Marcus Aurelius Commodus Emperours, *ioyning together, warred against the Quades, Vaudales, Sarmates, and Germanes, in the expeditiō against them their army by reason of the imminent assault of their enimies, was cooped & shut in within the straights and hoate dry places, where their souldiours besides other difficulties of battaile, being destitute of water, fyue dayes, were like to haue perished, which dread not a little discomfited them, & did abate their courage. Wherin this their so great distresse and ieopardy, sodainely wythdrew from the army a legian of the christian souldiours for their succour: who falling prostrate vpon the earth, by ardent prairer, by & by obtained of God double reliefe: by meanes of whom God gaue certaine pleasaunt showers from the element, whereby as their souldiors quenched their thirst so were a great number of their enimies discomfited & put to flight by the continual lightnings which shooted out of the aire. This miracle so pleased & won the Emperour, that euer after he waxed gentler & gentler to the Christians & dyrected his letters to diuers of his rulers, as Tertullian in his Apologie witnesseth, commaūding thē therin to giue thanks to the Christians, no lesse for his victory, then for the preseruacion of him and all his men. The copy of which letter hereafter ensueth.

Marcus Aurelius Antonius Emperour, to the Senate and people of Rome.

I Giue you hereby to vnderstande, what I intend to doe, as also, what successe I haue had in my warres in Germany, and with how much difficultie I haue vited my campe, being compassed about with 74. fierce Dragons, whome my Scottes descryed to be within ix. miles of vs, and Pompeianus our Liefetenaunt hath viewed as he signified vnto vs by hys letters: Wherefore I thought no lesse but to be ouerunne and all my bandes of so great multitude, as well my vaward mayne warde as reere warde, with all my souldiours of Ephrata. In whose host there were numbred of fighting men ix. hundreth seenty and fiue thousand. But when I saw my selfe not able to encounter with the enemy, I craued ayde of our countrey Gods, at whose hands I finding no comfort, and being driuen of the enemye vnto an exegent, I caused to be sent for those men which we call Christians who being mustred were found a good indifferent number, with whom I was in farther rage, then I had good cause, as afterwarde I had experience by their merueilous power, who forthwith did their indeuour, but without either weapon, munition, armour or trumpets, as men abhorring such preparation and furniture but onely satisfied in trust of their God, whome they cary about with them in their consciences. It is therefore to be credited, although we call them wicked men, that they worship God in their hartes. For they falling prostrate vpon the ground, prayed not onely for me, but for the host also, which was with me, beseeching their God for helpe in that our extremitie of vittels and fresh water. For we had bene now v. dayes without water, and were in our enemies land, euen in the middest of Germany. who thus falling vppon their faces, made their prayer to a GOD vnknowne of me: and there sell a|mongest vs from heauen a most pleasaunt and cold shower, but amongst our enemies a great storme of hayle mixt with lightning so that immediately we perceiued the inuincible ayde of the most mighty God to be with vs. Therefore we geue those men leaue to professe Christianitie, least perhap by their prayer, we be punished with the lyke, and thereby make my selfe the author of such hurt as shalbe receiued by the Christian profession. And if any shall apprehend one that is a Christian, onely for that cause: I will that he being apprened without punishment, may haue leaue to confesse the same, so that there be none other cause obiected agaynst hym, more then that he is a Christian: But let his accuser be burned aliue. Neither will I that he confessing and being founde a Christian, shalbe enforced to alter the same his opinion by the gouernour of any of our prouinces, but le•t to hys owne choyse. And this decree of myne I will to be ratified in the Senate house, and commaund the same publiquely to be proclaymed and read in the Court of Traianus and that farther from thence it may be sent into all our Prouinces by the diligence of Veratius gouernour of our Citie Polione. And further we geue leaue to all men to vse and write out this our decree, taking the same out of our co••e publiquely in the common Hall set forth.

Thus the tempestuous rage of persecution against the Christians began for a tyme to assuage partly by the occasion hereof, partly also vpon other causes incident, cōpelling the enimies to surcease their persecutiō, as great plagues & pestilence lying vpon the countrie of Italy: lykewise great warres, as well in y^e East partes, as also in Italy and Fraunce, terrible earthquakes great flouds, no•some swarmes of flies and vermine deuouring their corne fieldes,* &c. And thus much of thinges done vnder Antoninus Verus which Antoninus in the beginning of his raygne ioyned with him in the gouernement of the Empire, hys brother Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who also was wyth hym at the miraculous victory gotten by the Christiās, as Eusebius cap. 5. Lib. 5. recordeth, contrary Platina in vita Soteris, and the book intituled Flores historiarū, referre the same to the time of Antoninus verus, and his sonne Lucius Antoninus Commodus, and not of Marcus Aurelius Commodus hys brother. But howsoever the truth of yeares doe stand, certaine it is,* that after the death of Antoninus Verus, and of Aurelius Commodus, succeeded Lucius Antoninus, Commodus the sonne of Verus who raigned 13. yeares.

In the time of this Commodus, although he was an incōmodious Prince to the Senatours of Rome,* yet notw^tstanding there was some quietnes vniuersally through the whole Church of Christ from persecution by what occasion it is not certaine. Some thinke of whom is Xiphilinus that it came through Marcia the Emperours concubine, which fauoured the Christians: but how soeuer it came saith Eusebius, the furye of the raging enimies was then somewhat mittigated. & peace was giuen by the grace of Christ, vnto the Church throughout the whole worlde. At what time the wholesome doctrine of the Gospel allured and reduced the harts of all forces of people, vnto the true Religion of God, insomuch that many both rich and noble personages of Rome, with their whole families and houtholdes to their saluation, adioyned thē to the Church of Christ.

Among whom there was one Apollonius, a noble man and a Senatour of Rome,* mentioned in Eusebius. Lib. 5. ca. 21. who being maliciously accused vnto the Senate by one Page 52 whom Hierome writeth to be the seruaunt of y^e said Apollonius, and nameth him Seuerus: but whose seruaunt soeuer he was,* the wretched man came soone inough before the iudge, being condignely rewarded, for that his malicious diligence. For by a law which y^e Emperour made that no man vpon paine of death shoulde falsely accuse the Christians, he was put to execution, & had his legs broken forthwith, by the sentence of Perenninus the iudge, which being an heathen man, he pronounced against him: but the beloued martyr of God,* when the iudge with much a doe had obtained of hym to render an accout before the honorable Senate of his faith, vnder whose defence and warrant of lyfe he did the same, deliuered vnto them an eloquēt Apologie of the christian beliefe: but the former warrant notwithstanding, he by the decree of the Senate, was beheaded, and so ended his life.* For that there was an auncient law among them decreed, that none that professed Christ, and therefore araigned, should be released without recantation, or altering his opinion.

This Commodus is said in stories to be so sure & steddly handed in casting the dart, that in the open Theatre before the people, he would encounter with the wild beasts, and be sure to hit them in place where he appointed. Among diuers other his vicious and wild parts he was to farre surpressed in pride & arrogancy,* that he would be called Hercules, and many times would shewe himselfe to the people in the skinne of a Lion, to bee counted thereby the king of men, like as the Lion is of the beastes.

Upon a certaine time being his birth day, this Commodus, calling the people of Rome together, in a great roialtye hauing his lions skinne vpon him, made sacrifice to Hercules & Iupiter, causing it to be cried through the Citty that Hercules was the patrone and defender of the Citye. There were the same time at Rome. Vincentius, Eusebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, learned men, and instructors of the people,* who folowing the steps of the Apostles, went about from place to place where the Gospell was not yet preached, conuerting the Gentiles to the sayth of Christ, These hearing the madnes of the Emperour & of the people, began to reprove their idolatrous blindnes, teaching in villages & townes al that heard them, to beleue vpon y^e true and only God, and to come away from such worshipping of deuils, and to giue honor to God alone, which only is to be worshipped, willing them to repent and to bee Baptised,* least they perished with Commodus. With thys their preaching, they conuerted one Iulius a Senatour and other to the Religion of Christ. The Emperour hearyng thereof, caused thē to be apprehended of Vitellus his Captaine, and to be compelled to sacrifice vnto Hercules, which when they stoutly refused, after diuers greuous torments and great miracles by them done, at last they were pressed with •eaden waighes to death, Vincentius. Lib. 10. cap. 119. & Chron. Henr. de Erfordia.

*This Peregrinus aboue mentioned had bene sent before by Xistus Byshop of Rome, into the parties of Fraunce, to supply there y^e rowme of a Bishop and teacher, by reason y^t for the continual and horrible persecutions there aboue touched, those places were left desolat and destitute of ministers and instructors, where after he had occupied hym selfe w^t much frute among the flocke of Christ, and had stablished the congregation there, returning home againe to Rome, there finished at last (as it is said) his martirdome.

Now remaineth likewise to speake of Iulius, which Iulius being as is afore described, a Senator of Rome, and now won by y^e preaching of these blessed men, to the fayth of Christ, did eftsoones inuite them & brought them home to his house,* where being by them more fully instructed in christian religiō, he beleued in the gospel. And sending for one Ruffinus a Priest, was with all his family by him baptised, who (not as the common sort was wont to do) kept close and secret his faith: but incensed with a marueylous and sincere zeale openly professed the same: altogither wishing and praying to be giuen to him by God, not only to beleue in Christ, but also to hasarde his life for him. Which thing the Emperour hearing, how that Iulius had forsakē his old religion, and became a christian, forthwith sent for him to come before him, vnto whom he spake on this wise O Iuly, what madnes hath possessed thee, that this thou doest fall from the olde & common Religion of thy forefathers who acknowledged and worshipped Iupiter & Hercules their gods, & now doest embrace a new & fond kind of Religion of the Christians: At which time Iulius hauing good occasion to shew and opē his faith gaue straight way accompt thereof to him, and affirmed that Hercules & Iupiter were false Gods, & how the worshippers of thē should perish with eternall damnation & punishmentes. Which the Emperour hearing, how that he condemned & despised his Gods, being then inflamed with a great wrath as he was by nature very cholericke, committed him foorthwith to Vitellus, the master of the souldiours, a very cruell & fierce man, to see Iulius either to sacrifice to mighty Hercules or refusing the same to slea him. Vitellus as hee was commaunded) exhorted Iulius to obey the Emperors cōmaundement and to worship his Gods, Alledging how that the whole Empire of Rome was not onely constituted, but also preserued and maintained by them. Which Iulius denied vtterly to do, admonishing sharply in like ma'ner Vitellus to acknowledge the true God, and obey his commaundementes, least he with his maister should dye some greeuous death. Whereat Vitellus being moued, caused Iulius with cougels to be beaten vnto death.

These things being thus briefly recited touching such holy martirs, as hetherto haue suffered, nowe remayneth that wee returne againe to the order of the Romaine Byshops such as followed next after Alexander,* at whome we left, whose succeder next was Xistus or Sixtus, the sixt Byshoppe counted after Peter, and gouerned that ministerye the space of x yeares as Damascus & other do write. Vrspergensis maketh mention but of ix. yeares. Platina recordeth that he died a Martir, and was buried at Uaticane. But Eusebius speaking of his discease, maketh no word mentiō of any Martyrdome. In the 2. tome of the Councelles certaine Epistles be attributed to him, whereof Eusebius Damasus, Hierome, and other olde authors, as they make no relation, so seeme they to haue no intelligence nor knowledge of any such matter. In these cōūterfeit epistles, & in Platina appeareth y^e Xistus was the first author of these ordinaunces.* First that the holy misteries and holy vessels shoulde be touched, but onely of persons holy and consecrated, especially of no woman, Itē that the corporas cloth should be made of no other cloth, but of fine linnen. Item that bishops such as were called vp to the Apostolicke sea, returning home againe,* should not be receiued at their returne, vnlesse they brought with them letters from the bishop of Rome, saluting the people. Itē, at the celebration he ordained to be song this verse, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabaoth. Where moreouer is to be noted, that the saide Platina, in the life of thys Xistus, doeth testifie that Peter ministred the celebration of the cōmunion onlie wyth the Lordes prayer. These tryflyng ordinaunces of Xistus, who is so rude that seeth not or may not easly cōiecture to be falsly fathered of Xistus,* or of anye father of that time, first by the vniforme rudenes and stile of all those decretal letters, nothing sauouryng of that age, but rather of y^e later dunsticall times that followed. Also by the matter and argument in those leters contained, nothing agreing with the state of those troublesome daies. Neither againe is it to be supposed that any such recourse of bishops was then to the Apostolicall sea of Rome, that it was not lawfull to returne without their letters: when as the persecution against the Christians was then so hoate, in the daies of Hadrian that the Bishoppes of Rome themselues were more glad to flee out of the Citie, then other bishops were to come to them vnto Rome. And if Xistus added the Sanctus vnto the Masse cannon, what peece then of the canon went before it, when they which put to the other patches came after Xistus: And if they came after Xistus that aded the rest, why did they set their peeces before his, seing they y^t began the first peece of the canon, came after him?

The same likewise is to be iudged of the Epistles & ordinaunces of Telesphorus,* who succeded next vnto Xistus, and being Bishop of that congregation the terme of a 11, yeares, the first yeare of the raigne of Antoninus Pius, dyed Martyr, about the yeare of our Lorde. 138. His Epistle like vnto the rest containing in it no great matter of doctrine,* hath these ordinaunces: First he cōmaundeth al that were of the Clergy to fast and abstaine from flesh eatyng, vij. weekes before Easter. That three Masses shoulde bee said vpon the Natiuity day of the Lord. That no lay man should accuse either bishop or priest. He ordained moreouer Gloria in excelsis, to be added to the Masse, &c. but these things falsely to be fained vpon him may easly be coniectured. For as touching the vij. weekes fast neither doth it agree with the old Romane terme cōmonly receaued, calling it Quadragesima,* that is the xl. daies fast: neither with the example of our Sauour, who fasted not seuen wekes but onelye xl. dayes. Moreouer, as concernyng this xl. daies fast, wee reade of the same in the Epistle of Ignatius, which was lōg before Telesphorus: wherby it may appere that this Telesphorus was not the first inuentour thereof. And if it be true, that is lately come out in the name of Abdias (but vntruly, as by many coniectures may be proued) there is read, that in the daies of S. Mathewe this Lent, fast of xl. dayes was obserued long before Telesphorus: by Page 56 these wordes that followe: In the dayes sayd he, either of Lente, or in the time of other lawfull fastinges, he that abstaineth not as well from the eating meate as also from y^e mixture of bodies, doth incurre in so doing not onely pollution, but also cōmitteth offence, which must be washed away with the teares of repentaunce.* Agayne, Apollonius, affirmeth that Montanus the heretike, was the first deuiser and brynger in of these lawes of fasting into the Church, which before was vsed to be free. Euseb. Lib. 5. cap. 18. but especially by Socrates, wryter of the Ecclesiasticali story, who lyued after the daies of Theodosius, maye bee argued, that this vij. wekes fast is falsely imputed to Telesphorus. For Socrates in his first booke, speaking of this time hath these wordes:Romani namque tres ante Pascha septimanas praeter Sabbatum & Dominicam continuas ieiuiant, that is: the Romanes (saith he) doe fast three weekes continually before Easter, beside the Sabaoth and the Sunday. And moreouer, speaking of the diuers and sundry fastings of Lent in sundry and diuers Churches, he addeth these words: And because that no man can bring forth any commaundement written of this matter, it is therefore apparant, that the Apostles left this kind of fast free to euery mans will and iudgement, least anye should be constrayned by feare and necessitie to doe that which is good, &c. With this of Socrates, agreeth also the wordes of Sozomenus, liuing much about y^e same time, in his seuenth voke, where he thus writeth: The whole fast of Lent (saith he) some comprehend in sixe weekes, as doe the Illyrians, and the west churches, with al Libia, Egipt, & Palestina: some in vij. weekes, as at Cōstantinople, & y^e parties bordering to Phoenicia: other some in three weekes, next before the day of Easter, & some againe in ij. weekes. &c. By y^e whiche it may be collected, y^t Telesph. neuer ordained any such fast of vij. wekes: whiche otherwise neither woulde haue ben neglected in Rome, & in y^e west churches: neither againe woulde haue bene vnremembred of these auncient Ecclesiasticall writers, if any such thing had bene. The like is to be thought also of the rest, not onely of his constitutions: but also of the other auntient Byshops & Martyrs, which followed after him, as of Higinus. an. 142. who succeding him & dying also a Martyr, as Volateranus, Lib. 22. declareth, is saide or rather fained to bring in the creame, one Godfather and Godmother in Baptisme, to ordayne the dedication of Churches: when as in his time so far it was of, that anye solemne Churches were standing in Rome, that vnneth the Christians could safely conuent in their own houses. Likewise they distincting the orders of Metropolitanes, Byshops, and other degres, sauour nothing lesse then of that tyme.

After Higynus followed Pius, who as Platina reporteth was so precisely deuout aboute the holye misteries of the Lords Table, that if any one croome therof did fall downe to the grounde, he ordained that the Priest shoulde doe penaunce xl. daies. If any fell vpō the Superalter, he should doe penaunce iij. daies: if vpon the linen Corporas cloth iiij. daies: if vpon any other linnen cloth. ix. daies. And if any drop of the bloude (saith he) should chaunce be spilled, wheresoeuer it fell it should be licked vp, if it were possible if not the place should be washed or pared, & so being washed or pared, should be burned and layd in the vestry. All which toies may seeme to a wise man, more vaine and trifling, then to fauour of those pure and straight times of those holy Martyrs. This Pius (as is reported) was much conuersaunt with Hermes called otherwise Pastor. Damasus saith he was his brother, but how is that like that Hermes being the disciple of Paule,* or one of the lx. disciples, could be the brother of this Pius? Of this Hermes & of the reuelations the foresaid Pius in his Epistle decretall (if it be not forged) maketh mentiō, declaring that vnto him appeared the aungel of God in the habite of a shepherde,* commaunding him, y^t Easter day should be celebrated of al men vpō no other day, but vpon a sonday, whereupon, saith the Epistle, Pius the Byshop, by his authoritie Apostolicall, decreed and commaunded the same to be obserued of al men.

Then succeeded Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutharius, about the yeare of our Lord.* 180. This Eleutherius, at the request of Lucius king of Britanes, sent to him Damianus, and Fugatius, by whom the king was conuerted to Christes saith, and baptised about the yeare of our Lorde 179. Naclerus, Lib. Chro. Gen. 6. saith, it was, an. 156. Henr. de Erfodia, saith, it was, 169. in the xix. yeare of Verus the Emperour, some say it was in the vj. yeare of Commodus, which shoulde be about the yeare of our Lorde, 185. Timotheus in his storye thinketh that Eleutherius came himself: but that is not like And as there is a variaunce among the writers for y^e count of yeres: So doth there rise a question among some, whether Eleutherius was the first that brought the faith from Rome into this lande or not. Nicephorus. Lib. 2. cap. 4. saith that Symō Zelotes, came into Britaine. Some other alledge out of Gildas de victoria Aurel Ambrosi,* that Ioseph of Aramathie after the dispersion of the Iewes, was sent to Philip the Apostle from Fraunce to Britaine; about the yeare of our Lord 63. and here remained in this land al his time, and so with his fellowes laide the first foundation of christian fayth among the Britaine people. Whereupon other preachers and teachers cōming afterwarde confirmed the same & increased it more. And therefore doth Petrus Cluniacensis call the Scotishmen & so doth count them as more auntient Christians. For the confirmation hereof might be alledged the testimonie of Origene, of Tertulian, and the wordes also of the letter of Eleutherius whiche importe no lesse, but that the faith of Christ was here in Englande among the Britaine people, before Eleutherius time, & before the king was cōuerted, but hereof more shalbe spokē hereafter (Christ willing,) when after the tractation of these .x. persecutiōs, we shal enter y^e matter of our English stories.

About this time of Commodus aforementioned among diuers other learned men and famous teachers whō God stirred vp at that time (as he doth at all other times rayse vp some) in his church, to confound y^e persecutors by learning and writing, as the Martirs to confirme the truth with their blood,* was Serapion Byshop of Antioche, Egesippus a writer of the Ecclesiasticall historye from Christes Passion to his time, as witnesseth Hierome, & Eusebius Lib. 4. cap. 8. & 22. which bookes of his be not nowe remayning And those that be remaining (which be 5. de excidio Hierosol.) be not mentioned neither of Hierome, nor of Eusebius Miltiades which also wrote his Apology in defence of christian Religion,* as did Melito Quadratus, and Aristides before mentioned. About y^e same time also wrote Heraclitus, who first began to write annotations & enarrations vpon the newe Testament, and Epistles of the Apostles. Also Theophilus Byshop of Caesaria, Dionysius Byshoppe of Corinthe a man famously learned, which wrote diuers Epistles to diuers Churches, & among other writeth, exhorting Penitus a certaine Byshop, Ne graue seruandae castitatis onus necessario fratribus imponat, sed multorum sese imbecilitati attemperet, that is, that he would lay no yoke of chastitie of any necessity vpon his brethren: but that he would consider the infirmitie of other, and beare with it. Euseb. Lib. 4. cap. 23. Moreouer y^e sayd Dionisius in his Epistles writing of Dionisius Agiopagites, declareth of him how that he was first cōuerted to the Christian faith by S. Paule, according as in the actes is recorded, and afterwarde was made the first Byshop of Athens, but maketh there no mention of his booke de Hierarchia. Whereby it maye easely appeare, what is to be iudged of that booke. Furthermore, by the Epistles of the saide Dionisius Corint. this wee haue to vnderstande, to be the vse at that time in Churches to reade the letters and Epistles, such as were sent by learned Bishops and teachers vnto the Congregations, as may appeare by these words of Dionisius, who writing to y^e church of the Romanes, and to Soter saith. This day we celebrate the holy Dominical day. In which we haue read your Epistle, which alwaies we wil read for our exhortation,* like as we doe reade also the Epistle of Clement sent to vs before, &c. Euseb. ibid. where also mention is made of keepyng the Sondag holy. Whereof wee finde no mention made in auntient authors, before his time, except onely in Iustinus Martyr, who in his description declareth two tymes most especially vsed for Christen men to congregate together, first, when any conuert was to be Baptised. The second was vpon the Sondag, which was wont for ij. causes then to be halowed. First, because (saith he) vpon that day God made the worde, Secondlye, because that Christ vpon that day first shewed himselfe after his resurrection to his Disciples, &c.

Ouer and beside these aboue named, about the daies of Commodus,* wrote also Clemens Alexandrinus, a man of notable and singular learning, whose bookes, although for a great part be lost, yet certaine of them yet remaine wherin is declared among other thinges, the order and number of the bookes and Gospels of the new testament, &c.

The same time moreouer liued Pantenus, which was the first in Alexandria, that professed in open schoole to reade of whom is thought first to proceede the order and maner among the Christians to read and professe in Uniuersities This Pantenus for his excellency of learning was sent by Demetrius Bishop of Alexandria to preach to the Indeans,* where he founde the Gospell of S. Mathewe written in Hebrew, left there by S. Bartelinewe, which booke afterward he brought with him from thence, to the Library of Alexandria.

Duryng all the raigne of Commodus; God graunted rest & tranquility, although not without some bloudshed Page 54 of certaine holy Martyrs, as is aboue declared, vnto his Church. In the which time of tranquillitie, the Christians hauing now some laisure from the foraine enemy,* begā to haue a little contention among themselues, about the ceremonie of Easter: which contention albeit of long time before had bene stirring in the church as is before mentioned of Polycarpus and Anicetus: yet the variance and difference of that ceremonie brought no breach of Christian concorde and societie among them: Neither as yet did the matter excede so farre, but that the band of loue, and communion of brotherly life continued, although they differed in the ceremonie of the day. For they of the West Church pretending the tradition of Paule and Peter, but in deede beyng the traditiō of Hermes and of Pius, kept one day, which was vpon the Sunday after the 14. day of the first moneth. The Church of Asia following the ordinance of Iohn the Apostle, obserued an other, as more shalbe declared (the Lord willing) when we come to the tyme of Victor Bishop of Rome. In the meane tyme as concerning the fourth persecution, let this hetherto suffice.

The fift Persecution.

After the death of Commodus, raigned Pertinax but few monthes, after whom succeeded Seuerus. Under whom was raised the fift persecution against the christian saints: who rainging the terme of 18. yeares, the first x. yeares of the same, was very fauourable and curteous to the Christians. Afterward through sinister suggestions and malicio•s accusations of the malignāt,* was so incensed against them, that by Proclamations he commaunded no Christians any more to be suffered. Thus the rage of the Emperour beyng inflamed agaynst them, great persecution was stirred vpon euery side,* wherby an infinite nūber of Martyrs were slayne, as Eusebius in his sixt booke recordeth, which was about the yeare of our Lord,* 205. The crimes and false accusations obiected against the Christians, are partly touched before, pag. 37. as sedition and rebellion against the Emperour, sacriledge, murthering of Infants, incestuous polution, eating rawe flesh, libidinous cōmixture, whereof certaine in deede called then Gnostici, were infamed. Item, it was obiected against them, for worshipping the head of an Asse, which whereof it should rise, I finde no certain cause, except it were perhaps by y^e Iewes. Also they were charged for worshipping the sunne, for that peraduenture before the sunne rise, they conuented together, singing their morning Hymnes vnto the Lord, or els because they prayed toward y^e East: but especially for that they would not with them worship their idolatrous gods and were counted as enemies to all men. &c.

The Capitaines and Presidentes of this persecution vnder the Emperour were Hilarianus,*Vigellius, Claudius, Hermianus Ruler of Cappadocia, Cecilius, Capella, Vespronius, also Demetrius mentioned of Cyprian. And Aquila Iudge of Alexandria, of whom Euseb. Lib. 6. cap. 5. maketh relation.

The places where the force of this persecution most raged, were Affrica, Alexandria, Cappadocia, and Carthage.

The number of them that suffered in this persecution, by the report of the Ecclesiasticall story was innumerable.* Of whō the first was Leonides, the father of Origene, who was beheaded: with whō also Origene his sonne, beyng of the age thē of xvij. yeares, should haue suffered (such a seruent desire hee had to be Martired for Christ) had not hys mother priuily in the night season conueied away his clothes & his shirt.* Wherupō more for shame to be seen, then for feare to die, he was cōstrained to remaine at home: and when he could do nothing els, yet he writing to his father a letter with these words: Caue tibi, ne quid propter nos aliud quam martyrij constanter faciendi propositum cogites, that is, Take heede to your selfe, that you tourne not your thought and purpose for our sake,* &c. Such a feruency had this Origene being yet young, to the doctrine of Christes faith, by the operation of Gods heauenly prouidence, and partlye also by the diligent education of his Father, who brought him vp from his youth most studiously in all good literature, but especially in y^e reding & exercise of holy scripture, wherein he had such inward & mystical speculatiō, that many times he would moue questions to his father, of the meaning of this place, or y^t place in y^e scripture. Insomuch y^t his father diuers times would vncouer his brest being a sleepe,* & kisse it, giuing thanks to God which had made him so happy a father of such a happy child. After the death of his father, and all his goodes confiscated to the Emperour, he wyth his poore mother, and sixe brethren, beyng brought to such extreme pouerty, did sustaine both himself and them by teaching a schole. Til at length being wearye of y^t profession, he transferred his study onely to the knowledge and seeking of diuine Scripture, & such other learning conducible to the same. So much he profited both in the Hebrue and other touns, that he conferred y^r Hebrue text with the translation of the lxx. And moreouer did conferre and find out the other translations which we call the common translation of Aquila, of Symmachus, and Theodotion. Also he adioyned to these aforesaid other foure translations, wherof more is in the story of Eusebius expressed.

They that write of the life of Origene, testifie of him that he was of wit quicke and sharpe, much patient of labour, a great traueler in the tongues, of a spare dyet, of a straight life, a great faster, his teaching & his lining were both one: his going was much barefoot. A straight obseruer of that saying of the Lorde, bydding to haue but one coate, &c, he is said to haue written so much as seuen Notaries, & so many maides euery day could penne. The nūber of his bookes by the accōpt of Hierome, came to 7000. Uolumes, y^e copies whereof he vsed to sel for 3. d. or a little more, for the sustentation of his liuing. But of hym more shalbe touched hereafter. So zelous he was in the cause of Christ, and of Christes Martirs, that he nothing fearyng his owne perill would assist & exhort them going to theyr death, & kisse them, insomuch that he was oft in ieoperdie to be stoned of the multitude. And sometimes by the prouision of Christen men had his house garded about wyth souldiers, for the safety of them, which daily resorted to heare his readings, & many times he was cōpelled to shift places & houses, for such as laid waite for him in al places, But such was the prouidence of God to preserue him in the midst of all this tempest of Seuerus.

Among other which resorted vnto him, & were his hearers. Plutarchus, was one,* and died a martyr, & with him Serenus hys brother who was burned. The third after these was Heraclides, The fourth Heron, who were both beheaded. The fift, was an other Serenus also beheaded, Rhais, and Potamiena. who was tormented with pitch poured vpon her, & martyred with her mother, Marcella, who died also in the fyre. This Potamiena was of a fresh and flourishing beautie, who because she could not be remoued from her profession was committed to Basilides one of the Captaines there in the armie, to see the execution done, Basilides receyuing her at the Iudges hand, & leading her to the place, shewed to her some compassion in repressing the rebukes and raylinges of the wicked aduersaries: for the which Potamiena, the virgine, to requite againe his kindnes, bad him bee of good comfort, saying that she would pray y^e Lord to shewe mercy vpon him. And so went she to her Martyrdome, which she both strongly and quietly did sustaine.

Not long after it happened that Basilides was required to giue an othe in a matter cōcerning his fellowe souldiours: which thing he denied to doe,* plainly affirming y^e he was a Christian. For their othe then, was woont to be by the Idoles & the Emperor. At the first he was thought dissimulingly to iest, but after whē he was heard constantly, & in earnest to confirme the same, he was had before the iudge, and so by him committed towarde. The Christians marueiling thereat, as they came to him in the prison inquired of him the cause of that his sodaine conuersion. To whom he aunswered againe and saide, that Potamiena had praied for him to the Lord, & so he saw a crowne put vpon his head: adding moreouer that it should not be long, but he should be receiued. Which things thus done, y^e next day following, he was had to the place of execution, and there beheaded, Euseb. Lib. 6. cap. 5. Albeit the said Eusebius, giueth this story of no credite,* but onely of heare say, as he there expresseth.

As diuers and many there were that suffered in the daies of this Seuerus:* so some were againe which through the protection of God his prouidence, being put to great torments, yet escaped w^t life. Of whom was one Alexander who for his constant confessiō and torments suffered, was made Bishop afterwarde of Hierusalem, together with Narcissus, who being then an olde man of an hundred and threescore yeares and three, as sayeth Eusebius, was vnwiely for his age to gouerne that function alone.

Of this Narcissus is reported in the Ecclesiasticall historie, that certaine miracles by him were wrought verye notable,* if they be true. First of water by him turned into oyle at the solemne vigile of Easter, what time the cōgregation wanted oyle for their lampes. Another miracle is also told of him, which is this. There were three euill disposed persons, who seing the soundnes & graue constancy of his vertuous life, & fearyng their owne punishment, as a conscience that is giltie, is alwaies fearefull, thought to preuent his accusations, in accusing him first, & laying an haynous crime to his charge. And to make their accusatiō Page 55 more probable before the people, they bound their accusation with a great othe: One wishing to be destroyed with fire if he sayd not true. The other to bee consumed with a grievous sickenes. The third to loose both his eyes if they did lye. Narcissus although hauing his conscience cleare, yet not able beyng but one man to withstand their accusation bound with such othes gaue place, and remooued himself• from the multitude, into a solitarie desert by himself, where he continued the space of many yeares. In the meane time to them which so willingly and wickedly forswear themselves, this happened:* the first by casualtie of one litle smal sparkle of fire, was burnt with his goods and all his familie. The second, was taken with a great sicknesse from the top to the toe, and deuoured with the same. The third, hearing and seying the punishment of the other, confessed his fault, but through great repentance poured out such tears, that he lost both his eyes.* And thus was their false periurie punished. Narcissus after long absence returning home agayne, was by this meanes both cleared of the facte, and receiued into his bishoprike agayne. To whom, as is said, for impotencie of his age, Alexander was ioined with him in execution of the function. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. Lib. 6. cap. 10. Of this Alexander is recorded in the sayd Ecclesiasticall history, that after his agonies and constancie of his confessiō shewed in the persecution of Seuerus, he was admonished by a vision in the night season to make his iourney vp to Hierusalem & Palestina (for that place remained free from this persecution) to see there the congregation, & to pray. Thus he taking his iourney,* and drawing nere to the city, a vision with playne wordes was geuen to certaine chiefe heads of Hierusalem, to go out of the gate of the city, there to receiue the Bishop appointed to them of God. And so was Alexander met and receiued, and ioyned partner with aged Narcissus, as is before expressed in the Citie of Hierusalem, where he continued bishop about 40. yeares, vntill the persecution of Decius, and there crected a famous Libraric, where Eusebius had his chieftest helpe in writing his Ecclesiasticall history. He wrote also diuers Epistles to diuers churches, and licensed Origene openly to teach in his Church.* At length beyng very aged, was brought frō Ierusalem to Cesaria before the Iudge vnder Decius, where after his constant confession the second tyme, he was committed to prison, and there died.

Besides these that suffred in this persecution of Seuerus recited of Eusebius, Vincentius also, Lib. 11. cap. 6. Ex Martyrol. speaketh of one Andoclus,* whom Polycarpus before had sent into Fraunce: which Andoclus because he spread there the doctrine of Christ, was apprehended of Seuerus, and first beaten with stauies and battes, after was beheaded.

To these aboue named, may also be added Asclepiades, who although was not put to death in this persecution of Seuerus,* yet constantly he did abide the trial of his confessiō & suffered much for the same, as Alexander did before mentioned. Wherefore afterward he was ordained bishop of Antioch, where he continued the space of vij. yeares of whom Alexander writeth to the Church of Antioche, out of prison, much reioysing and geuing thanks to God, to heare that he was their Bishop.

About the same tyme during the raigne of Seuerus, died Irenaeus,* Henr. de Erfordia, Ado, and other Martyr writers, do hold, that he was martyred with a great multitude of other moe, for the confession and doctrine of Christ, about the fourth or fift yeare of Seuerus. This Irenaeus as he was a great writer, so was he greatly commended of Tertullian for his learning, whom he calleth omnium doctrinarum curiosissimum exploratorem: a great searcher of all kynde of learning. He was first scholer and hearer of Polycarpus, frō thence either was sent or came to Fraunce, and there by Photinus, and the rest of the Martyrs was instituted into the ministry, commended by their letter vnto Eleutherius, as is before premonished. At length after y^e Martyrdom of Photinus, he was appointed bishop of Lions, where he cōtinued about the space of 23. yeres. In y^e tyme of this Irenaeus, the state of the Church was much troubled, not only for the outward persecution of the foraine enemy, but also for diuers sectes and errors then stirring, against which he diligently laboured, and wrote much, although but few of his bookes be now remayning. The nature of this man well agreeyng with his name, was such, that he euer loued peace, and sought to set agreement when any controuersie role in the Church. And therefore, when the question of keeping the Easter day was renued to the Church, bebetwene Victor bishop of Rome, and the churches of Asia, and when Victor would haue excommunicated them as schisinatikes, for disagreeyng from him therein: Irenaeus with other brethren, of the French Church, sory to see such a contention among brethren for such a trifle, conuented themselues together in a common Councell, and directing their letter with their common consent subscribed, sent vnto Victor, intreating him to stay his purpose, & not to proceed in excommunicating his brethren for that matter. Although they themselues agreed with him in obseruing the Soday Easter as he did: yet with great reasons and arguments exhorted him not to deale so rigorously with his other brethren, following the ancient custome of their coūtreȳ maner in that behalf. And beside this he wrote diuers other letters abroad concerning the same contentiō, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of no force.

Not long after Irenaeus followed also Tertullian about the tyme of this Seuerus,* and Antoninus Carcalla his sonne, a man both in Greeke and Latin wel expert, hauing great gifts in disputing, and in writing eloquent, as his bookes declare, & as the commendation of al learned men doth testifie no lesse. To whom Vincentius Lirinensis geueth such prayse, that he calleth him the floure of all Latine writers, and of the eloquence of his stile so he writeth, that with the force of his reasons, he saith, whom he could not persuade, them he cōpelled to consent vnto him. How many words, so many sentences, and how many sentences, so many victories he had, &

Such men of doing and writing, God raiseth vp from tyme to tyme, as pillers and stayes for his poore Church, as he did this Tertullian in these dangerous dayes of persecution. For whē the christians were vexed with wrongs,* & falsly accused of the Gentils, Tertullian taking their cause in hand, defendeth them against the persecutors, & against their slaunderous accusations: First, that they neuer minded any styre or rebellion, either against the Empire or Emperours of Rome: forsomuch as the vse of Christians was to pray for the state of their Emperours and gouernours. And where as they were accused falsly to bee enemies to all mankind,* how could that be (saith Tertullian to Scapula) seyng the proper office of the Christians is by their profession to pray for all men, to loue their enemies, neuer requiting euil for euil, when as all other do loue but onely their friends, and scarcely them? As touching the horrible slaunder of murdering infants, how can that be true in the Christians (saith he)▪ whose order is to abstayne from all bloud, & strangled: in so much, that it is not lawful for thē to touch the bloud of any beast at their tables when they feede? From filthy copulation no sort more free then they: which are and euer hath ben the greatest obseruers of chastitie, of whom, such as may, liue in perpetuall Uirginitie all their life, such as cannot, contract matrimony, for auoyding all whoredom and fornication. Neither can it be proued of the christians to worship the sunne, which false surmise, Tertulliā declareth to rise hereof,* for that the maner of the Christians was to pray toward the East. Much lesse was there any of them so mad as to worship an Asses head whereof the occasion beyng taken onely of the Iewes, the slaunder therof therefore he prooueth to be falsly and wrōgfully laid to the charge of the Christians.

And likewise against all other lies and slaunders, obiected of the Heathen against the Christians, the sayd Tertullian purgeth the Christians, declaring them falsly to be belied, & wrongfully persecuted, not for any defect of theirs but only for the hatred of their name. And yet notwithstāding by the same persecutions, he prooueth in the same Apologie, the religion of the christians nothing to be empai red, but rather encreased. The more (saith he) we are mowen doune of you,* the moe rise vp. The bloud of Christians is seede. For what man sayth he, in beholding the painfull torments, and the perfect patience of them will not search and inquire what is in the cause? And when he hath found it out, who will not agree vnto it? And when he agreeth to it, who will not desire to suffer for it? Thus (faith he) this sect will neuer die, which the more it is cutdout, the more it groweth. For euery man seing and wondring at the sufferance of the Saints, is moued the more therby to search the cause in searching, he findeth it, and in finding, he followeth it. Tertul in eodem Apolog.

Thus Tertullian in this daungerous tyme of persecution, being stirred vp of God, defended the innocēcie of the Christians, against the blasphemy of the aduersaries, and moreouer for the instruction of the church compiled many fruitfull workes, whereof some are extant, some are not to be found.* Notwithstanding the great learning & famous vertues of this worthy mā, certaine errors and blemishes are noted in his doctrine, as were before both of Origine, & Irenaeus, and likewise of them were they neuer so excellent, that followed them. Which errors all here in order to note and comprehend, were too long a matter for this story to prosecute. This by the way shall be sufficient to admonish the Reader, neuer to looke for any such perfection of any Page 53 man in this world, how singular so euer he be (Christ onely excepted) but some blemishe or other ioyneth himselfe withall, whereof more perchaunce shall be sayd when we come to Cyprian.

And now to returne agayne to the order of bishops of Rome intermitted: after Eleutherius afore mentioned, next in the bishoprike of Rome succeded Victor, who as Platina sayth, died quietly in the dayes of Seuerus. But Damasus Supplementum, Lib. 8. and such as folow the common Chronicles, affirme that he died a Martyr, after he had sitten x. or as some say xij. yeares. This Victor was a great styrrer (as partly before is signified) in the controuersie and contention of Easterday. For the which he would haue proceded in excommunication against the churches of Asia, had not Irenaeus then bishop of Lions, with the counsaile of other his brethren there assēbled, repressed his intended violence. As touching that cōtrouersie of Easter in those daies of the primitiue Church, the originall thereof was this, as Eusebius, Socrates, Platina, and other record. First, certain it is, that the Apostles onely being intentiue and attendaunt to the doctrine of saluation, gaue no heed nor regard to the obseruation of dayes & times, neither bound the Church to any ceremoni•s and rites, except those things necessary mentioned in the Actes of the Apostles, as strangled and bloud, which was ordayned then of the holy Ghost, notwithstanding a most vrgent and necessary cause, touched partly in y^e history before. For when the murdering and bloud of Infants was commonly objected by the Heathen perse•utors agaynst the Christians, they had no other argumēt to help thēselues, nor to refell the aduersarie, but only their own law, by the which they were commaūded to abstaine not onely from all mens bloud, but also from the bloud of all cōmon beastes. And therefore that law seemeth by the holy Ghost to be geuen, & also to the same end & continued in the Church, so long as the cause, that is the persecutions of the Heathen Gentiles continued. Beside these we read of no other ceremonies or rites, which the Apostles greatly regarded, but left such things free to the libertie of Christians, euery man to vse therein his own discretion, for the vsing or not vsing thereof. Whereupon, as concerning all the ceremoniall obseruations of dayes, tymes, places, meates, drinks, vestures, and such other, of all these things neither was the diuersitie among men greatly noted, nor any vniformitie greatly required. In so much, that Irenaeus writing to Victor of the tradition of dayes,* and of fastings, and of the diuersitie of these things then vsed among y^e primitiue fathers, saith: Nihilominus omnes Illi pacem inter se retinuerunt, & retinemus etiam nū, & leuiunij dissonantia, fidei concordiam commendat, &c. That is, Notwithstanding all this varietie, all they kept peace among themselves, & yet we keepe it still, and this difference of fasting among vs, commendeth more the concord of faith. And so long did the doctrine of Christian libertie remaine whole & sounde in the Church till the tyme of Victor,* which was about the yeare of our Lord, 200. Although the diuersitie of these vsages, began something before also in the dayes of Pius and Anicetus, about the yere of our Lord, 163. to be misliked: yet restraint hereof was not so much vrged before, as in y^e tune of Victor. And yet neither did the violēce of Victor take such place, but that the doctrine of Christian libertie was defended and maintained by meanes of Irenaeus and other, and so continued in the Church till after the Councell of Nice. And thus much concerning the doctrine of Christian libertie of the differences of rites and ceremonies.

Now to returne to Victor agayne, to shew what diuersitie there was in obseruing the day of Easter, and how it came, thus is the story: First, in the tyme of Pius and Anicetus, an. 163. the questiō of Easter day began first to be moued, at what tyme Pius, by the reuelation of Hermes, decreed the obseruatiō of that day to be chaunged from the wonted maner of the 14. day of the moone in the first moneth, vnto the next Sunday after. After him came Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius Bishops of Rome, which also determined the same.* Agaynst these stode Melito. Bishop of Sardis, Polycarpus, and as some thinke, Egesippus, with other learned men of Asia which Polycarpus being sent by the brethren of Asia, came to Rome as is aforesayd, to cōferre with Anicetus in that matter: wherein when they could not agree after long debating, yet notwithstanding, they did both cōmunicate together with reuerēce, & departed in peace. And so the celebration of Easterday remained Adiaphoron, as a thing indifferent in the Church, till the time of Victor. Who folowing after Anicetus and hys fellowes, and chiefly stirring in this matter, endeouored by all meanes and might, to draw, or rather subdue the Churches of Asia vnto hys opinion, thinking moreouer to excommunicate all those Byshops and churches of Asia, as heretickes and schismatickes, which disagreed from the Romaine order, had not Irenaeus otherwise restrayned him from that doyng,* as is aforesayd, whiche was about the yeare of our Lord .191. in the reigne of Commodus. Thus then began the vniformitie of keeping that holy day to be first required, as a thing necessary, & all they accompted as heretickes and schismatickes, which dissented from y^e Bishop & traditiō of Rome.

With Victor stode Theophilus Byshop of Cesar•a, Narcissus of Hierusalem, Irenaeus of Lyons, Palmas of Pontus, Banchillus of Corinthe, the Byshop of D••roena, and other moe. All which condescended to haue the celebration of Easter vpon the Sunday, because they would differ frō the Iewes in all things, as neare as they might, and partly because the resurrection of the Lord fell on the same day.

On the contrary side diuers Byshop were in Asia, of whom the principall was Policrates Byshop of Ephesus, who being assembled with a great multitude of Bishops and brethren of those parties,* by the common assent of the rest, wrote agayne to Victor, and to the Church of Rome, declaring, that they had euer from the beginning obserued that day, according to the rule of Scripture vnchaunged, neither adding nor altering any thing frō the same. Alledging moreouer for them the examples of the Apostles and holy fathers their predecessours, as Phillip the Apostle, with hys three daughters at Hierapolis: also Iohn the Apostle and Euangelist at Ephesus, Polycarpus at Smyrna Thraseas at Eumenia, Byshoppe and Martyr, lykewise of Sagaris at Laodicea Byshop and Mattyr, Holy Papyrius, and Melito at Sardis. Beside these bishops also of his own kindred,* and his owne aunceters, to the number of seuen which all were bishops before him, & he the eight now after them. All which obserued (saith he) the solemnitie of the same day, after the same wi•e and sort as we do now.

Victor being not a litle mooued herewith,* by letters agayne denounceth against them (more bold vpon authoritie, then wi•e in his commission) violent excommunicatiō, Albeit by the wise handlyng of Irenaeus, and other learned men, that matter was staid, and Victor otherwise perswaded. What the perswasīōs of Irenaeus were, partly may appeare in Euseb. Lib. 5. cap. 26. the summe whereof tendeth to this effect: That the variance and difference of ceremonies is no straunge matter in the Church of Christ,* when as this varietie is not onely in the day of Easter, but also in the maner of fasting, & in diuers other vsages among the christian. For some fast one day, some two days, some other fast moe. Other there be, which counting xl. houres, both day & night, take that for a ful dayes fast. And this so diuers fashion of fasting in the church of Christ, began not onely in this our tyme, but was before among our fore elders. And yet notwithstanding they with all this diuersity, were in vnitie among themselues, and so be we, neyther both this difference of ceremonies any thing hinder, but rather commendeth the concorde of fayth. And bringeth forth the examples of the fathers of Telesphorus,*Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and such other, who neither obserued the same vsage themselues, neither prescribed it to others, and yet notwithstanding kept christian charitie with such as came to cōmunicate with them, not obseruing the same forme of things which they obserued, as well appeared by Polycarpus and Anicetus, which although they agreed not in one vniforme custome of rites, yet refused not to cōmunicate together, the one geuing reuerence vnto the other. Thus the controuersie being taken vp betwene Irenaeus & Victor, remained free to the time of Nicene Councell. Haec ex Iren. Eusebius. And thus much cōcerning the controuersie of that matter, and concerning the doings of Victor.

After Victor, succeeded in the sea of Rome Zephyrinus, in the dayes of the foresayd Seuerus,* about the yeare of our Lord .203. To this Zephyrinus be ascribed two Epistles, in the first Tome of the Councels. But as I haue sayd before of the decretall Epistles of other Romaine Bishops: so I say and verily suppose of this, that neither the countenāce of the stile, nor the matter therin contained, nor the condition of the •yme,* doth otherwise giue to thinke of these letters, but that they be verily bastard letters, not written by these fathers, nor in these tymes, but craftily and wickedly pact in by some, which to set vp y^e primacie of Rome, haue most pestilently abused the authoritie of these holy & auncient fathers, to deceaue the simple Church. For who is so rude, but that in considering onely the state of those terrible tymes, may easily vnderstand except affectiō blind him, beside a number of other probable coniectures to lead him, that the poore persecuted bishops in that time, would haue bene glad to haue any safe couert to put their heades in: so far was it of, that they had any lust or laisure, thē to seeke for any Primacie or Patriarkeship, or to driue all other churches to appeale to the sea of Rome, or to exempt Page 57 all Priests from the accusation of any lay man: as in the first Epistle of Zephyrinus is to be seene,* written to the Bishops of Sicilia, And likewise the second Epistle of his, to the Bishops of the prouince of Egypt, containing no maner of doctrine, nor consolation necessary for that time, but only certain ritual decrees to no purpose, argueth no lesse but the said epistles neither to sauor of that man, nor taste of the tyme.

Of like credite also seemeth the constitution of the Patines of glasse,* which Damasus sayth that the same Zephyrinus ordained to be caried before the Priest, at the celebratiō of the Masse.

Againe Platina writeth that he ordained the ministration of the Sacramēt to be no more vsed in vessels of wood, or of glasse, or of any other mettall, except only siluer, gold, and tinne, &c. But how these two testimonies of Damasus and Platina ioyned together, let the reader iudge: especially seying the same decree is referred to Vrbanus, that came after him. Againe, what needed this decree of golden chalices to be stablished afterward in the Councell of Tybur and Rhenes,* if it had bene enacted before by Zephyrinus? How long this Zephyrinus sate, our writers do varie. Eusebius sayth, he died in the raigne of Caracalla, and sate 17. yeares, Platina writeth that he died vnder Seuerus, and sate 8. yeares, and so saith also Nauclerus. Damasus affirmeth that he sate 16. yeares and two monthes.

Matthaeus author of the story intituled, Flores Historiarū, with other latter Chronicles,* maketh mention of Perpetua, and Felicitas, and Reuocatus, her brother, also of Saturninus and Satyrus brethren, and Secundulus, which in the persecution of this Seuerus, gaue ouer their liues to Martyrdome for Christ, beyng throwen to wild beasts, and deuoured of the same, in Carthage and in Affrike, saue that Saturninus brought agayne from the beasts, was beheaded, and Secūdulus dyed in prison, about the yeare of our Lord, 202. as writeth Florilegus.

This Seuerus the persecutor raigned, as the most part of writers accord the terme of 18. yeares, who about y^e latter tyme of his raigne, came with his army hether into Britaine, where after many conflictes had with the Britains, in the borders of the North, he cast vp a ditche with a mighty walle made of earth and turues, & strong stakes, to the length of 132. myles from the one side of the sea to the other, beginning at Tine, and reached to the Scottish sea, which done, he remooued to Yorke, and there by the breaking in of the Northren men and the Scots, was besieged and slaine, about the yere of our Lord, 214. leauing behind him two sonnes, Bassianus, and Geta. which Bassianus surnamed Caracalla,* after he had slayne his brother Geta here in Britaine, gouerned the Empire alone, the space of sixe yeares.* After whose death, he beyng slayne also of his seruants (as he had slayne his brother before) succeded Macrinus with his sonne Diadumenus, to be Emperour, who after they had raigned one yeare, were both slayne of their owne people.

After them followed Varius Heliogabalus, in the empire, rather to be called a Monster, then a man, so prodigious was his life in all glotonie, filthines, and ribaudry. Such was his pompe,* that in his lampes he vsed balme, & filled his fishpodes with rosewater. To let passe his sumptuous vestures which he would not weare but only of gold,* and most costly silkes: his shoes glistering with precious stones finely engraued he was neuer ij. dayes serued with one kynd of meate, he neuer wore one garment twise, and likewise for his fleshly wickednes: some dayes his company was serued at meale with the braynes of Ostriges, and a straunge foule called Phenocapterie, an other day with the touns of Popiniayes, and other sweete singing birdes. Beyng nye to the sea, he neuer vsed fish: in places farre distant from the sea, all his house was serued with most delicate fishes. At one supper he was serued with 7000. fishes, and 5000. foules. At his remoouing in his progresse,* often there followed him 600. chariots, laden only with baudes, common harlots, and ribaudes. He sacrificed with young children, and preferred to the best aduancementes in the common weale, most light personages, as baudes, Minstrels, Carters, and such like. In one word he was an enemy to all honesty & good order. And when he was foretold by his Sorcerers and Astronomers, that he should dye a violent death, he prouided ropes of silke to hang himselfe, swordes of gold to kill himselfe▪ and strong poyson in Iacincts and Emeraudes to poyson himself, if needs he must thereto be forced.* Moreouer, he made an high tower, hauing the floore of boordes couered with gold plate, bordred with precious stones, frō the which toure he would throw himself downe, if he should be pursued of his enemies. But notwithstanding all his prouision, he was slayne of the souldiours, drawen through the Citie, and cast into Tiber after he had raigned two yeres and viij. monthes, as witnesseth Eutropius, other say foure yeres.

This Heliogabalus hauing no issue,* adopted to his sōne and heyre Aurelius Alexander Seuerus, the sonne of Mammea who entring his raigne the yeare of our Lorde, 224. cōtinued 13. yeares,* well commended for vertuous, wise, gētle, liberal, & to no man hurtful. And as he was not vnlearned himself, through the diligent education of Mammea his mother, so he was a great fauourer of men, wise and learned. Neither did he any thing in the common weale, without the assistance of learned and sage counsailors.* It is reported of him, to beare such stomacke against corrupt iudges, that when he chaunced to meete with any of them, by the commotion of his mind, he would cast vp choler, being so mooued with them that he could not speake, and was redy with his two fingers to put out their eyes. From his court he dismissed all superfluous and vnneedful seruants saying, that he was no good pupil, which fed idle seruants with the bowels of his common weale.

Among his other good vertues, it appeareth also that he was frendly and fauourable vnto the Christians, as by this act may be gathered: For when the christians had occupied a certaine publike place in some good vse, belike for the assembling and conuenting together of the congregation, the company of the Cookes or tiplers, made challenge of that place to belōg vnto thē. The matter being brought before the Emperour, he iudged it more honest, the place to serue to the worship of God, howsoeuer it were, then to the dirtie slubbering of Cookes and Skullians.

By this it may be vnderstand,* that in Rome no Christian churches were erected vnto this tyme, when as yet (notwithstanding this fauour of the Emperour) no publike house could quietly be obtained for the christians. So that by the reason hereof may appeare the decretall epistle and ordinance of Pope Higynus concerning the dedication of churches aboue mentioned, pag. 53. to bee falsified. And likewise the ordinaunce of Pius his successour, concernyng the Altar, or Superaltare, to be also false. For what Superaltare was it like, they had in the tyme of Higynus and Pius, when as at this tyme which was long after, no publike place almost could be graunted them for the Christians to assemble together?

Of this Alexander, Platina writeth, that as hee was a great hater of all boasters & flatterers,* so he was of suche prudence, that no deceit could escape him, and bringeth in a story of one Turinus, who had gotten craftily many great bribes and gifts, in making the people beleue that he was of great authoritie with the Emperour, and that he could helpe them to haue whatsoever they sued for. Whereof the Emperour being certified,* caused him in the open market to be fastned to a stake, and there killed with smoke, where the Crier stood thus crying to the people: Smoke he sold, and with smoke he is punished.

Mammea the mother of this Alexander aboue mentioned (whom Hierome calleth a deuout and religious woman) hearing of the same and the excellent learning of Origene, being then at Alexandria, sent for him to Antioche, desirous to heare and see him▪ Unto whom the foresayd Origene according to her request, resorted, and after that he had there remained a space with the Emperour, and his mother, returned againe to Alexandria.

And thus continued this good Emperor his raigne the space of 13. yeares, at length at a commotion in Germany, with his mother Mammea he was slaine. After whome succeeded Maximinus, contrary to the mynd of the Scuate, only appointed by the souldiours to be Emperour. During all this tyme betwene Seuerus and this Maximinus, the church of Christ, although it had not perfect peace, yet it had some meane tranquillitie from persecution. Albeit some Martyrs there were at this tyme that suffred,* whereof Nauclerus giueth this reason: For although (saith he) Alexander beyng perswaded through the entreating of his mother Māmea, did fauour the Christians: yet notwithstanding, there was no publike Edict or Proclamation prouided for their safegard. By reasō wherof, diuers there were which suffered Martyrdome vnder Almachius & other iudges.* In the number of whom after some stories, was Calixtus Bishop of Rome, who succeeded next vnto Zephyrinus; aboue mentioned. And after him Vrbanus also, which both beyng Bishops of Rome, did both suffer, by the opiniō of some writers, vnder Alexander Seuerus.

This Calixtus in his two decretal Epistles, written to Benedictus,* and to the Bishops of Fraunce, geueth these ordinances, that no actions or accusations agaynst the Prelates or teachers of the church should be receaued, that no secret conspiracies should be made against bishops. Item, no man to communicate with persons excōmunicate. Also Page 58 no bishop to excommunicate or to deale in an other Dioces.* And here he expoundeth the Dioces or the Parish of any bishop or minister to be his wife. The wife (sayth the Apostle) is bound to the law, so long as the husbād liueth, when he is dead, she is free from the law: So (saith Calixtus) the wife of a bishop (which is his Church) so long as he liueth, is bound duely to him, neither ought to be iudged or disposed by any other man, without his will and iudgement: after his death she is free from the lawe, to marrie to whō she will, so it be in the Lord, that is, regulariter, regularly. In the end of the sayd his epistle decretall, he confuteth the error of them which hold, that they which are fallen, are not to be receiued agayne. Which heresie after the tyme of Calixtus or Calistus, came in first by Nouatus, in the dayes of Cornelius. Moreouer, in his sayd first Epistle decretall, is contayned the fast of the foure tymes, commonly called the Imber fast,* whereof also Marianus Scotus, maketh mention. But Damasus speaking of the same fast, sayth, he ordayned the fast but of three tymes, which was for the encrease of corne, wyne, and oyle.

By these hetherto premised, it is not hard for a quicke Reader to smel out the crafty iugling of that person or persons whosoeuer they were, y^e falsly haue ascribed these decretall institutions to those holy fathers. For first, what laysure had the Christians to lay in their accusations against their bishops, when we neuer read nor finde in any story any kynde of variaunce in those dayes among them, but all loue, mutuall compassion, and harty communion among the Saintes. And as we read of no variaunce among the people in those dayes, nor of any fault or backsliding among the Bishops, who for the most part then died all constant Martirs: so neither do we read of any tribunall seat or Consistorie vsed or frequented then about any such matters. Agayne, if a man examine well the dangers of those busie days, he shall see the poore flocke of the christians, so occupied and piteously oppressed by the cruell accusations of the Heathen Infidels, that though the cause did, yet the tyme would not serue them to commense any law against their bishops. Secōdly, as touching their conspiracie against bishops, what conspiracie either would they then practise agaynst them, which always gaue their liues for their defence? Or how could they then conspire in any cōpanies together, when neuer a true thristian man durst once put his head out of his dores, neither was there in the church any Christian man in those perilous dayes, except he were a true man in deed, such as was farre from all false conspiracies? And when as all the world almost in all places conspired agaynst them: What tyme, what cause, or what hart trow ye could they haue to cōspire against their instructors? Thirdly, concerning the confutation of that heresie, how standeth the confutation with the tyme of Calistus, whē Nouatus the author of that heresie was after him in the tyme of Cornelius? Fourthly, if by the lawe of Calixtus, euery Dioces be the proper wife of euery bishop or minister, then how many bishops wiues, and persons wiues hath the adulterous Pope of Rome defloured in these latter dayes of the Church, which so proudly and impudently hath intermedled and taken his pleasure & his owne profit in euery Dioces and Parish almost through all Christendome, without all leaue and licence of the good man, who hath bene in the meane tyme, * & yet is compelled stil, where so euer the Popes holines commeth, Vigilante sternere naso, and to giue him leaue vnasked, to do what he list. Wherefore if this Canon decretall be truly his, why is it not obserued, so as it doth stand without exceptiō? If it bee not, why is it then falsly forged vpon him, and the Church of Christ deceaued? And certes, lamentable it is, that this falsifyng of such trifling traditions vnder the false pretēce of antiquitie, either was begon in the Church, to deceaue the people: or that it hath remayned so long vndetected. For as I thinke, the church of Christ will neuer be perfectly reformed, before these decretall constitutions & Epistles which haue so long put on the visard of antiquitie, shalbe fully detected, and appeare in their owne colour, wherein they were first paynted.

And yet neither do I say this, or thinke contrary, but that it may be, that bishops of Rome and of the same name haue bene the true authors of these traditions: but here cōmeth in the error (as I credibly suppose) that when other later bishops of the like name, haue deuised these ceremoniall inuentions, the vulgar opinion of men hath transferred them to the first primitiue fathers, * although beyng of an other time, yet bearing the same name with the true inuentors thereof. But of Calixtus enough: who as Damasus sayth in the dayes of this Alexander Seuerus, died a Martyr. Vincentius affirmeth that he was tied to a great stone, and so out of a window was thrown into a ditch. Eusebius speakyng of his death, maketh no mention of his Martyrdom, and sayth he sate v. yeares. Platina sayth vj. yeres, * Sabellicus giueth him vij. yeares, and so doth Damasus.

After Calistus folowed Vrbanus, about the yeare of our Lord 227. * who in his epistle decretall (comming out of the same forge) which he wrote in common to all bishops, making no mention of the heauy persecutions of the Church, nor ministring any exhortation of comfort or constancie to the brethren, onely geueth many straight precepts, for not transporting or alienating the goods of the Church, and to pay truly their off•••ngs, which they vow: also to haue all common among the Clergie. * Moreouer, about the ende of his epistle he instituteth the confirmation of children after Baptisme (which the Papistes bee woont to take into the number of their vii. Sacraments) affirming and denouncing more then Scripture will beare, that the imposition of the Bishops hand bringeth the holy ghost, and thereby to be made full Christiās, &c. But of these decretall epistles inough is sayd before, more may bee considered of the discrete Reader. Marianus Scotus, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, & other late story writers doe hold as is aforesayd, * that he dyed a Martyr in the dayes of Alexander Seuerus, after he had gouerned that seat, 4. yeares, as Damasus and Platina do witnes, as Marianus sayth, eight yeares.

The same Damasus and Platina do testifie of him, that he by his preaching and holines of life cōuerted diuers Ethnikes to the fayth.* Among whom were Tiburtius, and Valerianus the husband of Cecilia, which both being noble men of Rome, remained constant in the fayth vnto the end and Martyrdome.

Of this Cecilia thus it is written in the Martyrologe by Ado,* that Cecilie the virgin, after she had brought Valerian her husband espoused, and Tiburtius his brother to the knowledge and fayth of Christ, and with her exhortations had made them constant vnto Martyrdome: after the suffryng of them she was also apprehended by Almachius the ruler, and brought to the Idols to do sacrifice, which thing when she abhorred to do, she should be presented before the iudge to haue the condēnation of death. In the meane time the Sergeants and officers which were about her, beholdyng her comely beautie, and the prudent behauior in her conuersation, began with many persuasions of wordes to sollicite her mynd, to fauour her selfe, and that so excellent beautie, and not to cast her selfe away, &c. But she agayne so replied to them with reasons & godly exhortations, that by the grace of almighty God their hartes began to kindle and at length to yeld to that Religion, which before they did persecute. Which thing she perceauing, desired of the iudge Almachius a litle respite. Which beyng graunted, she sendeth for Vrbanus the Bishop home to her house, to stablish and ground them in the fayth of Christ. And so were they, with diuers other at the same tyme Baptised, both men & women, to the number (as the story sayth) of 400. persons, among whome was one Gordianus a noble man. This done, this blessed Martyr was brought before the iudge,* where she was condemned: then after was brought to the house of the Iudge, where she was enclosed in a whote bath, but she remayning there a whole day & night without any hurt, as in a cold place, was brought out again, and cōmaundement giuen that in the bath she should be beheaded. The executor is said to haue foure strokes at her necke, & yet her head beyng cut off, she (as the story geueth) liued three days after. And so died this holy Virgine martyr, whose body in the night season Vrbanus the bishop tooke and buried among the other Bishops. Ado the compiler of this Martyrologe addeth that this was done in y^e tyme of Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus. But that cannot be, for so much as Vrbanus by all histories, was long after those Emperors, and liued in the dayes of this Alexander as is aboue declared. Antoninus, Bergomēsis, Equilinus with such other writers, set forth this history with many strāge miracles, wrought by the said Cecilia, in conuerting her husband Valerianus, and his brother, in shewyng them the Angell which was the keeper of her virginite, and of the Angell putting on crowns vpon their heads. But as touching these miracles, as I do not dispute whether they be true or fabulous: so because they haue no ground vpon any ancient or graue authors, but taken out of certain new Legends, I do therfore referre them thether from whence they came.

Under the same Alexander diuers other there be whom Bergomensis mentioned to haue suffred martyrdom,* as one Agapitus of the age of xv. yeares, who beyng apprehended and condemned at Preneste in Italy, because he would not sacrifice to Idoles, was assayled with sundry tormentes: first with whips scourged, then hanged vp by the feete, after hauing hote water poured vpon him, at last cast to the Page 59 wild beasts, with all which tormentes, when he could not be hurt,* finally with sword was beheaded. The executor of these punishments (as by Henricus Erford, may be gathered) was one Antiochus, who in the executing of the foresayd tormentes, sodenly fell downe from his iudiciall seate, crying out, that al his inward bowels burned within him and so gaue vp the breath, Henr. de Erfordia, Lib. 6. cap. 29.

Also with the same Agapitus is numbred Calepodius a minister of Rome, whose body first was drawn through the citie of Rome, & after cast into Tiber. Bergo. ibidem.

Then followeth Pammachius a Senatour of Rome, w^t his wife and children, and other both men and women, to the number of xlii.

Item an other noble Senator of Rome named Simplicius all which together in one day had their heads smitten off, and their heads after hanged vp in diuers gates of the Citie, for a terrour of other, that none should professe the name of Christ.

Beside these suffred also Quiritius a noble man of Rome, who with his mother Iulia, and a great number moe, were put likewise to death.

Also Tiberius and Valerianus, Citizens of Rome, and brethren, suffered (as Bergomensis sayth) the same tyme, who first being bruised and broken with bats, after were beheaded.

Also Vincentius, Bergomensis, and Erfordiensis, make mētion of Martina a Christian virgine, which after diuers bitter punishments, beyng constant in her fayth, suffered in like maner by the sword.

Albeit as touching the tyme of these forenamed Martyrs, as I find them not in elder writers: so do I suppose them to suffer vnder Maximinus, or Decius, rather then vnder Alexander.

The sixt Persecution.

After the death of Alexander the Emperour, who with his mother Mammea (as is said) was mured in Germany folowed Maximinus, chosen by the will of the souldiours, rather then by the authority of the Senate, about the yeare of our Lord, 237. who for the hatred hee had to the house of Alexander (as Eusebius recordeth) raysed vp the vi. persecution against the Christians: especially against the teachers and leaders of the Church, thinking thereby the sooner to vanquish the rest, if the captains of them were remooued out of the way. Whereby I suppose rather y^e Martyrdome of Vrbanus the bishop, and of the rest aboue specified,* to haue happened vnder the tyranny of this Maximinus then vnder Alexander. In the tyme of this persecution, Origene wrote his booke De Martyrio: which booke if it were extant would geue vs some knowledge, I doubt not, of such as in this persecution did suffer, which now lye in silence vnknowne. And no doubt but a great number they were, & moe should haue bene, had not the prouidēt mercy of God shortened his dayes, & brideled his tyranny, for he raigned but three yeares. After whom succeeded Gordianus an 240. a man no lesse studious for the vtilitie of the commō wealth,* as mild and gentle to the christians. This Gordian after he had gouerned with much peace and tranquillitie the Monarchie of Rome the space of vj.* yeares was slayne of Philip Emperour after him.

In the dayes of these Emperours aboue recited, was Pontianus bishop of Rome, who succeeded next after Vrbanus aboue rehersed, about the yeare of our Lord, 236. in the xij. yeare of Alexander, as Eusebius, Lib. 6. cap. 28. noteth: declaring him to sit vj. yeares. Contrary Damasus and Platina write, that he was bishop ix. yeares and a halfe. And that in the tyme of Alexander, he with Philippus his Priest was banished into Sardina, and there died, But it semeth more credible that he was banished rather vnder Maximinus, and died in the beginning of the raigne of Gordianus. In his Epistles decretal (which seeme likewise to be fayned) he appeareth very deuout, after the common example of other bishops to vphold the dignitie of Priests, and of Clergie men, saying: that God hath them so familiar with him, that by them he accepteth the offrings and oblations of other, and forgiueth their sinnes, and reconcileth them vnto him. Also, that they do make the body of the lord with their owne mouth, and geue it to other, &c. Which doctrine how it standeth with the Testament of God, & glory of Christ, let the Reader vse his owne iudgement.

Other notable fathers also in the same time were raysed vp in the church, as Philetus Bishop of Antioch, which succeded after Asclepiades afore mentioned,*an. 220. and after him Zebennus bishop of the same place, an. 231.

To these also may be added Ammonius the schoolemaister of Origene, as Suidas supposeth, also the kinsmen of Porphyry the great enemy of Christ. Notwithstanding, this Ammonius endued w^t better grace,* as he left diuers bookes in defence of Christes religion: so he did constantly perseuere (as Eusebius reporteth) in y^e doctrine of Christ, which he had in the beginning receaued, who was about y^r days of Alexander.

Iulius Aphricanus also about the tyme of Gordianus aforesayd, is numbred among the old and auncient writers, of whom Nicephorus writeth to be the scholer of Origene, and a great writer of histories of that tyme.

Unto these Doctors and Confessors may be adioyned the story of Natalius;* mentioned in the fift booke of Eusebius. This Natalius had suffred persecution before like a constant confessor, who being seduced and persuaded by Asclepiodotus and Theodorus (which were the Disciples of Theodorus) to take vpon him to be bishop of their sect, promising to geue him euery month an hundreth and fiftie pieces of siluer, and so he ioyning himselfe to them, was admonished by vision and reuelatiō from the Lord. For such was the great mercy of God, and of our Lord Christ Iesu, that he would nor his Martyr, which had suffered so much for his name before, now to perish out of his church. For the which cause (sayth Eusebius) God by certaine visions did admonish him.* But he not taking great heede thereunto, beyng blynded partly with lucre, partly with honor, was at length all the night long scourged of the Angels: In so much that he beyng made thereby very fore, and early on the morow putting on sackcloth, with much weeping and lamentation went to Zephyrinus the bishop aboue mentioned, where he falling down before him and all the Christian congregation, shewed them the stripes of his body, and prayed them for the mercies of Christ, that he might be receiued into their communion again, from which he had sequestred himselfe before. And so was admitted according as he desired.

After the decease of Pontianus Bishoppe of Rome afore mentioned,* succeeded next in that place Anterius of whom Isuardus writeth that Pontianus departing away, did substitute him his roome. But Eusebius writeth that he succeeded immediately after him. Damasus sayth, that because he caused the actes and deathes of the Martyrs to be written, therefore he was put to martirdome himselfe, by Maximinus the Iudge.* Concerning the tyme of this Byshop, our writers do greatly iarre. Eusebius and Marianus Scotus affirme that he was Bishop but one moneth. Sabellicus sayth that not to be so. Damasus assigneth to him xii. yeares & one moneth. Volateranus, Bergomensis, and Henricus Erford, geue to him three yeares & one moneth. Nauclerus writeth that he sat one yeare and one moneth. All which are so farr discrepant one from an other, that which of them most agreeth with truth, it lyeth in doubt. Next to this Bishop was Fabianus, of whom more is to be sayd hereafter.

Of Hippolytus,* also both Eusebius and Hieronymus maketh mention that he was a bishop, but where, they make no relation. And so likewise doth Theodoretus witnes him to be a bishop, and also a Martyr, but namyng no place. Gelasius contra Eutichen sayth, he dyed a Martyr, and that he was bishop of an head Citie in Arabie. Nicephorus writeth, that he was Bishop of Ostia, a port towne neare to Rome. Certain it is, he was a great writer, and left many workes in the Church, which Eusebius and Hierome do recite: by the supputation of Eusebius, he was about the yeare of our Lord, 230.*

Prudentius in his Peristephanon, making mentiō of great heapes of Martyrs buried by ix. together, speaketh also of Hippolytus, and sayth that he was drawn with wild horses through fields, dales and bushes, and describeth thereof a pitifull story.

After the Emperour Gordianus, the Empire fell to Philippus, who with Philip his sonne, gouerned the space of vj. yeares,an. 246. This Philippus with his sonne and all his familie, was christened & conuerted by Fabianus & Origene, who by letters exhorted him and Seuera his wife to be bap'tised, being the first of all the Emperours that brought in Christianity into the emperiall seat.* Howsoeuer Pomponius Letus reporteth of him to be a dissembling prince, this is certayne, that for his Christianitye, he with his sonne was slayne of Decius one of his Captaynes. Sabellicus Bergomensis Lib 8. sheweth this hatred of Decius agaynst Philippus to be conceaued, for that the Emperour Philip both the Father and the sonne had committed their treasures vnto Fabianus then Bishop of Rome.

The seuenth Persecution.*

THus Philippus beyng slayne,* after him Decius inuaded the crowne about the yeare of our Lord, 250, by whom Page 60 was mooued a terrible persecution against the Christians, which Orosius noteth to be the vij. persecution.* The first occasion of this hatred and persecution of this tyrant conceaued agaynst the Christians, was chiefly, as is before touched, because of the treasures of the Emperour which were committed to Fabian the bishop.

This Fabian first being a maryed man, as Platina writeth, was made Bishop of Rome after Anterius aboue mētioned by the miraculous appointment of God, which Eusebius doth thus describe in this sixt booke:* When the brethren (sayth he) were together in the Congregation, about the electiō of their Bishop, and had purposed among them selues vpon the nominatiō of some noble and worthy personage of Rome,* it chaūced that Fabianus amōg other was there presēt, who of late before was newly come out of the countrey to inhabite in the Citie. This Fabian, as is sayd, thinking nothyng lesse then of any such matter sodenly cōmeth a Doue fleing from aboue, and sitteth vpon his head. Whereupon all y^e Congregation beyng moued, wyth one minde and one uoyce, dyd chose hym for their Bishop. In the which function he remayned the space of xiiij. yeares, as Eusebius writeth. Damasus, Marianus, and Sabellicus say. xiiij. Yeares vnto y^e tyme of Decius. Who, whether for that Philippus had committed to him his treasures,* or whether for the hatred he bare to Philippus, in the beginning of his raigne caused him to be put to death. Sendyng out moreouer his Proclamation into al quarters that al which professed the name of Christ, should be slayne.

To this Fabian be ascribed certaine ordinaunces, as of consecrating new oyle once euery yeare, and burnyng the olde, of accusations against Byshops, of appealing to the sea Apostolicke, of not marying within the fift degree, of communicating thrise a yeare, of offering euery Sunday, with such other things moe in his. iij. Epistles decretall, the which Epistles, as by diuers other evidences may be supposed to be vntuely named vpon hym, gyuing no signification of any matter agreing to that tyme: so do I finde the most part of the iij. Epistle, worde for word standing in the Epistle of Sixtus y^e 3. which folowed almost 200. yeares after him, beside the vnseemely doctrine also in the ende of the sayd Epistles contayned, where he contrary to the tenour of the Gospell, applyeth remission of sinnes (onely due to the bloud of Christ) vnto the offerings of bread and wyne by men and women euery Sunday in the Church.

To this Fabianus wrote Origene De orthodoxia suae fidei, that is, of the rightnes of his fayth. Whereby is to be vnderstode,* that he continued to the tyme of Decius, some say also to the tyme of Gallus. Of this Origene partly mention is touched before, declaring how bolde and feruente he was in the dayes of Seuerus, in assisting, comforting, exhorting and killing the Martyrs that were imprisoned & suffered for the name of Christ, with such daunger of his owne life, that had not bene the singular protectiō of God, he had bene stoned to death many tymes of the Heathen multitude. Such great concourse of men and women was daily to his house to be catechised & instructed in the christian fayth by him, that souldiours were hyred of purpose to defend the place where he taught them. Agayn, such search sometymes was set for him, that vnneth any shiftyng of place or countrey could couer him. In those laborious trauailes and affayres of the Church, in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting, and expounding, he continued about the space of 52. yeares, vnto the tyme of Decius and Gallus. Diuers and great persecutions he sustayned,* but specially vnder Decius, as testifieth Eusebius in his sixt booke, declaring, that for the doctrine of Christ he sustained bands and torments in his body, rackings with barres of iron, dungeons, besides terrible threatens of death and burning. All this he suffred in the persecution of Decius, as Eusebius recordeth of him, and maketh no relatiō of any further matter. But Suidas and Nicephorus following the same, sayth further concerning him,* that the sayd Origene, after diuers and sundry other torments, which he manfully and constantly suffred for Christ, at length was brought to an altar where a foule filthy Ethiopie was appointed to be, and there this option or choyse was offred vnto him, whether he would sacrifice to the idole, or to haue his body polluted with that foule and ouglie Ethiopie. Then Origene (sayth he) who with a Philosophicall mynd,* euer kept his chastitie vndefiled, much abhorring y^e filthy villany to be done to his body, condescended to their request. Wherupon, the iudge puttyng incense in his hand, caused him to set it to the fire vpō the altar. For the which impietie, he afterward was excommunicated of the Church.* Epiphanius writeth that he beyng vrged to sacrifice to Idols, and takyng the boughes in his hand, wherwith the Heathen were woont to honour their Gods, called vpon the Christians to cary them in the honour of Christ. The which fact the church of Alexandria misliking, remooued him from their communion. Wherupon Origene driuen away with shame and sorow out of Alexandria, went into Iewry, where beyng in Hierusalem among the congregation, and there requested of the Priestes and Ministers (he being also a Priest) to make some exhortation in the church, refused a great while so to do. At length by importunate petition being cōstrained therunto, rose vp, and turning the booke, as though he would haue expounded some place of the Scripture, only read the verse of the 49. Psalme: but God sayd to the sinner, why doest thou preach my iustifications, & why doest thou take my testament in thy mouth, &c. Which verie beyng read,* he shut the booke, and sate downe weepyng and wayling, the whole congregation also weeping & lamentyng with him, Suid. Niceph. More what became of Origene it is not found in history, but onely that Suidas addeth, he dyed and was buried at Tyrus. Eusebius affirmeth, that he departed vnder the Emperour Gallus, about the yeare of our Lord 255. and the 70. yeare of his age, in great miserie (as appeareth) and pouertie.

In this Origene diuers blemishes of doctrine be noted wherupon Hierome some tymes doth inueigh against him.* Albeit in some places agayne he doth extoll and commend him for his excellent learning, as in his Apologie agaynst Ruff. and in his Epistle to Pammachus and Ocean,* where he prayseth Origene, although not for the perfection of his faith and doctrine, nor for an apostle, yet for an excellent interpreter, for his wit, and for a Philosopher. And yet in his Prologue vpō the Homelies of Origene vpon Ezechiel, he calleth him an other maister of the churches,* after the Apostles. And in an other Preface vpon his questions vpon Genesis, he wisheth to himself the knowledge of the scriptures, which Origene had, also with the enuy of his name. Athanasius moreouer calleth him singular, and laborious, and vseth also his testimonies against the Arrians. Socrates, Lib. 6. cap. 13.*

After Origene, the congrue order of history requireth. next to speak of Heraclas his Usher, a man singularly commēded for his knowledge, not only in Philosophy, but also in all such faculties as for a christiā diuine doth appertain. This great towardnes of wit and learning when Origene perceiued in him, he appointed him aboue all other, to bee his Usher or vnderteacher, to helpe in his schoole or Uniuersitie of Alexandria, in the raigne of Antoninus Caracalla, sonne of Seuerus. And after in the x. yeare of Alexander, Origene departing vnto Cesarea, he succeeded in his roome to gouerne the schoole in Alexandria. Further also, in the time of Gordianus, after the decease of Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, this Heraclas succeeded to be Bishop of the said Citie. Eusebius. Lib. 6. cap. 29.* In the which functiō he ministred the terme of xvj. yeares, Eusebius, Lib. 6. cap. 35. Of this Heraclas writeth also Origene himselfe, that he, although beyng Priest, yet ceased not to read ouer and peruse y^e bookes of the Gentils, to the intent he might the better out of their owne bookes confute their error. &c.

After Heraclas succeeded Dionysius Alexandrinus, in the bishoprike of Alexandria, like as he succeeded him in y^e schole before.* Which Dionysius also writeth of the same Heraclas vnto Philemon a Priest of Rome, thus saying: Hunc ego canonem & typum a beato Heracla Papa nostro accepi, &c. that is, This Canon and type I receaued of blessed Heraclas our Pope, &c. This Heraclas was no Martyr which dyed 3. yeares before Decius,* about the yeare of our Lord, 250. After whom succeeded next in the same seat of Alexandria, Dionysius Alexandrinus,* who also suffered much vnder the tyranny of Decius, as hereafter shalbe shewed (Christ willing) when we come to the tyme of Valerian.

Nicephorus in his fift booke, and other which write of this persecutiō vnder Decius, declare the horriblenes therof to be so great and so innumerable Martyrs to suffer in the same, that he sayth it is as easie to number the sandes of the sea, as to recite the perticular names of them, whō this persecution did deuour. In the which persecutiō the chieftest doers and tormenters vnder the Emperour, appeare in the history of Vincentius to be these: Optimus the vnder Consull,*Secundianus, Verianus, and Marcellianus, &c. Although therfore it be hard here to inferre all and singular persons in order that dyed in this persecution: yet such as remayne most notable in stories I will briefly touche, by the grace of him for whose cause they suffred.

In the former tractation of the fift persecution,* mentiō was made before of Alexander bishop of Hierusalem, and of his troubles suffred vnder Seuerus, and how afterward by the miracle of God he was appointed bishop of Hierusalem, where he continued a very aged man, aboue the terme of 40, yeares gouernour of that Church, til the tune Page 61 of the first yeare of Decius. At what tyme he being brought from Hierusalem to Cesarea into the iudgement place, after a constant and euident confession of his fayth made before the Iudge, was committed vnto prison, and there finished his lyre,* as testifieth Dionysius Alexandrinus in the six• booke of Eusebius. After whome succeeded in that seate Mezabanes the xxxvj. Bishop of that Citie, after Iames the Apostle.

Mention was made also before of Asclepiades Bishop of Antioch, who succeeded after Serapion, and in the persecution of Seuerus did likewise perseuer a constant confessor,* and as Vincentius testifieth in his xj. booke suffered Martyrdome at last vnder this Decius. But this computation of Vincentius can in no wise agree with the truth of tyme, for as much as by probable writers, as Zonaras, Nicephorus and other, the sayd Asclepiades after Serapion, entred the bishops seate of Antioch, an. 214. and sate vij. yeares before the tyme of Gordianus. After whom succeeded Philetus, an. 221. gouerning the function xij. yeares. And after him Zebinus followed, an. 232. and so after him Babylas, which Babylas if he dyed in this persecution of Decius, then could not Asclepiades also suffer in the same tyme, who dyed so long before him, as is declared.

Of this Babylas bishop of Antioche, Eusebus and Zonaras record, that vnder Decius he dyed in prison, as did Alexander bishop of Hierusalem aboue rehearsed.

We read in a certaine treatise of Chrysostome, intituled Contra Gentiles,* a notable and a long history of one Babylas a martyr, who about these times was put to death for resistyng a certaine Emperour, not suffring him to enter into the temple of the Christians, after a cruell murder cōmitted, the story of which murder is this: There was a certaine Emperour, who vpon conclusiō of peace made with a certain nation, had receiued for hostage or suretie of peace the sonne of the king beyng of yong and tender age, with conditions vpon the same, that neither he should be molested of them, nor that they should euer be vexed of him. Upon this the kings sonne was deliuered not without great care and feare of the father vnto the Emperour, whom the cruell Emperor, contrary to promise, caused in short tyme, without all iust cause to be slayne. This fact so horrible beyng committed, the tyrant with all hast would enter into the temple of the christians:* Where Babylas beyng bishop or minister withstoode him that he should not into y^e place approach. The Emperour therewith not a litle incensed, in great rage commaunded him forthwith to be laid in prison with as many irons as he could beare, & from thēce shortly after to be brought forth to death and execution. Babylas going constantly and boldly to his Martyrdome, desired after his death to be buried with his irons and bands, & so he was. The story proceedeth moreouer, and saith, that in continuaunce of tyme in the raigne of Constantinus, Gallus then made the ouersear of the East partes, caused his body to be translated into the suburbs of Antioch called Daphnes, where was a temple of Apollo, famous with diuelish Oracles & answers, geuen by that Idole, or by the deuill rather in that place. In the which temple after y^e bringing of the body of Babylas, the idole ceased to geue any more Oracles, saying, that for the body of Babylas, he could geue no moe answers, but complaining that that place was woont to bee consecrated vnto him, but now it was full of dead mens bodies. And thus the Oracles there ceased for that tyme, till the comming of Iulianus: who inquiring out the cause why the Oracles ceased, caused the bones of the holy Martyr to be remooued agayne from thence by the christians, whom he then called Galileans. They commyng in a great multitude both men, maydens, and children, to the tombe of Babylas, transported his bones according to the commaundement of the emperour, singing by the way as they went, the verse of the Psalme in wordes as followeth: Confounded be all that worship Images and all that glory in Idoles, &c. which comming to the Emperours •ares, set him in great rage against the Christians, stirring vp persecution against them. Albeit Zonaras declareth the cause something otherwise: saying, that so soone as the body of him and other Martyrs were remooued away, incontīnēt the temple of the Idole with the Image, in the night was consumed with fire.* For the which cause (sayth Zonaras) Iulian stirred vp with anger, persecuted the Christians, as shall be shewed (Christ willyng) in his order and place hereafter.

And thus much of Babylas, which whether it was the same Babylas Bishop then of Antioche, or an other of the same name, it appeareth not by Chrysostome: which neither maketh mention of the Emperours name, nor of the place where this Babylas was bishop. Agayne the stopping out of the Emperour out of the Church importeth as much as that Emperour to have bene a Christian. For otherwise if he had come in as an Heathen and as a persecutor,* it was not then the maner of christian bishops violently to withstand the Emperours or to stop them out. Ouer & beside the testimony of Eusebius, Zonaras doth wisse contrary in his vj. booke, that this Babylas which was then Bishop of Antioch after Zebinus, was not put to death by the tormentors, but died in prison. Wherefore it is not vnpossible, but this Babylas,* and this Emperour which Chrysostome speaketh off may be an other Babylas, then that which suffered vnder Decius. Nicephorus in his v. booke maketh mention of an other Babylas beside this that suffered vnder Decius, which was bishop of Nicomedia.

In the forenamed Citie of Antioche, Vincentius, Lib. 11. speaketh of 40. virgines Martyrs, which suffered in this persecution of Decius.

In the country of Phrigia, and in the toune of Lampsar, the same Vincentius also speaketh of one Peter, which there was apprehended, and suffered bitter tormentes for Christes name, vnder Optimus the Proconsul. And in Troada likewise of other Martyrs that there suffered, whose names were Andrew, Paule, Nicomachus, and Dionisia a virgin. Lib. 11 cap. 46.

Also in Babylon (sayth he) diuers christian Confessours were found of Decius, which were led away into Spayne, there to be executed, Lib. eodem, cap. 43.

In the countrey of Cappadocea at the Citie of Cesarea, in like maner of the sayde author is testified, of Germanus, Theophilus, Cesarius, and Vitalis, to suffer Martyrdom for Christ, eodē cap 52. And in y^e same Booke mētion also is made of Polychronius Byshop of Babylon, cap. 89. And in Pamphilia of Nestor there Bishop, y^t dyed Martyr, cap. 52.

At Perside in the Toune of Cardala, Olympiades and Maximus.* In Tyrus also Anatolia Uirgin, and Audax gaue theyr lyues likewyse to death, for the testimonie of Christes name.

Eusebius moreouer in his sixt booke, reciteth out of the Epistles of Dionysius Alexandrinus, diuers that suffred diuersly at Alexandria, the which places of Dionysius, as they be cited in Eusebius, I thought here good for the auncientnes of the author, to insert and notifie in his own wordes, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius bishop of Antioch, as followeth.

This persecution (saith he) began not with the proclamation set forth by the Emperor,* but began a whole yeare before, by the occasion and meanes of a wicked person, a Southsayer, and a follower of wicked Artes: who comming to our Citie here, stirred vp the multitude of y^e Heathen agaynst vs, and incited them to maintaine their own olde superstition and gentilitie of their countrey, whereby they beyng set a gog, and obtayning full power to prosecute their wicked purpose so thought & no lesse declared, all their pietie & religiō to consist only in the idolatrous worship of deuils, and in our destruction. And first flying vpon a certaine priest of ours named Metra, apprehended him & brought him forth,* to make him speake after theyr wicked blasphemy, which whē he would not do, they layd vpon him with slaues and clubs, and with sharp reedes pricked his face and eyes, and afterward bringing him out into the suburbes, there they stoned him to death. Then they tooke a faithfull woman called Quinta, and brought her to the temple of their Idols,* to compell her to worship with them, which whē she refused to do, and abhorred their Idols, they bound her fecte, and drew her through y^e whole streete of the citie, vpon the hard stones, & so dashyng her against milstones, & scourging her with whippes brought her to the same place of the suburbes, as they did the other before, where she likewise ended her lyfe. This done, in a great outrage, & with a multitude running together, they brust into houses of the religious & godly christians, spoiling, sacking, and carying away all that they could finde of any price. The rest of things, such as were of lesse value & of wood, they brought into the open market, & set them on fire.* In the meane time the brethren voyded aside, & withdrew themselues, taking patiently and no lesse ioyfully the spoyling of their goods, then did they of whome S. Paule doth testifie. Neither do I know any of them all (one only excepted) apprehended of them, which reuoltyng from his profession, denied the Lord yet to this present day.

Among the rest that were taken, there was a certayne virgin wel stricken in yeres, named Apollonia, whome they brought forth, & dashing out all her teeth out of her iawes, made a great fire before the citie, threatning to cast her into the same, vnlesse she would blaspheme with them and deny Christ. Whereat she staying a litle with herselfe, as one that would take a pause, sodenly leaped into the midst of the fire, and there was burned.

Page 62 There was one also Serapion, whom they tooke in his owne house, and after they had assayled him with sundrye kyndes of torments,* and had broken almost all the iointes of his body, they cast him downe from an vpper lost, & so did he complete his Martirdom. Thus was there no way neither priuie nor publike, nor corner nor alley left for vs, neither by day nor by night to escape, al the people making an outcry against vs, that vnlesse we vttred words of blasphemy, we should be drawn to the fire & burned. And this outrageous tumult endured a certaine space, but at length as the Lord would,* the miserable wretches fell at dissentiō among themselues, which turned the crueltie they exercised against vs, vpon their own heads. And so had we a litle breathyng tyme for a season, while the fury of the Heathen people by this occasion aswaged.

Shortly then after this, word was brought vnto vs of the state of the Empire, which before was somthing fauorable to vs, to be altered and changed agaynst vs, putting vs in great feare. And consequently vpon the same folowed the Edict of the Emperour so terrible & cruell, that according to the forewarning of the lord, the elect if it had bene possible, might haue bene thereby subuerted. Upon that Edict such feare came ouer vs al, that many there were especially of the richer sort, of whō some for feare came rūning, some were led by the occasion of time, some were drawne by their neighbours beyng cited by name, to those vnpure and idolatrous sacrifices. Other some came trembling & shaking, as men not which should do sacrifice, but which should be sacrificed themselues, the multitude laughyng them to scorne. Some agayne came boldly to the aultars, declaring themselues neuer to haue bene of that professiō, of whom it is said, that hardly they shalbe saued. Of the residue, some followed one part, some an other, some ran away, some were taken. Of whome certaine continued to bands & torments constant. Other agayne after long imprisonment, before they should come before the Iudge, renounced their faith. Some also after they suffred tormēts, yet after reuolted. But other being as strong as blessed, & valiant pillars of the Lord, fortified with constancie agreing to their fayth, were made faithfull Martyrs of y^e kingdome of God.

*Of whom the first was Iulianus, a man diseased with the gout, and not able to go, being caried of two men, of whō the one quickly denied, the other Cronion surnamed Eunus, with the foresayd Iulianus, the old man, confessing the Lord with a perfect fayth, were layd vpon Camels, and there scourged, at length cast into the fire, with great constancie were so consumed.

*As these aforesaid were going to their Martyrdome, there was a certaine souldiour, who in their defence tooke part agaynst them that rayled vpon them. For the which cause the people crying out agaynst hym, he also was apprehended, and beyng constant in his professiō, was forthwith beheaded.

*Likewise one Macar, a man borne in Lybia, beyng admonished and exhorted of the Iudge to deny his fayth, and not agreyng to his persuasions was burned alyue.

*After these suffred Epimachus, and one Alexander, who beyng long deteined in prison and in bandes, after innumerable paynes & torments with razers & scourges, were also cast into the burning fire with foure other women with them, which all there ended their Martyrdome.

Also Ammonarion an holy virgine, whō the cruel iudge had long and bitterly tormented, for that she promising the Iudge before, that for no punishment she would yelde to his request, and constantly performyng the same, suffred likewise Martyrdome, with two other women, of whom there was an aged Matrone,* named Mercuria, the other was called Dionysia, beyng a mother of many fayre childrē, whom yet notwithstanding she loued not aboue the Lord. These after they could nothe ouercome by no tormēts of y^e cruell iudge, but he rather ashamed and confounded to be ouercome of sely women, at length they beyng past feeling of all torments, were slayne with the sword, first Ammonarion like a valiant Captaine suffryng before them.

*Heron, Ater, and Isidorus Egyptians, and with them Dioscorus also a child of xv. yeres, were crowned with y^e same crowne of Martyrdom. And first the iudge began with the child, thinking him more easie to be wonne, with wordes to entise him, then with torments to constrain him, but he persisted immouable, geuing neither place to persuasions nor punishments. The rest after he had greuously tormēted being constant in their profession, he committed to the fire. At Dioscorus, the iudge greatly meruailing for his wise answers & graue constancie dismissed him, sparing (as he said) his age to a longer respite: which Dioscorus is yet also with vs at this present, wayting for a longer triall.

Nemesion beyng also an Egyptian,* first was accused for a companion of thieues, but beyng purged thereof before the Centurion, was then accused of Christianitie, and for that cause being in bands, was brought to the President, who most vnrighteously tormenting and scourging hym double to al other thieues and felons, at length among the thieues burned him to death, making him a blessed martir.

There were standing before the tribunall seate certaine of the warriors or knights,* whose names were Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, and with them a certayne aged man called Theophilus, who standing by, at what tyme a certaine christian man was before the iudge examined, and there seying him for feare redy to incline and fall away, did burst almost for sorow within themselues, making signes to him with their hands, and all iestures of their body, to be constant. This beyng noted of all the standers by, they were redy to lay hold vpon them, but they preuenting the matter, preased vp of their owne accord before to the bench of the iudge, professing themselues to be Christians. In so much, that both the President with the benchers were all astonied, the christians which were iudged, more emboldned to suffer, and the Iudges therby terrified. This done, they departed away from the place, glad and reioycing for the testimony that they had geuen of their fayth. Many other besides were in other cities and tounes rent and torne asunder by the Heathen, among whom, one I wil speake off for cause worthy of memory.

Ischirion one that was in seruice with a certaine noble man,* was commaunded of his maister to make sacrifice, who for not obeying, was therefore rebuked: After persisting in the same, was greuously threatned with sharp and manacing wordes. At last his maister when he could not preuaile against him, taking a stake or pike in his handes, ran him through into the body and slue him.

What should I speake of the multitude of them which wandering in desertes and mountaines, were consumed with hunger, thirst, cold, sicknes, thieues, or wilde beasts, of whose blessed victorie they which be aliue, are yet witnesses. In the number of whom, one I will speake off, among diuers other,* named Cheremon Bishop of the Citie called Nilus, an aged man, he with his wife flying to the mountain of Arabia, neuer returned again, nor euer could be seene after. And though they were sought for diligently by their brethren, yet neither they nor their bodies were found. Many other there were which flying to these moūtaines of Arabia, were taken of the barbarous Arabians: of whom some with much mony could scarce be ransomed, some were neuer heard off yet to this present day. Thus much out of the Epistle of Dionysius alledged in Euseb. Lib. 6 cap. 41 42. &c.*

Moreouer, the foresaid Dionysius in an other place writyng to Germanus, of his owne daungers and of other, sustained in this persecution, & before this persecution of Decius, thus inferreth as followeth: I, sayth he, behold before the sight of God, I lye not: and he knoweth, I lie not, how that I hauing no regard of myne owne life, and notwithstanding the motion of God, did flye and auoyde the daunger of this persecution. Yea and also before that this persecution of Decius did rage against vs: Sabinus the same houre sent a Farmer to seeke me, at what tyme I remaining at home waited iij. dayes for his comming. But he searching narrowly for me by all wayes, fields, flouds, & corners, where he thought I might best haue hid my self, or to haue passed by, was stroken with such a blindness, that he could not find myne house, thinking with himself nothing lesse, then that I would abide at home in such so dangerous persecution. Thus these iij. days beyng past, vpon the fourth day, the Lord God so willing and commanding me to flie, and also maruelously opening to me the way, I with my* children and many other brethren went out together. And this not to come of my selfe, but to be the worke of Gods prouidence, the sequel of those things declared, wherein afterward I was not vnprofitable peraduenture to some, &c.

Againe in another place shortly after the foresayd Dionysius proceedyng in the narration of himselfe, thus inferreth: Then I comming to Hierusalem with them which were with me, was brought by souldiours vnto Taposixis, where as Timotheus (by the prouidence of God) neyther was present, nor yet takē. Who then returning home foūd his house desert, and officers watching about the same, & vs within taken, &c. And agayne shortly after it foloweth: And to see (sayth he) the admirable disposing of God his workes. As Timotheus was thus flying with much hast & great feare,* a certain man, as happened, a dweller neere by met him by the way, & asked, whether he went so hastily: to whome Timotheus aunsweryng declared all the matter simply as it was. Which done, the man proceedeth on hys Page 63 iourney, whether he was purposed to go, which was to a mariage,* the maner of which mariages then was to sit vp all the night long feasting and drinking. Thus as he was come, sitting with them at the feast, he telleth his companions what was done, & what he heard by the way. This was no sooner told, but all they forthwith vpon a head, as stroken with a sodain fury rushing out together, made toward vs as fast as they could, with such crying & noyse, as might seeme very terrible. At the first hearing wherof, the souldiours that had vs in keping, being afraid, ran away, by reason wherof we were left alone, & found as we were lying vpon fourmes & benches. I then, (the Lord knoweth) thinking with my selfe that they had bene thieues, which came to spoyle and rob, being in my couch, lay still in my shirt onely as I was, the rest of my garments lying by me, I offred to them. They then willed me in all hast to rise and get away, wherby I then perceauing the cause of their commyng,* cryed vnto them desiring that they would suffer vs so to do: And if they would do any benefit for me for so much as I could not escape the hands of thē which would pursue me and cary me away, I prayed them that they would preuent them, and cut off my head before. And as I was crying thus vnto them, casting my selfe groueling vpon the pauement as my companions can testifie, who were pertakers of all these thinges, they brust forth violently, takyng me by the handes and feete, and caried me out of the doores, and led me away. There followed me Gaius, Faustus, Petrus, Paulus, (who were witnesses of all the same) which brought me also out of the Citie, and so setting me vpon a bare Asse, conueyed me away. Thus much writeth Dionysius of himselfe, the example of whose Epistle is cited in the Ecclesiasticall story of Eusebius, Lib. 6. cap. 40. also Lib. 7. cap. 11.

Nicephorus in his fift booke, cap. 27. maketh mention of one named Christophorus, which also suffered in this persecution of Decius. Of which Christophorus, whether the fable riseth of that mighty Giant set vp in Churches, wadyng through the Seas, with Christ on his shoulder, and a tree in his hand for a walking staffe, &c. it is vncertayne. Georg. Wicelius alledgeth out of Ruggerus Fulden (and mentioneth of one Christophorus, borne of the nation of the Cananites, which suffered vnder Decius, beyng, as he sayth of xii. cubites hye. But the rest of the history paynted in Churches, the sayd Wicelius he derideth as fables of Centaurus, or other Poeticall fictions.

*Bergomensis in hys viii. booke maketh relation of diuers martyred vnder Decius, as Meniatius which suffered at Florence, of Agatha an holy virgine of Sicile, who is sayd to suffer diuers and bitter tormentes vnder Quintinianus the Proconsul, with prisonment, with beatings, with famine, with racking, roled also vpon sharpe shelles and hot coles, hauing moreouer her brestes cut from her body, as Bergomensis, and the Martyrologe of Ado recorde. In the whiche Authors as I denye not, but part of the story may be true, so agayne concernyng the myracles of the aged man appearing to her, and of the yong man clothed in a silken vesture, with an hundreth yong mē after him, and of the marble table with the inscription, Mentem sanctam, &c. I doubt.

*Hard it is to recite all that suffred in this persecution, whē as whole multitudes went into wildernes & mountains, wandring without succour or comfort, some starued with hunger and cold, some with sicknes consumed, some deuoured of beastes, some with barbarous theeues taken and caried away. Vincentius in his xj. booke speakyng of Asclepiades, * writeth also of xl. virgins and Martyrs, which by sundry kindes of tormentes were put to death about the same tyme, in the persecution of this tirant.

Likewise in the said Vincentius, mentiō is made of Tryphon, a man of great holines, and constant in his suffryng, who beyng brought to the Citie of Nice, before the President Aquilus, for his constant confession of Christes name was afflicted with diuers and grieuous tormentes, and at length with the sword put to death.

*At what tyme Decius had erected a temple in the midst of the Citie of Ephesus, compelling all that were in the Citie there, to sacrifice to the Idoles, seuen Christians were found, whose names were Maximianus, Malchus, Martianus, Dionysius, Ioannes, Serapion, and Constantinus, who refusing the Idolatrous worship, were accused for the same vnto the Emperour to be Christians. Which when they constantly professed, and did not deny, notwithstanding, because they were souldiours, retayning to the Emperours seruice, respite was geuen them for a certaine space to deliberate with themselues, til the returne agayne of the Emperour, which then was goyng to warre. In the meane space, the Emperour being departed, they taking counsail together, went and hidde themselues in secret caues of the Mount Caelius. The Emperour returnyng agayne, after great inquisitiō made for them, hearing where they were, caused the mouth of the place where they were, to be closed vp with heapes of stones, that they not able to get out, should be famished within. And thus were those good men martired. * The story (if it be true) goeth further that they betwene feare and sorrow fell a sleepe, in which sleepe they continued the space of certaine ages after, till the tyme of Theodosius the Emperour, before they did awake, as reporteth Vincentius, Nicephorus, Lib. 5. ca. 27. and partly also Henr. Erfordiens▪▪ But of their awakyng, that I referre to them that lift beleue it. Certain it is, that at the last day they shall awake in deede without any fable.

Hieronymus in the lyfe of Paulus the Hermite,* reciteth a story of a certaine souldiour, whom the Pretor could not otherwise with torments remooue frō his Christianitie, he deuised an other way, which was this: he comaunded the souldiour to be layd vpon a soft bed in a pleasant garden among the flourishing Lillies and red Roses, which done, all other beyng remoued away, & himself there left alone, a beautifull harlot came to him, who embracing him, & with al other intisements of an harlot, laboured to prouoke him to her naughtines. But the godly souldiour fearyng God more, then obeying flesh, bitte of his tong with hys owne teeth, and spit it in the face of the harlot, as she was kissing him, and so got he the victorie, by the constant grace of the Lord assisting him.*

An other like example of singular chastitie is written of the virgin Theodora, and an other souldiour, by Ambrose Lib. 2. De virginibus. At Antioche, this Theodora refusing to do sacrifice to the Idols, was condemned by the Iudge to y^e stewes, which notw^tstanding by the singular prouidence of god was wel deliuered. For as there was a great company of wanton yong men ready at the doore to prease into the house where she was, one of the brethren, named Didimus (as Ado sayth) moued with fayth and motiō of God, putting on a souldiours habite, made himselfe one of the first that came in, who rounding her in the eare, tolde her the cause and purpose of his commyng, beyng a christiā as she was: his counsaile was that she should put on y^t souldiors habite, and so slip away. And he puttyng on her garmentes would there remaine to abide their force. And so did, whereby the virgine escaped vnknownen. Didimus left vnto the rage and wondring of the people beyng a man in stead of a woman, was presented vnto the President, vnto whom without delay he vttered all the whole matter as it was done, professing him so as he was, to be a christiā, and therupon was condemned to suffer. Theodora vnderstanding thereof, and thinking to excuse him by accusing her selfe, offred her selfe as the partie guiltie, vnto the Iudge, clayming and requiring the condemnation to light vpon her, the other as innocent to be discharged. But the cruell Iudge (crueller then Dionysius, which spared Damon & Pithias) neither considering the vertue of the persons,* nor the innocency of the cause, vniustly and inhumanely proceded in execution against thē both, who first hauing their heads cut off, after were cast in the fire, Ambros. Ado. Although what tyme, or in what persecution these did suffer, in the authors of this narration it doth not appeare.

Agathon a man of armes in the Citie of Alexandria, for rebuking certaine lewd persons,* scornefully deridyng the dead bodies of the Christians, was cried out off and rayled on of the people. Afterward accused to the iudge, was condemned to loose his head. Erfordiensis

The sayd Erfordiensis also maketh mention of Paulus, and Andraeas,* whome the Proconsul of Troada gaue to the people beyng scourged, and after drawne out of the Citie, they were troden to death with the feete of the people. Hen. de Erford.

Among other that suffered vnder this wicked Decius,* Bergomensis also maketh mention of one Iustinus a Priest of Rome, and of an other Nicostratus a Deacon. To these Vincentius also addeth Portius a Priest of Rome, whom he reporteth to be the conuerter of Phillip the Emperor afore mentioned.

Of Abdon and Sennas we read also in the foresayd Bergomensis and Vincentius,* two noble men, who because they had buried the christians, whom Decius had brought from Babylon to Corduba, and there put them to death, were therefore accused to Decius, & brought to Rome, where they beyng commaunded to sacrifice to dead Idols, would not obey, and for the same were geuen to the wilde beastes to be deuoured: but when the wild beastes more gentle then the men would not touch them, they were at length with the sword beheaded. Bergom. Vincent. Lib. 11. cap. 4 Albeit to me it seemeth not vnpossible nor vnlike, this Abdon and Page 64Sennas, to be the same, whome in other storyes we finde, and before haue mentioned to be Ammon and Zenon.

One Secundianus was accused to Valerian a Captayne of Decius, to be a Christian, which professiō when he stoutly did maynetayne, was commaunded to prison. By the way as the souldiours were leading him to the gaile, Verianus and Marcellianus seing the matter, cried to the souldiours, asking them whether they drew the innocent. At the which worde, when they also confessed them selues to be Christians, they were likewise apprehended, and brought to a Citie named Centumcellas• where being willed to sacrifice, they did spit vpon the Idols, and so after sentence and iudgement geuen, first they were beaten with wasters or trunshons, after that were hanged and tormented vpō the gibbet, hauing fire set to their sides. Vincentius addeth moreouer that the tormentors some of them fallē sodainly dead, other some being taken w^t wicked spirites, the Martyrs w^t sword at length were beheaded. Vinc. Lib. 11 cap. 31.

To prosecute in length of history, the liues and sufferings of all them, which in this terrible persecution, were Martyred, it were to long, & almost infinite: briefly therefore to rehearse the names of such as we finde alledged out of a certaine briefe treatise of Bede intituled De temporibus,* cited by Henricus De Erford, it shalbe at this time sufficient. Under Decius suffered Hyppolitus and Concordia, Hiereneus and Abnudus, Victoria a virgine, being noble personages of Antioche Bellias Byshoppe of the Citie of Apollonia, Leacus, Tyrsus, and Gallinetus, Nazanzo, Tryphon in the Citie of Egypt called •anais. Phileas Bishop, Philocomus with many other in Perside. Philcronius byshop of Babylon, Thesiphon Byshop of Pamphilia. Nestor Byshop in Corduba. Parmenius Priest with diuers moe. In the Prouince called Colonia, Circensis, Marianus and Iacobus. In Africa, Nemesianus, Felix, Rogatianus priest. •elicissimus. At Rome Iouinus, Basileus, also Ruffin•, and Secunda Uirgines, Tertullianus, Valerianus, Nemesius, Sempronianus, and Olympius. In Spayne Teragone, at Verona Zeno Byshop. At Caesarea, Marinus, and Archemius. In the towne of Miliane Priuatus Byshop, Theodorus surnamed Gregorius Byshop of Pontus. Haec Beda.

Vincentius in his xj. booke, maketh also mention, citing Ex Hugone,* of certaine children suffering Martyrdome vnder the same persecution, in a Citie of Tuscia called Aretium: whose names I finde not, except they be •rgentius & Laurentius mentioned in Equilinus, Lib. 5. cap. 80.

Nowe that I haue recorded of them sufficiently, which vnder this tempest of Decius,* constantly gaue their liues to Martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ: it remaineth, that a fewe wordes also be spoken of such that for feare or frailtie in this persecution did shrinke backe, & slide from the truth of their confession. In the number of whome first commeth in the remembrāce of Serapion an aged olde man. Of whom writeth Dionysius Alexandrinus, vnto Fabius, declaring: that this Serapion was an olde man,* which liued amongst them a sincere and vpright life of long time, but at length fell. This Serapion oft and many times desired to be receaued againe, but no man listened to him, for hee had sacrificed before.* After this not long after he fell into sicknesse where he remained three dayes dombe, and benumbed of all his sēses. The fourth day following, beginning a litle to recouer, he called to him his sisters sonne, & saide: how long, how lōg (my sonne) do ye hold me here? Make hast I pray you, that I were absolved. Call hether some of the ministers to me, and so saying no more, held his peace, as dombe & speechles. The boy ranne, it was then night, vnto the minister, who at the same time being sicke, could not come with the messenger, but sayde: for somuch as he willed heretofore (as he sayde) that such as lay a dying, if they couet to be receaued & reconciled, and especially if they required it earnestly, should be admitted, wherby with the better hope & confidence they may depart hence: therefore he gaue to the boy a litle of the * Eucharist, willing him to crumble it into the cup, & so to drop it into the mouth of the olde man. With this the boy returned, bringing w^t him the holy Eucharist. As he was now nere at hād, before he had entred in, Serapiō the old mā, speaking againe, cōmest thou (sayd he) my sonne? The Priest, quoth the messenger, is sicke & can not come, but do, as he willeth you, & let me go. And the boy immixed the Eucharist, & dropt it in softly into the mouth of the old mā. Who after he had tasted a litle, immediatly gaue vp the Ghost. &c. Haec Dionys. ex Eus.

In the Citie of Troade, as the Proconsul was grieuously tormenting one Nicomachus, he cried out, that he was no Christian, and so was let downe againe. And when after he had sacrificed, he was taken eftsoones with a wicked spirite, and so throwen downe vpon the ground, where he byting of his tounge with his teeth, so departed. Henr. de Erfordia.

Dionysius in his Epistles also writyng to Fabius, and lamentyng the great terrour of this persecution declareth,* how that many woorthy and notable Christians, for feare and horror of the great tyranny therof, did shew themselues feeble and weake men. Of whome some for dread, some of their owne accord, other after great torments suffered, yet after reuolted from the constancy of their profession. Also S. Cyprian in his treatise De lapsis, reciteth with great sorrow, and testifieth, how that a great number at the first threatnyng of the aduersary, neither beyng cōpelled nor thrown downe with any violence of the enemy, but of their volūtary weakenes fell downe themselues. Neither (sayth he) tarying while the iudge should put incense in their hands, but before any stroke stroken in the field,* turned their backs, & played the cowards, not only comyng to their sacrifices, but preuētyng the same, and pretending to come without compulsion, bringing moreouer theyr infantes & children eyther put into their hands, or taking them with them of their owne accord, and exhortyng moreouer other to do the lyke after their example.

Of this weaknesse and falling, the said author sheweth two causes,* either loue of their goodes and patrimonie, or feare of torments. And addeth moreouer examples of the punishmentes of them which so reuolted: affirmyng that many of them were taken and vexed with wicked sprites. And of one man among other which after his voluntary deniall, sodainly was stroken dombe. Agayn, an other after his abiuration as he should communicate with other, in stead of bread receiued ashes in his hād. Itē of a certayn mayden, who beyng taken & vexed with a sprite, did teare her owne tounge with her teeth, and tormented with paine in her bellie and inward partes so deceased.

Among other of this sort, S. Cyprian, Lib. 2 cap. 8. maketh also mention of one Euaristus a Bishop in Aphrica, who leauing his charge, and making a shipwracke of his faith, went wandering about in other countreys, forsakyng his owne flocke. In like maner he maketh also mention of Nicostratus a Deacon, who forsakyng his Deaconship, and takyng the goods of the Church with him, fled away into other countreys, &c. Albeit Bergomensis geueth that this Nicostratus the Deacon afterward dyed a Martyr. Thus then although some did relent, yet a very great nūber saith he, there was, whom neither feare could remoue, nor pain could ouerthrow to cause them to betray their confession, but that they stode like glorious Martyrs vnto the ende, Cyprian.

The same Cyprianus also in an other booke De mortalitate, reciteth a notable story of one of his owne Colleges and fellow Priest: * who beyng oppressed with weaknesse, and greatly afayrd with death drawyng at hand, desired leaue to depart, and to be discharged. As he was thus entreating, and almost now dying, there appeared by him a yong man, of an honorable and of reuerend maiestie, of a tall stature, and comely behauior, so bright & cleare to behold, that scarce mans carnall eyes was able to beare the beholding of him, but that he was able so to do, which was now redy to depart this world. To whom this yong man speaking with a certaine indignation of mynd and voyce, thus said: Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To suffer ye dare not, to goe out ye will not, what would ye me to do vnto you?

Upon the occasion of these and such other, * which were a great number, that fell and did renounce, as is aforesaid, in this persecution of Decius, rose vp first the quarell & heresie of Nouatus, who in these dayes made a great disturbance in the church, holding this opinion, that they which once renounced the faith, and for feare of torments had offred incense to the idols, although they repented therefore, yet could not afterward be reconciled, nor admitted to the Church of Christ. This Nouatus beyng first Priest vnder Cyprian at Carthage, afterward by stirring vp discord and factions, began to disturbe the Bishopricke of Cyprian, to appoint there a Deacon called Felicissimus, agaynst the bishops mynd or knowledge, also to allure and separate certayne of the brethren from the Bishop, all which Cyprian, Lib. 2. Epist. 8. doth well declare. After this the sayd Nouatus goyng to Rome, kept there the like stirre with Cornelius (as the same Cornelius in Eusebius, * Lib. 6. cap. 43. doth testifie) setting himselfe vp as Bishop of Rome against Cornelius, which was the lawfull Bishop of Rome before. The which to bring to passe, he vsed this practise: first he had allured to him to be his adherents, thre or foure of good men and holy confessours, which had suffered before great tormentes for their confession, whose names were Maximus, Vrbanus, Sydonius, and Celerinus. After this he entised three simple bishops about the coastes of Italy to repayre Page 65 to Rome, vnder pretence to make an end of certain cōtrouersies then in hand. This done, he caused the same, whether by making them dronke, or by other craftye counsell, to lay their handes vpon him, and to make him Bishop, & so did. Wherefore the one of those three Byshops hardly was receiued to the communion, by the great intercession of his people: the other two by discipline of y^e church, were displaced from their Byshoprickes, & other possessed with their roomes. * Thus then were there two Byshops together in one church of Rome, Nouatus and Cornelius, which was vnsemely, & contrary to the discipline of the Church. And hereupon riseth the true cause and meaning of S. Cyprian, writing in his Epistles so much of one Byshop, and of the vnity to be kept in Ecclesiasticall regimēt, as appeareth, Lib. 4. Epist. 2. De simplicit. praelat. item. Lib. 3. Epist. 11. &c. And in like sort writeth also Cornelius himselfe of one Byshop, saying: Ita{que} Vindex ille Euangelij ignorauit vnum esse debere Episcopū in Catholica Ecclesia. &c. That is, He knew not that there ought to be one Byshoppe in a Catholicke Church. &c. This by the way, not out of the way I trust, I haue touched briefly, to detect or refute the cauling wrastling of the Papistes, which falsely apply these places of Cyprian and Cornelius to mainetayne the Popes supreme maistershippe alone, ouer the whole vniuersall Church of Christ in all places. Whē their meaning is otherwise, how that euery one Catholicke Church or dioces ought to haue one Byshop ouer it, not that the whole world ought to be subiect to the dominion of him onely that is Byshop of Rome. Now to the story againe. Nouatus beyng thus Bishop tooke not a little vpon him, goyng about by all meanes to defeat Cornelius, and to allure the people from him. Insomuch that (as in the foresayd book of Eusebius appeareth) whē Nouatus came to the distributing of the offrings, and should geue euery man his part, he cōpelled the simple persōs euery man to sweare, before they should receiue of the benediction, & of the collectes or oblations, holding both their handes in his, & holding them so long, speaking these wordes vnto them, (Sweare to me by the body and bloud of our Lord Iesu Christ, that thou wilt not leaue me and goe to Cornelius,) till that they swearing vnto him, in'stead of Amē (to be sayd at y^e receauing of the* bread, should aunswere, I will not returne to Cornelius, &c. Where note by the way, that the Latine booke of Christofersons translation, in this place, craftely leaueth out the name of bread. This story being written in Eusebius, also contained in Nicephorus, although not in the same order of wordes, yet in effe•t drawne out of him, doth declare in playne wordes in both the Authors (who so will marke the same) that the sacrament of the bodye of Christ, is termed with the playne name of bread, after the consecration.

It followeth more in the story, that Maximus, Vrbanus, Sydonius, and Celerinus before mentioned, perceiuing at length the crafty dissimulation and arrogancy, of Nouatus, left him, and with great repentance returned agayne to the Church, & were reconciled to Cornelius, as they thēselues writing to Cyprian, and Cyprian likewise writing to them an Epistle gratulatory doth declare. Lib. 3. Epist. 3. & Cornelius also in his Epistle to Fab{us} witnesseth the same. In thi• Epistle the sayd Cornelius moreouer writeth of one Moses a worthy Martyr, which once being a follower also of Nouatus, after perceiuing his wickednesse forsooke him, and did excommunicate him. Of him Cyprian also maketh mention, & calleth him a blessed confessor. Lib. 2. Epi. 4. Damasus in his pontificall sayth, that he was apprehended with Maximus and Nicostratus aboue mentioned, & was put with them in prison, where he ended his life. And thus much of Nouatus (agaynst whom, as Eusebius testifieth) a Synode was holdē at Rome of lx. sondry Byshops in the tyme of Cornelius, and vnder the reigne of Decius an. 255. whereby it may be supposed that the heat of the persecutiō at that tyme was somewhat calmed.*

After Fabianus (or as Zonaras calleth him Flauianus) next succeeded into the bishoprick of Rome Cornelius,* whō Cyprian noteth to be a worthy Byshop, and for his great vertue & maydenlye continency much commēdable, chosen to that roome, not so much of his owne consent, as of y^e full greement both of the Clergy men,* and also of the people. Hierome addeth also that he was a man of great eloquēce, wherby it may appeare those two Epistles decretal, which go in his name not to be his, both for the rudenes of the barbarous and grose stile, and also for the matter therein contained, nothing tasting of that tyme, nor of that age nor doings then of the Church. Wherof in the first he writeth to all ministers & brethren of the Church,* concerning the lifting vp of the bodyes & bones of Peter & Paule, De cathecumbis, and transposed to Vaticanum, at the instance of a certayne deuoute woman named Lucina, hauing no great argumēt or cause to write therof vnto the churches, but onely that he in that letter doth desire thē to pray vnto the Lord, that through the intercession of those Apostolicall Sayntes; their sinnes might be forgeuen them. &c. In the second Epistle writing to Ruffus a Byshop of the East Church, he decreeth and ordaineth that no oth ought to be required or exacted of any head or chiefe Byshop, for any cause, or by any power. Also that no cause of Priestes or Ministers ought to be handled in any straunge or forreine Court, without his precinct, except onely in the Court of Rome by appellation; whereby who seeth not the trayn of our latter Byshops, going about craftely to aduaunce the dignity of the Court of Rome, vnder and by the prtenced title of Cornelius, and of such auncient Byshops. If Cornelius did write any Epistles to any in deede in those so turbulent times of persecution; no doubt but some signification thereof he would haue touched in the sayd his letters, either in ministring consolation to his brethrē, or in requiring consolation and prayers of others. Neither is there any doubt, but he would haue geuē some touch also of the matter of Nouatus, with whom he had so much to do, as in deed he did: for so we finde it recorded both in Eusebius, and in Hierome that he wrote vnto Fabius Byshop of Antioche, of the decreementes of the counsell of Rome, and an other letter of the maner of the Counsell: the third also of the cause of Nouatus, and agayne of the repentaunce of such as fell, wherof there is no word touched at all in these foresayd Epistles decretall.*

What trouble this Cornelius had with Nouatus, sufficiently is before signified. In this persecution of Decius, he demeaned himselfe very constantly and faythfully, whiche sustayned great conflictes with the aduersaries, as S. Cyprian geueth winesse,Lib. 1. Epist. 1. Hierome testifieth that he remayned Byshop after the death of Decius, to the tyme of Gallus, and so appeareth also by S. Cyprian, which hath these wordes: Et tyrannum armis & bello postmodum victum, prior sacerdotio suo vicit. But Damasus and Sabellicus, his folowers, affirm that he was both exiled & also martired vnder the tyrannous reigne of Decius. Of whom Sabellicus writeth this story, taken out (as it seemeth) of Damasus, and sayth: that Cornelius by the commaūdemēt of Decius, was banished a towne called Centumcellas, bordering in Hetruria, from whence he sent letters to Cyprian Byshop of Carthage, and Cyprian agayne to him. This comming to the eares of Decius the Emperour, he sendeth for Cornelius, asking him: how he durst be so bolde to shew suche stubbernes, that he neither caring for the Gods, nor fearing the displeasure of his Princes, durst, agaynst the cōmon wealth, geue and receiue letters from other. To whom Cornelius answering agayne, thus purged himselfe, declaring to the Emperour, that letters in deede he had written and receiued agayne concerning the prayses & honoring of Christ, & of saluation of soules,* but nothing as touching any matter of the common wealth. And it foloweth in the storie: Then Decius moued with anger commaūded him to be beaten with plumbattes (which is sayth Sabellicus a kinde of scourging) and so to be brought to the temple of Mars: either there to do sacrifice, or to suffer the extremitye. But he rather willing to dye, then to committe such iniquity, prepared himselfe to Martyredome, beyng sure that he should dye.* And so commending the charge of the Church vnto Stephanus his Archdeacon, was brought to the way of Appius, where he ended his life in faythfull Martyrdome. Eusebius in one place sayth, that he sat ij. yeares, in an other place sayth, that he sat three yeares, and so doth Marianus Scotu., following also the diuersity of the sayd Eusebius. Damasus geueth him onely two yeares.

In this foresayde persecution of Decius, it seemeth by some writers also that Cyprian was banished, but I suppose rather his banishment to be referred to the reigne of Gallus next Emperour after Decius, whereof more shall be sayd, (Christ willing) in this place hereafter. In the mean time the sayd Cyprian in his second booke, Epist. 5. & 6. maketh mention of two that suffered either in the time of this Decius,* or much about the same time. Of whom one was Aurelius a worthy and valiant yong man, who was twice in tormentes for his confession, which he neuer denied, but manfully and boldly withstood the aduersary, till he was banished, and also after. And therefore was commended of Cyprian to certayne brethren, to haue him for their lecturer, as in the forenamed Epistle of Cyprian appeareth. The other was named Mappalicus,* who the day before he suffered, declaring to the Proconsul, in the midst of his tormentes, & saying: Videbis cras agonem: that is, to morrow you shall see the running for a wager. &c. was brought forth according as he forespake, to Martyrdome, and there with no lesse constancie then patience did suffer.

Page 66* And thus much of the tyrannie of this wicked Decius agaynst God his Saintes, now to touch also the power of God his vengeance and punishment against him, like as we see commonly a tempest that is vehement, not long to continue: so it happened with this tyrannical tormenter, who raining but two yeares as sayth Eusebius, or three at most,* as writeth Orosius among the middle of the Barbarians with whom he did warre, was there slayne with his sonne, like as he had slayn Philippus, and his sonne his predecessours before, so was he with his sonne slayne by the righteous iudgement of God himselfe.*Euseb. Lib. 7. cap. 1. Platin. Pomponius affirmeth that he warrying agaynst the Gotthians, and beyng by them ouercome, sest he should fall into their handes, ranne into a whurlepyt, where he was drowned, and his body neuer found after.

*Neither did the iust hand of God plague the Emperor onely, but also reuenged as well the heathen Gentils and persecutors of hys word, throughout all prouinces & dominions of the Roman Monarchie, amongst whom the lord immediatly after the death of Decius, sent such a plague and pestilence, lastyng for the space of x. yeares together, that horrible it is to heare, and almost incredible to beleue. Of this plague or pestilence, testifieth Dionysius to Hierax a bishop in Egypt,Euseb. Lib. 7. cap. 21.22. Where he declareth the mortalitie of this plague to bee so great in Alexandria, where he was bishop, that there was no house in y^e whole Citie free. And although the greatnes of the plague touched also the Christians somewhat, yet it scourged the heathen Idolaters much more: beside that the order of their behauiour in the one, and in the other was much diuers. For, as the foresayd Dionysius doth recorde, the Christians through brotherly loue and pietie, did not refuse one to visit and comfort an other, and to minister to him, what need required. Notwithstanding it was to them great danger: for diuers there were, who in closing vp their eyes, in washyng their bodies, & interryng them in the ground, were next themselues which folowed them to their graues. Yet all this stayed not them frō doying their duetie, and shewyng mercy one to another. Where as the Gentils contrarily, beyng extremely visited by the hand of God, felt the plague, but considered not the striker, neyther yet considered they their neighbour, but euery man shifting for himselfe, neither cared one for an other: but such as were infected, some they would cast out of the doores halfe dead, to be deuoured of dogges and wilde beasts, some they let dye within theyr houses without all succour, some they suffred to lye vnburied, for that no mā durst come neare him. And yet notwithstanding,* for all their voyding and shiftyng, the pestilence followed them whether soeuer they went, & miserably consumed them. In so much, that Dionysius bishop y^e same tyme of Alexandria, thus reporteth of his owne City: that such a great mortalitie was then among them, that the sayd City of Alexandria had not in number of all together, both old and yong, as it was woont to contayn before of the old men onely from the age of 60. to 70. such as were found in tyme past commonly almost in that Citie.

Pomponius Laetus, and other Latine writers also makyng mention of the sayd pestilitie, declare how the beginnyng therof first came (as they thinke) out of Ethiope, and from the hote countreys, and so inuading and wastyng first the South partes, from thence spread into the East, & so further running and increasing into all other quarters of the world, especially, wheresoeuer the Edicts of the Emperour went agaynst the Christians, it followed after, and consumed the most part of the inhabitauntes, whereby manye places became desolate and voyde of all concourse, and so continued the terme of x. yeares together.

This pestiferous mortalitie (by the occasion whereof Cyprian tooke the ground to write hys booke De mortalitate) began as is sayd, immediately after the death of Decius the persecutor,* in the beginning of the raigne of Vibias Gallus, and Volusianus hys sonne: who succeeded through treason, next vnto Decius, about the yeare of our Lord. 255. and continued their raygne but two yeares.

This Gallus although the first beginning of the raygne was some thing quiet,* yet shortly after following the steps of Decius, by whō rather he should haue taken better heed, set forth Edictes in like maner, for y^e persecution of Christians, albeit in this Edict we finde no number of Martyrs to haue suffered, but only all this persecution to rest onely in the exilement of bishops or guides of the flock. Of other suffrings or executions we do not read: for the terrible pestilence following immediatly, kept the barbarous heathē otherwise occupied. Unto this tyme of Gallus, rather then to the tyme of Decius,* I referre the banishment of Cyprian, who was then bishop of Carthage. Of the which banishment, he himselfe testifieth in diuers of his epistles, declaryng the cause therof to rise vpon a commotion or sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himselfe, lest the sedition should grow greater. Notwthstāding the sayd Cyprian, though beyng absent, yet had no lesse care of his flocke and of the whole church, then if he had bene present with them. And therefore neuer ceased in his Epistles continually to exhort and call vpon them to be constant in their profession,* and pacient in theyr afflictions. Amongst diuers other, whom he doth comfort in his banishmēt, although he was in that case to be comforted himselfe, writing to certayne that were condemned to minyng for metals, whose names were Nemesianus, Felix, Lucius, with other bishops, Priests and Deacons, declareth vnto them, how it is no shame but a glory not to be feared, but to be reioyced at, to suffer banishment or other paynes for Christ. And confirming them in the same, or rather commending them, signifieth, how worthily they do shew themselues to be as valiant captaines of vertue, prouoking both by the confessions of their mouth, and by the suffring of their body, the hartes of the brethren to Christian Martyrdome, whose example was and is, a great confirmation to many, both maydes and children to follow the like. As for punishment and sufferyng, it is (sayth he) a thing not execrable to a Christian. For a Christian mans brest, whose hope doth wholly consist in the*tree, dreadeth neyther batte nor club, woundes and skarres of the body be ornaments to a Christian man, such as bring no shame nor dishonestie to the partie, but rather preferreth and freeth him with the Lord. And although in the mines where the mettals be digged there be no beds for Christian mens bodies to take their rest, yet they haue their rest in Christ. And though their wearie bones lye vpon the cold ground, yet it is no payne to lye with Christ. Their feete haue bene fettered with bandes and chaynes, but happily he is bound of man, whome the Lord Christ doth loose:*happily doth he lye tyed in the stockes, whose feete therby are made swifter to runne to heauen. Neither can any man tye a Christian so fast, but he runneth so much the faster for his garland of life. They haue no garmentes to saue them from colde, but he that putteth on Christ, is sufficiently coated. Doth bread lacke to their hungry bodies? But man liueth not onely by bread, but by euery worde proceedyng from the mouth of God. Your deformitie (sayth he) shall be turned to honour, your mourning to ioy, your payne to pleasure, and felicitie infinite. And if this doe grieue you, that ye cannot now employ your sacrifices and oblations after your wonted maner: yet your sacrifice daily ceaseth not, which is a contrite and humble hart, as when you offer vp daily your bodies a liuely and a glorious sacrifice vnto the Lorde, which is the sacrifice that pleaseth God. And though your trauaile be great,*yet is the rewarde gre•ter, which is most certaine to follow. For God beholding and looking downe vpon them that confesse his name, in their willyng mynd approoueth them, in their striuyng helpeth them, in their victory crowneth them, rewarding that in vs, which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in vs perfected. With these and such like comfortable wordes he doth animate his brethren, admonishing them, that they are now in a ioyfull iourney, hasting apace to the mansions of the Martyrs, there to enioy after this darknes a stable light, and brightnes greater then all their passions, according to the Apostles saying: These sufferings of this present tyme be nothing like comparable to the brightnesse of the glory that shall be reuealed in vs, &c.

And after the like wordes of sweete comfort and consolation writing to Seagrins,* and Rogatianus, which were in prison and bondes for the testimony of truth, doth encourage them to continue stedfast and patient in the way, wherein they haue begun to runne, for that they haue the Lord with them their helper and defender, who promiseth to bee with vs to the worldes ende: and therefore willeth them to set before their eyes in their death immortalitie, in their payne euerlasting glory, of the which it is written: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saintes. Item, although before men they suffred torments, yet their hope is full of immortalitie, and beyng vexed in small things, they shall be well requited in great matters. For the Lord hath tried them as gold in the fire.*And writeth moreouer, admonishing them, that it is so appoynted from the beginnyng of the world, that righteousnes here should suffer in secular conflicts, for so iust Abell was slayne in the beginnyng of the world, and after him all iust and good men, the Prophets also and the Apostles sent of the Lord himselfe, vnto whome all, the Lorde first gaue an example in himselfe, teachyng that there is no comming to his kingdome, but by that way which he entred himselfe, saying by these wordes: he that loueth his lyfe in this worlde, shall loose it, &c. And agayne, feare ye not them, that slay the body, but haue no power to slay the soule. And S. Paule likewise admonishing all them, whosoeuer couete to be pertakers of the promises of the Lord, to follow the Lord sayth: if we suffer together with him, we shall raigne toge•her, &c.

Furthermore, as the same Cyprian doth encourage here the holy Martyrs, which were in captiuitie: to persist▪ so likewyse Page 66 <1 page duplicate> Page 67 writing to the Priestes and Deacons, which were free, exhorteth them to be seruiceable and obsequious with al care and loue, to cherish and embrace thē that were in bondes. Cypria. Lib. 3. Ep. 6. wherby may appeare the feruent zeale & care of this good-Byshop, toward the Church of Christ,* although beyng now in exile, in the time of this Emperour Gallus.

In the same time and vnder the said Gallus reigntyng with his sonne Volusianus was also Lucius bishop of Rome sent to banyshment who next succeeded after Cornelius, in that byshopricke, about the yeare of our Lorde 256. Albeit in this banishment he did not long continue,* but returned againe home to his Church: as by the Epistle of, S. Cyprian, Lib 3. Epist. 1. maye appeare. As to all other Bishops of Rome in those primitiue daies certaine decretall Epystles with seuerall ordinaunces be ascribed,* bearing theyr names and titles, as hath bene afore declared: so also hath Lucius one Epistle, fathered vpon him, in the which Epistle he writing to the brethren of Fraunce and of Spayne, appointeth such an order and forme of the church, as seemeth not to agree with the time then present.* For so hee declareth in that Epistle that a Byshop in al places, whether soeuer he goeth, should haue two Priestes with three deacons waiting vpō him, to be witnesses of al his waies and doings. Which ordinaunce although I deny not, but it may be and is conuenient, yet I se not how that time of Lucius could serue then, for a Bishop to cary such a pompe of Priestes & Deacons about him, or to study for any such matter: for so much as Bishops commonly in those daies were seldome free to go abroad, went they neuer so secrete: but either were in houses close and secret, or in prison, or els in banishment.* Moreouer in the said Epistle how pōpously he writeth to the Church of Rome: This holy and Apostolycall Church of Rome (sayth he) the mother of all Churches of Christ, which by the grace of God omnipotent, hath neuer bene proued to swerue out of the pathe of Apostolicall tradition, neyther hath euer fallen, or bene depraued with heretical innouations: but euen as in the first beginning it receaued the rule of the Apostolicall faith by his first instructors, the Princes of the Apostles, so it continueth euer immaculate and vndefiled vnto the end.

Unto this Lucius also is referred in the decrees of Gratian this constitution,* that no minister whatsoever, after his ordination, should at any time reenter to the chamber of his owne wife, in paine of loosing his Ministry in the Church, &c. Eusebius in his vij. booke, making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his Martyrdome, saith that he sate but eight moneths. But Damasus in his Martyrologe holdeth that hee sat thre yeares, & was beheaded the second yeare of Valerian and Galienus Emperours. And so doth also Marianus Scotus, and Nauclerus, with other that folow Damasus, affirme the same.

After him came Stephanus next Bishop of Rome following Lucius: whome Damasus, Platina, and Sabellicus, affirme to haue sit vij. yeares fine monethes, & to die a martir. Contrary Eusebius and Volateranus holding with hym, giue him but two yeares, which part commeth most neare to the truth, I leaue to the readers iudgement, of his two Epistles decretall, and of his ordinaunces out of the same collected, I nede not much to tary, for two respects, eyther for that concerning these decretal Epistles suspiciously intituled to the names of the fathers of the primitiue church,* sufficiently hath bene said before: or els because both the phrase barbarous and incongrue and also the matter it self therin contained is such, that although no testimony came against it, yet it easely refelleth it selfe. As wherein the second Epistle he decreeth, that no Byshop being expulsed out of hys seate or depriued of his goodes, ought to be accused of anye, or is bound to aunswere for himselfe, before that by the lawe regularly he be restored agayne fully to his former state, and that the Primates and the Synode render to him agayne all such possessions and fruites, as were taken frō him before his accusation, as is agreeing both to the lawes Canon & also seculare. First here I would desire y^e Reader a little to stay,* & this to consider to himself, who be these here ment, which either vsed or might despoile these bishops of their goods, & expulse thē frō their seates for such wrōgfull causes, but only Kings & Emperours, which at this time were not yet Christened nor vsed any such proceedinges against these Bishops, in such sort as either Primates or Synodes coulde restore them again to their places and possessiōs. Againe what priuate goodes or possessions had Byshops then to be taken from them, when as Churches yet neither were indued wyth patrimonies nor possessions. And if any treasures were cōmitted to the church, it pertained not properly to y^e Byshop, but went in general to the subuention of the poore in the Church, as in the Epistle of Cornelius to Fabius maye appeare, alleaged in Eusebius, Lib. 6. cap. 43. where he speaking of his Church, & declaring how there ought to bee but one Byshoppe in the same, •ntereth mention of xlvj. Priestes, vij. Deacons, with vij. Subdeacons, xlij. Acoluthes, of widowes and poore afflicted persons to the ••ber of a 1500,* and aboue, founde and nourished in the same Church, by the mercifull benignitie and prouidence of god Eusebius. Lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the ende of the said Canon. which thing is forbidden both by the lawes Ecclesiastical, & also seculer, &c. Now what lawes seculer were in the time of Stephen, for bishops not to be charged w^t any accusation before they were restored againe to their state, let any Reader marking well the state or the Heathen lawes that then were, iudge, and in iudgeing, I doubte not but this matter alone, though there were no other, will be ynough to descry the vntruth hereof.

Moreouer, by diuers other probable notes and arguments in the saide seconde Epistle of Stephanus, it maye be easely espied,* this Epistle to be famed and ••authored, especiall by the fift Canon of the saide Epistle, where hee so solemnly entreateth of the difference betweene Primats, Metropolitanes, and Archbishops, which distinction of degres and titles, sauoring more o• ambition, then of persecution, giueth me verily to suppose this Epistle not to be written by this Stephen, but by •ine other man, either of that name or of some other time when the Church began to be settled in more prosperitie, and orders therein to bee taken, for euery man to know his •eg••e and limits of his authoritie according as t• specified by the vj and vij. Canon, of Nicene Councell ••ceeing of the same matter.

The like 〈...〉 of the seuenth Canon of the said Epistle, where he writeth and appointeth all causes iudicarie to be decided & determined within the precinct of their owne proper Prouince, and not to passe ouer the boundes theron,* vnlesse (saith he) the appea•e be made to the Apostolical sea of Rome: which san•reth in my nose, rather of a ••acke of Popery then of the veine of Christianity, especially in these times, during this terrible persecution among y^e Byshops of Christ. And thus much of the second decretall Epistle of Stephanus: although of the first Epistle also written to Hilarius, some thing may be said,* as where he speaketh in the said Epistle of holy ••timentes, and holy vessels, and other ornaments of the aulter, seruing to diuine worship, and therefore not to be touched nor handled of any mā, sauing of Priests alone. Concerning all which implements, my opinion is this, that I thinke the Church of Rome not to haue beene in so good state thē, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him beyng occupied about other more earnest maters, and scarce able to hide their owne heades, had any minde or cogitation to studie vpon such vnnecessary inuentions, seruing in publike Churches. Neither doe I see howe the Heathen in those daies would haue suffered these ornaments to be vnconsumed, which would not suffer the Bishops themselues to liue amongst them. Notwithstanding Isidorus and Polydorus iudge the contrary. Betweene this Stephen and Cyprian Byshop of Carthage was a great contention, about rebaptising of heretickes, whereof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be saide.

Besides these Byshops aboue specified, diuers other there were also sent into banishmēt vnder the forenamed Emperours Gallus & Volusianus, as appeareth by Dionysius writing to Hermammon on this wise: that Gallus not seeyng the euill of Decius, nor foreseeing the occasion of his seductiō and ruine,* stumbled himselfe also at the same stone, lying open before his eyes. For at y^e first beginning when his Empire went prosperously foreward, and all thinges went luckely with him, afterward he draue out holy men, which praied for his peace and safegarde, and so with them reiected also the praiers which they made for him. &c. Eusebius. Lib. 7. cap. 1. Otherwise of any bloudshed or any Martirs that in the time of this Emperour were put to death, we doe not read.

After the raigne of which Emperour Gallus and of his sonne Volusianus being expired who reigned but ij. yeares, *Emelianus which slewe them both by ciuill sedition, succeeded in their place▪ who reigned but three monethes, & was also slayne. Next to whom Valerianus, & his sonne Gallienus were aduanced to the Empire.

About the chaunging of these Emperours, the persecution which first began at Decius, & afterwarde slacked in the time of Gallus, was now extinguished for a time, partly for the great plague raining in all places, partly by y^e change of the Emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the first entraunce of the Empire for the space of iij. or foure yeres, was right courteous and gentle to the people of God, & well accepted to the Senate. Neither was there any of all the Emperors before him, no not Page 68 of the which openly professed Christ, that shewed himselfe so louing and familiar toward the Christians as he did:  in so much that (as Dionysius, writing to Herman doth testifie) all hys whole courte was replenished w^t holy Saintes & seruantes of Christ, and godly persons, so that his house might seeme to be made a Church of God. But by the malice of Sathan, through wicked counsell these quiet dayes endured not very long. For in processe of tyme this Valerianus beyng charmed or incensed by a certayne Egiptian, a chiefe ruler of the Heathen Synagoge of the Egiptians,  a mayster of the Charmers or inchaunters, who in deede was troubled, for that he could not do his Magicall feates for the Christians, was so farre infatuated and bewitched, that through the detestable prouocations of that deuilishe Egyptian, he was wholly turned vnto abhominable Idols, and to execrable impietie, in sacrificing young infāts and quartering bodies, and deuiding the entrals of childrē new borne, and so proceeding in his fury, moued the eight persecution, agaynst the Christians, whom the wicked Egyptian coulde not abide, as being the hinderers and destroyars of hys Magicall enchauntinges, about the yeare of our Lord. 259.

The eight Persecution.

IN the which persecution the chiefe administers and executours were Emilianus President of Egipt, Paternus and Galerius Maximus, Proconsuls in Aphrica, Bergomensis also maketh mention of Paternus.  Uicegerent of Rome, and of Perennius. Vincentius speaketh also of Nicerius, and Claudius Presidentes. &c.

What was the chiefe originall cause of this persecution, partly is signified before,  where mention was made of the wicked Egiptian. But as this was the outward and politicall cause, so S Cyprian sheweth other causes more speciall, and Ecclesiasticall, in his iiii. booke. Epist. 4. whose wordes be these: but we (sayth he) must vnderstand and confesse, that thys turbulent oppression & calamitie, which hath wasted for the most part all our whole company, and doth daily consume,  riseth chiefly of our owne wickednes & sinnes: while we walke not in the way of the Lord, nor obserue his preceptes left vnto vs for our institution. The Lord obserued the will of his father in all poynts: but we obserue not the will of the Lord, hauing all our minde and study set vpon lucre & possessions, geuen to pryde, full of emulation and dissention, voyde of simplicitie and faythfull dealing, renouncing thys world in word onely, but nothing in deede, euery man pleasing himselfe, and displeasing all other. And therefore are we thus scourged, and worthely. For what stripes and scourges doe wee not deserue, when the confessors themselues (such as haue byd the tryall of their confession) and such as ought to be an example to the rest of well doynge, doe keepe no discipline? And therefore because some such there be, proudly puffed vp with this swelling and vnmanerly bragging of their confession, these tormentes come: such as doe not easely send vs to the crowne, except by the mercy of God, some being takē away by quicknes of death, do preuēt the tediousnes of punishimēt. These things do we suffer for our sinnes and desertes, as by the Lordes censure we haue bene forewarned, saying: If they shall forsake my lawe, and will not walke in my iudgementes: If they shall prophane my institutions, and will not obserue my preceptes, I will visite their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges (sayth he) we feelee, which neyther please God in our good deedes, nor repent in our euill deedes. Wherefore the sayd Cyprian, adding this exhortation withall, exhorted them to pray and intreate from the bottome of their hart and whole minde, the mercy of God which promiseth, saying: but yet my mercy I will not scatter from them. &c. Let vs aske, and wee shall obtayne, and though (sayth Cyprian) it be with tariance, yet for so much as we haue greuously offended, let vs continue knocking, for to him that knocketh, it shalbe opened, if our prayers, sighinges, and weepinges knocke still at the dore with continuance, and if our prayers be ioyned together with brotherly agreement &c.

Moreouer, what vices were then principally raygning among the Christians,hee further specifieth in the sayd Epistle: which chiefly were deuision and dissention among the brethren. For when it was spoken to them in a vision, by these wordes Petite & impetrabitis, that is: Pray, and ye shall obtayne, afterward it was required of the congregation there present, to direct their prayers, for certayne persons assigned to them by name: but they could not agree and cōdescend altogether of the names and persons of them which they should pray for, but were dissonant in their consent and petition: whiche thing (sayth Cyprian) did greatly displease hym, that spake vnto them: Pray, and ye shall obtayne, for that there was no vniforme equalitie of voyce and hart nor one simple and ioyned concorde among the brethren, whereof it is written the Psalme. 67. God which maketh to dwell in the house together men of one accord.&c. And so by the occasion hereof, he writeth vnto them in the foresayd Epistle, and moueth them to prayer and mutuall agreement. For (sayth he) if it be promised in the Gospell, to be graunted whatsoever any two consenting together shall aske, what shall then the whole Churche do agreeing together? or what if this vnanimitie were among the whole fraternitie, which vnanimitie (sayeth Cyprian) if it had bene then among the brethren, non venissent fraetribus haec mala, si in vnum fraternitas fuisset animata, that is: these euiles had not happened to the brethren, if the brethren had ioyned together in brotherly vnanimitie.*&c.

After the causes thus declared of this, or other persecutions, the sayd, S. Cyprian moreouer in the forenamed Epistle (worthy to be read of al men) describeth likewise a certayne vision, wherein was shewed vnto them by the Lord, before the persecutiō came, what should happen. The vision was this: There was a certayne aged father sitting, at whose right hand set a young man very sad and pensiue: as one with an indignation sorrowfull, holding hys hand vpon hys brest, hys countenance heauy and vnchearefull. On the left hand sate an other person, hauing in hys hand a net, whiche he threatned to lay to catch the people that stode about. And as he was marueiling that saw the sight thereof, it was sayd vnto him: The young man whō thou seest sit on the tight hand, is sad and sory, that hys preceptes be not obserued. But he on the left hand daunceth and is merry, for that occasion is geuen him to haue power of the aged Father geuen him to afflict men. And this vision was seene long before this tempest of persecution happened,*Wherein is declared the same that before is sayd, the sinnes of the people to be the cause, why Sathan in this persecution and all other, hath had and hath still such power with hys net of destruction, to rage agaynst the bloud of Christen men, and all because (sayth Cyprian) we forslacke our praying, or be not so vigilant therein as wee shoulde: wherefore the Lord because he loueth vs, correcteth vs, correcteth vs, to amend vs, amendeth vs to saue vs. &c. Cyprian.

Furthermore,* the same Cyprian, and in the same Epistle, wrting of his own reuelation or message sent to him, thus sayth: And to hys least seruauent both sinfull and vnworthy (meaning by himselfe) God of his tender goodnes hath vouched safe to direct this word. Tell him sayth he that hee be quiet and of good comfort, for peace will come. Albeit a litle stay there is for a while, for that some remain yet to be proued and tryed.* &c. And sheweth also in y^e same place of an other reuelation of his, wherein he was admonished to be spare in hys feeding, and sober in hys drinke, least hys minde geuen to heauenly meditation might be caryed away with worldly allurements, or oppressed with to much surfet of meates and drinckes, should be lesse apt or able to prayer and spirituall exercise.

Finally in the latter end of the foresayd Epistle, mention also followeth of other reuelations or shewinges,* wherein the Lord (sayth Cyprian) doth vouchsafe in many of hys seruantes to foreshew to come the restauring of hys Church, the stable quiet of our health and safeguard, after rayne fayre weather, after darcknes light, after stormy tempest, peaceable calme, the fatherly helpe of his loue, the wont & old glory of hys diuine maiesty whereby both the blasphemy of the persecutors shall be repressed, and the repentance of such as haue fallen be reformed, and the strong and stable confidence of them that stand, shall reioyce and glory. Thus much hath S. Cyprian, writing of these thinges to the Clergy. Lib. 4. Epist. 4.

As touching now the crymes and accusations in this persecution layd to the charge of the Christians,* thys was the principall, first because they refused to doe worship to their Idols and to the Emperours: then for that they professed the name of Christ. Besides all the calamities and euils that happened in the world, as warres, famine, and pestilence,* were onely imputed to the Christians. Agaynst all which quarreling accusations Cyprian doth eloquently defend the Christians in his booke Contra Demetrianum: Like as Tertulian had done before, writing Contra Scapulam page. 55. And first touching the obiection for not worshipping Idoles, he cleareth the Christians both in his booke Contra Demeir. & also De vanitate idol. prouing those Idols to be no true Gods, but Images of certayne dead kinges, which neyther could saue themselues from death, nor such as worship them. The true God to be but one, and that by the testimony of Sosthenes, Plato, and Trismegistus, the which God the Christians doe truely worship. And as concerning that the Christians were thought to be causes of publique calamities, because they worshipped not the Gentiles Idoles, he purgeth the Christians thereof, prouing that if there be any defect in increase of thinges, it is not to be ascribed to them, but rather to the decrease of nature, languishing now toward her age and latter end. Agayne for that it hath bene so foresayd and prophecied, that toward the end of the worlde should come warres, famine, and pestilence. Moreouer if there be anye Page 69 cause therof more proper then other, it is most like to be imputed to their vaine Idolatry, and to the contempt of the true God. Also that such euils be increased by the wickednes of the people, so that to speake in his owne words famem maiorem facia• rapacites quam siccitas, i. famine cometh more by auarice of men, then by drought of the aire, but especially the cause therof to procede of the cruell shedding of the innocent bloud of the Christians &c.

Thus with many other mo probations doth Cyprian defend the Christians, against the barbarous exclamatiōs of the heathē Gentiles. Of which Cyprian forsomuch as he suffered in the time of his persecution, I mynde (Christ wylling) to recapitulate here in ample discourse, the ful summe, first of his life and bringing vp, then of his death, & Martyrdome, as the worthines of that man deserueth to be remembred. Of this Cyprian therfore, otherwise named Statius, thus writeth Nicephorus, Nazianzenns, Iacobus de Voragine,Henricus de Erfordia, Volateranus. Hieronymus, and other, that he being an Aphrican, and borne in Carthage, first was an Idolater and Gentill, altogether giuen to the study and practise of the Magicall Artes, of whose parentage and education in letters from his youth, no mention is made but y^t he was a worthy Rethorician in Aphrica. Of whose conuersion and baptisme he himselfe in his first booke & second Epistle, writeth a flourishing and eloquent Hystory. Which his conuersion vnto the christian fayth as Hieronimus affirmeth in his commentary vpon Ionas, was through the grace of God and the meanes of Cecilius a Priest, whose name after he bare, and through the occasion of hearing the history of the Prophet Ionas. The same Hierome moreouer testifieth how he immediatly vpon his conuersion distributed among the poore al his substaunce and after that being ordained a Priest,* was not long after constituted bishop of the congregation of Carthage. But whether he succeeded Agrippinus of whom he often maketh mention, which also was the first author of rebaptization, or some other bishop of Carthage, it remaineth vncertain. But this is most true, he himselfe shined in his office and dignitie with such good giftes, and vertues, that as Nazianzenus writeth, he had the gouernment of the whole, east Church, and church of Spain, and was called the Bishop of the Christian men.

And to the further setting foorth (to the praise of God) of his godly vertues wherwith he was indued appearing as well in his owne workes, to them that list to peruse the same, as also described by other worthy writers, he was curteous and gentle, louing and ful of patience, and therewithall sharpe & seure in his office, according as the cause required, as appeareth in his first booke and third epistle. Furthermore he was most louing and kinde towarde his brethren, and tooke much payne in helping and relieuyng the Martyrs, as appeareth by his letters to the Elders, and Deacons of his Bishopricke, that with all study and indeuour they should gently entertaine and shewe pleasure vnto the Martirs in his absence, as partly is touched before.

The third Epistle of his first booke doth declare of what stomacke and godly courage he was, in executyng his office, and handling his matters. Neither was he void of prudence & circumspection, but was adorned with marueilous modestie,* wherby he attempted nothing vpon his owne head and iudgement, but with the consent of his fellow byshops and other inferiour Ministers, & that chiefly (amōg others) doth the 10. Epistle of his third booke witnes. He was of a marueilous liberal disposition towards the poore brethren of other countries: for so often as he had cause of absence he committed the care of those poore men to his fellow officers, and wrote vnto them, that of their own proper goods, they would helpe their banished brethren, to that which was necessary for them, as witnesseth the 24. Epistle of his thirde booke.* He reciteth among other gifts wherewith he was indued, as touching the visions and heauenly admonitions of the persecutions that should follow, and of other matters touching the gouernment of y^e Church in his first booke & third Epistle, and fourth booke and fourth Epistle, where he reciteth and expoundeth the forme or maner of a certaine vision, which we haue before sufficiently expressed.

He had moreouer great skill in the foreknowledge of things that should chaunce, as may be gathered in the vj. Epistle of his fourth booke. Also Augustine doth attribute vnto him many worthy vertues, which wryteth much in setting foorth his giftes of humilitie, in his seconde booke of Baptisme, the fourth chapter, against the Donatistes, and in his vij. booke and xj. chap. of his long sufferance and patience. Also of his curtesie and meekenes by which vertues he concealed nothing that he vnderstoode,* but vttered the same meekely and patiently. Also that he kept the Ecclesiasticall peace & concorde with those that were of an other opinion then he was of: lastly, that he neither circumuented nor did preiudice any man, but followed y^r thing which seemed good in his iudgement, it is manifest in S. Augustine his fift booke, De Baptismo contra Donatistas. Neyther is this to be passed with silence, that Hierome writeth that he was very diligent in reading, especially the works of Tertullian, For he saieth that he saw a certaine olde man whose name was Paulus,* which tolde him he saw the notarye of blessed Cyprian, being then an olde man when he him selfe was but a springal in the Citie of Rome, and told him that it was Cyprians wont neuer to let one daye passe wythout some reading of Tertullian, and that he was accustomed oftentimes to say vnto him: giue me any master, meanyng thereby Tertullian.

Now a few wordes touching his exile, and Martyrdome. Of his Epistles which he wrote backe to his congregation, leading his life in exile, mention is made aboue wherin he sheweth the vertue beseeming a faithfull pastor in that he tooke no lesse care, as wel of his owne church, as of other Bishops being absent, then he did beyng presente. Wherin also he himselfe doth signifie y^t voluntarily he absented himselfe, least he should doe more hurt then good to the congregation, by reason of his presence, as is likewyse declared before. Thus from the desolate places of his banishment, wherein he was oftentimes sought for, he writeth vnto his brethren, as in his third booke and x. Epistle is manifest, which thing semeth to be done in the raigne of Decius or Gallus. But after that he returned againe but of exile,* in the raigne of this Valorianus, he was also after that the second tyme banished of Paternus the Proconsull of Aphrica, into the Citie of Thurbin, as the oration of Augustine touching Cyprian sheweth, or els as Pontius the Deacon saith,* into a Citie named Fur•bilitana, or Curabilitana. But when Paternus the Proconsull was dead, Galienus Maximus succeded in the rowme and office of Paternus, who fynding Cyprian in a garden, caused him to be apprehended by his Sergeauntes, and to be brought before the Idoles, to offer sacrifice, which when he woulde not doe, then the Proconsul breaking forth in these words sayd: Long hast thou liued in a sacrilegious mind, and hast gathered together men of wicked conspiracie, and hast shewed thy selfe an enimie to the Gods of the Romanes, and to their holye lawes: neither could the sacrete Emperours Valerianus & Galienus reuoke thee to the secte of their ceremonies. At length the wicked tyraunt condemnyng him to haue hys head cut of,* he patiently and willingly submitted his necke to the stroke of the sword (as Hieronimus affirmeth.) And so this blessed Martyr ended this present life in the Lorde, Xistus then being Byshop of Rome,* as Eusebius noteth, in the yeare of our Lorde. 259. Sabellicus saith that he was Martired in the raigne of Gallus and Volusianus, Lucius, being bishop of Rome, but that seemeth not like.

Now remayneth to speake something likewise of hys workes and bookes left behind him,* although al peradūecture doe not remaine, that he wrote: wherof some are missing, some againe which in the liuery of his name & title, are not his, but such as be certainly his by the style & sense may soone be discerned: such is the eloquence of his phrase, & grauity of his sentence, vigour of wit, power in perswasion, so much differing from many other, as he can lightlie be imitated but of fewe. Of the which his bookes with vs extant, as the flourishing eloquence is worthely cōmended, proceeding out of the schoole of Rhetoricians, so is the authoritie therof no lesse reputation, not onely among vs of this age of the Church, but also among the Auncient fathers. Whereof S. Austen speaking of his commendation sayth,*Ego inquit, literas Cypriani non vt canonicas habeo, sed eas ex canonis considero: & quod in eis deuinarum Scripturarum autoritati congruit cum laude eius accipio: quod autem non congruit, cum pace eius respuo. &c. By which words it may appeare that Austen, although he did not repute y^r bookes and writings of Cyprian, to be equiualent with the holy Scripture, yet notwithstanding next after the scriptures he had the same in great admiration.

Vincentius, and Laziardus Celestinus, recyting the names of dyuers bookes, bearyng the tytle of Cyprian (moe perchaunce then be truly his) do collect out of them a certaine extract of his most pithy sentences, al which here to repeat were to tedious. To giue a tast of the speciall, I thought it not impertinent. As where he speaking of the treasures of a rich man, exhorteth saying:

Ne dormiat in thesauris tuis,*quod pauperi prodesse potest• i.

Let it not sleepe in thy treasures, that may profite the poore.

Duo nunquam veterascunt in homine, cor semper nouas cogitationes machinando: lingua, cordis vanas conceptiones proferendo. Page 70 i.

Two things neuer waxe old in man, the hart euer in imagining new cogitations, the tounge euer in vttering the vaine conceptions of the hart.

Quod aliquando de necessitate amittendum est, sponte prodiuina remuneratione distribuendum est .i.

That which a man must needs forgo of necessitie, wisdom it is a man to distribute so, that God may euerlastingly reward him.

Disciplina est morum praesentium ordinata correctio, & malorum praeteritorum regularis obseruatio. i.

Discipline is an ordinate amendment of maners present, and a regular obseruation of euils past.

Integritas ibi nulla esse potest, vbi qui improbos damnent, desunt: & soli qui damnentur, occurrunt.

There can be no integrity, wheras they which should condemne the wicked are euer wanting: and they only which are to be condemned, are euer present.

Auari ad hoc tantum possident, quae habent, vt ne alteri possidere liceat.

A couetous man onely possesseth his goodes for this, because an other should not possesse them.

Sericum & purpurum indutae, Christum induere non possunt.

Wemen that aduaunce themselues in putting on silks and purple, cannot lightly put on Christ.

Foeminae crines suos inficiunt malo praesagio: Capillos enim sibi flammeos auspicari non metuunt.

They which colour their lockes with red and yealow, beginne betime to prognosticate, of that colour theyr heades shall be in hell.

Qui se pingunt in hoc seculo, aliter quam creauit Deus metuant ne cum resurrectionis venerit dies, artifex creaturam suam non recognoscat.

They which loue to paynt themselues in this world otherwise then God hath created thē: let them feare, least when the day commeth of resurrection, the creator will not know them.

Qui pauperi eleemosinam dat, Deo suauitatis odorem sacrificat.

He that gyueth an almes to the poore, sacrificeth to God an odour of swete smell.

Contemnenda est omnis iniuria praesentium molorum, fiducia futurorum bonorum.

All iniurie of euils presēt to be neglected, for the good hope of good thinges to come.

Nihil prodest verbis proferre virtutem, & factis destruere.

To set out vertue in wordes, and to destroy the same in factes, is nothing worth.

Quo plures domi sint tibi liberi, hoc plus tibi non recondendum sed erogandum est, quia multorum iam delicta redimenda sunt multorum purgandae conscientiae.

The mo children and greater houshoulde thou hast at home the more cause thou hast not to horde vp, but to disperse abroode, for that many sinnes are to be redeemed many consciences are to be purged.

*Moreouer, least the Papists here should take an occasion by this text, grounded vpon the text of Tobī, cap. 4. Almoſe (saith he) deliuereth from al sinne and death: to build vp the workes of satisfactiō, the said Cyprian. Lib. 4. Epist, 2. more plainely expoundeth both himſelfe, and that place of Scripture, writing in these wordes: Quia scriptum est, Eleemosina ab omni peccato, & morte liberat. Yob. 4. non vtique ab ea morte, quam semel Christi sanguis extinxit, & a qua nos salutaris Baptismi & tedemptoris nostri gratia liberauit, sed ab illa quae per delicta postmodum serpit. &c. That is: Almoſe doth deliuer from all sinne and from death. Yob. 4. not from that (saith Cyprian) which the bloude of Christ hath once extincted, and from which the wholesome grace of our Baptisme, and of our redeemer hath deliuered vs, but frō that death which afterward creepeth in by sinne. &c. Cyprian. Lib. 4. Epist. 2. by which words it is apparant, that Cyprian meaneth this deliuerance (which commeth by almose gyuing) from death and sinne, not to be expounded nor to be taken for death euerlasting, from which only the bloude of Christ doth saue vs, but for temporall or transitory punishment, which is wont to be inflicted in this body of sin. For so it is nothing repugnaunt, but that temporall vertues may haue their temporall rewards in this life, & likewise sinnes committed may haue temporal punishments both of vs and in our families, our eternal saluation standing euermore firme in Christ yet notwithstanding.

The foresaide Vincentius moreouer speaking of an other booke of Cyprian (although the said booke be not numbred in the Catalogue of his workes) maketh mention of xij. abuses, or absurdities in the life of man, which in order be these:

- 1. Sapiens sine operibus. A wise man without good workes.
- 2. Senex sine religione. An old man without religion.
- 3. Adolescens sine obedientia.* A young man without obedience.
- 4. Diues sine eleemosina. A rich man without almose.
- 5. Foemina sine pudicitia. A woman shameles,
- 6. Dominus sine virtute. A guide without vertue.
- 7. Christianus contentiosus. A Christian man contentious.
- 8. Pauper superbus. A poore man proude.
- 9. Rex iniquus. A king vnrighteous.
- 10. Episcopus negligens. A byshop negligent.
- 11. Plebs sine disciplina. People without discipline.
- 12. Populus sine lege. Subiectes without law.

As I haue hetherto set forth the commendation of Cyprian this blessed Martyr:.* so must we nowe take heede againe, y^t we do not here incurre the old & common daunger, whiche the Papystes are commonlye accustomed to runne into, whose fault is alwayes almost to be immoderate and excessiue in their proceedings, making to much almost of euery thing.* So in speaking of the holye Sacraments, they make more of them then doth y^e nature of Sacraments require, not vsing them, but abusing thē, not referring or applying them, but adoring them, not taking thē in their kind for thinges godly as they are, but taking thē for God himselfe, turning religion into superstition, & y^e creature to the creator, y^t things signifying to the things them selues signified, &c. To the Church likewise and ceremonies of the church, to generall Councils, to the blessed virgin Mary mother of Christ, to the bishop of Rome, and to all other in like case, not contented to attribute that which is sufficient, they excede moreouer the bounds of iudgement and veritie, iudging so of the Church, & general coūcels, as though they could neuer, or did neuer erre in any iote. That the blessed mother of Christ amongst al women was blessed, and a virgine ful of grace, the Scripture & truth doth giue, but to say that she was borne without al original sinne, or to make of her an aduocate, or mother of mercy, there they run further then truth wil beare. The ceremonies were first ordained to serue but onely for order sake, vnto the which they haue attributed so much at length, that they haue set in them a great part of our Religion yea & also saluation. And what thing is there els almost, wherein the Papistes haue not exceeded?

Wherefore to auoyd this common error of the papists,* we must beware in cōmending the Doctors & writers of the Church, & so commend them, that truth and consideratiō, go with our cōmendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other blessed Martyrs were holy men, yet notwithstanding they were men that is such as might haue, & had their falles & faultes, men I say, & not aungels, nor gods, sauēd by God, not sauīours of men, nor patrons of grace: and though they were also men of excellent learning, & worthy Doctors, yet w^t theyr learning they had their errors also annexed. And though their bookes be (as they ought to be of great authority, yet ought they not to be equall with the Scriptures. And albeit the saide well in most things, yet it is not therefore inough that what they said it must stande for a truth.* That preeminence of authority onely belongeth to the worde of God, and not to the pen of man. For of men and Doctors, be they neuer so famous, there is none that is voyde of his reprehension.* In Origene (although in his time the admiratiō of his learning was singuler) yet how many things be there, which the Church nowe holdeth not? but examining him by Scriptures, where he sayd well, they admit him, where otherwise they leaue him.* In Polycarpus the church hath corrected and altered that which he did holde in celebrating the Easter day after the Iewes. Neither cā holy and blessed Ignatius be defended in al his sayings:* as where he maketh the fasting vpon y^e Sonday or the Sabbath day as great an offence, as to kil Christ him selfe, Ignat Epist. ad Phillip. contrary to this saying of Saint Paule. Let no man iudge you in meate & drinke. Also where the said Ignatius speaketh De virginitate, and of other thinges mo.* Irenaeus did hold that man was not made perfect in the beginning. He seemeth also to defend free will in man, in those thinges also that be spirituall. He saye• that Christ suffered after he was fifty yeares old, abusing this place of the Gospell.* Quinquaginta annos nondum habes. &c. Tertulianus (whom S. Cyprian neuer laide out of his handes almost) is noted to be a Chiliaste: also to haue bene of Mōtanus sect. The same did hold also w^t Iustine, Cyprian, & other, that the Aungels fel first for the concupiscence of women, Lib. de habitu mulierum. He defendeth fre wil of man after y^e corruption of nature, inclining also to the errour of them, which defend the possibilitie of keeping God his law. Cōcerning Mariage. Vnum matrimonium (inquit) nouimus, sicut vnum Deum. i. We know (sayth he) one Mariage, as Page 71 we know one God condemning the second maryage. Lib. de Monogam. Diuers other things of like absurditie in him be noted. Iustinus also seemeth to haue inclined vnto the errour of the Chiliastes,* of the fall of certaine Aungels by wemen, offree will or man, of possibilitie of keeping the lawe and such other. Neither was this our Cyprian, the great schooler of Tertulian, vtterly exempt from the blot of them, who contrary to the doctrine of the Church,* did hold with rebaptising of such, as were before Baptised of heretikes, Whereof speaketh S. Austen, myslyking the same errour of Cyprian, in these words contained in his 2. booke, Contra Cresconium. Cypriani, inquit, laudem ego consequi non valeo eius multis literis mea scripta non comparo, eius ingenium diligo eius ore delector, eius charitatem miror, eius Martyrium veneror. Non accipio quod de baptisandis haereticis & schismaticis sensit.*&c. Uppon the whiche matter there was a great contention betwene the sayd Cyprian, and Stephen Bishop of Rome, as partly afore is note•. Of Austen himselfe likewise, of Ambrose, Hierome, Chrisostome, the same maye be said, that none of them also clearely passed away, but their peculiar faultes and errours went with them, whereof it were to long, and out of our purpose at this present to entreate. And thus much concerning the story of Cyprian the holy learned Martyr of Christ.

Albeit here is to be noted by the way, touching the life and story of Cyprian that this Cyprian was not he, whome the narration of Nazianzen speaketh of (as is aboue mentioned) who from Arte Magicke was conuerted to bee a Christian, which Cyprian was a Citizen of Antioche, and afterward Bishop of the same Citie, and was Martyred vnder Diocletian. Where as this Cyprian was Byshop of Carthage, and died vnder Valerianus, as is sayd, &c. By the decrees of Gratiā. Dist. x. Quoniam. it appeareth moreouer that there was also a third Cyprian in the time of Iulianus the Emperour Apostata, long after both these aforenamed. For so giueth the title prefixed before the saide Distinct. Cyprianus Iuliano Imperatori: the distinction beginning. Quoniam idem mediator Dei & hominum homo Christus Iesus, he actibus proprijs, & dignitatibus distinctis officia potestatis vtriusque discernit, &c. Upon the which distinctiō the glose commeth in with these words saying: * y^t the popedome, and the seate Imperial, haue both one beginning of one that is, Christ: who was both Bishoppe, and king of Kings. And that the said dignities be distincted, albeit the Pope notwithstanding hath both the swords in his hand and may exercise them both some time. And therefore although they be distincted, yet in exercise the one standeth lineally vnder the other, so that the imperiall dignitie is subiect vnder the Papall dignitie, as the inferiour is subiect vnder the superiour: that as there is one ruler ouer the whole which is God: so in the Church is one Monarche, that is, the Pope, to whom the Lord hath committed the power and lawfull right both of the heauenly and terrene dominion. Haec Glosa.

*Thus much I thought here to note by the waye because this distinction is fathered vpon Cyprian, which is false, for this Cyprian was not in the time of Iulian, not by 200. yeares, and so likewise by the other Cyprian, which died Martyr vnder Diocletian. Of anye Cyprian besides these two, we read not. Neither is it credible, that if there were any such Cyprian, he would euer haue written of any such matter, of the difference and mutuall nede of Christiā Emperours and Christen Popes. When as that Emperour being an Apostata, neither regarded Christ, nor cared for any Pope.

*About this tyme, and vnder the same Emperour Valerianus suffered also Xistus, or Sixtus, the seconde of that name, Byshop of Rome, who being accused of his aduersaries, to be a Christiā, was brought with his vj. deacons to the place of execution, where he with Nemesius & other hys Deacons were beheaded and suffered Martyrdome. Laurence in the same time being also Deacon folowed after complayning to Xistus, as one being greued, that he might not also suffer with him, but to be seclused as the sonne frō the father. To whom the Bishop aunswering againe, declared that within thre daies he should folow after. In the meane time, hee willed him to go home, and to distribute his treasures, if he had any vnto y^e poore. The iudge belike hearing mentiō to be made of treasures to be giuen to the poore, and thinking that Laurence had great store of treasure in his custody, cōmaunded him to bring the same vnto him, according as the discourse of his storye here vnder written, more fully may appeare. Which history, because it is set foorth more at large in Prudentius, Ambrose, and other writers, and containeth in it mo things in it worthy to be noted of the Reader, we haue therfore with the more dilygence here inserted the more ample description of y^e same, to the further admiration of his patience, and God his glory shewed in him.

Now then as order requireth,* let vs enter the story of that most constaunt and couragious Martir of Christ S. Laurence, whose words and works deserue to be as freshe and greene in Christian harts, as is the flourishing Laurel tree, This thirsty hart longing after the water of lyfe, desirous to passe vnto it, through the straight doore of bitter death, when on a time he saw his vigilaunt Shephearde, Xistus led as an harmles lambe, of harmefull tyrantes to his death, cried out with open mouth and hart inuincible, saying,* O deare father, whether goest thou, without the company of thy deare sonne? Whether hastenest thou, O reuerend Priest, without thy Deacon? Neuer wast thou wont to offer sacrifice without thy minister. What cryme is there in me that offendeth thy fatherhod? Hast thou proued me vnnaturall? Now try swete father, whether thou hast chosen a faithfull minister or not. Deniest thou vnto him the fellowship of thy bloud, to whom thou hast committed the distribution of the Lordes bloud? See that thy iudgement be not misliked, whilst thy fortitude is liked & lauded. The abasing of the scholer, is the disgracing of the Maister. What? haue we not learned that worthy Maisters, haue obtained most worthy same, by y^e worthy actes of their Disciples and Scholers? Finally Abraham sacryficed his onely begotten Isaac. Stoned Stephen prepared the way to preaching Pe•er, euen so father declare thy manifold vertues by me thy sonne. Offer thou him that proferreth him selfe. Graunt that the body of thy scholer may be sacrificed, whose mind with good letters thou hast beau'tefied. These wordes with teares S. Laurence vttered, not becau•e his master should suffer, but for that he might not be suffered to tast of deaths cup, which he thirsted a•ter.

Then Xistus to his sonne shaped this aunswere:* I forsake thee not, O my sonne, I giue thee to wit, that a sharper conflict remaineth for thee. A feeble and weak old man am I, and therefore run the rase of a lighter & easier death. But lusty and young thou art, and more lustely, yea more gloriously shalt thou triumph ouer this tiraunt. Thy time approcheth, cease to wepe & lament, three daies after thou shalt follow me. Decent is it, that this space of time come betwene the Priest & the Leuite. It may not beseeme thee O sweete Pupill, to triumphe vnder thy master, least it be said he wanted an helper. Why crauest thou to be pertaker with me in my passion? I bequeath vnto thee the whole inheritaunce. Why requirest thou to enioy my presence: let weake scholers go before, and the strōger come after, that those without maister may get the victory, which haue no neede by maister to be gouerned. So Helias left behynde him his beloued Heliseus. I yeelde vp into thy handes the succession of my vertues. Such was their contention, not vnmeete for so godly a priest, so zelous a minister, striuing with themselues, who shoulde first suffer for the name of Christ Iesu.

In tragical histories we haue it mentioned, y^t through ioy & admiration people claped their handes, whē Pylades named himselfe Orestes, Orestes, as truth it was, affirmed himselfe to bee Orestes. Pylades wishing to die for Orestes, Orestes, not suffering Pylades to loose his life for his sake: But neither of them might escape death, for both these louers were guilty of bloud the one committing the facte the other consenting. But this our Laurence the Martyr most constant, was by no meanes enforced to make this profer, sauing onely by his ardent zeale, and feruent spirite, who thirsting after the cup of Maytirdome, had it shortly after filled to the hard brymme.

Now let vs draw neare to the fire of Martyred Laurence,* that our colde hartes may be warmed thereby. The mercylesse tyraunt, vnderstanding this vertuous Leuite, not onely to be a minister of the Sacramentes, but a distributor also of the Church riches (whereof mention is made before in the wordes of Xistus) promised to himselfe a double pray, by the appresion of one silly soule. First with the rake of Auarice to scrape to himselfe the treasu•e of poore Christians, then with the firy forke of tyranny so to tosse and turmoyle them, that they should waxe weary of their Christian profession: With furious face, and cruell countenaunce, the greedy wolfe demaunded where this Deacon Laurence had bestowed the substaunce of the Church. Who crauing three dayes respite, promised to declare where the treasure might he had. In the meane time he caused a good number of poore Christians to be congregated. So when y^e day of his aunswere was come, the persecutor straightly charged him to stād to hys promise. Then valiant Laurēce stretching out his armes ouer the poore sayde: These are the precious treasure of the church: * These are the treasure in deede, in whom the faith of Christ raigneth, in whome Iesus Christ hath his mansion place. What more precious Page 72 Iuels can Christ haue, thē those in whō he hath promised to dwel? For so it is written, I was hungry, & ye gaue me to eate: I was thirsty, and ye gaue me to drinke: I was harborles, and ye lodged me. And againe: Looke what ye haue done to the least of these, the same haue ye done to me. What greater riches can christ our maister posses, then the poore people, in whō he loueth to be sene? Oh, what tounge is able to expresse the fury and madnes of the tirants hart? Now he stāped, he stared, he rāped, he fared as one out of his wit: his eies like fier glowed, his mouth like a bore fomed, his teeth like an helhoūd grinded. Now not a reasonable man, but a roaryng lion he might be called. Kindle the fire (he cried) of wood make no spare. Hath this vyllaine deluded the Emperour? away with him, away with him. Whip him with scourges, iercke him with rods: buffet him with fistes, braine him with clubs, iesteth the traitour with the Emperour? Pinche him with fyrie tonges gyrde him with burning plates, bring out the strongest chaines, and the fireforkes, and the grated bedde of yron. On the firewith it, bind the rebell hande and foote, & when the bed is fire hot, on with him: rost him, broyle him, tosse him, turne him: On paine of our highe displeasure do euery man his office, O ye tormentors.

The worde was no soner spoken, but all was done. After many cruell handlings, * this meeke lambe was layd I will not say on his firye bed of yron, but on his soft bed of downe. So mightily God wrought with his Martyr Laurence, so miraculously God tempered his element the fire, not a bed of consuming paine, but a pallet of nourishing rest was it vnto Laurence. Not Laurence, but the Emperour might seeme to be tormented: the one broiling in the fleshe, the other burning in the hart. When this tryumphant Martir had beene pressed downe with firepikes for a great space, in the mightie spirite of God he spake to the vanquished tyraunt:

*This side is now rosted inough, turne vp O tyraunt great, Assay, whether rosted or raw, thou thinkest the better meate.

O rare and vnaccustomed patience. O faith inuincible, that not onely not burnest, but by meanes vnspeakable doest recreate, refresh, stablish, & strengthen those that are burned, afflicted and troubled. And why so mightilye comfortest thou the persecuted? Because through thee they beleue in gods promises infallible. By thee this glorious Martir ouercommeth his torments, vanquisheth this tyraunt, confoundeth his enimies, * confirmeth the Christiās slepeth in peace, raigneth in glory. The God of might and mercy graunt vs grace, by the life of Laurence to learne in Christ to liue, and by his death to learne for Christ to dye. Amen.

Such is the wisdom and prouidence of God, that the bloud of his deare Saints (like good seede) neuer falleth in vaine to the grounde, * but it bringeth some increase: so it pleased the Lord to worke at the Martirdome of this holy Laurence, that by the constant confession of this worthy & valiaunt Deacon, a certaine souldiour of Rome beyng therewith compuncted, and conuerted to y^e same faith, desired forthwith to be Baptised of him: for the which he being called for of the iudge, was scourged, and afterwarde beheaded. Henr. de Erford.

Under the same Valerianus suffered also Dionysius byshop of Alexandria much affliction and banishment,* with certaine other brethren, Of the which he writeth himselfe, & is alledged in the Ecclesiasticall story of Euseb. Lib. 7. cap. 11. the wordes whereof tend to this effect: Dionysius wyth three of his Deacons, to wit, Maximus, Faustus, and Cheremon, also with a certaine brother of Rome, came to Emilianus then President, who there declared vnto them in circumstance of words how he had signified vnto them y^e clemencie of his Lords and Emperours: who had graunted them pardon of life, so that they would returne to them, & worship the Gods and keepers (as he called them) of their Emperie, asking them what aunswere they would gyue him there vnto: trusting as he saide that they would not shew themselues ingrateful to the clemency of them which so gently did exhort them. To this Dionysius aunsweryng, said:* Al men worship not al Gods, but diuers men diuers gods, so as euery one hath in himselfe a mind or phantasie to worship. But we worship not many nor diuers Gods, but onely that one God, who is the creator of all things, & hath committed to our Lords Valerianus and Galienus the gouernmēt of their Empery, making to him our prayers •cessauntly for their prosperous health and continuance. Then the President sayde: And what hurt is it, but that you may both worship your God, what God soeuer he be, and these our Gods also? For you are cōmaunded worship such Gods, as al men know to be gods. Dionysius answered we worship none other, but as we haue sayd▪ Emilianus the President said: I see you are ingrattfull men, and consider not y^e benignitie of the Emperous,* wherefore you shal remaine no longer in this City, but shal be sent out to the parts of Libya, vnto a towne called Cephro. For that place by the commaundement of the Emperour I haue chosen for you. Neither shal it be lawful for you, to cōuent your assemblies, or to resort, as ye are wont to your burial places. And if any of you shal be found out of your places wherunto you are apointed, at your peril be it. And think not contrary, but ye shal be watched well inough. Depart therfore to the place as is cōmaunded you. and it foloweth more in the said Dionysius speaking of himselfe:* And as for me (sayth he) although I was sicke, yet hee vrged mee so straightly to depart, that he would not giue me one dayes respite. And how (saith he writing to Germanus) coude I congregate or not congregate any assemblies? And after a few lines it followeth. And yet neyther am I altogether absent from the corporall societie of the Lordes flocke, but I haue collected them together, which were in the Citye, being absent, as though I had bene present, absent in body yet present in spirit.* And in the same Cephro, a great congregation remayned with mee, as well of those brethren which followed me out of the City, as also of them which were remayning there out of Egypt. And there the Lorde opened to me the doore of his word, although at the first entraunce I was persecuted and stoned among them, yet afterward a great number of them fel from their Idoles and were cōuerted vnto the Lord. And so by vs the word was preached to them which before were infidels: which ministery after that we had accomplished there, the lord remoued vs to an other place. For Aemilianus translated vs frō thence to more sharpe and straighter places of Libya, commaunding vs to meete altogether at a city Mareota, thinking there to separate vs seuerallye into sundrye villages, or thinking rather to take and preuent vs by the way. After we were come thether, it was assigned to me (saith Dionysius) to go to Colluthion, which place I neuer hearde of before: which was the more grieve to me, yet some solace it was to me, that the brethren told me, it was neare to a Citie named Paraetionium. For as my being at Cephro got me the acquaintance of manye brethren of Egypt, so my hope was that the vicinitie of that place where I shoulde be, to the Citie, might procure the familiaritie and concourse of certaine louing brethren, which would resort and assemble with vs,* and so it came to passe, &c.

Moreouer the said Dionysius in his Epistle ad Domitium & Dydymū, making mention of them whiche were afflicted in this persecution of Valerian, recordeth in these wordes saying: it were superflous (saith he) here to recite the names peculiarly of all our brethren slaine in this persecution, which both were manye and to me vnknowne.* But this is certaine that there were men, wemen, younge men, maydens, olde wiues, souldiers, simple innocentes, and of all sortes and ages of men. Of whome some with courages and fire, some with sworde obtained victorye, and got the crowne. Some continued a great time, and yet haue bene reserued. In the whiche number am I reserued hetherto to some other oportune tyme knowen vnto the Lord, which sayth: In the time accepted I haue herd thee, and in the daye of saluation I haue helped thee, &c. Nowe as concerning my selfe in what state I am, if thou desire to know first howe I and Caius, and Faustus Petrus, and Paulus, being apprehended by the Centurion, were taken away by certayne of the towne of Mareote, I haue declared to you before. Now I and Caius, and Petrus alone are left here included, in a west place of Libya, distant the space of thre daies iourney from Paraetionium. &c. And in processe farther he addeth: In the Citie (saith he) were certaine priuily which visite the brethren: of Priestes Maximus, Dioscorus, Demetrius, and Lucius. For they which were more notable in the world, Faustinus and Aquilla, do wander abroad in Egypt. Of the Deacons besides them whō sicknes hath consumed, Faustus, Eusebius, & Cheremon, are yet alyue.* Eusebius hath God raised and stirred vp to minister to the confessours lying in bandes, and to burye the bodies of the blessed Martirs, not without great perill. Neither doth the President cease yet to this day, cruellye murderying such as be brought afore him, some tearynge with torments, some imprisoning and keeping in custody commaunding that no man should come to them,* inquiring also who resorted vnto them. Yet notwithstanding God with chearefulnes and dailye resorte of the brethren doth comfort the afflicted. Haec Dionysius.

Concerning these deacons aboue recited, here is to be noted, that Eusebius afterward was made Bishop of Laodicia in Syria. Maximus the Priest aforesaide, had the mynistration of the Church of Alexandria after Dionysius. Faustus Page 73 long after continued in great age,* vnto the latter persecution, where he being a very old man at length was beheaded, and died Martyr.

As touching Dionysius him selfe, thus the stories report, that he suruiuing all these troubles and persecutiōs, by the prouidence of God, continued after the death of Valerian, vnto the xij. yeare of the raigne of Galienus, whiche was about the yeare of our Lord. 268. and so departed in peace in great age, after that he had gouerned the Church of Alexandria the space of xvij. yeares, & before that, had taught the schole of the sayd Citie of Alexandria, the terme of xvj. yeares. After whom succeeded Maximus, as is aboue specified. And thus much touching the full storie of Dionysius Alexandrinus, and of other also Martyrs and Confessours of Alexandria.

In Caesaria Palestine, suffered also the same time, Priscus, Malchus,* and Alexander, the which three dwelling in the countrey, and good men, seing the valiaunt courage of the Christians, so boldly to venter, & constantly to stand, and patiently to suffer in this persecutiō, as men being greued with them selues, began to repent & accuse their so great sluggishnes, and cowardly negligence, to see other so zealous & valiant, & themselues so colde & faint harted, in laboring for the crowne of Christian martyrdome: first consulting and agreing within themselues, came to Cesarea, & there stepping to the Iudge, declared thēselues what they were, & obtained the end they came for, being giuen to the wilde beasts. After which like maner also and in the same Citie of Cesarea, a certaine woman whose name Eusebius expresseth not, who had beene before of the secte of Marcion was brought before the President, and likewise obtayned the same Martyrdome. *Euseb. Lib. 7. cap. 12.

Neither was the citie of Carthage all this while free from the stroke of this persecution, * if credit should be giuē to the speculatiue glasse of Vincentius, who cyting out of Hugo, recordeth of 300. Martyrs, of which 300. Martyrs the history saith thus, that the President setting before the cooles and incense to doe sacryfice, by a lyme kilne, which was there neere at hand, offred vnto them this condition, either to set incense to the coales, for sacrifice to Iupiter, or els to go into the fornace of lyme: wherupon they altogether with a generall motion sodenly rushed into the kilne, and ther with the dusty smoke of the lime were smothered Vincent. Erford.

*In Aphrica also in the City of Tuburba, the sayd Vincētius out of the Martyrologe inferreth mention of thre constaunt virgins Maxima, Donatilla, and Secunda, who in the persecution of this Valerian and Galienus, first had giuen for their drinke vinager and gaule, then with scourges were tried, after that vpon the gibbet were tormented, & rubbed with lime: then were scorched vpon y^e fiery gridirō, at last were cast to the wilde beastes, who being not touched of them, finally with the sword were beheaded, Vincent. Erfor.

*In Symela a City in Italy, vnder the Alpes, one Pontius beyng there apprehended, by the commaundement of Claudius the President, was hanged first vpon the racke, then was cast to the wilde beastes, * of whom he being nothing hurt, was after cōmitted to the fire. And finally neither touched therwith, (if the storie of Vincentius be true) was headed by y^e ryuers side, & his body throwne into the floude, where immediatlye the same houre, the foresayde Claudius with his assistant Anabius, were taken with wicked spirits, by whom they were so miserably vexed, that they byt of their tongues, and died.

*Zenon also Byshop of Verona, is saide also in the same persecution to sustayne Martyrdome.

*Moreouer in the same Citie of Alexandria aforesayde, Bergomensis in his 8. booke, writing of the story of Valerianus Emperour, maketh mention of Philippus, bishoppe of the said sea of Alexandria, who (as he saith) was vnder the sayd Valerian beheaded. But that is not to be founde in any approued story, nor stādeth with the truth of time that any such Philip then was bishop of Alexandria, or any other except onely Dionysius. After whom next succeeded Maximus, who remained xvij. yeares, and after him Theonas, &c. So that by the auncient recordes of olde writees it appeareth not that Philippus or any other of that name was Bishop of Alexandria, during this time signified by Bergomensis.

Although in some other later writers, as Equilinus Antoninus, and Bergomensis▪ I finde a certaine historye of one Philippus, President of Alexandria about the same tyme of Valerian and Galienus, elected by the Emperour and Senate of Rome, to gouerne those quarters, where he was at length conuerted to the christian faith, and after made Priest or Bishop, * as they saye, of Alexandria, but that not to be so, the testimony of auntient writers doth refell. The history of this Philippus, witnessed in our later Chronicles is this: Philippus, being promoted to the Presidentship of Alexandria came downe with his wife Claudia, * and his two sonnes, Auitus, and Sergius, and with his daughter named Eugenia, of the which Eugenia a long history full of straunge and prodigious miracles is written of Antoninus & other, wherof many things I will cut of, and briefely touche the effect of the storye, leauing to the iudgement of the reader the credit of mine authors, as he shall see cause.

Thys Eugenia daughter of Philippus, being of singular beautie, and diligently brought vp by her parentes in y^e studie of science and learnyng, was by occasion of hearyng Christians,* reduced and brought vp to Christianitie, with two other Eunuches her Schoolefellowes called Prothus and Hiacyntus: wyth whome shee takyng counsaile, vpon occasion, whether to auoyde the daunger of persecucion, or refusing to marry wyth a Pagane, vnknowne to her parents and fryendes dyd flee awaye, and because the more boldlye shee might resort to heare the readynges of Helenus then an aged Byshoppe and of others, chaunged her selfe into mans apparell, and named her selfe Eugenius,* vnder the whiche name she was at length admitted vnto a certayne Monastery, or a societie of christians in the suburbes of Alexandria although I hardly beleeeue that any Monasterye of Christians was then in the suburbes of Alexandria permitted, where also at the last for the excellencye of learnyng and vertue, shee was made head of the place. Here by the waye I omit the myracles of the foresayde Helenus) Byshoppe as the story saith of Hierapolis (howe he caried burning coales in his lap,* & how he aduētured himself to goe in the burning fyre, to resell wicked Zereas a Pagane, remaining in the same vnburned. Here also I omit the careful search of her parents for her, and of the answere of the Pythonisse againe vnto them, that she was taken vp to the heauen among y^e Goddesses. I omit moreouer the miracles done by y^e sayde Eugenia, in healyng the diseases and sicknesses or such as came to her, &c. The story proceedeth thus: Among other which were by this Eugenius cured & restored, there was a certaine Matrone of Alexandria named Melancia, who after she had vsed the helpe and acquaintaun• of Eugenius supposing her to be a man,* fell into an inordi•ate loue, sekyng by al meanes how to accomplish the lust of her concupiscence. In so much that in her daily visiting of her, at length she began secretly to breake her mind, and to entise her to her ludenes. Eugenius contrary exhorted her to vertue & honesty, shewing her the miseries of this life, and the peryll of that folly. Melancia seeing that by no meanes shee would be allured, nor by force drawen to her desire, & fearyng moreouer that she in detecting of her would bringe her to shame, beginneth first to make an outcry of Eugenius, declaring howe y^t she went about corruptly to defloure her, & so presented her accusation before Philippus y^e President, as well against Eugenius, as also against the rest of that company. This matter being heard, and the woman well knowen, the crime began to seeme suspitious, and so much the more, because it was obiected against the Chrystians. By reason whereof Eugenius with her felow Chrystians was now not only in great hatred, but also in daūger of present death and destruction. Then Eugenius purging herselfe & her honesty, although with sufficient probation, yet notwithstanding perceiuing that it coulde take no place, what so euer she said, and seeing no time now to dissemble any longer, for the daunger as well of her owne selfe, as specially of her brethren which troubled her more: desired of the Iudge place and time to make manifest to him the truth, and so shewed her selfe what she was, and how she was his daughter, the other to be Prothus & Hiacyntus the two Eunuches, her schoolefellowes, vtterying moreouer to him and to her brethrē the cause of her departing from them. At the narration whereof Philippus her father,* and her two brethren comming to the knowledge of her conceaued no litle ioy, in receauing their Eugenia againe whom they thought had bene lost. No lesse gladnes was among the people, to see y^e euidence of the matter so plainly to try out the truth of the one,* & the falsenes of the other. Wherat y^e malignant accuser was to double shame cōfounded, first for her dishonesty falsly clokod, secondly for the vntruth of her accusation openly detected. Bergomensis addeth moreouer, y^t the said accuser was stricken presently with lightning. Thus Eugenia trying her honestly to her parents & friends, not onely was receaued of them againe, but also by the grace of the Lord working with her in the space of time did win thē to Christ. Wherby Philippus the father of her by nature,* now by grace was begottē of his own daughter to a more perfect life, & whō once he thought to haue bene lost, not only he foūd againe, but also w^t her found his own soule, & his own life, which before he Page 74 had lost indeede.* This Phillippus (sayth the storye) was made afterwarde Bishop of Alexandria, and there suffered Martyrdome. Concerning whose Martyrdome I denye not but it may be true, but that he was byshop of Alexandria, that cannot be admitted, as is before sufficiently prooued, out of Eusebius and other auncient historians.

Lykewyse it is sayd, that Eugenia after the Martyrdome of her father, returning to Rome with Prothus, and Hiacinthus, by occasion of conuerting Basilla (who shoulde haue bene married to a Pagane husband,* and was then beheaded) to the Christian faith, was assayled wyth sundrye kinds of death, first being tied to a great stone & cast into Tyber, where she was caried vp from drowning, thē put in the hoate bathes, which were extincted, and she preserued: afterward by famishment in prison, where they saye she was fed at the hande of our Sauior, all which Legendary miracles I leaue to the Reader to iudge of them, as shal seeme good vnto him. At last the story sayeth, she was with the sword beheaded, Antonin. Bergom. Ado.

*And because in this prent history mention was made of Helenus whom Antoninus with his fellowes noteth to be the byshop of Hierapolis, here is to be vnderstoode & obserued by the way, y^t as Philippus in the foresaide history is falsly saide to be byshop of Alexandria, so lykewise vntrue it is that Helenus was bishop of Hierapolis. For by Eusebius it appeareth, Lib. 7. cap. 5. alleading the words of Dionysius that he was bishop of Tarus in Cilicia, and had there ouersight of that Church from the tyme of our Lorde, 254. to the yeare. 274.

The vj. yeare of Valerianus and Galienus we read in the story of Herfordiensis,* cited out of Isuardus, of Victor and Victorinus, who lying in prison the space of three yeares with Claudianus and Bossa his wife,* are sayde to haue sustayne• great tormentes, and Martyrdome, for the testimony and name of Christ. Ex. luardo.

Aurelius Prudentius in his booke intituled Peristephanon, inferreth mention of Fructuosus Byshop of Tarracona in Spaine, who with his two Deacons Augurius and Eulogius, suffered also Martyrdome being burned after syxe daies imprisonment, vnder y^e foresaid Emperours in this persecution. The cause of their punishment was for the profession of Christs name. Their Iudge and condemner was Emilianus: Their imprisonment indured sixe dayes. The kinde of death ministred vnto them was fire, wherin they being altogether cast with their armes bound behind them, their bandes (as Prudentius writeth) were dissolued, their hands vntouched with the fire, and their bodies remayning whole. The charge of this Iudge vnto the Byshop was this, that he would worship the Gods, whome the Emperour Galienus worshipped. To whom Fructuosus the byshop aunswering: nay, (sayde he) I worship no dombe God of stockes and blockes, whom Galienus doth worship, but I worship the Lord and maister of Galienus, the Father and creator of all times, and his onely Sonne, sent downe to vs of whose flock I am here the Pastor and shepeherd. At this worde Emilianus aunswering agayne, Nay, (saith he) say not thou art, but say thou wast. And forthwith commaunded them to be committed to the fyre,* where (as is sayd) their bandes and manicles being loosed, by the fire, they lifted vp their hands to heauen, praysyng the liuing God, to the great admiration of them that stode by, praying also that the element which seemed to fle from them, might worke his full force vpon them, & spedely dispatche them,* which was after their request obtained. In the meane space as they were in the fire, there was a certayne Souldier in the house of Emilianus, who did see the heauens aboue to open, and these foresayd Martyrs to enter in the same, which souldiour likewise shewed the sight the same time vnto the daughter of Emilianus, the president who beholding the same sight with the souldiour, was a present witnesse of the blessednesse of them, whom her cruell father had condemned.

As thys godly Byshop was preparyng to his death (sayth Prudentius) the brethren approching to him, brought him drinke, desiring him with much weeping to receaue & drinke with them, but that he refused to do, requiring thē moreouer to refrayne their teares. With like readines the brethren also were diligent about him to pluck of his shoes & hose, as he was addressing himselfe to the fire. But neyther would he suffer any seruaunts helpe in that,* wherein he was no lesse willing as able to helpe himself. And thus this blessed and fruitefull byshop Fructuosus with his twoo Deacons Augurius and Eulogius, beyng brought to the fire, witnessed the constant confession of the name of christ, with the shedding of their bloude. Aurel. Prudentius. Ado. Equilinus.

And thus farre continued wicked Valerian, in his tyranny against the Saintes of Christ. But as all the Tyrauntes before, and oppressors of the Christians had theyr deserued reward at the iust hand of God,* which rendreth to euery man according to his workes: so this cruel Valerian, after he had reigned with his sonne Galienus, y^e terme of vj. or vij. yeares, and about two yeares had afflicted the Church of Christ, felt the iust stroke of his hande, whose indignation before he had prouoked, whereof we haue to witnes Eutropius, Pollio, Sabellicus, Volateranus: For making hys expedition agaynst the Persians, whether by the fraude and treason of some about him, or whether by his owne rashnes, it is doubtfull: But this is certayne, that he fell into the handes of hys enemies, being about the age of lxx. yeares, where he led hys wret•hed age in a more wretched captiuitie.* In so much that Sapoires the king of the Persians vsed him (and well worthy) not for his ryding foole, but for hys riding blocke. For whensouer the king should light vpon hys horse openly in the sight of the people, Valerian Emperour quondam, was brought forth in steede of a blocke, for the king to tread vpon hys backe, in goyng to hys horsebacke. And so continued this blockishe butcherly Emperour with shame and sport inough vnto his finall end, as witnesseth Laetus and Aurelius Victor.

And albeit Eusebius in a certaine Sermon to the Congregation,* declareth a more cruell handling of him, affirming that he was slaine, writing in these wordes: Sed & tu Valeriane, quoniam eandem homicidiorum saeuitiam erga subditos Dei exercuisti, iustum Dei iudicium declarasti, dum captiuus ac vinctus vna cum ipsa purpura ac reliquo imparatorio ornatu abductus, ac tandem a Sapore Persarum Rege excoiri iussus, sale{que} conditus, perpetuum infaelicitatis tuae trophaeum erexisti. &c. That is and thou Valerian, for so much as thou hast exercised the same crudelitie in murdering the subiects of God, therefore hast proued vnto vs the rightuous iudgement of God, in that thy selfe hast bene bound in chaynes, and caryed away for a captiue slaue, with thy gorgeous purple, and thy imperiall attire, and at length also beyng commaunded of Sapoires king of the Persians to be slayne and poudred with sault, hast set vp vnto al men a perpetuall monument of thine owne wretchednes. &c. Euseb.

The like seueritie of God his terrible iudgement is also to be noted in Claudius,* his Presidēt, and minister of his persecutions. Of which Claudius, Henricus de Erfordia thus writeth, that he was possessed and vexed of the deuill, in such sort, that he byting of his owne tongue in many small peeces, so ended hys life. Erford.

Neither did Galienus the sonne of Valerian, after the captiuitie of hys father, vtterly escape the righteous hand of God. For beside the miserable captiuitie of hys father whom he could not rescue, such portentes straunge, & out of the course of nature, such Earthquakes did happen, also such tumultes, commotions, and rebellions did followe, that Trebellio doth reckon vp to the number of 30. together which in sundry places all at one time tooke vpon them to be tyrantes and Emperours ouer y^e Monarchie of Rome, by the meanes whereof he was not able to succour hys father, though he would. Notwithstanding the sayd Galienus beyng (as is thought) terrified by the exāple of his father,* did remoue: at least did moderate the persecutiō stirred vp by the Edictes of Valerian hys father, directing forth hys imperiall Proclamation, the tenor whereof proceedeth after this effect, as is to be sene in Euseb. Lib 7. ca. 13. Emperour and Caesar, Publius Licinius, Galienus, Pius Fortunatus, Augustus, vnto Dionysius, to Pinna, and to Demetrian and to all other the like Bishops. The bountifull benignitie of my gift, I haue willed and commaunded to be proclaymed through the whole worlde, to the intent that such whiche are deteined in banishment for discipline sake, may safely returne home agayne, from whence they came. And for the same cause I haue here sent to you the example of my rescript for you to peruse & to enioy, so that no man so hardy to vexe or molest you. And thys whiche you may now lawfully enioy, hath bene long since by me graunted. And therefore for your more warrant in the same, I haue committed the examplar hereof to the custody of Aurelianus Cyrenius my chiefe Steward, where you may •et the copy to see at your pleasure.

This mandate aboue prefixed did Galienus sent to Dionysius Alexandrinus,* and to other Byshops as is premised. An other rescript also the sayd Emperour sent to other Christian Byshops, permitting to them full libertie to receaue agayne their wonted places, where they were wont to associate together, called of them Caemiteria•

By this it may appeare that some peace was then graūted vnder this Galienus,* to the Church of Christ: albeit not so,* but y^e some there were which suffered. Among whome was one Marinus mentioned in Eusebius. Lib. 7. This Marinus being a warriour and a noble man in Cesarea, stooode Page 75 for the dignitie of a certaine order, whiche by all order of course, was next to fall vpon him by right, had not the enuious ambitiō of him y^t should follow next after hym, supplanted him both of office & life. For he accused him to be a Christian, and therefore sayd that he was not to be admytted vnto their offices, which was against their Religion. Wherupon Achaius then being iudge examined him of his faith, who finding him to be a christian indeede, & constantly to stand to his profession, gaue him .iij. houres to deliberate & aduise wyth himselfe. There was the same time in Cesarea a Byshop named Theotechnus,* otherwise called Theodistus, who perceiuing him to stand in doubtfull delyberation and perplexitie in himselfe, tooke him by the hand & brought him into the house or Church of the Christians, laying before him a sworde (which he had vnder his cloke for the same purpose) and a booke of the new Testament & so willed him to take his free choyse which of them both he would preferre.* The souldior immediately without delay ran to the booke of the Gospell, taking that before the sword. And thus he being animated by the bishop, presented himselfe boldly before the iudge,* by whose sentence he was beheaded, and died a Martyr. Euseb. ibid.

*Whose body he beyng dead, one Asyrius a noble Senatour of Rome, and a man very wealthy among the chief of that order, (who the same tyme was there present at hys Martyrdome) toke vp and bare vpō his owne shoulders, wrapping it in a rich & sumptuous weede, & so honourably committed it to the burial.*Euseb, Lib. 7. cap 16.

Of which Asyrius the sayde author writeth, moreouer this storye, howe that in the foresayde Citie of Cesarea, the Gentiles vsed ther, of an aūcient custome to offer vp a certayne sacrifice by a fountaine side, the which sacrifice by the working of the deuill, was wont sodainly to vanish out of their eies, to the great admiraciō of the inhabiteurs by. Asyrius seing this and pittying the miserable errour of the simple people, lifting vp his eies to Heauen, made his praier to almightie God in the name of christ. y^t the people might not be seduced of the deuil any lōger: by y^e vertue of whose praier the sacrifice was seene to swimme in the water of the fountaine, & so the straunge wonder of that sight was taken away, and no such matter coude be their wrought any more.*Euseb. Lib, 7. cap. 17.

And because mention is made here of Cesarea, there foloweth in y^e next chapter of y^e same author, a strange miracle if it be true, which he there reporteth, howe y^t out of the same City was the woman, which in y^e gospel came to our Sauour, and was healed of her bloody issue. Her house being in the Citie of Cesarea, before the doore thereof was set vp a certayne pyller of stone, & vpon the piller, an Image was made of brasse, of a woman mekely knelyng on her knes, and holding vp her hands, as one that had some sute. Against the which there was an other Image also of a man proportioned of the same mettall, cūningly engrauen, in a short semely vestur•, & stretching forth his hand to the woman.* At the foote of which piller grew vp a certayne herbe of a straunge kind, but of a more straunge opiration, which growing vp to the hemme of his vesture, & once touching the same, is saide to haue such vertue, that it was able to cure all maner of diseases. This picture of the man, (they say) represented the image of Christ. The history is written in Eusebius, as is said, the credite whereof I referre to the Reader, whether he will thinke it true or false. If he thinke it false, yet I haue shewed him myne author: if he thinke it true, then must hee thinke with all that this miraculous operation of the herbe, proceded neither by the vertue of the picture, nor by the praier of the other being both dombe pictures, and engrauen no doubt at that time by the hand of Infidels, but to be wrought by some secret permission of God his wisdom, either to reduce the Infidels at that time to the belief of the storye,* or to admonish the Christians to consider with them selues what strength and health was to be looked for onelye of Christ, and no other aduocate, seing the dumbe picture engrauen in Brasse, gaue his efficacie to a poore herbe to cure so many diseases. This picture saith Eusebius remained also to his time which was vnder Constantinus the great.

As touching the line and order of the Romaine Bishops hetherto intermitted, after the martirdome of Xistus aboue specified, the gouernement of that church was committed next, to one Dionysius, about the yeare of our Lord, 266. who continued in the same the space of ix, yeares, as Eusebius saith,* as Damasus recordeth but onely vj. yeares, and two moneths. Of his decretall Epistles because sufficient hath bene sayd before concerning that matter, I omit to speake. After whom succeeded Felix, in the first yeare of Probus the Emperour, about y^e yeare of our Lord, 280. who gouerned that church v. yeares, and died as Pla[•]ina saith, a martyr. After him followed Eutychianus, and then Gaius, both martyrs, as the histories of some do recorde.

About the time of these byshops, lyued Theodorus byshop of Neocesarea, who is otherwise called Gregorius Mogrus, whome also Nicephorus for his myracles, calleth 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

Thus Galienus the foresayd Emperour raygned as is declared, with his father Valerian, vij, yeares, after whose captiuitie he ruled the Monarchie, alone about ix. yeares, with some peace and quietnes graunted to the Church.

The daies of this Galien[•]s being expired,* followed Claudius a quiet Emperour,* as most stories do record. Although Vincentius affirmeth that he was a mouer of persecution against the Christiā^s, & maketh mention of 262. Martyrs, which in his time did suffer, but because no such record remaineth to be found in Eusebius, who woulde not haue omitted some memoriall thereof if it had bene true, therefore I referre the same to the free iudgement of the Reader to finde such credite as it maye.* This Claudius raigned but two yeares, after whome came Quintilianus, his brother next Emperour, & a quiet Prince, who cōtinued but onely xvij. daies, and had to his successor Aurelianus, vnder whome Orosius in his seuenth booke, doth number the ix. persecution against the Christians.

The ix. Persecution.

HEtherto from the captiuitie of Ualerian the Church of Christ was in some quietnes till the death of Quintilianus,* as hath beene declared: After whom Aurelianus the next successor possessed the crowne, who in the first beginning of his raigne (after the common maner of al princes) shewed himselfe a Prince moderate and discrete, much worthy of commendation, if his good beginning had continued in a constant course agreeing to the same. Of nature he was seuer & rigorous in correcting,* dissolute in manners, in so much that it was said of him in a vulgare prouerbe, that he was a good phisition, sauynge that he gaue to bitter medicines. This Emperour being sicke, neuer sent for Phisition, but cured himselfe with abstinence. And as his beginning was not vnfruitefull to the common wealth: so neither was he any great disturber of the christians: whom he did not onely tolerate in their religiō but also in their counsell,* beyng the same tyme assembled at Antioche, semed not to be against them. Notwithstanding in continuance of time through sinister motion and instigation of certaine about him (as commonly such are neuer absent in al places from the eares of princes (hys nature somewhat inclinable to seueritie, was altered to a playne tyranny, which tyranny first he shewed beginnyng with the death of his owne sisters sonne, as wytnesseth Eutropius. After that he proceeded either to mooue, or at least to purpose persecution against the Christians.* Albeit that wicked purpose of the Emperour, the mercifull working of God his hand did soone ouerthrow. For as the edict or proclamation should haue beene denounced for the persecuting of the christians, and the emperour now ready to subscribe the edict with his hande, the mighty stroke of the hand of the lord sodainly from aboue did stop his purpose, binding,* as a man might say, the Emperours hands behinde him: declaryng (as Eusebius saieth) to all men, how there is no power to worke any violence against the seruantes of God, vnlesse his permission do suffer them, and gyue them leaue. Euseb. Lib. 7. cap. 30. Eutropius and Uopiscus affirme, that as the said Aurelianus was purposing to rayse persecutiō against vs, he was sodainly terrified with lightning, and so stopped from his wicked tyranny. Not long after about the fifte or sixt yeare of hys rayne,* he was slaine betwene Bizance and Hieraclea, an. 278. Thus Aurelianus rather intended thē moued persecution.* Neither is there any more then this founde cōcerning this persecution in auncient histories and records of the Church. Wherefore I maruell the more, that Vincentius collecting out of the Martyreloges, hath comprehended such a great Cataloge of so manye martirs, whiche in Fraunce and in Italye (sayeth he) suffered death and torments vnder this Emperour Aurelianus. Whereunto Orosius also seemeth to agree, in numbring this to be the ninth persecution vnder the sayd Aurelian.

Next after Aurelianus the succession of the impery fell to Publius Annius Tacitus,* who raigned but vj. monethes, Him succeded his brother Florianus, who raigned but lx. dayes. And after him followed Marcus Aurelius, surnamed Probus. Of whome more hereafter (God willing) shal appeare.

In the meane time, within the compasse of these Emperours ••lleth in a story recorded, of Eusebius, and not vnworthy Page 76 here to be noted, whereby to vnderstand the faithfull diligence of good Ministers, what good it may doe in a common wealth.

Mention is made before of Eusebius the Deacon of Dyonisius, whom God stirred vp to vnite and comfort the saintes that were in prison and bandes, and to burye the bodies of the blessed Martyrs departed, not without great perill of his owne life, and after was made bishop (as is sayde) of Laodicea. But before he came to Laodicea to be bishop there, it chaunced, the sayde Eusebius remaining as yet at Alexandria, the citie to be besieged of the Romaines, Pyrchus being there captaine. In the which siege halfe of the citie did hold with the Romaines, the other half withstoode them.* In that part which went with the Romaine captaine was Eusebius, being also in great fauour with the captaine for his worthy fidelitie and seruice shewed. With the other halfe that resisted the Romaines, was Anatholius, gouernour or moderator then of the schole of Alexandria, who also was bishop after the sayde Eusebius of Laodicea. This Anatholius perceiuing the citizens to be in miserable distresse of famine and destruction by reason of penury and lacke of sustenance, sendeth to Eusebius beeng then with the Romaines, and certifieth him of the lamentable penurie and perill of the citie, instructing him moreouer, what to do in the matter. Eusebius vnderstanding the case, repaireth to the captaine, desiring of him so much fauoure, that so many as would flee out of the citie from their enemies, might be licenced to escape and freely to passe, which was to him eftsoones graunted. As Eusebius was thus labouring with the capitaine,* on the other side Anatholius for his part laboured with the Citizens, moouing them to assemble together, and perswading them to geue themselues ouer, in yeelding to the force and might of the Romaines. But when the Citizens could not abide the hearing therof: yet (sayde Anatholius) this I trust you will be con•ented, if I shal cōsaile you, in this miserable lacke of things to auoide out of your citie, all such superfluities and vnnecessary impedimentes vnto you, as olde women, yong children, aged men, with such other as be feeble and impotent, & not to suffer them here to perish with famine, whose presence can do no stead to you if they dy, & lesse if they liue, for spending the victuals which otherwise might serue thē that be more able to defend the Citie. The Senate hearing this sentence, & vnderstanding moreouer the graunt of the captaine, promising them their safetie, were well cōsenting therevnto. Then Anatholius, hauing a speciall care to them that belonged to the Church of Christ, calleth them together, with the rest of the multitude, and perswading them what they should do, and what had bene obtained for thē, caused them to void the citie, and not onlie them, but also a great number of other mo, who perswaded by him, vnder that pre•ence, changing themselues in womens apparell, or faming some impotencie, so escapeh out of the citie. At whose comming out Eusebius on the other side was readie to receiue them, and refreshed their hungrye and pined bodies, whereby not onelye they, but the whole Citye of Alexandria was preserued from destruction.*Eusebius. lib. 7. cap. 32.

By this little historie of Eusebius and Anatholius, described in the vij. booke of Eusebius. cap. 32. and briefly here set foorth to thee (gentle Reader) thou mayest partly vnderstande the practise of the Prelates what it was in those daies in the church, which was then onlie imploied in sauing of life, and succouring the common weales wherein they liued, as by these two godly persons Eusebius and Anatholius may wel appeare. Unto the which practise if we compare the practise of our latter prelates of the church of Rome, I suppose no little difference will appeare.

The next Emperour to Florianus (as is said) was Marcus Aurelius Probus,* a Prince both wise and vertuous, and no lesse valiant in martiall affaires, as fortunate in the successe of the same. During his time we reade of no persecution greatly stiring in the church, but much quietnes, as well in matters of religion, as also in the common wealth In so much that after his great and manye victories, such peace ensued,* that his saying was, there needed no more souldiers, seing there were no moe enimies to the cōmon wealth to fight against. It was his saying also, that hys souldiers nede not to spend corne and victuale, except they laboured to serue the common wealth.* And for the same cause he caused his souldiers to be set a worke about certayne mountaynes in Syrinia & in Messia to be planted with vines, and not so much as in winter suffered them to be at rest, therefore by them at length he was slayne, after he had reigned the space of vj. yeres, and 4. moneths, an. 284 Eutrop.*

Carus with his two sonnes Carinus and Numerianus, succeeded next after Probus in the Empire,* the raygne of which Emperors, continued in all, but iij. yeares. Of the which three first Carus,* warring agaynst the Persians, was slayne with lightning. Of Numerianus his sonne, beyng with his father in his warres against the Persians, we finde much commendation in Eutropius, Vopiscus, and other writers, which testified to him to be a valiaunt warriour, an eloquent orator, as appeared by his declamatiōs and writinges sent to the Senate. Thirdly, to be an excellent Poet. This Numerianus sorrowing & lamentyng for the death of hys father, through immoderate weeping fell into a great sorenes of his eyes, by reason whereof he keping close, was slaine not long after of his father in lawe, named Aper who traiterously aspiring to the Empire, dissnnuled his death, with a false excuse to the people, asking for him, saying, for the payne of his eyes he kept in from the wind and weather, til at length by the stinch of his body being caried about, his death was vttered.

In the life of this Emperor Carus aforesaide,* written by Eutropius in the later edition set forth by Frobenius, I finde (whiche in other editions of Eutropius doth not appeare) that Numerianus the sonne of this Carus was he that slewe Babylas the holye Martyr, whose history before wee haue comprehended. But that seemeth not to be like both by the narration of Chrysostome, and also for that Vrspergensis declaryng the same hystorie and in the same wordes,* as it is in Eutropius, saith that it was Cyrillus, whome Numerianus killed, the story whereof is this: what time Carus the Emperour in his iourney going toward the Persians, remayned at Antioche.Numerianus his sonne would enter into the church of the christians, to view and behold their misteries. But Cyrillus their bishop would in no wise suffer him to enter into the church, saying that it was not lawfull for him to see the misteries of God, who was polluted with sacrifices of Idoles. Numerianus full of indignation at the hearing of these words, not suffering that repulse at the hands of Cyrillus, in his fury did slay the godlye Martyr. And therefore iustly (as it seemed) was he himselfe slayne afterward by the hands of Aper.

Thus Carus with his sonne Numerianus being slaine in the East partes, as is declared, Carinus the other sonne raigned alone in Italye, where he ouercame Sabinus striuyng for the Empire, and raigned there with much wyckednes, till they returning home of the army againe from the Persians,* who then set vp Dioclesian to be Emperour, by whome the foresayde Carinus for the wickednes of hys life, being forsaken of his host, was ouercome, & at length slayne with the hande of the Tribune, whose wyfe before he had defloured. Thus Carus with his two sonnes, Numerianus and Carinus ended their liues, whose raigne continued not aboue three yeares.

All this meane space we reade of no great persecution stirring in the Church of Christ,* but was in meane quiete state and tranquillitie,* vnto the xix. yeare of the raigne of Dioclesian, So that in counting the time from the latter ende of Ualerian, vnto this foresaid yeare of Dioclesian, the peace of the church which God gaue to his people, semeth to continue aboue 44. yeares. During the which tyme of peace and tranquillitie, the church of the Lord did mightely increase and flourish, so that the more bodies it lost by persecution, the more honor and reuerence it wan daily among the Gentiles in al quarters, both Grekes and barbarous, in so much that (as Eusebius in his vij. booke describeth) amongst the Emperours themselues, diuers there were which not onely bare singular good will and fauor to them of our profession, but also did commit vnto them offices & regiments ouer countries and nations, so well were they affected to our doctrine, that they priuiledged the same with liberty and indemnitie. What needeth to speake of them which not only liued vnder the Emperours in libertie but also were familiar in the court with the Princes themselues,* entertained with great honour and speciall fauour beyond the other seruitures of the court, as was Dorotheus with his wife, children and whole family, highly accepted & aduanced in the palace of the Emperour: Also Gorgonius in like maner with diuers other mo, who for theyr doctrine & learning which they professed, were with theyr Princes in great estimation. In like reuerence also were the bishops of cities and Diocesse,* with the Presidentes and rulers where they liued: who not onely suffered thē to liue in peace, but also had them in great price and regarde, so long as they kept themselues vpriight, and continued in God his fauour. Who is able to number at that time the mighty and innumerable multitudes and congregations assembling together in euery citie, and the notable cōcurses of such as dayly •locked to the common Oratoures to pray▪ For the which cause they beyng not able to be contained Page 77 in their old houses, had large and great churches, new builded from the foundation, for them to frequent togither. In such increasement (saith Eusebius) by processe of tyme did the church of christ grow and shout vp daily more and more, profiting and spreading through all quarters, which neith•r enuie of men coulde infringe, nor any deuill could inchaunte, neither the craftie policie of mans wit coulde supplant, so long as the protection of God his Heauenlye arme went with his people, keeping them in good order, according to the rule of christian life.

*But as commonly the nature of al men being of it selfe vnruely and vntowarde, alwaies secketh & desireth prosperity, and yet can neuer wel vse prosperitie, alwaies would haue peace, and yet hauing peace, alwaies abuseth y^e same: so here likewise it happened with these mē, which through this so great libertie & prosperitie of life began to degenerate & languishe vnto idlenes & delycacy, & one to worke spite and cōtumely against an other, struiing and contending among thēselues for euery occasiō, with railing wordes after most despitfull maner: * bishops against bishops, and people against people, mouing hatred and seditiō one against an other, besides also cursed hipocrisie and simulation with all extremity encreasing more and more, by reason wherof the iudgemēt of god after his wonted maner, (whilst yet the congregatiō began to multiply) began by a litle and litle to visite our men with persecution, fallyng first vpon our brethrē which were abroad in warfare, but whē y^t toucht y^e other nothing or very litle, neither did they seeke to appease gods wrath, & call for his mercy, but wickedly thinking with ourselues, that god neither regarded nor would visit our transgressions, we heaped our iniquities daily more and more one vpon an other, & they which semed to be our pastors refusing the rule of piety, were inflamed with mutual contentions on against an other. and thus whilst they were giuen onely to the studie of contentions, threatnings, emulations, mutual hatred, & dyscord, euery man seeking his owne ambition, * and persecuting one another after the maner of tirany: Then, then, I say, the Lord according to the voice of Ieremy tooke awaye the beauty of the daughter of Sion. & the glory of Israell, fell downe from heauen, neither did he remember the footstoole of his feete in the day of his wrath. And the Lorde ouerturned all y^e comely ornaments of Israell, & destroyed all her gorgeous buildings, and according to the saying of the Psalme, subuerted and extinguished the Testament of his seruauant, and prophaned his sanctuary in destruction of his churches, and in laying wast the buildinges thereof so that all passingers spoiling the multitude of the people, they were made an obloquie to al the dwellers about. For he hath exalted the strength of his enimies, * and turned away the helpe of his sword from her, nor ayded her in the battayle, but ceased from the purging of her and her seate. He stroke downe to the ground and deminished her daies and ouer all this poured vpon her confusion. All these things were fulfilled vpon vs, when we saw the temples rased from the top to the ground, and the sacred scriptures to be burnt in the open market place, and the Pastours of the church to hide themselues, some here, some there, some other taken prisoners with great shame, were mocked of their enimies, whē also according to the saying of the prophet in an other place: Contempt was poured out vpon the Princes, and they caused to goe out of the waye, and not to keepe the straithe pathe.

The x. Persecution.

BY reason whereof (the wrath of God being kindled against his church) ensued the tenth and last persecucion against the christians, * so horrible and greeuous, that maketh the pen almost to tremble to writ vpon it, so tedious that neuer was any persecution before or since comparable to it for the time it continued, lasting the space of tenne yeares together. This persecution although it passed thorow the handes of diuers tyrantes and workers moe then one or two, yet principally it beareth the name of Dioclesiā who was Emperour as is aboue noted, * next after Carus & Numerianus. Thys Dioclesian euer hauyng an ambitious minde, aspired greatly to be Emperour. To whom Druas his Concubine sayd, * that first he should kill a wilde Boore before he should be Emperour. Hee taking effect at these wordes, vsed much with handes to kill wylde Boores: but seeing no successe to come thereof, vsed this prouerbe: Ego Apros occido, alius pulpamento fruitur, that is, I kill the Boores, but other doe eate the fleshe. At length the sayde Dioclesian being nominate to be Emperour,* and seeing Aper (who had killed Numerianus the Emperour) standing thereby sware, to the souldiers that Numerianus, was wrongfully killed, and forthwith runing vpon Aper with his sworde,* slew him. Vopisc. After this he being stablished in the Empire, and seeing on euery side diuers and sundrie cōmotions rising vp against him, which he was not well able himselfe to sustaine, in the first beginning of his raigh he chuseth for his Colleague Maximianus surnamed Herculus,* Father of Maxentius. Which two Emperours, because of diuers warres that rose in manye prouinces, choose to thē two other noble men, Galerius, & Constantinus, whome they called Caesars. Of whome Galerius was sent into the East partes against the Persians.* Constantinus was sent ouer to Britannie to this our country of England, to recouer the tribute. Where he toke to wife Helena the daughter of king Coil, which was a maiden excelling in beautye, and no lesse famously brought vp in the study of learning of whome was borne Constantinus the great.*

All this while hitherto no persecution was yet stirred of these 4. princes against the church of Christ, but quietlie and moderatly they gouerned the common wealth, wherfore accordingly God prospered their doings and affaires, and gaue them great victories, Dioclesian in Egipt, Maximian in Aphricke and in Fraunce, Galerius in Persia, Constantinus in England and in Fraunce also. By reason of which victories Dioclesian and Maximian pu•te vppe in pride, ordeyned a solemne triumph at Rome, after which triumph Dioclesian gaue commaundement that he woulde be worshipped as God, saying, that he was brother to the Sunne and Moone,* and adourning his shooes with golde and precious stones commaunded the people to kysse hys feete.

And not long after by the iudgement of God, for certaine enormities vsed in the church,* about touched, began the great and greuous persecution of the Christians, moued by the ragious cruelty of Dioclesian,* which was about the nyneteenth yeare of his rayne, who in the Moneth of Marche when the feast of Easter was nye at hande,* commaunded all the churches of the Christians to bee spoyled and cast to the earth, and the bookes of holy scripture to be burned.

Thus most violent edictes and proclamations were set foorth,* for the ouerthrowing as is saide, of the Christians temples throughout all the Romane Empire. Neyther did there want in the officers any cruell execution of the same proclamations. For their temples were defaced euen when they celebrated the feast of Easter. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 2. And this was the first edicte giuen out by Dioclesian,* the next proclamation that came forth, was for the burning of the bookes of the holy scripture, which thyng was done in the open market place as before: then next vnto that were edictes giuen forth for the displacing of such as were Magistrats,* and that with a great ignominie, & al other whatsoever bare anye office. Imprisoning suche as were of the common sorte, if they would not abiure Christianitie, and subscribe to the heathen religion.* Euseb. lib. 8. cap 3. & Nicephorus lib. 7. cap 4. Zonaras also in his seconde tome. And these were the beginning of the Christians euils.

It was not long after but that new edictes were sent forth, nothing for their cruelty inferiour to the first: for the casting of the elders and bishops into prisō, and then constraining them with sundry kindes of punishments to offer vnto their Idoles. By reason whereof ensued a great persecutiō amongst the gouernors of the church, amongst whom many stood manfully, passing through many exceeding bitter torments, neyther were ouercome therwyth, being tormented and examined diuers of them diuerslye, some scourged, all their bodies ouer with whips & scourges, some with racks, rasings of y^e flesh intolerable were cruciated: some one way, some another way put to death. Some againe violently were drawn to the vnpure sacrifice, and as though they had sacrificed, when indeede they did not, were let go. Other some neither comming at al to their aultars, nor touching anye peece of their sacrifices, yet were borne in hand of thē that stode by, that they had sacrificed, & so suffering that false infamation of their enymies, quietly went away. Other as dead men were caried and cast away, being but halfe dead. Some they cast down vpon the pauement, and trailing them a great space by the legs, made the people beleue that they had sacrificed. Furthermore other there were which stoutly withstood them, affirming with a loud voice that they had done no such sacrifice. Of whom some saide they were Christians, & gloried in the profession of that name: some cryed saying, that neither they had, nor would euer be pertakers of that idolatry. And those being buffeted on the face & mouth wyth the handes of the soldiers, were made to hold their peace, and so thrust out with violence. And if the Saintes did seeme neuer so little to doe▪ what the enimies would haue Page 78 them, they were made much of. Albeit all this purpose of the aduersary, did nothing preuayle against the holye and constaunt seruaunts of Christ. Notwithstanding, of the weake sort innumerable there were, which for feare & infirmity fell and gaue ouer, euen at the first brunt.

At the first comming downe of these edictes into Nicomedia, there chanced a dede to be done,* much worthy of memory, of a Christien, being a noble man borne, whiche moued by the zeale of God, after the proclamation made at Nicomedia was set vp, by and by ranne and tooke downe the same, and openly tare and rent it in peeces, not fearing the presence of the two Emperours, then being in the citie. For which acte he was put to a most bitter death,* whiche death he with great faith & constancie endured euen to the last gaspe, Euseb. lib. 8. lib. 3. & 5.

After this the furious rage of the malignaunt Emperours, being let loose against the saintes of Christ proceeded more & more, making hauock of gods people through out all quarters of the worlde.* First Dioclesian which had purposed with himselfe to subuert the whole christian religion, executed his tyranny in the east) and Maximianus in the west, But wily Dioclesian began very subtilye, for hee put the matter first in practise in his owne campe, among whom the marshall of the field, as Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 4. affirmeth, put the Christian Souldiers to this choise,* whether they would obey the Emperors commaundement in that maner of sacrifice he cōmaunded, and so both to keepe their offices, and leade their bands, or els to lay away from thē their armor and weapons.* Whereunto the Christen men couragiously aunswered, that they were not only ready to lay away their armour & weapons, but also to suffer death if it should with tiranny be enforced vnto them, rather thē they would obey the wicked decrees and comaundements of the Emperour.

There might a man haue seene very manye whiche were desirous to liue a simple and poore life: and whiche regarded no estimation and honour in comparison of true pietie & godlines. And this was no more but a subtile and wily flattery in the beginning, to offer them to be at theyr owne liberty, whether they would willingly abiure their profession or not, as also this was an other, that in the beginning of the persecution, there were but a few tormented with punishment, but afterwarde by little and little hee began more manifestlye to braste out into persecution: It can hardly be expressed with wordes what number of Martirs,* and what blood was shedde through all cities and regions for the name of Christ Eusebius, in his 8 booke & chap. 7. saith that he himselfe knew the worthy Martirs that were in Palestina.* But in Tire of Phenicia he declareth in the same a marueilous martyrdome made, where certayne christians being geuen to most cruell wild beasts were preserued without hurt of them, to the great admiration of the beholders and those Lions, Beares, and Lybardes (kept hungry for that purpose) had no desire to deuoure them, which notwithstanding most vehementlye raged against those by whome they were brought into the stage, and stode as they thought without daunger of thē, such were first deuoured. But the Christian Martyrs because they could not be hurt of the beasts being slayne with the sworde, were afterwarde throwen into the sea. At that time was martyred the Bishop of Sydon. But Syluanus the Byshop of Gazensis with 39. other were slayne in the mettall mynes of Phenitia.Pamphilus the elder of Cesarea being the glory of that congregation, died a most worthy Martyr, whose both life and most commendable martyrdome, Eusebius oftentimes declareth in his 8. booke and 13. chapter, in so much that he hath written the same in a booke by it selfe. In Syria all the chiefe teachers of the congregation were first committed to prison, as a most heauye & cruell spectacle to behold, as also the bishops, Elders, and Deacons, which all were esteemed as menquellers, and perpetrators of most wicked facts. Eusebius. Lib. 8. cap. 6, After that we read of an other, whose name was Tirannion which was made meate for the fishes of the sea, and of Zenobius which was a verry good Phisition, which also was slaine with brickebates in the same place. Eusebius. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Furthermore he maketh mention in the same place of others which were not tormented to death, but every day terrified and feared without ceasing: Of some others that were brought to the sacrifices and commaunded to doe sacrifice, which woulde rather thrust their right hande into the fire, then to touch the prophane or wicked sacrifice, also of some others that before they were apprehended, would cast downe themselues from steepe places, left that beyng taken they should commit any thing against their professiō. Also of two virgines very faire and proper, with their mother also which had studiously brought them vp,* euen from their infancy in all godlines, beyng long sought for and at the last founde, and straightly kept by their keepers, whilst they made their excuse to do that which nature required, threw thēselues downe headlong into a riuer, also of other two yong maidēs being sisters, & of a worshipfull stock, moued with many goodly vertues, which were cast of the persecutors into the sea: and these things were done at Antioche as Eusebius in his 8. booke, and 13. chap. affirmeth. But Syluanus the Bishop of Emissa y^e notable martyr together with certaine others were throwen to the wilde beastes. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Diuers and sondry torments were the christians in Mesopotamia molested with, where they were hāged vp by the feete, & their heads downewards, & with the smok of a small fire strangled. And also in Capadocia, where the Martirs had their legs broken. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 12.

Henricus de Erfordia maketh mention of the Martyrs of Tharsus in Cilicia as Tharatus, Probus, and Andronicus: But yet the Martirs in the region of Pontus suffered far more passing and sharper tormentes, wherof I wil hereafter make mention. Eusebius ibidem. So outrageous was the beginning of the persecution whiche the Emperour made in Nicomedia in Bithinia. as afore is saide, that he refrained not from the slaughter of the children of Emperours, neither yet from slaughter of the most chieftest princes of his court, who a litle before he made as much of, as if they had ben his owne childrē: Such an other was Peter, which among diuers and sundry tormentes: (among whō he being naked was lefted vp, his whole body being beaten with whips and torne, that a man might see y^e bare bones, and after they had mingled vineger & salt together they poured it vpon the most tender parts of his body, & lastly rosted at a soft fire, as a man would rost flesh to eate as a victorious Martir ended his life. Dorotheus and Gorgonius being in great authoritie and office vnder the Emperour, after diuers torments were strangled with a halter,* which both being of the priuie chamber, to him, when they saw & beheld the greuous punishment of Peter their houshold cōpanion: wherfore (said they O Emperour) do you punish in Peter that opinion which is in all vs? Why is that accounted in him an offence, that all we confesse we are of that faith religion & iudgement y^t he is of. Therefore he commaunded them to be brought forth, & almost with like paynes to be tormented as Peter was,* & afterwarde hanged. Euseb. Rufini Lib 8. cap. 6. After whom Anthimus the Byshop of Nicomedia after he had made a notable confession, & bringing with him a great company of Martyrs, was beheaded. These men being thus dispatched y^e Emprour vainly thought y^t he might cause y^e rest to do whateuer him listed. To this ende came Lucianus the Elder of the congregation of Antioche, and was martyred after hee had made his Apologie before the Emperour. Eusebius. Lib. 8. Cap. 13.

Hermanus also that monster, caused Serena the wife of Dioclesian the Emperour, to be martyred for the Christian Religion: so much did the rage of persecutiō vtterly forget all naturall affectes. Other Martyrs of Nichomedia doth Nicephorus in hys vii. booke and xiiii. chapter recite, as Eulampius and Eulampia, Agapen, Ireneia, Chionia, and Anastacia, vnder Illyricus, chiefe officer, were bound hand & foote to a post and brent. Vincentius. Lib. 12 cap. 66. And also Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 6. mentioneth such an other like matter full of horror and grief. There assembltd together in their temple many Christian men to celebrate the memory of the Natiuitie of Christ, of euery age and sorte some: There Maximianus thinking to haue bene geuen a very fit occasion to execute hys tyranny vpō the poore Christians, sent thether such as should burne the temple, the doores being shut and closed rounde about. Thether came they with fire, but first they commaunded the cryer with a loud voyce to cry, y^t who soeuer would haue life, should come out of the temple, & do sacrifice vpō the next altar they came vnto of Iupiter, and vnles they would do this, they shoulde all be brent with the temple. Then one stepping vp in the temple, answered in the name of all y^e rest with great courage & boldnes of minde, that they were all Christians, & beleued that Christ was their onely God & king,* and that they woulde doe sacrifice to him, with his father and holy Ghost, & that they were now all readye to offer vnto him. Wyth these words the fire was kindled and compassed about the temple, and there were brent of men, women, and children certeine thousands. There were also in Arabia, very manye martyrs slayne with axes, as Eusebius. Lib. 8. cap. 12. There was in Phrigia a citie, vnto which the Emperour sent his Edictes that they should doe sacrifice to the gods, and worship Idoles, all which Citizens the Maior himselfe, Page 79 the Questor, and chiefe Captaine confessed that they were all Christians. The Citie vpon this was besieged & set on fire,* and all the people, Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 11. In Melitina a region of Armenia, the bishops and Elders were cast in prison. Eusebius eodem cap. 6. In Arabrace a region neare adioyning to Armenia Eustratius was Martyred, as Nicephorus declareth, Lib 7 cap. 14. This Eustratius was y^r countrey man borne, and very skilfull in the Greeke tong, executyng by the Emperours commaundement, the shiriffes office at Licia in the East, which also did execution there vpon the Christians, and was a Scribe of great estimatiō called Ordinis Ducalis. This man beholding the meruailous constancie of the Martyrs, thirsted with the desire of Martyrdome, for that he had priuily learned the Christian religion. Therefore he not abiding for other accusers, detected himself, and worthely professed that he was a christian, openly execrating the madnesse and vanitie of the wicked Ethnikes. He therefore being caried away, was tyed vp, beyng first most bitterly beaten. After that he was parched with fire, beyng put vnto his bowels, and thē basted with salt and vinagre, and lastly, so scotched & bemangled with the sheldes of sharpe and cutting shels, that his whole body semed to be all one continual wound, howbeit, by gods great goodnes afterward, it was restored to the first integritie. After this he was caried away to Sebastia, where, w^t his companion Orest he was burned.* At that tyme also suffred Eugenius, Auxentius, Mardarius, Nicepho. Lib. 7. cap. 14. And in no lesse wise raged this persecution throughout al Egypt: where Eusebius in his 8. booke, and 13. chapter maketh mention of Peleus and Nilus Martyrs and byshops in Egypt. But at Alexandria especially were declared most notable conflictes of Christian and true constant Martyrs that suffred: which Phileas the Bishop of Thumitane describeth as after (God willing) shalbe declared. In this persecution of Alexandria, the principall that then suffred was Peter the bishop of Alexandria, with the Elders of y^e same most worthy Martyrs, as Faustus, Didius, and Ammonius, also Phileas, Hesichius, Pachiminus, and Theodorus, which all were bishops of the congregations within Egypt, and besides them, many other both famous and singular mē. The whole legion of Christian souldiours which lay at Thebes in Egypt, vnder the christian captaine Mauritius, when they would not obey the Emperours commaundement touching the worshipping of Images, were tythed to death once, and then againe. And at last through the exhortation of Mauritius, dyed altogether like constant Martyrs. Vincentius in speculo, Lib 13. cap. 2. Likewise at Antino diuers Christian souldiours, notwithstanding they were seriously dissuaded, suffred death together, amongst whome were Ascla, Philemon, and Apollonius, ibidem, cap. 50. and also in y^e other partes of Aphrica and Mauritania, was great persecution, as Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 6. Also in Sammum, of whiche place Chronicon maketh mention, and Scilia, where were 79. Martyrs slayne, for the profession of Christ, as writeth Henricus de Erfordia.

Now let vs come vnto Europe, Nicephorus in his vij. booke and xiiij. chap. sayth, that at Nicopolis in Thracia the Martyrs were in most miserable and pitifull wise handled, where Lysia had the execution thereof. In Chalcedon suffred Euphemia, vnder Priscus the Proconsul. Vincentius, Lib. 12. cap. 77.

Henricus de Erfordia sayth that at Rome, Iohannes and Crispus, beyng priests, had the execution of Martyrs. And at Boemia Agricola, and Vitalis, Vincentius. Lib. 12. cap. 49. And at Aquileia the Emperour commaunded euery man to kill the Christians. Vincentius, Lib. eodem cap. 58. and amongst those Martyrs he maketh mention of Felices, and Fortunatus. Reginus also writeth that in other places of Italy the persecution became great, as at Florentia, Pergamus, Neaples Campania, Beneuentus, at Venusa in Apulia, and in Thussia, and Henricus de Erfordia, saith, also at Verona. In France doubtlesse Rectionarus appoynted to that office,* played the cruell helhound, of whose great cruelty agaynst y^e Christiās many histories are full. At Mediolanus suffered Victor. And at Massilia, Maximianus set forth his decree, that either they should all do sacrifice to the Gods of the Gentils, or els be all slayne with diuers kindes of torments. Therefore many Martyrs there dyed for the glory of Christ. Antonius & Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 2. In Beluacus suffred Lucian.

Vincentius and Reginus write of many places in Spain, where was great persecution, as at Emerita, where suffred Eulalia, of whom more foloweth hereafter, & Adula, where also suffred Vincentius, Sabina and Christina. At Toletum suffred Lencadia the virgin, at Cesarea Augusta, where were put to death, 18. beside a great number of other Martirs, which suffred vnder Decianus the gouernour, which afflicted with persecution all the coast of Spayne, as sayth Vincentius, lib. 13. cap. 123.124.128.130.134• The foresayd Rictionarus made such persecution at Treuers neare the riuer of Mosella,* that the bloud of christian men that were slayne, ran like small brookes, and couloured great and mayne riuers. Neyther yet did this suffise him, but from thence sent certaine horsemen with his letters, commaunding them to ride into euery place, and charge all such as had taken and apprehēded any Christians, that they should immediatly put them to death. Vincent. Lib. 13. cap. 136.

Also Henricus de Erfordia,* and Reginus make mention of great persecution to bee at Colonia where Agrippina and Augusta were martyred, as also in the Prouince of Rhetia.

Beda also sayth, that this persecution reached euen vnto the Britains in his booke De ratione temporum. And the Chronicle of Martinus, and the Nosegay or tyme do declare that all the Christians in Britanny were vtterly destroyed. Furthermore, that the kindes of death & punishment were so great and horrible,* as no mans tong is able to expresse. In the beginning, when the Emperour by his subtiltie and wilines, rather dallied then shewed his rigor, he threatned them with bands and imprisonment: but with in a while when he began to worke the matter in good earnest, he deuised innumerable sortes of torments & punishments, as whippings and scourgings, rackings, horrible scrapings, sword, fire, and ship boates, wherin a great nūber beyng put, were sunke & drowned in the bottom of the sea. Euseb. Lib 8. cap 6. & 7. Also hanging them vpon crosses, binding them to the bodies of dead trees with their heads donneward,* hanging them by the middles vpon gallowses, til they dyed for hunger, throwyng them aliue to such kind of wilde beastes as would deuour them, as Lyons, Beares,* Libardes, and wild Buls. Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 8. Pricking and thrusting them in with bodkins and talants of beastes till they were almost dead, lifyng them vp a high with their heads douneward, euen as in Thebaide, they did vnto the women beyng naked and vnclothed, one of theyr feete tyed and lifted a high, & so hanging doune with theyr bodies, which thing to see was very pitifull, with other deuised sortes of punishments most tragicall, or rather tirannicall, and pitiful to describe: as first, the bindyng of thē to trees, and to the boughes therof. The pulling & tearing asunder of their members and iointes,* beyng tyed to the boughes and armes of trees. Euseb. Lib 8. cap. 9. The mangling of them with axes, the choking them with smoke by small and soft fires,* the dismembring of their hands, eares, and feete, with other ioyntes, as the holy Martyrs of Alexandria, suffred, the scorching and broyling of them w^t coales, not vnto death, but euery day renued. With such kynde of torments the Martyrs at Antioche were afflicted.* But in Pontus other horrible punishmentes and fearefull to bee heard, did the Martyrs of Christ suffer, of which, some had their fingers endes vnder the nayles thrust in with sharpe bodkins, some all to be sprinckled with boyling lead, hauing their most necessary members cut from them, some other suffryng most filthy, intollerable, and indurable tormentes and payne in theyr bowels and priuy members. Eusebius eodem,*cap. 12.

To conclude, how great the outrage of the persecution which rained in Alexandria, was, and with how many & sundry kindes of new deuised punishments the Martyrs were afflicted:*Phileas, the byshop of the Thumitanes, a man singularly well learned, hath described in his epistle to the Thumitanes, the copy wherof Eusebius hath in his 8. booke & x. chapter, out of the which we meane here briefly to recite somewhat.

Because (sayth he) euery man might torment the holy Martyrs as they listed themselues,*some beat them with cudgels, some with rods, some with whippes, some with thongs, and some with cordes, and this example of beating was in sundry wise executed, and with much crueltie. For some of them hauyng their handes bound behynde their backes, were lifted vp vpon tymber logs, and with certaine instruments their members & ioints were stretched forth, whereon their whole bodies hanging, were subiect to the will of the tormentors, who were commaunded to afflict them with all maner of torments, and not on their sides onely (like as homicides were) but vpon their bellies, thighes, and legges, they scratched them with the talents and clawes of wylde beasts. Some other were seene to hang by one hand vpon the engine, wherby they might feele the more grieuous pullyng out of the rest of their ioyntes and members. Some other were suche sort bound vnto pillers with their faces turned to the wall, hauing no stay vnder their feete, and were violently wayed downe with the payse of their bodies, that by reason of their straight binding, they beyng drawn out, might be more greuously tormēted. And this suffered they not onely during the tyme of their examination, and while the Shiriffe had to do with them, but also the whole day long. And whilest the Iudge went thus from one to another, he by his authoritie appointed certaine officers to attende vpon Page 80 those he left, and not to be let downe vntill either through the intollerablenes of the payne, or by the extremitie of cold, they being neare the point of death, should be let downe: and so were they haled vpon the ground. And further they were commaunded that they should shew not so much as one sparke of mercy or compassion vpon vs, but so extremely and furiously did deale with vs, as though our soules and bodies should haue died together.*And therfore yet an other torment our aduersaries deuised to augmēt our former plagues. After that they had most lamentably beaten them, they deuised moreouer a new kinde of racke, wherein they lying vpright, were stretched by both the feete aboue the fourth stop or hole with sharpe shels or shares strowed vnder them, after a strange kind of engine to vs here vnknown. Other some were cast downe vpon the pauement where they were oppressed so thicke, and so grieuously with tormentes, that it is not almost to be thought what afflictions they suffred.

Thus they lying in paines and torments, some died therewith, not a little shaming and confounding their enemies by their singular pacience. Some halfe dead and halfe aliue, were thrust into prison, where shortly after by paynes and woundes of their bodies they ended their bitter life. Some again beyng cured of their woundes by their indurance in prison, were more confirmed, who beyng put to the choise whether they would come to their cursed sacrifice, and enioy their wicked libertie, or els sustaine the sentence of death,*did willingly and without delay abide the extremitie, remembring with themselues what is written in the Scriptures: He that sacrificeth (sayth he) to straunge Gods, shall be exterminate, &c. Item, thou shalt not haue any strange Gods beside me, &c.

Thus much wrote Phileas to the Congregation where he was Bishop, before he receyued the sentence of death,* beyng yet in bandes, and in the same exhorteth his brethren constantly to persist after his death, in the truth of Christ professed. Euseb Lib 8. cap. 10.

Sabellicus in his vij. Ennead. and viij. booke, sayth that that christened man, which tore and pulled down the wicked Edict of the Emperour in Nicomedia, beyng stript and beaten y^t the bones appeared, and after washed in salt and vineger, was then slaine with this cruell kind of torment. But Platina writeth that Dorotheus and Gorgonius exhorteth him to dye so constantly.

But as all their torments were for their horriblenesse, meruailous and notable, and therewithall so studiously, deuised, & no lesse greuous and sharpe: so notwithstanding therewith were these Martyrs neither dismayd, nor ouercome, but rather thereby confirmed and strengthened, so merily and ioyfully sustained they what so euer was put vnto them.Eusebius sayth that he himselfe beheld and sawe the huge and great persecution that was done in Thebaide, in so much that the very swordes of the hangmen and persecutors beyng blunt with the great and often slaughter, they themselues for wearines sate downe to rest them, and other were fayne to take their places. And yet all this notwithstanding the murdered christians, shewed their meruailous readines▪ willingnes, and diuine fortitude, which they were indued with, with stout courage, ioy, and smiling, receiuing the sentence of death pronounced vpon thē, and song euen vnto the last gaspe, Hymnes and Psalmes to God. So did also the Martyrs of Alexandria, as witnesseth Phileas aboue mentioned. The holy martyrs (saith he) keping Christ in their myndes, beyng led with the loue of better rewards, sustained not onely at one tyme, whatsoeuer labour and deuised punishments they had to lay vpon them: but now also the second tyme haue done the same, and haue borne all the manaces of the cruell souldiors, not onely in wordes, wherwith they threatned them, but also whatsoeuer in deede and worke they could deuise to their destruction, and that with most manly stomackes, excluding all feare, with the perfection of their inspeakable loue towards Christ, whose great strength and fortitude cānot by wordes bee expressed. And Sulpitius sayth in the second booke of his sacred history, that then the Christians with more greedie desire preased and sought for Martyrdome,* then now they desire bishoprikes.

Although some there were also, as I haue sayd, that with feare and threatnings, and by their owne infirmitie, were ouercome and went backe. Eusebius, Lib. 8. cap. 3. Amongst whom Socrates nameth Miletius, Lib. 1. cap. 6. and Athanasius in his second Apologie, nameth the bishop of Licus a Citie in little Egypt, whom Peter the Bishop of Alexandria, excōmunicated,* for that in this persecution he sacrificed to the Gentiles Gods. Of the fall of Marcellinus the Byshop of Rome, I will speake afterwarde. For he beyng perswaded by others, and specially of the Emperour Dioclesian himselfe, did sacrifice, whereupon he was excōmunicated, but afterwarde he repēting the same, was agayne receaued into the congregation, and made Martyr as Platina and the compiler of the booke of the general coūcels, affirme. The number of the Martyrs increased daily, sometymes tenne, sometymes twenty were slaine at once, some whiles 30. and oftentymes 60. and otherwhiles a C. in one day, men, women, and children by diuers kindes of death. Eusebius, Lib 8. cap. 9 also Damasus, Beda, Orosius, Honorius and others do witnes, that there were slayne in this persecution by the names of Martyrs, within the space of 30. days, 17. thousand persons, beside an other great number and multitude that were condemned to the mettall mines and quarries with like crueltie.

At Alexandria with Peter the Bishop, of whom I haue made mention before, were slayne with axes 300. & aboue, as Sabellicus declareth. Gereon was beheaded at Colonia Agrippina, with 300. of his fellowes, as saith Henricus de Erfordia. Mauritius the Captaine of Christian religion, with his fellowes 6666. Victor in the citie of Troy now called Xanthus, with his fellowes 360. were slayne, as sayth Otto Phrinsigensis, Lib. 2. cap 45. Reginus reciteth the names of many other Martyrs, to the number of 120.

And for as much as mention here hath bene made of Mauritius and Victor, the perticular description of the same history I thought here to insert, taken out of Ado & other story writers, as insueth.

Mauritius came out of Syria into Fraunce and Italy, beyng Captaine of the bande of the Theban souldiours, to the number of 6660. beyng sent for of Maximianus, to goe agaynst the rebellious Bangandes, but rather as it should seeme by the treason of the •irant, which thought he might better in these quarters vse his tyranny vpon the Christians, then in the East part. These Thebans with Mauritius the Captaine, after that they had entred into Rome, who were there of Marcellus the blessed bishop, confirmed in the fayth, promising by othe that they would rather be slayne of their enemies, then forsake that faith which they had receaued, who followed the Emperours hoste through the Alpes euen into Fraunce. At that tyme the Caesarians were incamped not farre from the towne called Ottodor, where Maximianus offred sacrifice to his deuils, and called all the souldiours both of the East and West to the same, straightly charging them by the aultars of his Gods, that they would fight against those rebels the Bangandes, and persecute the christian enemies of the Emperors Gods: which his commaundement was shewed to the Thebanes hoste, which were also incamped about the riuer of Rode, and in a place that was named Agawne, but to Ottodor they wold in no wise come, for that euery man did certainly appointe and perswade with themselues rather in that place to dye, then either to sacrifice to the gods, or beare armour against the Christians. Which thing in deede very stoutly and valiantly they affirmed,* vpon their othe befor taken to Maximianus when he sent for them. Wherwith the tyrant beyng wrathfull and all mooued, commaunded euery tenth man of that whole band to be put to the sworde, whereto striuingly and with great reioysing they committed theyr neckes. To which notable thing and great force of fayth, Mauritius himselfe was a great encourager, who by & by w^t a most graue Oration exhorted & animated his souldiours both to fortitude & cōstancie.* Which beyng again called of y^e Emperor, answered in this wise saying:

We are O Emperour your souldiours, but yet also to speake freely, the seruants of god. We owe to thee seruice of war, to him innocēcie: of thee we receaue for our trauell, wages: of hym the beginning of lyfe. But in this we may in no wayes obey thee O Emperour, to deny God our author and Lord, and not onely ours, but your Lord likewise, will ye, nill ye. If we be not so extreemely enforced that we offend him, doubtles as we haue hitherto before, we will yet obey you, but otherwise we will rather obey hym then you. We offer here our handes agaynst any other enemies: but to defile our handes with the bloud of innocentes, that we may not doe. These right hands of ours haue skill to fight agaynst the wicked and true enemies: but to spoyle and murder the godly and Citizens, they haue no skill at all. We haue in remembraunce how we tooke armour in hand for the defence of the Citizens, and not agaynst them. We fought alwayes for iustice sake, pietie, and for the health of innocentes. These haue bene alwayes the rewardes of our perils and trauell We haue fought in the quarrell of fayth, whiche in no wise we can keepe to you, if we doe not shewe the same to our God. We first sware vpon the Sacramentes of our God, then afterward to the king: and doe you thinke the second will aduaile vs▪ if we breake the first▪ By vs you would plague the Christians, to doe which feate we are onely commaunded by you. We are here ready to confesse God the author of all thinges, and beleue in hys sonne Iesus Christ our Lord. We see before our eyes our fellowes and partakers of our labours and trauailes, to be put to the sword, and we sprinkled with their bloud, of which our most blessed companions and brethrē, their end and death we haue not bewayled nor mourned, but rather haue bene glad, and haue reioyced Page 81 thereat, for that they haue bene counted worthy to suffer for the Lord their God. The extreeme necessitie of death cannot moue vs agaynst your maiesty, neyther yet any despiratiō, O Em^{perour}, which is wont in ventrous affayres to do much, shal 〈◇〉 vs agaynst you. Behold here we cast downe our weapons, and resist not, for that we had rather to be killed, then kill, and guiltles to dye, then guilty to liue. What soeuer more ye will commaūd appoynt and inioyne vs, we are here ready to suffer, yea both fire sword, and whatsoeuer other tormentes. We confesse our selues to be Christians, we cannot persecute Christians, nor will do sacrifice to your deuilish Idols.

With which their aunswer the kyng beyng altogether incensed and mooued, * commaunded the second tyme the tenth man of them that were left to be in like case murdered. That crueltie also beyng accomplished, at length whē the christian souldiours would in no wise condescend vnto his mynde, he set vpon them with his whole host, both footemen and also horsemen, and charged them to kil them all. Who with all force set vpon them, they making no resistance, but throwyng downe their armour, yelded theyr lyues to the persecutors, and offered to them theyr naked bodies.

*Victor at the same tyme was not of that bande, nor yet then any souldiour, but one beyng an old souldior, and dismissed for his age. At which tyme he comming sodainly vpon them as they were haketting and making mery with the spoyles of the holy Martyrs, was bidden to sit downe with them: and first asking the cause of that their so great reioysing, and vnderstanding the truth therof, detested the gueses, and refused to eate with them. And then being demaunded of them whether happily he were a Christian or no, openly confessed and denied not, but that he was • christian, and euer would be. And therupon they rushing vpō him, killed him, and made him partner of the like Martyrdome and honour.

Beda in his history writeth, that this persecution beyng vnder Dioclesian, endured vnto the seuenth yere of Constantinus, and Euseb Lib 8. cap. 6 sayth, that is lasted vntill the x. yeare of Constantinus. It was not yet one yeare from the day in which Dioclesian & Maximianus ioyning themselues together, began their persecution, when that they sawe the number of the Christians rather to encrease then to diminish, notwithstanding all the cruelty that euer they coule shew; and now were out of all hope for the vtter rootyng out of them.  which thing was the cause of their first enterprise, and had now euen their fill of bloud, and lothed as it were, the shedding thereof, they ceased at the last of theyr owne accord to put any mo christians to death: But yet of a great multitude they did thrust out their right eyes, and maymed their left legs at the hamme with a searing iron, condemning them to the mines of mettals, not so much for the vse of their labour, as for the desire of afflicting them. And this was the clemencie and release of the crueltie of those Princes, which sayd that it was not meete that the cities should be defiled with the bloud of citizens, and to make the Emperours highnesse to bee destained with the name of cruelty, but to shew his princely beneficence and liberalitie to all men. *Eusebius, Lib. 8. cap 10.

When Dioclesianus and Maximianus had raigned together Emperours twenty yeares and one (Nicephorus saith xxij. yeares) at length Dioclesian put himselfe from his imperiall dignitie at Nicomedia, and liued at Salona, Maximianus at Mediolanum, and led both of thē a priuate life in the 309. yeare after Christ. This strange and meruailous alteration gaue occasion, and so came to passe, that within short space after,* there were in the Romaine commō welth many Emperours at one tyme.

In the beginning of this persecution, you heard how Dioclesian beyng made Emperour, tooke to him Maximinian. Also how these two gouerning as Emperours together, chose other two Caesars vnder them, to wit, Galerius Maximinus & Constantius the father of Constantine the 〈◇〉. Thus then Dioclesian rainging with Maximinian, in the 19. yeare of his raigne, began his furious persecution against the christians, whose raigne after the same continued not long. For so it pleased God to put such a snaffle in the tyrants mouth, that within two yeares after, he caused both him and Maximinian (for what cause he knoweth) to geue ouer his Imperial function▪ and so to remayne not as emperours any more, but as priuate persones: So that t•ey beyng now displaced and dispossessed, the Imperial dominion remayned w^t Constantius & Galerius Maximinus, which two deuided the whole Monarchie betwene them: so that Maximinus should gouerne the East countreys, & Constantius the west partes. But Constantius as a modest Prince, onely contented with the Imperial title, refused Italy and Aphrike, contenting himselfe only with Fraunce, Spaine, and Britaine. Wherefore Galerius Maximinus chose to hym his two sonnes Maximinus and Seuerus. Likewise Constantius tooke Constantinus his sonne, Caesar vnder him. In the meane tyme, while Maximinus with his two Caesars were in Asia, the Romaine souldiours set vp for their emperour Maxentius the sonne of Maximinian, who had before deposed himselfe. Against whom Maximinus the Emperour of the East, sent his sonne Seuerus, which Seuerus was slayne in the same voyage of Maxentius. In whose place then Maximinus tooke Licinius. And these were the Emperours and Caesars, which succeeding after Dioclesian, and Maximinian, prosecuted the rest of that persecution, which Dioclesian and Maximinian before begun,* duryng neare the space of seuen or viij. yeares, which was to the yeare of our Lorde, 318. Saue onely that Constantius with his sonne Constantinus,* was no great doer therin, but rather a maintainer and a supporter of the Christians. Which Constantius surnamed Chlorus for his palenesse, was the sonne of Eutropius, a mā of great nobilitie of the Romaine union, as Loetus affirmeth. He came of the lyne of Aeneas and Claudia, the daughter of Claudius Augustus. This man had not the desire of great and mightie dominion, and therefore parted he the Empire with Galerius, and would rule but in France, Britaine, and Spayne, refusing the other kingdomes for the troublesome and difficult gouernment of the same. Otherwise he was a Prince, as Eutropius maketh description of him, very excellent, ciuill, meeke, gentle, liberall, and desirous to do good vnto those that had any priuate authoritie vnder him.* And as Cyrus once sayd, that he ga•e treasure inough, when he made his friendes rich: euen so it is sayd that Constantius would often tymes say, that it were better that his subiects had treasure, thē he to haue it in his treasure house. Also he was by nature suffised with a little, In so much, that he vsed to eate and drinke in earthen vessels (which thing was counted in Agathotles the Sicilian, a great commendation) and if at any tyme cause required to garnish his table, he would send for plate and other furniture to his frendes.* To these vertues he added yet a more worthy ornament, that is, deuotion, loue, and affection towards the word of God, as Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 13. affirmeth, after which vertues ensued great peace and tranquillitie in all his Prouinces: By which worde he being guided, neither leuied any warres contrary to pietie and christian religion, neither he aided anye other that did the same: neither destroyed he the churches, but commaunded that the christians should be preserued and defended, and kept them safe from all contumelions iniuries. And when that in the other iurisdictions of the Empire,* the congregatiōs were molested with persecution, as Sozomenus declareth, Lib. 1. cap. 6. he only gaue licence vnto the Christians to liue after their accustomed maner. This wonderfull acte of his followyng, besides other, doth shew that he was a sincere worshipper of the christian religion.

Those which bare the chiefe offices among the Ethnikes, draue out of the emperors count all the godly Christians: wherupon this ensued, that the Emperors themselues at the last, were destitute of helpe, when suche were driuen away,* which dwelling in their courtes, and liuyng a godly lyfe, poure out their prayers vnto God for y^e prosperous estate and health both of the Empire & Emperor. Constantius therefore thinkyng at a certayne tyme to try what sincere and good Christians he had yet in hys courte, called together all hys officers and seruaunts in the same, fayning himselfe to chitise out such as would do sacrifice to deuils, and that those only should dwell there & keep their offices, and that those which would refuse to doe the same, should be thrust out & banished the court. At this appointment, all the <◇> deuided thēselues into

<◇> ▪* The Emperor marked which were the constantest & godliest from the rest▪ And when <◇> sayd that they would willingly do sacrificie, other serue openly and boldly denied to do the same: Then the Emperor <◇> rebuked those which were so redy to doe <◇>, & iudged them as false traitors vnto God accountyng their vnworthy to bee in his court, which were such traitors to God, and forthwith commaunded that they only should be banished the same. But greatly he commended them, which refused to doe sacrifice and confessed God, affirmyng that they onely were worthy to be aboue • prince, forthwith <◇> thē that thenceforth they should be the <◇> counsellors and defēders both of his person & kingdom, saying thus much more that they onely were worthy to be in office, whome he might make account of as his assured friends, and that he ment to haue them in more estimation,* then the substāce he had in his treasurie. Eusebius maketh mention hereof in his first booke of the life of Constantius, and also Sozomenus in his 1. booke and •. chap.

Page 82With this Constantius was ioyned (as hath bene aforesayd) Galerius Maximinus,* a man as Eutropius affirmeth, very ciuill and a passing good souldior: Furthermore, a fauourer of wise and learned men, of a quiet disposition, not rigorous, but in his dronkenesse, wherof he would soone after repent him, as Victor writeth. whether he meaneth Maximinus the father, or Maximinus his sonne, it is vncertayne. But Eusebius farre otherwise describeth the conditions of him in his viij. booke, and first chapter. For he sayth he was of a tyrannicall disposition: The feareinllest man that might be, and curious in all magicall superstition, in so much that without the diuinatiōs and aunsweres of diuels he durst do nothing at al, & therefore he gaue great offices and dignities to enchaunters. Furthermore that he was an exactor and extortioner of the Citizens, liberall to those that were flatterers, geuen to surfeting and riote, a great drinker of wine, and in his furious drounkenesse most like a mad man, a Ribaud, an adulterer, which came to no City but he rauished virgins & defiled mens wiues.* To conclude he was so great an idolater, that he built vp Temples in euery City, and repayred those that were fallen in great decay: and he chose out the most worthiest of his politicall Magistrates to be the idols priestes, and deuised that they should execute that their office with great authority and dignity, and also with warlike pompe. But to Christian piety and religion he was most incensiuē, and in the East Churches exercised cruel persecution, and vsed as executioners of the same, Pencetius, Quintianus, and Theotechnus beside others.

Notwithstanding he was at length reuoked from his cruelty by the iust iudgemēt and punishment of God.* For he was sodenly vexed with a fatall disease most filthy and desperate, which disease to describe was very straunge, taking the first beginning in his flesh outwardly, frō thence it proceeded more and more to the inward parts of his bodye. For in the priuy members of his body ther happened vnto him a suddayne putrificatiō, and after in the bottome of the same a botchy corrupt bile, with a Fistula, cōsuming & eating vp his entrals, out of the which came swarming forth an innumerable multitude of lice, with such a pestiferous stinche that no man coulde abide him, and so much more, for that all the grosenesse of his body by aboundance of meat before he fell sick, was turned also into a fat: which fat now putrified, and stincking was so vgsome and horrible, that none that came to him coulde abide the sight thereof. By reason whereof, the Phisitions which had him in cure,* some of thē notable to abide the intollerable stinch were commaunded to be slayne. Other some because they could not heale him being so swollen and past hope of cure were also cruelly put to death. At length being put in remembraunce that his disease was sent of God, he began to forethinke the wickednesse that he had done agaynst the sayntes of God, and so comming agayne to himselfe, first confeseth vnto god all his offences, then calling them vnto him which were about him, forthwith commaunded all men, to cease from the persecutions of the Christians. Requiring moreouer that they should set vp his Imperiall proclamatiōs, for the restoring and reedyfiyng of their tēples, and that they would obtayne this of the Christians, in their assembles (which without all feare and doubt they might be bolde to make) that they would deuoutly pray to theyr God for the Emperour. Then forthwith was the persecution stayed, and the Imperiall proclamations in euery City were set vp, contayning the retraction or countermaund of those things which agaynst the Christians were before decreed, the copy whereof ensueth.

*Amongst other thinges which for the benefite and cōmodity of the common weale we established, we cōmaunded to reforme all thinges according to the auncient lawes and publicke discipline of the Romaines, and also to vse this pollicy, that the Christians which had forsaken the religion of those forefathers should be brought agayne to the right way. For such phāsticall singularity was amongst them, that those thinges which their elders had receiued and allowed, they re•ected and disallowed, deuising euery man such lawes as they thought good, and obserued the same, assembling in diuers places great multitudes of people.

Therefore when our foresaid decree was proclaymed, many there were that felt the penalty therof, and many being troubled therefore suffered many kindes of death. And because we see yet that there be many which perseuere in the same, which neither geue due worship vnto the Celestiall Gods neither receiue the God of the Christians, we hauing respect to our accustomed benignitie, wherewith we are wont to shew fauour vnto all men, thinke good in this cause also to extend our clemencie, that the Christians may be agayne tollerated, and appoynt them places where againe they may meet together, so that they doe nothing contrary to publick order and discipline By an other Epistle we meane to prescribe vnto the iudges, what shal be conuenient for them to do. Wherefore according as this our bountifull clemencie deserueth, let them make intercession to God for our health, common weale, and for themselus, that in all places the state of of the common weale may be preserued, and that they themselues may be able safely to liue within their bondes.*Euseb. lib. 8. cap. vltimo.

But one of his inferior officers whose name was also Maximinus, was not well pleased when this countermaūd was Published throughout all Asia, and the Prouinces where he had to do. Yet he being qualified by this example that it was not conuenient for him to repugn the pleasure of those Princes which had the chiefe authority as Constantius and Maximinus, set forth of himselfe no edict touching the same: but commaunded his officers in the presence of others, that they should somewhat stay from the persecution of the Christians: of which commaundement of the inferiour Maximinus,* each of them gaue intelligence vnto their fellowes by their letters. But Sabinus which then amongst them all, had the chiefest office and dignitie: to the substitutes of euery countrey, wrote by his letters the Emperours pleasure in this wise.

The maiestie of our most gracious and Soueraigne Lordes the Emperours, hath lately decreed with speciall diligence and deuotiō, to induce all men to an vniforme life, so that they which seemed to dissent from the Romaine custome by a straunge maner of liuing, shoulde exhibite to the immortall Gods their due and proper worshipp, but the wilfull and obstinate minde of diuers so much, and so cōtinually resisted the same, that by no lawfull meanes they might be reuoked from their purpose, neither made afraid by any terror or punishment. Because therefore it so came to passe, that by this meanes many put themselues in perill and ieoperdy: The maiestie of our soueraigne Lordes the Emperours according to their noble pietie, considering that it was far from the meaning of their princely maiesties that suche thinges should be, whereby so many men and muche people should be, destroyd, gaue me in charge that with diligence I shoulde write vnto you, that if any of the Christians from henceforth fortune to be taken in the exercise of their religion, that in no wise you molest the same, neither for that cause you doe iudge any man worthy of punishment: for that in all this time it hath euidentlye appeared that by no meanes they might be allured from such wilfulnesse. It is therefore requisite that your wisdome write vnto the Questors, Captaynes, and Constables of euery City and village, that they may know it not to be lawfull for them, or any of them,*to do contrary to the prescript of this commaundement, neither that they presume to attempt the same.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

The gouernours therefore of euery prouince, supposing this to be the determinate pleasure (and not fayned) of the Emperour,* did first aduertise thereof, the rusticall & Pagan multitude: After that they released and set at libertye all suche prisoners as were condemned to the mettall mines, & to perpetuall imprisonmēt for their fayth, thinking therby (where in deed they were deceiued) that the doing thereof would well please the Emperor. This therefore seemed to them as vnlooked for, and as light to traouellers in a darcke night.* They gather themselues together in euery City, they call their Synodes and counsels, & much maruell at the sodden chaunge and alteration. The Infidels themselues extoll the onely and true God of the christians. The Christians receiue agayne all their former libertie, and such as fell away before in the tyme of persecution, repent themselues and after penaunce done, they returned agayne to the congregation. Nowe the Christians reioyced in euery Citty, praying God with hymnes and Psalmes.Eusebius ibidem. This was a maruailous sodaine alteration of the Church, from a most vnhappy state into a better, but scarce suffered Maximinus the Tyraunt the same vj. monethes vniuolated to continue. For whatsoever seemed to make for the subuersion of the same peace (yet scarcely hatched) that did he onely meditate. And first of all he tooke from the Christians all libertie and leaue for them to assemble and congregate in churchyardes vnder a certayne coulour. After that he sent certayne Miscreants vnto the Athenians, to sollicite them agaynst the Christians, and to prouoke them to aske of him as a recompence and great reward, that he would not suffer any Christian to inhabite in their countrey: and amongst them was one Theotechnus, a most wicked miscreant, an inchaunter, and a most deadly enemy agaynst the Christians. He first made the way whereby the Christians were put out of credite, and accused to the Emperour, to which fraud also he erected a certayne Idoll of Iupiter to be worshipped of the inchaunters and coniurers, and mingled the same worship with ceremonies, full of deceiueable witchcraft. Lastly, he caused the same Idoll to geue this sound out of his Page 83 mouth. That is: Iupiter commaundeth the christians to be banished out of the Citie and suburbs of the same, as enemies vnto him. And the same sentence did the rest of the gouernors of the prouinces publish against the Christians, and thus at length persecution began to kindle against them. Maximinus appoynted and instituted high priestes and bishops in euery citie to offer sacrifice vnto Idoles, & inueigled all those that were in great offices vnder him, that they should not onely cease to pleasure them & to do for them, but also that they should with new deuised accusatiōs agaynst thē, at their pleasure,* put as many to death as by any meanes they might. They also did counterfet certaine practises of Pilate against our sauour Christ full of blasphemie, and sent the same into all the Empire of Maximinus by their letters, commaunding that the same shoulde be published and set vp in euery citie and suburbs of the same, and that they should be deliuered to y^e scholemaisters, to cause their scholers to learne by roate the same.

After that one named Praefectus castrorum, whome the Romaines do call captaine, allured certaine light womē, partly by feare, and partly by punishment, dwelling at Damascus in Phenicia, and taken out of the court wherein they were accused, that they shoulde openly say in wryting that they were once Christians, and that they knewe what wicked & lasciuious actes the Christians were wont to execute amongst themselues vpon the sondaies, & what other things they thought good to make more of their own head, to the slander of the Christians. The capitaine sheweth vnto the emperour theer words, as though it had bene so in deede, and the Emperour by and by commanded the same to be published throughout euery city. Furthermore, they did hange vp in the midst of euery Citie (which was neuer done before) the Emperours edicts against y^e Christians, grauen in tables of brasse. And the children in the scholes with great noise and clapping of handes did euery day resound, the contumelious blasphemies of Pilate vnto Iesus,* & what other things so euer were deuised of the magistrates, after most despitefull maner. Euseb. lib. 8, cap. 3.4.5.6.7. And this is the copie of the edict, which Maximinus caused to be fastened to pillers fraught, with all arrogant and insolent hate against God and Christ.*

The weake and imbecil rebellion of mans minde (all obscuritie and blindnesse of ignorance set aparte, which hetherto hath wrapped the mindes of impious and miserable men, in the pernicious darkenesse of ignoraunce) is now at the length able to discerne, that the same is gouerned, as also corroborated by the pro|uidence of the immortall gods the louers of vertue: which thing, how acceptable it is to vs, howe pleasant and gratefull, and howe much prooffe the same hath declared of your wel disposed willing minds, is incredible to be tolde: Although this was not vnknown before with what diligence and deuotion yee serued the immortall Gods, whose wonderfull and constant faith is not knowen by bare and naked wordes, but by your worthy & notable deeds. Wherefore worthely is your Citie called the habitation and seate of the immortall Gods, and by many examples it appeareth that the same flourisheth, and prospereth by the presence of the celestially Gods. For beholde, your Citie not regarding your priuate businesses, nor esteeming that which shoulde haue bene for the speciall commoditie thereof, when it perceaued that cursed vanitie to begin againe to creepe, and as a fire negligently quenched, when the dead brandes thereof began to kindle and make a great flame: by and by without delay ye hauing recourse vnto our pietie, as vnto the Metropolitan of all diuine worship and Religion,* craued remedie and helpe, which wholesome minde for your pieties sake, it is most manifest that the gods haue indued you with. Therefore hee, euen that most mightie Iupiter I say, which preserueth your most famous Citie: to that intent he might deliuer and make free your countrey Gods, your wiues and children, your housholde Gods and houses, from all detestable corruption, hath inspired you with this wholesome and willing minde, shewing & declaring howe worthy, notable, and healthfull a thing it is to worship & to sacrifice to the immortall Gods.*For who is so void of reason & vnderstanding, that knoweth not that this thing happeneth vnto vs by the carefull studie of the goodnes of our gods, that the grounde denieth not to geue her timely increase, nor maketh frustrate the husband mans hope, nor that wicked warre dare shew her face vpon the earth, nor that the corruption of the aire is nowe cause of pestilence, neither that the sea swelleth with immoderate windes,*neither that sodaine stormes are cause of hurtfull tempestes. To conclude, that the ground which is as the nurce and mother of all things, is not swallowed vp of her deepe chappes and gapings, by terrible earthquake, neither that the hils made leuell with the earth, are not with gaping cliftes deuoured, all which euils and greater then these, before this time to haue happened euery mā knoweth. And all these mischiefes came vpō vs for the pernicious errours sake of the extreeme follie of those wicked men the Christianis, when filthinesse it selfe (as I may call it) so occupied their mindes, and ouerranne the worlde. Let them beholde the fieldes nowe all about full of corne,*and ouerflowen as it were with eares of corne. Let them vewe the pleasant medowes clothed with flowers, and moistned with showers from heauen, and also the pleasant and temperate weather. Therefore let all men reioyce, that by your pietie, sacrifices, & worshipping, the maiestie of the most stearne God of battell Mars is appeased, & that therfore we enioy pleasant & firme peace. And how many so euer haue left that blind error and straying of the Christians vnfaignedly, and be of a better minde, let them specially reioyce, as men deliuered out of a sodaine great tempest, and from a greuous disease, and haue afterward obtained a delectable and pleasant life. For doubtlesse, if they had remained in that execrable vanitie, farre of had they bene chased from your Citie & suburbs of the same (according to your desire) that your Citie by that meanes, according to your commēdable diligence, clensed from all impuritie and impietie, may offer sacrifices according to the meaning of the same, with due reuerence of the immortall Gods. And that you may perceiue in how good part your supplication (yea vnasked and desired) we are most willing and ready to further your honest endeouours, and graunt vnto you for your deuotion, whatsoever you aske of our magnificence. And that thys thing may be accomplished, forthwith aske and haue. And thys thing with all speede, indeuour you to obtaine, which shall bee a perpetuall testimony of pietie exhibited of your Citie to the immortall Gods, and shalbe a president to your children and posteritie, and withall you shall obtaine of vs for this your willing desire of reformation,*condygne and worthy rewardes.

Eusebius. Lib 9. cap. 7.

Thus came it to passe that at the length persecutiō was as great as euer it was, and the magistrates of euery prouince were very disdainefull against the Christians which cōdemned some to death, and some to exile. Among whom they condemned three christians at Emisa,* in Phenicia, w^t whom Siluanus the bishop a very old man, being 40. yeres in the ecclesiasticall function, was condemned to death. At Nicomedia, Lucianus the elder of Antioche, brought thether, after he had exhibited to the emperour his Apologie concerning the doctrin of the Christians, was cast in pryson, and after put to death. In Amasea a City of Capadocia, Bringes the lieftenaunt of Maximinus, had at that time, the executing of that persecution. At Alexandria, Petrus a most worthy byshop was beheaded with whome manye other Egiptian byshops also died. Euseb. Lib.

9. cap. 7. Nicepho. Lib. 7. cap. 44. Quirinus the Byshop Scescanius hauing a hanmyll tyed about hys necke, was throwne headlong from the bridge, into the flood, and there a long while fleeted aboue the water, and when hee opened his mouth to speake to the lookers on that they shoulde not be dismaied with that his punishmēt, was with much a do drowned. Chron. Euseb. At Rome dyed Marcellus the bishop as sayeth Platina, also Timotheus the elder, with many other bishops & Priests were martyred. To cōclud many in sundry places euery where were martyred, whose name y^e booke intituled Fasciculus temporum declareth, as Victorianus, Symphorianus, Castorius, with his wife, Castulus, Cesarius, Mennas, Nobilis, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, and other innumerable martirs,* Erasmus, Bonifacius, Iuliana, Cosmas, Damianus, Basilinus with seuen others, Dorothea, Theophilus, Theodosia, Vitalis, Agricola, Acha, Philemon, Hireneus, Ianuarius, Festus, Desiderius, Gregorius, Spoletanus, Agapes, Chionia, Hirenea. Theodora, and 270. other Martyrs, Florianus, Primus and Felicianus, Vitus and Modestus, Crescentia, Albinus, Rogatianus, Donatianus, Pancratius, Catharina, Margareta, Lucia, the virgin, and Antheus the king with many thousād martirs mo. Simplicius, Faustinus, Beatrix, Panthaleon, Georgius, Iustus, Leocandia, Anthonia, and other mo to an infinite number,* suffered martirdome in this persecution, whose names God hath written in the booke of life. Also Felix Victor, with his parents Lucia the widow, Gemenianus, with 79 others, Sabinus, Anastasia, Chrisogonus, Felix, and Audactus, Adrianus, Nathalia, Eugenia, Agnes, also when she was but 13. yeare old was martyred▪ Euseb. in his 8. booke and 15. chap. rehearseth these kinds of torments and punishmēts,* that is to say, Fire, wilde beastes, the sword, crucifyinges, the bottome of the sea, the cutting and burning of mēbers, the thrusting out of eyes, dismembring of the whole body, hūger, imprisonment, & whatsoeuer other cruelty y^e Magistrates coulde deuise. All which notwithstanding the godly ones, rather then that they woulde doe sacrifice as they were bid, māfully endured. Neither were the womē any thing at al behind thē. For they beyng intised to the filthy vse of their bodies, rather suffered banishmēt, or willingly killed themselues. Neither yet could the Christians liue safely in the wildernes, but were fetched euē frō thēce to death and tormentes, in so much that this was a more greeuous persecution vnder Maximianus, the tyraunt, then Page 84 was the former cruell persecution, vnder Maximianus the Prince.* Euseb. Lib. 9. cap. 6. & 10.

And forasmuch as yee haue hearde the cruell Edict of Maximinus proclaymed against the Christians, grauen in brasse, which he thought perpetually should endure to the abolishing of Christ & his Religion: Now marke againe the great handy worke of God, which immediatly fel vpon the same,* checking the proud presumption of the tyrant, prouing al to be false and contrary, that in the brasen Proclamation was contained. For where the foresaide Edict boasted so much of the prosperitie and plentie of all things in the time of this persecution of the Christians, sodenly befell such vnseasonable drougt with famine and pestilēce among the people, besides also the warres with the Armenians, that all was founde vntrue that hee had bragged so much of before. By reason of which famine and pestilence y^e people were greatly consumed, in so much that one measure of wheat was sold for two thousand and fiue hundred peeces of money of Athens coyne, by reason whereof innumerable died in the Cities, but many more in the countrey and villages, so that most part of the husbād men and countrey men died vp with the famine and pestilence. Diuers there were which bringing out their best treasure,* were glad to geue it for any kinde of sustenāce, were it neuer so litle. Other selling away their possessions, fel by reason thereof to extreme pouertie and beggary. Certaine eating grasse, and feeding on other vnholosome herbes, were faine to relieue them selues with such foode as did hurt and poyson their dodies.

Also a number of women in the Cities, being brought to extreeme miserie and penurie, were constrained to depart the Citie, and fal to begging through the coūtrei.* Some other were weake and faint (as Images without breath) wandring vp and downe, & not able to stand for feblenesse, fel downe in the middle of y^e streetes, and holding vp their handes most pitifull, cried for some scrappes or fragments of bread to be geuen them, & being at the last gaspe, ready to geue vp the Ghost, and not able to vtter any other words, yet cried out that they were hūgry. Of the richer sort diuers there were, who being weary with the number of beggers and askers, after they had bestowed largely vpon them, became hard harted, fearing least they should fall into the same miserie themselues, as they which begged. By reason wherof the market place, streetes, lanes, and alleis lay full of dead & naked bodies, being cast out and vnburied, to the pitifull & grieuous beholding of them that saw them. Wherefore many were eaten of dogges, for which cause they that liued fell to the killing of dogges, least they running mad, shoulde fall vpon them, and kill them.

*In like maner the pestilence scattering through all houses and ages of men, did no lesse consume them, especially those which through plēty of vitail escaped famine. Wherefore the rich Princes Presidentes and other innumerable of the Magistrates, being the more apt to receiue the infection, by reason of their plēty, were quickly dispatched, and turned vp their heeles. Thus the miserable multitude being consumed with famine and with pestilence, all places was full of mourning, neither was there any thing else seene, but wailing and weeping in euery corner. So that death, what for famine and pestilence in short time brake vp and consumed whole houtholdes, two or three dead bodies being borne out together from one house to one funerall,

These were the rewards of the vaine bragges of Maximinus and his Edicts, which he did publish in all townes and Cities against vs, whē it was euident to al men, how diligent and charitable the Christians were to them all in this their miserable extremitie. For they onely in all this time of distresse, shewing compassion vpō them, trauelled euery day, some in curing the sicke, & some in burying the dead, which otherwise of their owne sort were forsaken. Other some of the Christians calling and gathering the multitude together,* which were in ieopardie of famine, distributed bread to them, whereby they ministred occasion to all men to glorifie the God of the Christians, and to confesse them to be the true worshippers of God, as appeard by their workes. By the meanes and reason hereof, the great God and defender of the Christians, who before had shewed his anger and indignation against al men, for their wrongfull afflicting of vs, opened againe vnto vs the comfortable light of his prouidence, so that by meanes thereof peace fell vnto vs, as light to them that sit in darknesse, to the great admiration of all men, which easely perceiue God himselfe to be a perpetuall director of our doings, who many times chasteneth his people with calamities for a time to exercise them, but after sufficient correction, againe sheweth himselfe mercifull and fauourable to them which with trust call vpon him.

By the narration of these things heeretofore premised, taken out of the storie of Eusebius, like as it is manifest to see, so is it wonderfull to marke and note, how those counsailes and rages of the Gentiles, atchieued against Christ and his Christians, when they seemed most •ure against them, were most against them selues. And whereby they thought most to confoūd the Church & Religion of Christ, the same turned most to their owne confusion,* and to the profite and praise of the Christians, (God of his marueilous wisdomes so ordering & disposing the end of things.) For where the brasen Edict of the Emperour promised temperate weather, God sent drought, where it promised plentie, God immediatly sent vpon them famine and penurie: where it promised health, God stroke them euen vpon the same, with grieuous pestilence, and with other moe calamities, in such sort, that the most reliefe they had, was chiefly by the Christians, to the great praise both of them, and to the honour of our God.

Thus most plainely and euidently was then verified the true promise of Christ to his Church,* affirming and assuring vs, that the gates of hell shall not preuaile against his Church builded vpō his faith: as sufficiently may appeare by these x. persecutiōs aboue specified and described. Wherein as no man can deny, but that Sathan & his malignaunt world haue assayed the vttermost of their power and might to ouerthrow the Church of Iesus: so must all men needes graunt, that read these stories, that when Sathan and the gates of hell haue done their worst, yet haue they not preuailed against this mount of Sion, nor euer shall. For els what was here to be thought, where so many Emperours and tyraunts together, Dioclesian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximinus, Seuerus, Maxentius, Licinius with their Captaines and officers, were let loose, like so many Lyons, vpon a scattered and vnarmed flocke of sheepe, intending nothing els, but the vtter subuersion of all Christianitie, and especially also when lawes were set vp in brasse against the Christians, as a thing perpetually to stand: what was here to be looked for, but a finall desolation of the name and Religion of Christians? But what folowed, partly ye haue heard, partly more is to be marked, as in the storie foloweth.

I shewed before how Maxentius the sonne of Maximinian, was set vp at Rome by the Pretorian souldiours to be Emperour. Whereunto the Senate, although they were not consenting, yet for feare they were not resisting. Maximinian his father, who had before depriued him selfe with Dioclesian, hearing of this, tooke heart againe to him, to resume his dignitie, and so laboured to perswade Dioclesian also to do the same: but when he could not moue him therunto, he repaireth to Rome, thinking to wrast the Empire out of his sonnes hand: but when the souldiours woulde not suffer that, of a craftie purpose he flieth to Constantinus in Fraunce, vnder pretense to complaine of Maxentius his sonne, but in very deede to kill Constantinus. Notwithstāding that conspiracie being detected by Fausta the daughter of Maximinian, whom Constantinus had maryed, so was Constantinus through the grace of God preserued,* & Maximinian retired backe. In y^e which his flight by the way hee was apprehended, and so put to death. And this is the end of Maximinian.

Now let vs returne to Maxentius againe,* who all this while raigned at Rome, with tyranny and wickednes intollerable, much like to an other Pharaο or Nero. For hee slewe the most part of his noble men, and tooke from them their goodes. And sometime in his rage he would destroy great multitudes of the people of Rome by his souldiours, as Eusebius declareth,* lib. 8. cap. 14. Also hee left no mischieuous nor lasciuious acte vnattempted, but was the vtter enemie of all womanly chastity, which vsed to send the honest wiues whome he had adulterated with shame and dishonestie vnto their husbandes (being worthy Senators) after that he had rauished them. He abstained from no adulterous acte, but was inflamed with the inquencheable lust of deflouring of women.* Letus declareth that he being at a time farre in loue with a noble & chaste gentlewoman of Rome, sent vnto her such courtiers of his, as were mete for that purpose, whome also he had in greater estimation then any others, and with such was wont to cōsult about matters for the common weale. These first fell vpon her husbande and muredred him within his owne house, then when they coulde by no meanes neither with feare of the tyrant,* nor with threatning of death pull her away from him: At length she being a Christian desired leaue of them to go into her chamber, and after her prayers shee would accomplish that which they requested. And when she had gotten into her chamber, vnder this pretence, she killed her Page 85 selfe. But the Courtiers when they sawe that the woman taryed so long, they being displeased therewith, brake open the doores, and found her there lying dead. Then returned they and declared this matter to the Emperor, who was so far past shame, that in steade of repentance, hee was the more set on fire in attempting the like.

He was also much addict to the arte Magicall, which to execute,* hee was more fitte then the Imperiall dignitie. Also sometime he would rippe women when they were in laboure, and would search the place where the infant lay, being borne a little before. Often he would inuocate Diuels in a secrete maner, and by the answeres of them hee sought to breake the warres, which he knew Constantinus and Licinius prepared against him. And to the ende hee might the rather perpetrate hys mischieuous and wicked attemptes, which in his vngracious minde he had conceiued, according to his purpose,* in the beginning of his raigne he fained himself to be a fauourer of the Christians. In which thing doing, thinking to make the people of Rome hys friendes, hee commaunded that they shoulde cease from persecuting of the Christians, and hee himselfe in the meane season abstained from no contumelious vexation of them, till that he began at last to shewe hymselfe an open persecutour of them: at which time as Zonaras wryteth hee most cruelly raged against all the Christians thereabouts, vexing them w^t all maner of iniuries. Which thing he in no lesse wise did, then Maximinus, as Euse. in his 8. booke and 15. chap. seemeth to affirme.* And Platina declareth in the life of Marcellus the Bishop, that hee banished a certaine noble woman of Rome, because shee gaue her goodes to the Church.

Thus by the grieuous tyranny and vnspeakable wickednesse of thys Maxentius,* the Citizens and Senatours of Rome, being much grieued and oppressed, sent theyr complaintes wyth letters vnto Constantinus, wyth much sute and most hearty petitions, desiring hym to helpe and release their Countrey and Citie of Rome: who hearyng and vnderstanding theyr miserable and pitifull state, and grieued therewyth not a little, first sendeth by letters to Maxentius, desiring and exhorting him to refrayne his corrupt doinges, and great crueltie. But when no letters nor exhortations would preuaile, at length pitying the wofull case of the Romaines, gathered together hys power and armie in Britayne and Fraunce, wherewyth to repress the violent rage of that tyraunt. Thus Constantinus sufficiently appoynted with strength of men, but especially wyth strength of God, entred hys iourney comming towarde Italie, whyche was about the last yeare of the persecution.* Anno 318. Maxentius vnderstanding of the comming of Constantine, and trusting more to his diuelish Arte of Magike, then to the good will of hys subiectes, whych hee little deserued, durst not shewe hymselfe out of the Citie, nor encounter wyth him in the open fielde, but wyth priuie garrisons laide in waite for him by the waye, in sundry straightes as he should come. With whom Constantine had diuers skirmishes, and by the power of the Lorde did euer vanquishe them and put them to flight.* Notwythstanding Constantinus yet was in no great comfort, but in great care and dread in hys minde (approching nowe neare vnto Rome) for the Magicall charmes and sorceries of Maxentius, wherewith hee had vanquished before Seuerus sent by Galerius against hym,* as hath bene declared, which made also Constantinus the more afrayde. Wherefore being in great doubt and perplexity in himself, and reuoluing many thinges in his minde, what helpe he might haue against the operatiōs of hys charming, which vsed to cut women great with childe, to take hys diuelishe charmes by the entrals of the infants, with such other like feates of deuilishnes which he practised: These thinges (I say) Constantinus doubting and reuoluing in his minde, in his journey drawing toward the Citie, and casting vp his eyes many times to heauen, in the South part, about the going downe of the sunne, sawe a great brightnesse in heauen, appearing in the similitude of a crosse, wyth certaine starres of equall bignesse, geuing this inscription like Latine letters, IN HOC VINCE, that is: In thys ouercome. Euseb. De vita Constant lib. 2. Nicep. lib. 7. cap. 29. Eutrop. lib. 11. Sozom. lib 1. cap 3. Socrat lib. 1. cap. 2. Vrspurgens. Chronic. Paul. Diacon. lib. 11. Thys miraculous vision to be true, for the more credite, Eusebius Pamphilus in hys first booke De vita Constantini doeth witnesse moreouer, that hee had hearde the sayde Constantinus himselfe oftentimes reporte, and also to sweare this to be true and certaine, which hee did see with his owne eyes in heauen, and also his souldiours about him. At the sight wherof, when he was greatly astonied, and consulting with his men vpon the meaning thereof, behold in the night season in his slepe Christ appeared to him with the signe of the same crosse, which he had seene before, bidding him to make the figuration therof, and to carie it in hys warres before him, and so shoulde he haue the victorie.

Wherin is to be noted (good Reader) that this signe of the Crosse,* and these letters added withall: In hoc vince, was geuen to him of God, not to induce any superstitious worship or opynion of the Crosse, as though the crosse it self, had any such power or strength in it, to obtaine victorie: but onely to beare the meaning of an other thing, that is, to be an admonition to him, to seeke and aspire to the knowledge and faith of him, which was crucified vppon the crosse for the saluation of him, and of all the world, and so to set forth the glory of his name, as afterwarde it came to passe. This by the way, now to the matter.

The next day following after this nights vision,*Constantinus caused a crosse after the same figuratiō to be made of golde and precious stone, and to be borne before him in steade of his standard: and so with much hope of victory & great confidence, as one armed from heauen spedeth himselfe towarde his enemye. Against whom Maxentius being constrained perforce to issue out of the Citie, sendeth al his power to ioyn with him in the fiede beyonde the riuer of Tybur, where Maxentius craftely breaking downe y^e bridge called Pons Miluius, caused an other deceitfull bridge to be made of boates and whirries, being ioyned together, and couered ouer with boordes and planckes in maner of a bridge, thinking therewith to take Constantine as in a trap. But here it came to passe which in the 7. Psalme is writtē. He digged a pit,and fell therein himselfe. Let his working returne vpon his owne head, and his vnrighteousnesse vppon hys owne pate, which heere in this Maxentius was rightly verified. For after the two hostes did meete, hee being not able to sustaine the force of Constantine fighting vnder the crosse of Christ against hym, was put to such a flight, and driuen to suche an exigent, that in retyring backe, for hast thinking to get the Citie, vppon the same bridge which he did lay for Constantine, was ouerturned by the fall of hys horse into the bottome of the floude, and there with the waight of his armour, he with a great part of his beatē men were drowned. Representing vnto vs the like example of Pharaō & his host drowned in the red sea. Who not vnaptly seemeth to beare a Prophetically figuration of this Maxentius. For as the children of Israel were in long thraldome and persecution in Egypt vnder tyrantes there, til the drowning of this Pharaō theyr last persecutour: so was this Maxentius and Maximinus and Licinius the last persecutours in the Romane Monarchie of the Christians, whome thys Constantinus fighting vnder the crosse of Christ, did vanquishe and set the Christians at liberty,* who before had bene persecuted nowe 300. yeares in Rome, as hath bene hetherto in this historie declared.

Wherefore as the Israelites with their Moses at the drowning of their Pharaos, * song gloriously vnto the Lorde, who myraculously had cast downe the horse and horsemen into the sea: So no lesse reioycing and exceeding gladnesse was heere, to see the gloryous hande of the Lorde Christe fighting with his people, and vanquishing hys enemyes and persecutours.

In histories we read of many victories and great conquests gotten:  yet we neuer read, nor euer shal of any victory so wholsom, so commodious, so opportune to mākind as this was, which made an ende of so much bloudshed, & obtained so much libertye & life to the posterity of so many generations. For albeit that some persecutiō was yet stirring in the East countreys by Maximinus and Licinius, as shall be declared: Yet in Rome and in all the West partes, no martyr died after this heauēly victory gotten. And also in the East partes the said Constantinus with the said crosse borne before him, consequently vpon the same so vanquished the tyrants,  and so established the peace of the church, that for the space of a iust M. yeares after that, we reade of no set persecution against the Christians, vnto the time of Iohn Wickliffe, when the bishops of Rome began with fire to persecute the true members of Christ, as in further processe of thys historie (Christ graunting) shall appeare. So happie, so glorious (as I sayde) was this victorie of Constantine, surnamed the great. For the ioy & gladnes wherof, the Citizens who had sent for him before, with exceding triumph brought him into the citie of Rome, where he w^t the crosse was most honourably receiued and celebrated the space of vij. dayes together, hauing moreouer in the market place, his image set vp, holding in his right hande the signe of the crosse, w^t this inscription: Hoc salutari signo, veraci fortitudinis indicio, ciuitatem nostram iugo tyranni ereptam liberaui. That is, with this wholesome signe, the true Page 86 token of fortitude, I haue rescued and deliuered our Citie from the yoke of the tyrant. *Euseb lib. 9. cap 9.

By this heauenly victorie of Constantinus, and by the death of Maxentius no little tranquillity came to the church of Christ. Although notwithstanding in the East churches the storme of this tenth persecutiō was not yet altogether quieted, but that some taile thereof in those partes remained for the space of ij. or iij. yeare. * But of this we minde to speake (Christ willing) hereafter. In the meane season, to returne againe to the West partes here in Europe, where Constantinus then had most to doe, great tranquillitie followed, and long cōtinued in the church without any open slaughter, for a thousande yeares together (to the time of Iohn Wickliffe and Waldenses, as is before touched) by the meanes of the godly beginning of good Constantinus, who with his fellow Licinius, being now stablished in their dominion, eftsones set foorth their generall proclamation or edict, not cōstraining therein any man to any religion, but geuing liberty to all men, both for the Christians to persist in their profession without any danger, and for other men freely to adioyne wyth them, whosoeuer pleased. Which thing was very wel taken, and highly allowed of the Romaines, and al wise men. The copie of the Edict or constitution here ensueth.

The copie of the Imperial constitution of Constantinus and Licinius, for the establishing of the free worshipping of God, after the Christian religion.

NOt long agoe we weying with our selues, that the libertie and freedome of religion ought not in any case to be prohibited, * but that free leaue ought to be geuen to euery man to doe therein

according to his wil and minde, we haue giuen commandement to all men to qualifie matters of religion as they themselues thought good, and that also the Christians shoulde keepe the opinions and faith of their religion. But because that many & sundry opinions by the same our first licence spring and increase through such libertie graunted, we thought good manifestly to adde thereunto, and make plaine such things, wherby perchance some of them in time to come, may from such their obseruaunce be let or hindered. When therfore by prosperous successe, I Constantinus Augustus, and I Licinius Augustus came to Mediolanum, and there sate in councell vpon such thinges as serued for the vtilitie and profit of the common weale, these things amongst others, we thought woulde be beneficiall to all men, yea and before all other things we purposed to establish those things, wherin the true reuerence and worship of God is comprehended, that is, to geue vnto the Christians free choise to followe what religion they thinke good, and whereby the same sinceritie and celestiall grace which is in euery place receaued, may also be embraced and accepted of all our louing subiects. According therefore vnto this our pleasure vpon good aduisement and sounde iudgement, we haue decreed, that no man so hardy, be denied to chuse and followe the Christian obseruance or religion: But that this libertie be geuen to euery man, that he may apply his minde to what religion he thinketh meete himselfe, whereby God may performe vpon vs all his accustomed care and goodnesse. To the intent therefore you might knowe that this is our pleasure, wee thought it necessary this to wryte vnto you, whereby all such errorrs and opinions being remooued, which in our former letters (being sent vnto you in the behalfe of the Christians) are conteyned, and which seeme very vndiscreete and contrary to our clemēcy, may be made frustrate & adnihilate. Now therfore firmly and freely we will and commaunde, that euery man haue a free libertie to obserue the Christian religion, and that without any griefe or molestation hee may be suffered to doe the same. These things haue we thought good to signifie vnto you by as plaine wordes as we may, that we haue geuen to the Christians free and absolute power to keepe and vse their religion. And for as much as this libertie is absolutely geuen of vs vnto them, to vse and exercise their former obseruance, if any be so disposed, it is manifest that the same helpeth much to establishe the publike tranquillitie of our time, euery man to haue licence and libertie to vse and chuse what kinde of worshipping he list himself. And this is done of vs onely for the intent, that we woulde haue no man to be enforced to one religion more then an other. And this thing also amongst others we haue prouided for the Christians, that they may haue againe the possessiō of such places, in which heretofore they haue bene accustomed to make their assemblies, so that if any haue bought or purchased the same either of vs, or of any other: the same places without either mony or other recompence, forthwith and without delay we will to be restored againe vnto the sayd Christians. And if any man haue obtained the same by gift from vs, and shall require any recompence to be made to them in that behalf: Then let the Christians repaire vnto the President (being the iudge appoynted for that place) that consideration may be had of those mē by our benignitie: al which things we will and commaunde, that you see to be geuen and restored freely, and with diligence vnto the societie of the Christians, all delay set apart. And because the Christians themselues are vnderstoode to haue had not onely those places wherein they were accustomed to resort together, but certaine other peculiar places also, not being priuate to any one man, but belonging to the right of their congregation and societie: you shall see also al those to be restored vnto the Christians, that is to say, to euery fellowship and company of them, according to the decree, whereof we haue made mention, all delay set apart. Prouided that the order we haue taken in the meane time be obserued, that if any (taking no recompence) shall restore the same lands and possessions, they shall not mistrust but be sure to be saued harmelesse by vs. In all these things it shall be your part to employ your diligence in the behalfe of the foresayde companie of the Christians, whereby this our commaundement may speedely be accomplished, and also in this case by our clemencie the common and publike peace may be preserued. For vndoubtedly by this meanes, as before we haue sayde, the good will and fauour of God towards vs (whereof in many cases we haue had good experience) shall alwayes continue with vs. And to the intent that this our constitution may be notified to all men, it shall be requisite that the copie of these our letters be set vp in all places, that men may reade and knowe the same, least any should be ignorant thereof.

By these hystories I doubt not (good reader) but thou doest right well cōsider and behold with thy selfe the marueilous working of God his mighty power: * to see so many Emperours at one time conspired and confederate together against the Lord and his Christ annoynted, whose names before we haue recited, as Dioclesian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maxentius, Maximinus, Seuerus, Licinius, who hauing the subiection of the whole world vnder their dominion, did bende and extende their whole might and deuises, to extirpate the name of Christ, and of all Christians. Wherein if the power of man could haue preuailed, * what coulde they not doe? or what coulde they doe more then they did? If policie or deuises could haue serued, what policie was there lacking? If torments or paines of death could haue helped, what cruelty of torment by man could be inuented, which was not attempted? If lawes, edictes, proclamations, wrytten not onely in tables, but ingrauen in brasse, could haue stande, all this was practised against the weake Christians. And yet notwithstanding, to see howe no counsaile can stand against the Lorde, note heere how all these be gone, and yet Christ and his Church doth stande. Fyrst, of the taking away of Maximinian you haue heard, also of the death of Seuerus, of the drowning moreouer of Maxentius, * inough hath bene sayde. What a terrible plague was vpon Galerius, consuming his priuie members with Lice, hath bene also described. Howe Dioclesian the quondam being at Salona, hearing of the proceedings of Constantinus, * and this his Edict, either for sorrow died, or as some say did poyson himselfe. Onely Maximinus now in the East partes remained aliuie, who bare a deadly hatred against the Christians, and no lesse expressed the same wyth mortall persecution, to whome Constantine and Licinius caused this constitution of theirs to be deliuered: at the sight whereof, although hee was somewhat appaled, and defeated of his purpose: yet forasmuch as he saw himselfe too weake to resist the authoritie of Constantinus and Licinius the superiour Princes: * Hee dissembled his counterfet pietie, as though hee himselfe had tendered the quiet of the Christians: directing downe a certaine decree in the behalfe of the Christians, wherein hee pretendeth to wryte to Sabinus afore mentioned, first repeating vnto him the former decree of Dioclesian and Maximinian in few wordes, with the commandement therein contained touching the persecution against the Christians. After that hee reciteth the Decree which he himselfe made against them, when he came first to the imperiall dignitie in the East part ioyned wyth Constantius. Then the Countermaund of an other Decree of his agayne, for the rescuing of the Christians, wyth such fayned and pretensed causes, as is in the same to be seene. After that declareth howe he comming to Nicomedia, at the sute and supplication of the Citizens (which he also fained, as may appeare before) he applying to their sute, reuoked that his former Edict, and graunted them that no Christian should dwell within their Citie or territories. Upon which Sabinus also had geuen foorth his letters, rehearsing withall the generall recountermaunde sent forth by him, for the persecution againe of the Christians. Last of all nowe hee sendeth downe againe an other Surrecountermaund, * with the causes therein conteyned, touching the safetie of the Christians, and tranquillitie of them: Commaunding Sabinus to publish the same. Which edict of his is at large set forth of Eusebius, lib. 9. cap. 9. But this Surrecountermaunde hee then dissimuled, as he had Page 87 done in the other before. Howbeit shortly after, he making warres, and fighting a battaile with Licinius, wherein hee lost the victory,* comming home againe, tooke great indignation against the Priestes and Prophetes of his Gods, whom before that time he had great regard vnto, and honored: vpon whose answers he trusting, & depending vpon their enchantments, began hys warre against Licinius. But after that he perceaued himselfe to be deceaued by thē,* as by wicked enchaunters and deceauers, and such as had betrayed hys safety and person, he kylled and put them to death. And hee shortly after, oppressed with a certaine disease, glorified the God of the Christians, and made a most absolute law for the safety and preseruacion of them, wyth franchise and liberty: the copy wherof ensueth.

Imperator Caesar, Gaius, Valerius, Maximinus, Germanicus, Pius, Fortunatus, Augustus. It is necessary that we alwaies carefully prouide and see vnto, the benefite and commoditie of such as be our subiects, & to exhibit such things vnto them, wherby they may best obtaine the same. But we suppose that there are none of you so ignorant, but knowe and vnderstand what things make best for the profite & commoditie of the common weale, & best please euery mans disposition. But it is meete and conuenient that euery man haue recourse to that which they haue sene done before their eyes, and that all sortes of men consider the same, & beare it in their mindes. When therfore, and that before this time it came vnto our knowledge: vpon the occasion that Dioclesianus, and Maximinianus, our progenitours of famous memorie, commaunded the assemblies and meetings of the Christians to be cut of, there were many of them spoyled and robbed of our Officials: which thing we also perceiue is now put in practise against our subiects, that they in like case may be spoyled of their goods and substance, which thing chiefly to preuent, is our onely indeuour. By our letters sent to the gouernours of euery prouince the yere past, we ordeined that if any man were disposed to leane vnto the Christian religion, that he might without any iniury done vnto him, accomplish his desire, neither to be of any man either let or molested: and that he might without any feare or suspition, do whatsoeuer he therein thought good. But now also we vnderstand that there be certaine iudges which haue neglected▪ our commandemēt, and haue put our subiects in doubt, whether that hath ben our pleasure or not, which thing they did, that such men might be the better aduised, how they entred into such religion: wherein they followed their owne phantasie. To the entent therfore that after this, all suspition, doubt, and feare may be taken away: we haue thought good to publish this our edict, whereby it may be made manifest to euery man, that it shalbe lawfull for all such as will follow that religion, by the benefit of this our graunt and letters patents, to vse what religion they like best. And also hereby we graunt vnto them licence to build them Oratories or Temples.* And furthermore, that this our graunt may more amply extende vnto them, we vouchsafe to appoynt and ordaine, that whatsoeuer landes and substance, before belonging and appertaining to the Christians, and by the commandement of our predecessors were transposed to our reuenue and exchequer, or els be in the possession of any Citie, by meanes of the franchises of the same, or els otherwise sold or geuen to any man: all and euery parcell thereof we commaund shall be restored vnto the proper vse of the Christians againe, whereby they may all haue in this matter more experience, of our godly deuotion and prouidence. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 10.

Maximinus thus being conquered of Licinius, and also plagued wyth an incurable disease in the guts, sent by the hande of God, was compelled by torments and aduersitie to cōfesse the true

God, whom before he regarded not, and to write thys Edicte in the fauour of those Christians, whom before he did persecute.* Thus the Lord doth make many times hys enemyes, be they neuer so sterne & stout, at length to stoupe, & mauger their harts, to confesse him, as this Maximinus here did, who not long after, by the vehemencie of his disease ended his life.* Whereby, no mo tyrauntes nowe were left aliue, to trouble the Church, but onely Licinius. Of which Licinius, and of hys persecutions stirred vp in the East partes, against the Saints of God, now remaineth in order of story to prosecute.

This Licinius being a Dane borne, and made first Caesar by Galerius,* as is aboue specified, was afterward ioyned with Constantinus in gouernement of the Empyre, and in setting foorth the Edicts, which before we haue described: although it seemeth, all this to be done of him w^t a dissembling minde. For so is he in all hystories described, to be a man passing all other in desire of vnsatiable riches, geuen to lechery, hasty, stubburne, and furious. To learning hee was such an enemye, that he named the same a poyson and a common pestilence,* and especially the knowledge of the lawes. Hee thought no vice worse became a Prince, then learning, because hee him selfe was vnlearned. Eutropius, Letus, Ignatius. Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 13.

There was betweene him and Constantinus in the beginning great familiaritie: and such agreement, that Constantinus gaue vnto him his sister Constantia in Matrimonie, as Aurelius Victor wryteth. Neither woulde any man haue thought him to haue bene of any other Religion then Constantinus was of, hee seemed in all thinges so well to agree with him. Whereupon he made a decree with Constantinus in the behalfe of the Christians, as we haue shewed. Eusebius,* Lib. 9. cap. 9. And such was Licinius in the beginning. But after arming him selfe with tyrannie, began to cōspire against the person of Constantinus, of whom he had receaued so great benefites, neither fauorable to the law of nature, nor mindful of his othes, his bloud, nor promises. But when hee considered that in his conspiracies he nothing preuailed,* for that he saw Cōstantinus was preserued and safely defended of God: And partly being puffed vp w^t the victory against Maximinus, he began vehemētly to hate him, and not onely to reiect the Christian religion, but also deadly to hate the same. Hee saide he would become an enemy vnto the Christiās, for that in their assemblies and meetings they prayed not for him, but for Constantinus. Therefore, first by litle and litle and that secretly, he went about to wrong and hurt the christians,* & banished them his Court, which neuer were by any meanes preiudiciall to his kingdom. Then he commāded that all those should be depriued which were knights of the honourable order, vnlesse they would do sacrifice to deuils. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8. The same persecution afterwarde stretched he from his court, into all his prouinces, which with most wicked and deuised lawes hee set forth. First, that for no cause the Byshops shoulde in any matter communicate together: neither that any man should come at the Churches next vnto them, or to call any assemblies, and consult for the necessary matters and vtilitie of the Church.

After, that the men & women together should not come in companies to pray, nor that the women should come in those places where they vsed to preach and read the worde of God, neither that they should be after that instructed any more of the Byshops, but should chuse out such women amongst them as shoulde instruct them.* The thirde most cruell and wickedst of all was, that none should helpe and succour those that were cast in prison, nor shoulde bestowe any almes or charitie vpon them, though they shoulde die for hunger: and they which shewed any compassion vpon those that were condemned to death, should be as greatly punished,* as they to whome they shewed the same shoulde be. Eusebius libro primo de vita Constantini. These were the most horrible cōstitutions of Licinius, which went beyond and passed the boundes of nature.

After this he vsed violence against the Byshops, but yet not openly,* for feare of Constantinus, but priuely and by conspiracie: by which meanes hee slewe those that were the worthiest men amongst the Doctours and Prelates. And about Amasea and other Cities of Pontus, he razed the Churches euen to the ground. Other some he shut vp, that no man should come after their accustomed maner to pray and worship God: and therefore as we sayde before, his conscience accusing him, all this hee did, for that he suspected they prayed for Constantinus, and not at all for him. And from this place in the East parties vnto the Libians, which bordered vpon the Egyptians, the christians durst not assemble and come together for the displeasure of Licinius,* which hee had conceaued against them. Zozomenus. Lib. 1. cap. 2.

Furthermore, the flattering officers that were vnder him, thinking by this meanes to please him, slewe & made out of the way many byshops, and without any cause put them to death, as though they had bene homicides & hainous offenders: and such rigorousnes vsed they towards some of them, that they cut their bodyes into gobbets and small peeces in maner of a Boucher, and after that threwe them into the Sea to feede the fishes.*Euseb. Lib. 10. cap. 8. What shall we speake of the exiles & confiscations of good and vertuous men? For he tooke by violence euery mans substaunce, and cared not by what meanes he came by the same: But threatned them with death, vnlesse they would forgoe the same. Hee banished those which had committed none euill at all. He commanded that both gentlemen and men of honour, should be made out of the way, neither yet herewith content, but gaue their daughters that were vnmarried, to varlets and wicked ones to be defloured. And Licinius himselfe (although that by reason of his yeres, his body was spent) yet shamefully did hee vitiate many women, mens wiues & maids.*Euseb Lib. 1. de vita Constantini. Which cruel outrage of him caused many godly mē of their owne accorde to forsake their houses: and it was also seene that the woodes, fieldes, desert places and mountaines, Page 88 were faine to be the habitations, and resting places of the poore and miserable Christians.*Eusebius. Lib. 10. cap. 14. Of those worthy men and famous Martyrs, which in this persecution founde the way to heauen, Nicephorus. Lib. 7. cap. 10. first speaketh of Theodorus, who first being hanged vpon the crosse, had nawles thrust into his arme pits, and after that his head stricken of. Also of another Theodorus being the Byshop of Tyre, the thirde was a man of Perga. Basilius also the Byshop of Amasenus, Nicolaus, the Byshop of Mirorus, Gregorius, of Armenia the great: After that, Paule of Neocaesaria, which by the impious commandemēt of Licinius had both his hands cut of with a searing yron. Besides these were in the Citie of Sebastia, xl. worthy men, & Christian souldiours in the vehemēt cold time of winter, soused and drowned in a horse pond, whē Locias as yet, of whom we spake before, and Agricolaus executing the Shrieues office vnder Licinius in the East parts, were aliue: and were in great estimation, for inuenting of new and strange torments against the Christians. The wiues of those 40. good men, were caried to Heraclea a Citie in Thracia, and there with a certaine Deacon whose name was Amones, were (after innumerable torments by them most constauntly indured) slaine with the sworde. These thinges wryteth Nicephorus. Also Zozomenus in his ninth booke & 2. Chapter maketh mention of the same Martyrs. And Basilius in a certaine Oration seemeth to intreate of their history, sauing that in the circumstances he somewhat varieth. And surely Licinius was determined, for that the first face of this persecution fel out according to his desire, to haue ouerrunne all the Christians: to which thing neither counsell, nor good will, nor yet oportunitie, perchance wanted: vnlesse God had brought Constantinus into those parties, where he gouerned: where, in the warres which hee himselfe began (knowing right well that Constantinus had intelligence of his conspiracy & treason) ioyning battaile with him, was most cowardly ouercome.

Diuers battailes betweene them were fought, the first fought in Hungarie, where Licinius was ouerthrowen: Then he fled into Macedonia, & repairing his army, was againe discomfited. Finally, being vāquished, both by sea and lande: he lastly, at Nicomedia, yelded himselfe to Constantine: and was cōmaunded to liue a priuate life in Thessalia, where at length he was slaine by the souldiours.

Thus haue ye heard, the ende and conclusion of all the vij. tyrants,* which were the authors and workers of this x. and last persecutiō, against the true people of God. The chiefe Captaine, and incentour of which persecution was first Dioclesian, who died at Salena, as some say, by his owne poyson. An. 319. The next was Maximinian, who as is sayde, was hanged of Constantine at Masilia, about the yeare of our Lorde. 310. Then died Galerius, plagued with an horrible disease sent of God. Seuerus was slaine by Maximinian, father of Maxentius the wicked tyraunt was ouercome and vanquished of Constantine. an. 318. Maximinus the vi. tyraunt taried not long after, who being ouercome by Licinius, died, about the yere of our Lord. 320. Lastly, how this Licinius was ouercome by Constantine and slaine. An. 324. is before declared. Only Constantius, the father of Constantine being a good and a godly Emperour, died in the third yeare of the persecution. An. 310. and was buried at Yorke. After whom succeeded after his godly father, Constantinus, as a seconde Moses sent and set vp of God to deliuer his people out of this so miserable captiuitie, into libertie most ioyfull.

*Now remaineth after the end of these persecutors thus described, to gather vp the names & stories of certain particular Martyrs, which nowe are to be set forth worthy of speciall memory: for their singular constancie & fortitude, shewed in their sufferings & cruell torments. The names of all which that suffered in this foresaid tenth persecution, being in number infinite, in vertue most excellēt, it is impossible heere to comprehend: but the most notable, and in most approued authors expressed, we thought heere to insert, for the more edification of other Christiāns, which may and ought to looke vpon their examples, first beginning with Albanus, the first Martyr that euer in England suffered death for the name of Christ.

At what time Dioclesian & Maximinian the Pagan Emperours had directed out their letters with all seueritye, for the persecuting of the Christians:Alban being then an infidell, receiued into his house a certaine Clerke, fleeing from the persecutours hands, whom when Alban beheld, continually both day & night to perseuer in watching and in prayer: sodenly by the great mercy of God, he began to imitate the example of his faith & vertuous life: whereupon by litle and litle he being instructed by his holesom exhortation, and leauing the blindnesse of his Idolatrie, became at length a perfect Christian.* And when the forenamed Clerke had lodged with him a certaine time, it was enformed the wicked Prince, that this good man & Confessour of Christ (not yet condemned to death) was harbored in Albans house, or very neare vnto him. Whereupon immediately he gaue in charge to the souldiours, to make more diligent inquisition of the matter. Who as soone as they came to the house of Alban the Martyr, hee by and by putting on the apparell wherewith his guest and maister was apparelled (that is,* a garment at that time vsed, named Caracalla) offered him selfe in the steade of the other to the souldiours: who binding him, brought him forthwith to the iudge. It fortuneth that at that instant when blessed Alban was brought unto the Iudge, they founde the same Iudge at the aulters offering sacrifice vnto Deuils, who as soone as hee sawe Alban, was straight waies in a great rage, for that hee woulde presume of his owne voluntary will, to offer him selfe to perill, and geue him selfe a prisoner to the souldiours, for safegarde of his guest whome he harbored: and commaunded him to be brought before the Images of the deuils whome he worshipped,* saying: For that thou haddest rather hide & conuey away a rebell, then to deliuer him to the officers, and that (as a contemner of our Gods) he should not suffer punishment and merite of his blasphemye: looke what punishment he shoulde haue had, thou for him shalt suffer the same: if I perceiue thee any whit to reuolt from our maner of worshipping. But blessed Alban, who of his owne accorde had bewrayed to the persecutors that hee was a Christian, feared not at all the manaces of the Prince, but being armed with spirituall armour, openly pronounced that hee woulde not obey his commandement. Then sayd the Iudge: of what stocke or kindred art thou come? Alban answered, what is that to you, what stocke soeuer I am come of, if you desire to heare the veritie of my Religion, I do ye to wit that I am a Christian, and apply my selfe altogether to that calling. Then sayd the Iudge, I would knowe thy name, and see thou tell me the same without delay. Then sayde hee, my parentes named me Alban, and I worship and honour the true and liuing God, which hath created all the worlde. Then sayd the Iudge fraught with fury, if thou wilt enioy the felicitie of this present life, doe sacrifice (and that out of hande) to these mighty Gods. Alban replieth: these sacrifices which ye offer vnto deuils, cā neither helpe them that offer the same, neither yet can they accomplish the desires and prayers of their suppliāts: But rather shal they, what soeuer they be, that offer sacrifice to these Idoles, receaue for their meede euerlasting paines of hell fire. The Iudge, when he heard these words, was passing angry, and commaunded the tormentors to whip this holy Confessour of God,* indeuoring to ouercome the constancy of his hart w^t stripes, which had preuailed nothing with wordes. And when he was cruelly beaten, yet suffered he the same patiently, nay rather ioyfully, for the Lordes sake. Then when the Iudge saw that he would not with torments be ouercomen, nor be reduced from the worship of Christian Religion, he commaunded him to be beheaded.

The rest that foloweth of this story in the narration of Bede,* as of drying vp the Riuer, as Alban went to the place of his execution: then of making a welspring in the top of the hill, and of the falling out of the eyes of him that did behead him (with such other prodigious miracles mētioned in his story) because they seeme more legēdlike, then truthlike: againe, because I see no great profit, nor necessitie in the relation thereof, I leaue them to the free iudgement of the Reader, to thinke of them, as cause shall moue him.

The like estimation I haue of the long story,* wherein is written at large a fabulous discourse of all the doings & miracles of S. Alban, taken out of the Librarie of S. Albans, compiled (as there is saide) by a certaine Pagan, who (as he sayth) afterwarde went to Rome, there to be Baptised. But because in the beginning or Prologue of the Booke, the sayde writer maketh mention of the ruinous walles of the towne of Verolanium, containing the storye of Albanus, and of his bitter punishments: which walles were then falling downe for age, at the wryting of the sayde booke, as he saith: Therby it seemeth this story to be written a great while after the martyrdome of Alban either by a Britaine, or by an English mā. If he were a Britaine, how then did the Latin translation take it out of the English tounge, as in the Prologue hee him selfe doeth testifie. If hee were an Englishmā, how then did he go vp to Rome for baptisme, being a Pagan, when he myght haue bene baptised amōg the Christian Britaines more neare at home.

But among al other euidences and declarations sufficient to disproue this Legendary story of S. Alban, nothing maketh more against it, then the very storie it selfe: as Page 89 where he bringeth in the head of the holy martyr, to speake vnto the people after it was smitten of from the body. Also where he bringeth in the Angels going vp, & comming downe in a pillar of fire, & singing al the night long. Item in the riuer which he sayth, S Alban made drie, such as were drowned in the same before in the bottome, were founde aliue. With other such like Monkish miracles and grosse fables,* wherewith these Abbey Monkes were wont in time past to deceaue the Church of God, and to beguile the whole world for their owne aduātage. Notwithstanding this I write not to any derogatiō of the blessed and faithful martyr of God, who was the first that I did euer finde in this Realme, to suffer Martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ. And worthy no doubt of condigne commendation, especially of vs here in this land: whose Christian faith in the Lorde, and charitie toward his neighbour: I pray God all we may followe. As also I wishe moreouer that the stories both of him, and of al other Christian Martyrs might haue bene deliuered to vs simply as they were, w^tout the admixture of all these Abbey like additiōs of Monkish miracles,* wherewith they were wont to paint out the glory of such saintes to the moste, by whose offerings they were accustomed to receaue most aduauntage.

As touching the name of the Clearke mētioned in this story,* whome Alban receaued into his house, I finde in the Englishe stories to be Amphibalus, although the latine authors name him not, who y^e same time flying into Wales was also set from thence againe to the same towne of Uerolamium, otherwise called Uerlancaster, where hee was martyred, hauing his bellie opened, and made to runne about a stake, while all his bowels were drawen out, then thrust in with swordes and daggers: and at last was stoned to death, as the foresaid legend declareth.

Moreouer the same time with Alban, suffered also ij. citizens of the foresaide Citie of Uerlancaster, whose names were Aaron and Iulius:* beside other, whereof a great number the same time no doubt, did suffer, although our Chronicles of their names doe make no rehearsall.

The time of the Martyrdom of this blessed Alban and the other, seemeth to be about the second or thirde yeare of this tenth persecution, vnder the tyrāny of Dioclesian, and Maximinianus Herculus, bearing then the rule in England, about the yeare of our Lorde 301. before the comming of Constantius to his gouernement.* Where, by the way is to be noted, that this realme of Britaine being so christened before, yet neuer was touched with any other of the nine persecutions, before this tenth persecution of Dioclesian & Maximinian. In which persecution our stories and Polichronicon doe recorde, that all Christianitie almost in the whole Ilelande was destroyed, the Churches subuerted, all bookes of the Scripture burned, many of the faithfull both men & women were slaine. Among whome the first and chiefe ringleader (as hath bene sayde) was Albanus. And thus much touching the martyrs of Britaine. Nowe from Englande to returne againe vnto other countries, where this persecution did more vehemētly rage: we will adde hereunto (the Lorde willing) the stories of other, although not of all that suffered in this persecution (which were impossible) but of certaine most principal, whose singular constancie in their strong torments are chiefly renowned in latter histories: beginning first with Romanus the notable and admirable souldiour and true seruauant of Christ, whose historie set forth in Prudentius, doth thus proceede: so lamentably by him described, that it will be harde for any man almost with dry cheekes to heare it.

*Pitiles Galerius with his graunde captaine Asclepiades violently inuaded the citie of Antioche, entending by force of armes to driue all Christians to renounce vtterly their pure religion. The Christians as god would, were at that time cōgregated together, to whom Romanus hastely ran, declaring that the Wolues were at hande, which woulde deuour the christian flocke, but feare not (sayde he) neither let this imminēt perill disturbe you, my brethren: brought was it to passe, by the great grace of God working in Romanus, that olde men and matrones, *fathers and mothers, young men and maidens were all of one will and minde, most ready to shed their bloud in defence of their Christian profession. Word was brought to y^e captaine that the band of armed souldiors was not able to wrest the staffe of faith, out of the hand of the armed congregation: and all by reason that one Romanus so mightely did encourage them, that they sticke not to offer their naked throtes, wishing gloriously to die for the name of their Christ. Seeke out that rebell (quod the captaine) and bring him to me that he may aunswer for the whole sect. Apprehended he was, & bound as a sheepe appoynted to the slaughter house, was presented to the Emperour: who w^t wrathfull countenance beholding him, sayde: What? Art thou the author of this sedition? art thou the cause why so many shall loose their liues? By the gods I sweare thou shalt smart for it, and first in thy flesh shalt thou suffer the paines, *whereunto thou hast encouraged the hearts of thy felowes. Romanus answered: Thy sentence O Emperour I ioyfully embrace, I refuse not to be sacrificed for my brethren, and that by as cruell meanes as thou mayest inuent: and whereas thy soldiors were repelled from the christian cōgregation, that so happened, because it lay not in Idolaters and worshippers of Deuils to enter into the holy house of God, and to pollute the place of true prayer. Then Asclepiades wholly enflamed with this stoute answere, commaunded him to be trussed vp, and his bowels drawne out. The executioners themselues more pitiful in hart then the captaine, said: not so sir, this man is of noble parentage: vnlawful is it to put a noble man to so vnnoble a death: scourge him then with whips (quod the captaine) with knaps o• lead at the ends. In stede of teares, *sighs & grones, Romanus song psalmes al the time of his whipping, requiring them not to fauour him for nobilities sake, not the bloud of my progenitours (said he) but Christian profession maketh me noble. Then with great power of spirit he inueied against the capitain, laughing to scorne the false gods of the heathen, with the idolatrous worshipping of them, affirming the God of the Christians to be the true God that created heauen and earth, before whose iudiciall seat all nations shall appeare. but the wholesome wordes of the Martyr were as oyle to the fire of the captaines fury. The more the Martyr spake, the madder was hee, in so much that he commaunded the Martyrs sides to be launced with kniues, vntil the bones appeared white againe. Sorie am I, O captain (quod the Martyr) not for that my flesh shall be thus cut and mangled, but for thy cause am I sorowfull, who being corrupted with damnable errors, seducest others. The seconde time hee preached at large, the liuing God, and the Lorde Iesus Christ his welbeloued sonne, eternall life through faith in his bloud, expressing therewith the abhomination of idolatry, w^t a vehement exhortation to worship & adore the liuing God. At these words Asclepiades commaunded the tormentors to strike Romanus on the mouth, that his teeth being stricken out, his pronounciation at least wise might be impeired: The commandement was obeyed, his face buffeted, his eye liddes torne with their nailes, his cheekes scorched with kniues, the skin of his bearde was plucked by little and little from the flesh, finally his seemely face was wholly defaced. The meeke Martyr sayde: I thanke thee, O Capitaine, that thou hast opened vnto me many mouthes, whereby I may preach my Lord & Sauour Christ. Looke howe many woundes I haue, so many mouths I haue lauding and praising God. The captaine astonished w^t this singular constancie, commanded them to cease from the tortures. Hee threatneth cruell fire, he reuileth the noble martyr, he blasphemeth god, saying: Thy crucified Christ, is but an yesterdaies God, the gods of the Gentiles are of most antiquitie.

Heere againe Romanus taking good occasion, made a long Oration of the eternitie of Christ, of his humane nature, of the death & satisfaction of Christ for all mankinde. Which done, he sayde: geue me a childe (O Capitaine) but seuen yeres of age, which age is free from malice and other vices, wherwith riper age is commōly infected, and thou shalt heare what he will say, his request was graunted. A pretie boy was called out of the multitude, and set before him. Tell me my babe (quoth the Martyr) whether thou thinke it reason that we worship one Christ, and in Christ one father, or els that we worship infinite gods? Unto whom the babe aunswered:* That certainly, whatsoever it be, that men affirme to be God, must nedes be one: which with one, is one and the same: and in as much as this one is Christ, of necessitie Christ must be the true God, for, that there be many gods, we children cannot beleue. The capitaine hereat cleane amased, said: thou yong villaine & traitor, where and of whom learnedst thou this lesson? Of my mother (quod the childe) with whose milke I sucked in this lesson,* that I must beleue in Christ. The mother was called, and shee gladly appeared, the capitaine commanded the childe to be horsed vp, and scourged. The pitiful beholders of this pitillesse acte, could not temper thēselues from teares: the ioyful and glad mother alone, stood by with dry cheekes: yea, shee rebuked her sweete babe for crauing a draught of colde water, she charged him to thirst after the cup,* that the infantes of Bethleem once dranke of, forgetting their mothers milke and pappes, shee willed him to remember little Isaac, who beholding the sworde wherewith, & the altar wheron he should be sacrificed, willingly profered his tender necke to the dent of his fathers sword. Page 90 Whilest this counsel was ingening, the boucherly torture pluckt the skin from the crowne of his head,* heare and all. The mother cried, suffer my childe, anone thou shalt passe to him that will adorne thy naked head, with a crowne of eternall glory. The mother counselleth, the childe is counselled: the mother encourageth, the babe is encouraged: & receiued the stripes with smiling countenance. The capitaine perceiuing the childe inuincible, and himselfe vāquished, committeth the sillie soule, the blessed babe, the childe vncherished, to the stinking prison, commaunding the tormentes of Romanus to be renued and encreased, as chiefe author of this euill.

Thus was Romanus brought foorth againe to newe stripes and punishments, to be renued and receiued vpon his old sores, in so much the bare bones appeared, the flesh all torne away: wherein no pitie was shewed, but the raging tyrant puffing out of his blasphemous mouth, like a madde man these woordes, cried out to the tormentors, saying:

Where is quod the Capitaine, where is your might?

What?* are ye not able one body to spill?

Scant may it, so weake is it, stand vpright:

And yet in spite of vs, shall it liue still?

The Gripe with talent, the dog with his tooth,

Could soone ye dastardes, this corpes rent and teare,

He scorneth our gods in all that he doth,

Cut, pricke, and pounce him, no longer forbear.

Yea, no longer could the tyrant forbear, but nedes he must draw nearer to the sentence of death: is it painefull to thee (sayde he) to tary so long aliue? a flaming fire doubt thou not shalbe prepared for thee, by and by, wherein thou and that boy, thy fellow of rebellion shall be consumed into ashes. Romanus and the babe were led to the place of execution. As they laide handes on Romanus, hee looked backe saying: I appeale from this thy tyrannie, O iudge vniust, to the righteous throne of Christ that vpriight iudge: not because I feare thy cruell torments and mercilesse handlings, but that thy iudgements may be knowne to be cruell and bloody. Nowe when they were come to the place, the tormentor required the child of the mother, for she had taken it vp in her armes:*. And shee onely kissing it, deliuered the babe. Farewel she said my sweete childe, and as the hangman applied his sword to the babes necke, shee sang on this maner.

All laude and praise with heart and voice,

O Lorde we yelde to thee:*

To whome the death of all thy Saintes,

We know most deare to bee.

The innocentes head being cut off, the mother wrapped it vp in her garment, and laide it to her brest. On the other side a mighty fire was made, wherinto Romanus was cast: who sayde, y^t he should not burne: wherewith a great storme arose (if it be true) and quenched the fire.* The Capitaine gaue in commandement that his tounge should be cut out, out was it plucked by the harde rootes and cut of: Neuerthelesse, hee spake▪ saying: hee that speaketh Christ shall neuer want a tongue, thinke not that the voyce that vttereth Christ, hath neede of the tong to be the minister. The Capitaine at this, halfe out of his wit, bare in hande that the hangman deceiued the sight of the people by some subtile sleight and craftie conueiance. Not so (quoth the hangman) if ye suspect my dede, open his mouth and diligently search the rootes of his tongue. The Captaine at length being confounded with the fortitude and courage of the Martyr, straightly commaundeth him to be brought backe into the prison,* and there to be strangled. Where his sorowfull life and paines being ended, hee nowe enioyeth quiet rest in the Lord, with perpetuall hope of his miserable body to be restored againe with his soule into a better life: where no tyrant shall haue any power: Prudentius in hymnis de coronis Martyrum.

Gordius was a citizen of Caesaria, a worthy souldiour, and Capitaine of an hundreth men. Hee in the time of extreme persecution, refusing any lōger to execute his charge did chuse of his owne accord willing exile, and liued in the desert many yeares a religious and solitary life. But vpon a certaine day when a solemne feast of Mars was celebrated, in the citie of Caesarea, and much people were assembled in the Theatre to beholde the games: he left the desert, and got him vp into the chiefe place of the Theatre,* and with a loude voyce vttered this saying of the Apostle:

Beholde I am foūd of them which sought me not, and to those which asked not for mee, haue I openly appeared. By which wordes he let it to be vnderstood, that of his owne accorde he came vnto those games. At this noise, the multitude litle regarding the sights, looked about to see who it was y^t made such exclamation. As soone as it was knowne to be Gordius, and that the crier had commanded silence, he was brought vnto the shiri•e,* which at that instant was present, and ordeined the games. Whē he was asked the question who he was, from whence, and for what occasion he came thether, he telleth the truth of euery thing as it was. I am come,* saith he, to publish, that I set nothing by your decrees against the Christian religion: but that I professe Iesu Christ to be my hope and safety. And when I vnderstood with what crueltie ye handle other men: I tooke this as a fitte time to accomplish my desire. The Shirife with these wordes was greatly mooued, and reuengeth all his displeasure vpon poore Gordius, commaunding the executioners to be brought out with scourges, while gibbet, & whatsoeuer torments els might be deuised. Whereunto Gordius answered, saying, that it shoulde be to him an hinderance and damage if hee coulde not suffer and endure diuers torments and punishments for Christ his cause. The shirife being more offended with this his boldnesse, commaunded him to feele as many kinde of torments as there were, with all which Gordius notwithstanding, coulde not be mastered or ouercome: but lifting vp his eies vnto heauen singeth this saying out of the Psalmes. The Lorde is my helper, I will not feare the thing that man can doe to me: and also this saying, I will feare none euill, because thou Lord art with me.*

After this, he against him selfe prouoketh the extremitie of the tormentours, & blameth them if they fauour him any thing at al. When the Shrif saw, that hereby he could winne but little, he goeth about by gentlenes and intising wordes, to turne the stoute and valiant minde of Gordius. He promiseth to him great and large offers if he wil denie Christ:* as to make him a Captaine of as many men as any other is, to geue him riches, treasure, & what other thing so euer hee desireth. But in vaine as the Prouerbe is, pipeth the minstrell to him that hath no eares to heare, for he deriding the foolish madnesse of the Magistrate sayth, that it lieth not in him to place any in authority, which he worthy to haue a place in heauen. The Magistrate with these wordes throughly angred and vexed, prepareth him selfe to his condemnation.* Whom after that he had cōdemned, he caused to be had out of the Citie to be brent. There runneth out of the Citie great multitudes by heaps to see him put to execution, some take him in their armes, & louingly kisse him, persuading him to take a better way and saue himself,* and that with weeping teares. To whom Gordius answered, weepe not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which alwaies make warre against the Christians: weepe I say for them which prepare for vs a fire, purchasing hell fire for themselues in the day of vengeance: And cease of further, I pray you, to molest and disquiet my settled minde. Truly (saith he) I am ready for the name of Iesus Christ, to suffer and indure a thousande deathes if neede were. Some other came vnto him which persuaded him to deny Christ with his mouth, & to keepe his conscience to himselfe. My tounge (sayeth hee) which by the goodnes of God I haue, cannot be brought to denie the author and geuer of the same: for with the heart we beleue vnto righteousness, and with the tounge we confesse vnto saluation. Many moe such like wordes he spake: but especially vttering to them such matter, wherby he might perswade the beholders to death, and to the desire of Martyrdome. After all which, with a mery and glad countenance, neuer changing so much as his colour, hee willingly gaue himselfe to be brent. Basilus in Sermone in Gordium militem Caesariensem.

Not much vnlike to the story of Gordius is the story also of Menas an Egiptian, who being likewise a souldiour by his profession, in this persecution of Dioclesian forsooke al, & went into the desert, where a long time he gaue hym selfe to abstinence, watching, and meditation of the Scriptures. At length returning againe to y^e Citie Cotys, there in the open theatre, as y^e people were occupied vpon their spectacles or pastimes, he with a loude voice openly proclaimed himselfe to be a christian, and vpon the same was brought to Pyrrhus the President: * of whome, he being demaunded of his faith, made thys aunswere: Conuenient it is that I shoulde (sayth he) confesse God in whome is light and no darkenes, for so much as Paule doth teache that with hart we beleue to righteousnes, with mouth cōfession is giuen to saluation. After this the innocent Martyr was most painfully pinched and cruciate with sundrie punishments. In all which, notwithstanding he declared a constant heart, and faith inuincible, hauing these wordes Page 91 in his mouth being in the midst of his torments. * There is nothing in my minde that can be compared to the kingdome of heauen. Neither is al the world, if it were wayed in balance able to be conferred with the price of one soule. And sayd, who is able to separate vs from the loue of Iesus Christ our Lord: shal afflictio or anguish? And moreouer (said he) I haue thus learned of my Lord & my king, not to feare them which kill the body and haue no power to kill y^e soule, but to feare him rather, who hath power to destroy both bodye and soule in hell fire. To make the story short, after manifold tormentes borne of him, and suffered, when the last sentence of death was vpon him pronounced which was to be beheaded: * Menas being then had to the place of execution said: I giue thee thanks my Lord god, which hast so excepted me to be foūd a partaker of thy precious death, & hast not giuen me to be deuoured of my fierce enimies, * but hast made me to remaine cōstant in thy pure faith vnto this my later end: And so this blessed souldiour fighting valiantly vnder the baner of Christ, lost his head, * & wan his soule. Symeon Metaphrast. tom. 5. In the which autor there foloweth a long narration of the miracles of this holy man, which here for prolixity I doe omit,

Basilius in a certayne Sermon of 40. Martyrs rehearseth this story not vnworthye to bee noted. There came (saith he) into a certaine place (which place he maketh no mention of) the Emperours Marshall or officer, with the edict which the Emperour had set out against the Christians, that whosoeuer confessed Christ, shoulde after manye tormentes suffer death. And first they did priuily suborne certaine which should detect & accuse the Christians whom they had found out, or had layde wayte for: vpon this the sword, * the gibbet, the wheele, & the whips were brought forth: At the terrible sight whereof, the harts of all the beholders did shake & tremble. Some for feare did flee, some did stand in doubt what to do: Certaine were so terrified at the beholding of these engines & tormenting instruments that they denied their faith. Some other began the game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agony of Martydome, but vanquished at length, by the intollerable paine of their torments, * made shipwracke of their consciences, & lost the glory of their confession. Amōg other xl. there were at that time younge gentlemen all souldiers, which after the Marshall had shewed the Emperours Edict, and required of all men the obedience of the same, freely & boldly of their owne accord confessed themselues to be Christians & declared to him their names. The Marshall somewhat amased at this their boldnes of speach, stādeth in doubte, what was best to do. Yet forthwith he goeth about to win them with faire words, aduertising them to consider their youth, neither that they shoulde chaunge a cruell and vntimely death, * or a sweete and pleasant life: After that hee promiseth them money, and honorable offices in the Emperours name. But they little esteming all these thinges breake forth into a long and bolde Oration, affirming that they did neither desire life, dignitie, nor money, but onelye the celestiaall kingdome of Christ, saying further that they are ready for the loue and faith they haue in god, to indure the afflictioⁿ of the wheele, the crosse, and the fire. The rude Marshall being herewith offended,* deuise^th a newe kinde of punishment. He spied out in the middle of the citie a certaine great pond, which layfull, vpon the cold Northren winde, for it was in the winter time, wherein he caused them to be put all that night, but they being merry & comforting one another, receiued this their appointed punishment, and sayd, as they were putting of their clothes: we put off (said they) now not our clothes, but we put of y^e old mā, corrupt with the deceit of cōcupiscence. We giue thee thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparell we may also put of by thy grace, the sinfull man: for by meanes of the Serpent we once put him on, and by the meanes of Iesus Christ we now put him of.* When they had thus said: they were brought naked into y^e place where they felt moste vehement colde: in so much that all the partes of their bodies were starke & stiffe therewith. Assone as it was daye, they yet hauing breath, were brought into the fire, wherein they were consumed, and their ashes throwne into the flud. By chaunce there was on of the company more liuely, and not so neere dead as the rest, of whome y^e executioners takyng pitie, saide vnto his mother standing by, that they would saue his life. But shee with her owne handes taking her sonne brought him to the pile of wood where y^e residue of his fellowes (crooked for cold) did lie ready to be brent, admonished him to accomplish the blessed iourney he had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

A lyke hystory of 40. Martyres, which were maryed men, we read of in Niceph. & Zozomenus. Lib. 9. cap. 2. which were killed likewise in a lake or pond at Sebastia, a towne of Armenia, vnder Licinius, if the story be not the same with this, Niceph. Zozom.

In this felowship and company of martyrs can not be left out and forgotte the story of Cyrus: This Cyrus was a Phisition borne in Alexandria, which fleing into Egipt, in the persecution of Dioclesianus, and Maximianus, led a solitary life in Arabia, being much spoken of for his learning and myracles, vnto whose company after a certaine tyme did Ioannes, borne in the Citie of Edessa, beyond the ryuer Euphrates, ioyne himself, leauing the souldiers life which before that time he had exercised. But whilest as yet the same persecution raged in a city in Egipt called Canope, there was cast into prison for the confession of their fayth, a certayne godly Christian woman, called Athanasia, and her three daughters,Theoctiste, Theodota, and Eudoxia: wyth whom Cyrus was well acquainted. At whose infirmities he much fearing accompanied with his brother Iohn, came and visited them for their better confirmation: at which time Lyrianus was chiefe captaine and Lieutenaunt of Egypt, of whose wickednes and crueltie, especially agaynst women and maydens: Athanasus maketh mention in hys Apologies, and in his Epistle to those that lead a solitary life. Thys Cyrus therefore and Ioannes, being accused and apprehended of the Heathen men, as by whose perswasions, the maydens and daughters of Athanasia contumelyously, despised the Gods and the Emperours religion, & could by no meanes be brought to doe sacrifice, were after the publication of their constaunt confession put to death by the sworde. Athanasia also and her three daughters being condemned to death. This history writeth Symeon Metaphrastes.*

Sebastian being borne in the part of Fraunce called Gallia Narbonensis was a Christian, and was Lieutenaunte generall of the vawward of Dioclesian the Emperor, who also encouraged many martyrs of Christ by his exhortations, vnto constancy, and kept them in the faith. He being therfore accused to the Emperor, was commaunded to be apprehended, and that he should be brought into the open field, where of his owne souldiers he was thrust through the body with innumerable arrowes, and after that hys body was throwne into a iaque or sinke. Ambrosius maketh mention of this Sebastian the martir in his Cōmentary vpon the 118. Psalme. & Symeon Metaphrastes amongst oher Martyrs that suffered with Sebastian numbred also these followyng: Nicostratus wyth Zoe hys wyfe, Tranquillinus wyth Martia his wyfe: Traglinus Claudius, Castor, Tiburtius, Castullus, Marcus, and Marcellinus wyth other moe.

Basilius in an other Sermon also maketh mention of one Barlaam being a noble and famous Martyr, which abode al the torments of the executioners euen to the point of death, which thing when the tormentors sawe, they brought him and laid him vpon the altar, where they dyd vse to offer sacrifices to their idoles,* and put fire & frankensence into his right hād wherin he had yet some strēgth, thinking that the same his right hand, by the heate & force of the fire, would haue scattered the burning incense vpon the aultar and so haue sacrificed. But of that their hope, the pestiferous tormentors were disapointed: for the flame eate round about his hand, and the same indured euen as though it had bene couered with hote embers, when Barlaam, recited out of the Psalmes this saying: Blessed is the Lord my God which teacheth my handes to fight.

To this narration of Basilius touching the Martyrdome of Barlaam, we will anexe cōsequently an other story of Ambrose: Hee making a certaine exhortation to certaine virgins, in the same Oration cōmendeth the martirdomes of Agricola & Vitalis, who suffered also in the same persecution vnder Dioclesian and Maximinian (as they so affirme) at Bononie. This Vitalis was seruauant to Agricola, who both togyther betweene themselues had made a compact to giue their liues wyth other Martyrs for the name of Christ. Wherupon Vitalis, being sent before of his maister to offer himselfe to Martirdome, fell first into the hands of persecutors, who laboured about him by all maner of meanes to cause him to deny Christ. Which when he would in no case do▪ but stoutly persisted in the confessiō of his faith, they began to exercise him with all kinds of torments: So vnmercifully that there was no whole skinne left in all his body. So Vitalis in the midst of the agonie, & painefull torments, after he had in a short praier, cōmended him selfe to God, gaue vp his life. After him the tormentours set vpon Agricola his Master, whose vertuous manners & gentle conditions, because they were singularly wel liked and knowen to the enimies, his suffring therfore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abyding the long delay and driuing of, and prouoking moreouer y^e Page 92 aduersaries to quicker speede, at length was fastned vnto the crosse and so finished his martirdome,* which he so long desired, Ambros in Exhortatione ad Virgines.

No lesse worthy of commemoration is the lamentable Martyrdome of Vincentius, whose historie here followeth. This Vincentius was a Spaniard, and a Leuite most godly and vertuous, who at this time suffered Martyrdom at Valence, vnder Dacianus the President, as we may gather by Prudentius in his hymne.Bergomensis in his supplement reciteth these words concerning his martyrdome, out of a certaine sermon of S. Augustine: Our heart conceiued not a vaine and fruitles sight (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies) but a great sight & marue•lous, certainly, and there with singulare pleasure receiued it, when the painefull passion of Victorius Vincentius was read vnto vs. Is there any so heauye harted, that will not be moued in the contemplation of this immooueable Martyr so manly, or rather so godly fighting against the craft and subilty of that Serpent, against the tyranny of Dacianus, against the horrors of death, & by the mightie spirite of his God conquering all: But let vs in few wordes rehearse the degrees of his tormentes though the paynes thereof in many wordes can not be expressed. First Dacianus caused the Martir to be layde vpon the torture, and all the ioyntes of his body to be distended and racked out, vntill they crackt againe. This being done in most extreme and cruel maner al the members of his painful and pittiful body were greuously indented with deadly woundes. Thirdly (that his dolours & griefes might be augmēted) they miserably vexed his flesh with yron combes sharpely filed. And to y^e end the tormentors might vomit out al their vengeāce on the meeke & milde martyrs fleshe, the tormentors themselues also were vily scourged at the Presidentes commaundement. And lest his passion through want of paines might seeme imperfect or else to easie, they laid his body being all out of ioint, on a grate of iron, which body when they had opened with iron hookes, they seared it with firie plates, with hote burning salt sprinkling the same. Last of all into a vyle dongeon was this mighty Martir drawen, the floure whereof first was thicke spreadde wyth the sharpest shels that might be gotten, his fete then being fast locked in the stockes, there was he left alone without all worldly comfort: but the Lorde his God was with him, the holye spirit of God (whose office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his hart with ioy & gladnes. Hast thou prepared a terrible racke (O cruell tyraunt, O deuouring Lion) for the Martirs bed:* the Lorde shall make that bed softe and sweete vnto him. Rackest thou his bones and ioyntes al a sunder, His bones, his ioints, his heares are al numbred. Tormentest thou his flesh with mortal woundes: the Lord shal poure abūdantly into al his sores of his oyle of gladnes. Thy scraping combes, thy sharpe fleshhookes, thine whote searing yrons, thy parched salte, thy stincking prison, thy cutting shelles, thy pinching stockes shal turne to this patient Martyr to the best. Altogether shall worke contrary to thine expectation, great plenty of ioy shall hee reap into the barne of his soule, out of this mighty haruest of paines that thou hast brought him into. Yea thou shalte proue him Vincentius indede: that is, a vanquisher, a tryumpher, a conqueror subduing thy madnes, by his mekenes, thy tyranny by his pat•ence, thy manifold meanes of tortures, by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he is plentifully enriched.

In this cataloge or company of such holy martirs, as suffered in this foresaid tenth persecutiō, many mo and almost innumerable there be expressed in authors, beside thē whom we haue hetherto comprehended, as Philoromus, a man of noble byrth,* & great possessions in Alexandria, who being perswaded by his friendes to fauour himselfe, to respect his wife, to consider his children and familie did not onely reiect the counsels of them,* but also neglected the threatens and torments of the Iudge, to keepe the confessiō of Christ inuiolate vnto the death, & losing of his head. Euseb. Lib. 8. cap. 9. Niceph. Lib. 7. cap. 9. of whome Euseb. beareth witnes that he was there present himselfe.

Of like estate and dignitie was also Procopius in Palestina, who after his conuersion brake his images of siluer, and golde, and distributed the same to the poore and after al kinde of tormentes, of racking, of cording, of tearing hys flesh, of goring and stabbing in, of fiering, at lēghth had his head also smitten of, as witnesseth. Niceph. Lib. 7. cap. 15.

To this maye be ioyned also Georgius, a younge man of Capadocia, who stoutly inueighing against the impyous idolatry of the Emperours, was apprehended, and cast in prison, then torne wyth hooked yrons, burnt with hoate lyme, stretched with cordes, after that his hands and feete with other members of his body being cut of, at last wyth a sworde had his head cut of. Niceph. ibid.

With these aforenamed adde also Sergius,* and Bacchius, Panthaleon, a phisition in Nicomedia, mentioned in Supplem. Lib. 8. Theodorus of the Citie Amasia in Hellesp. mentioned of Vincentius. Lib. 3. Faustus a martyr of Egypt, mentioned of Niceph. Lib. 8. cap. 5. Gereon with 318. fellow martirs which suffered about Colours. Petr. de nat. Lib, 9. cap. 49. Hermogenes the President of Athens, who being conuerted by the constancie of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, suffered also for the like faith. Item Samonas, Gurius and Abibus, mentioned in Symeon Metaphrast. Hieron also w^t certaine of his confessors, vnder Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphrastes. Iudes, and Domuas, who suffred with many other Martirs aboue mentioned, at Nicomedia, as recordeth Metaphrastes. Euelasius, Maximinus the Emperors officers, whom Fausta the virgin in her torments conuerted. Also Thyrsus, Lucius, Callinicus, Appollonius, Philemon, Asilas, Leonides, with Arrianus president of Thebaide, Cyprianus, likewise a Citizen of Antioche, who after he had continued a long time a filthy Magitian, or sorcerer, at length was conuerted, & made a Deacon then a Priest, and at last the Bishop of Antioche, Vincent lib. 12. cap. 120. of whome partly we touched somewhat before. Pag. 72. This Cyprian w^t Iustina a virgin suffered amōg the martirs, Item, Glycerius at Nicomedia, Felix a minister, Fortunatus, Achilleus, Deacons in the citie of Valent. Arthemius of Rome, Cyriacus Deacon to Marcellus the bishop. Carpophorus Priest at Thuscia, with Abundus his deacō. Item, Claudius, Syrinus, Antonius, which suffered with Marcellinus the Bishop Sabell Enead. 7. Lib. 8. Cucusatus, in the citie Barcinona. Felix Byshop of Apulia, with Adauctus & Ianuarius his priests, Fortunatus & Septimus hys readers, who suffered in the Citie Venusina vnder Dioclesian. Bergom. Lib. 8.

It were to long a trauell or trouble to recite al and singular names of them particularly,* whom this persecutiō of Dioclesian did consume. The number of whom being almost infinite is not to be collected or expressed: One storye yet ramayneth, not to be forgotten of Cassianus, whose pitifull story being described of Prudentius we haue here inserted, rendring metre for metre as followeth.

Through Forum, as in Italy,

I passed once to Roome:

Into a Church by chaunce came I,

And stoode fast by a toome.

2

Which church sometime a place had bene,

Where causes greates in lawe:

Were scand and tryed, and iudgement giuen,

To keepe brute men in awe.

3

Thys place Sylla Cornelius,
First built: he raysed the frame:
And called the same Forum, and thus,
That City tooke the name.

4

In prayer feruent as I stoode, casting mine eie aside:
A picture in full piteous moode,
(Imbrude) by chaunce I spied.

5

A thousand wounded markes full bad,
All mangled, rent, and torne:
The skinne appeared as though it had,
Bene iagde and prickt with thorne.

6

A scull of pictured boyes did bande,
About that lothsome sight:
That with their sharpned gads in hand,
His members thus had dight.

These gads were but their pens wherewith,
Their Tables written were:
And such as scholers often sith,
Vnto the scholes doe beare.

8

Whom thou seest heere thus picturde sitte,

And firmly dost behold:

No fable is, I do thee witte,

Vnaskte a Prelate tolde

9

That walkt thereby: but doth declare,

The history of one,

Which written, would good recorde beare,

What faith was long agone.

10

A skilfull scolemaister this was,

That here sometime did teach:

The Bishop once of Brixia as,

And Christ full plaine did preach.

11

He knew well how to comprehend▪

Long talke in few lynes:

Page 93 And it at length how to amende,

By order and by times.

12

His sharpe precepts, and sterne looks,

His beardles boyes did feare:

When hate in hart (yet for their bookes)

Full deadly they did beare.

13

The childe that learnes, I doe yee weete,

Termes aye his tutor crule.

No discipline in youth seemes sweete,

Count this a common rule.

14

Behold the raging time now here,

Oppressing sore the faith:

Doth persecute gods children dere,

And all that Christ bewraith.

15

This trusly teacher of the swarme,

Profest the liuing God:

The chiefe good thing, they compt their harme,

Perhaps he shakes his rod.

What rebels aske the president,

Is he, Theare so loude

Vnto our youth an instrument,

They say, and low they bowde.

17

Go bring the caytiffe foorth he bids,

And make no long delay:

Let him be set the boyes amids,

They doe as he doth say.

18

Let him be giuen vnto them all,
And let them haue their will:
To doe to him what spite they shall,
So that they will him kill.

19

Euen as they list let them him fray
And him deride so long:
Till wearines prouokes their play,
No lenger to prolong.

20

Let them I say then vncontrold,
Both pricke and scotch his skinne:
To bath their hands let them be bold,
In the hote bloud of him.

21

The scholers hereat make great game,
It pleaseth them full well:
That they may kill and quench the flame,
They thought to them a hell.

22

They binde his hands behind his back●,
And naked they him stripe:
In bodkinne wise at him they nacke,
They laugh to see him skippe.

The priuy hate that ech one hath,
In hart it now appeares:
They poure it foorth in gally wrath,
They wreake them of their teares.

24

Some cast great stones, some other breake,
Their tables on his face:
Lo here thy Latine and thy Greeke,
(Oh barren boyes of grace.)

25

The bloud runnes downe his cheekes and doth,
Imbrue the boxen leames:
Where notes by them were made (though loth)
And well proponed theames.

26

Some whet, some sharpe, their penseles pointes,
That serude to write with all:
Some other gage his flesh and ioyntes,
As with a pointed nall.

27

Sometimes they pricke, sometime they rent,
This worthy martirs flesh:
And thus by turnes they do torment,
This confessour a fresh.

28

Now all with on consent on him,
Their bloody handes they lay:
To see the bloud from limme to limme,
Drop downe they make a play.

29

More painefull was the pricking pange,
Of children oft and thicke:
Then of the bigger boyes that stange,
And neere the hart did sticke.

30

For by the feeble strokes of the one,
Death was denied his will:
Of smart that made him wo begon,
He had the better skill.

31

The deeper strokes the great ones gaue, and neerer toucht the quicke:
The welcomer he thought the same,
Whom longing death made sicke.

32

God make you strong he saith I pray,
God giue you might at will:
And what you want in yeares I say,
Let crueltie fulfill.

But whilst the hangman breatheth still,
and me with you do match:
That weakely worke, yet want no will,
my 〈...〉 to dispatch.

34

My griefes waxe great, what gronest thou now?
Sayd some of them againe?
In schoole, aduised well art thou?
Whom there thou pu•st to payne?

35

Behold we pay, and now make good,
as many thousande stripes:
As when with weeping eyes we stoode,
In daunger of thy gripes.

36

Art thou now angry at thy bande, that alwayes cried writ•, write,
And neuer wouldst that our right hand,
Should rest in quiet plyte•

37

We had forgot our playing times,
Thou churle deniedst vs of:
We now but pricke and point our lines,
And thus they grinne and scof.

38

Correct good sir your viewed verse,
If ought amisse there be:
Now vse thy power and then rehearse, that haue not marked thee.

39

Christ pittying this groaning man,
With tormments torne and tyred:
Commaundes his hart to breake euen then,
And life that was then hyered.

40

He yeeldes againe to him that gaue,
And thus he makes exchange:
Immortall▪ for mortall to haue,
That in such payne did •aunge.

41

This is saith he, that this plesure,
Thou so beholdst, Oh g••t:
Of Cassianus Martir pure,*
Doth preach I doe protest.

42

If thou Prudence haue ought in store,
In pietie to deale:
In hope of iust reward therefore,
Now shew thy louing zeale:

43

I could not but consent, I weepe,

Hys tombe I doe embrace:

Home I returne, and after sleepe,

This pittifull preface,

44

I write as a memoriall,

For euer to endure:

Of Cassianus scolemaster,

All others to allure.

45

To constancy vnder the crosse,

Of their profession:

Accompting gaine what euer losse,

For Christ they take vpon.

No lesse admirable then wonderfull was the constancy also of woemen and maidens, who in the same persecution gaue their bodyes to the tormentes & their liues for the testimony of Christ, with no lesse boldnes of spirite, thē did the men themselues aboue specified, to whome howe much more inferiour they were in bodely strēgth, so much more worthy of prayse they be, for their constant standing. Of whom some examples here we minde (Christ willing) to inferre, such as in our stories and Chronicles seem most notable, first beginning with Eulalia, whose story we haue taken out of the foresayd Prudentius as followeth.

In the West part of Spaine called Portingall, is a City great and pop•lous, named Emerita, wherein dwelt and was brought vp a virgine borne of noble parentage, whose name was Eulalia,* which Emerita although for the apte situation therof, was both rich & famous, yet more adourned and famous was the renowne therof, by y^e martyrdome, bloud,* and sepulture of this blessed virgine Eulalia. Twelue yeares of age was shee and not much aboue, when she refused great and honourable offers in mariage, as one not skilfull, nor yet delighting in courtly daliaunce, neyther yet taking pleasure in purple and gorgeous apparell, or els in precious balmes, or costly ornamentes and iuels.* But forsaking and despising all these and such lyke pompeous allurements, then shewed she her self most busie in preparing her iourney to her hoped inheritance, and heauenly patronage. Which Eulalia as she was modest and descrete in behaiour, sage and sober in conditions, so was she also witty and sharp in aunswering her enemies. But when the 〈◇〉 rage of persecution inforced her to ioyne her self amongst Gods

Children in the houshold of faith, and when the Christians were commaunded to offer incense and sacrifice to deuils or dead Gods: Then began the blessed spirite of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a pro•tipt & ready wit thought forthwith (as a couragious captayne) Page 94 to geue a charge vpon this so great, and disordered a battayle: and so she,  silly woeman, pouring out the bowels of her innocent hart before God, more prouoketh therby the •orce and rage of her enemies agaynst her. But the godly care of her parentes, fearing least the willing minde of the Damsel, so ready to dye for Christes cause, might make her guilty of her owne death,  hid her and kept her close at their house in the countrey, being a great way out of the Citty. She yet misliking that quiet life, as also detesting, to make such delay, softly stealeth out of the doores (no man knowing therof) in the night and in great hast leauing the common waye, openeth the hedge gappes, and with werye feete (god knoweth) passed through y^e thorny & bryery places, accompanied yet w^t spirituall garde: & although darke & dreadfull was the silent night, yet had shee with her the Lord & guider of light. And as the children of Israel comming out of Egipt, had by the mightye power of God, a cloudy pillar for their guide in y^e day, & a flame of fire in the night, so had this godly virgine, traueling in this darke night, when she fleing & forsaking the place where al filthy idolatry abounded, & hastened her heauenly iourney, was not oppressed with the dreadfull darknes of the night, But yet she before the day appeared in this her speedy iourney, with her selfe considered & mused on a thousand matters, & more.  In the morning betime with a bould courage she goeth vnto the tribunall or iudgement seat, & in the midst of them all with a loud voice, crying out sayde: I praye you what a shame is it for you thus rashely, and without aduisement to destroy and kill mens soules, and to throwe their bodies aliue against the rocks, and cause them to deny the omnipotent god?  Would you know (O you vnfortunate) who I am? behold, I am one of the Christians: an enimie to your deuilish sacrifices, I spurne your idols vnder my feete: I confesse God omnipotent with my hart and mouth. Isis, Apollo, and Uenus, what are they? Maximinus himselfe, what is he? The one a thing of naught, for that they be y^e workes of mens hands, y^e other but a cast away bicause he worshippeth the same worke. Therefore friuolous are they both, and both not worthy to be set by. Maximinus is a Lorde of substaunce, and yet he himselfe falleth downe before a stone, and voweth the honor of hys dignitie vnto those that are much inferior to his vassals. Why then doth he oppresse so tirannically, more worthye stomacks and courages then himselfe? He must nedes be a good guid, and an vpright iudge, which fedeth vpon innocent bloud: and breathing in the bodies of godly men doth rent and teare their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in destroying and subuerting the faith.

Go to therfore thou hangman, burne, cut and mangle thou these earthly mēbers. It is an easie matter to breake a brittle substance, but the inward mind shalt not thou hurt for any thing thou canst do. The pretor thē or iudge wyth these words of hers, set in a great rage, saith, hangmā take her and pull her out by the heare of her head & torment her to the vttermost. Let her feelee the power of our countrey gods, and let her know what the Imperiall gouernement of a Prince is.  But yet, O thou sturdy girle, faine woulde I haue thee (if it were possible) before thou dye, to reuoke this thy wickednes. Behold what pleasures thou maiest enioy by the honorable house thou camest of. Thy fallen house and progenie followeth thee to death with lamentable teares, & the heauy nobility of thy kindred maketh dolfull lamētation for thee. What meanest thou, wilt thou kill thy self so younge a flower, & so neare these honorable mariages and great dowries that thou mayest enioy? Doth not the glistering and golden pompe of the bried bed moue thee? Doth not the reuerende pietie of thyne Auncitours pricke thee? whom is it not, but that this thy rashnes and weakenes sorroweth? behold here the furniture ready prepared for thy terrible death. Either shalt thou be beheaded with this sword, or else with these wild beastes shalt thou be pulled in peeces, or els yⁿ being cast into the fiery flames shalbe (although lamentably bewailed of thy friends and kinsfolks) consumed to ashes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to escape al this? If thou wilt but take & put with thy fingers a little salt & incense into the censers, thou shalt be deliuered from al these punishmēts. To this Eulalia made no aunswere, but being in a great furye shee spitteth in the tirauntes face, she throweth downe the Idoles, and spurneth abroad with her feete the heape of incense prepared to the censers: then without further delay, the hangmen with both their strengthes tooke her, & puld one ioynite from an other, and with the talantes of wilde beastes, scotched her sides to the hard bodes: she all this while singing and praying God in this wise. Beholde, O Lord I will not forget thee: what a pleasure is it for them O Christ that remember thy triumphant victoryes, to attayne vnto these high dignities, and still calleth vpon that holy name, al stained and embrued with her owne bloude. This sang she with a bold stomacke, neither lamentyngly nor yet wepingly, but being glad and mery, abandonyng from her mind all heauines and grieffe, when as out of a warme fountain her mangled members with fresh bloud bathed her white and fayre skinne. Then proceede they to the last and final torment, which was not only the goring and wounding of her mangled body with the yron grat, & hurdle, and terrible harrowing of her flesh, but burned, on euery side with flaming torches her tormented brests,* and sides: her heare hanging about her shoulders in two parts deuided (wherewith her shamefast chastitie and virginitie was couered) reached downe to the ground: but when the cracking flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her heare, and reacheth the crowne of her head: thē she desiring swift death, opened her mouth and swallowed the flame, and so rested shee in peace.

The sayde Prudentius and Ado,* also Equilinus adde moreouer, writinge of a white doue issuing out of her mouth at her departing, and of the fire quenched about her body, also of her body, couered miraculously wyth snow, with other things more, wherof let euery reader vse hys owne iudgement.

As ye haue heard now the Christian life and constant death of Eulalia,* much worthy of praise & commendation: So no lesse commendation is worthely to be giuen to blessed Agnes, that constant Damsell and martir of God, who as she was in Rome of honorable parentes begotten, so lyeth she there as honorably intombed & buried. Whiche Agnes for her vnspotted & vndefiled virginitie, deserueth no greater praise and commendation, then for her willing death and martirdome.* Some writers make of her a long discourse, more in my iudgement then necessary, reciting diuers & sundry straunge miracles by her done in the processe of her history, which partly for tediousnes, partly for the doubtfulnes of the author, (whome some father vpon Ambrose) and partly for the straungenes and incredibilitie therof I omit, being satisfied with that which Prudentius, brefly writeth of her,* as foloweth: Shee was (sayth hee) yong & not marriageable, when first she being dedicated to Christ, boldly resisted the wicked Edictes of the Emperour: least that through idolatry she might haue denied and forsaken the holy faith: but yet first proued by diuers and sundry pollicies to induce her to the same (as now with y^e flattering and intising words of the Iudge, now with the threatnings of the storming executioner) stode notwithstanding,* stedfast in al couragious strength: and willingly offered her body to hard & painful torments, not refusing as she sayd, to suffer whatsoever it should be, yea though it were death it selfe. Then said the cruell tyraunt: if to suffer paine & torment, be so easie a matter and lightly regarded of thee & that thou accomptest thy life nothing woorth: yet y^e shame of thy dedicated or vowed virginity is a thing more regarded I know, and esteemed of thee. Wherefore this is determined, that vnles thou wilt make obeisaunce to the aultar of Minerua, and aske forgiuenes of her for thy arrogancy,* thou shalt be sent or abandoned to the cōmon stewes or brothelhouse. Agnes y^e virgine, with more spirit and vehemency inneieth against both Minerua & her verginitie: the youth in sculs flocke and runne together, and craue that they may haue Agnes their ludibrious pray:* thē saith Agnes, Christ is not so forgetfull of those that be hys, that he wil suffer violently to be taken frō them their golden and pure chastitie, neither wil he leaue them so destitute of helpe: he is alwaies at hande and ready to fight for such as are shamfast and chast virgines, neither suffereth he his giftes of holy integritie or chastitie to be polluted. Thou shalt sayth shee, willingly bathe thy sworde in my bloud if thou wilt, but thou shalt not defile my body with filthy lust for any thing thou canst doe. She had no sooner spoken these wordes, but he commaunded that she should be set naked at the corner of some streete, (whiche place at that time, such as were strumpets cōmonly vsed, the greater part of the multitude both sorrowing and shaming to see so shameles a sight,* went their wayes, some turninge their heades, some hiding their faces. But one amongst y^e rest, with vncircumcised eies, beholding the Damsell, and that in such opprobrious wise: behold a flame of fire lyke vnto a flash of lightning, falleth vpō him, striketh his eies out of his head, wherupon he for dead falling to the groūd, sprauleth in the chanel durt, whose cōpanions taking him vp, & carrying him away, bewayled him as a dead man. But the virgin for this her miraculous deliuey from the danger and shame of that place, singeth prayses vnto God and Christ.

There be (saith Prudentius) that report how that shee Page 95 beyng desired to pray vnto Christ for the partie, that a litle before with fire frō heauen for hys incōtinency was stricken was restored by their prayer,* both vnto hys perfect health & sight. But blessed Agnes after that she had climed this her first griefe and step vnto the heauēly pallace, forthwith began to clime an other: for fury ingendring now, y^e mortall wrath of her bloody enemy, wringing his handes crieth out saying, I am vndone: O y^t the executioner draw out thy sword, and doe thyne office that y^e Emperour hath appoynted thee. And when Agnes saw a sturdy and cruell fellow (to behold) stand behinde her, or approaching neere vnto her with a naked sword in his hand: I am now glad,der sayth she, & reioyce, y^t such a one as thou, being a stout, fierce, strong and sturdy souldiour art come, then one more feable, weake, & faynt should come, or els any other yong man sweetly enbalmed,* and wearing gaye apparell that might destroy me with funerall shame. This, euen this is he I now cōfesse, y^t I do loue. I wil make hast to meet him and will no longer protract my longing desire: I wil willingly receaue into my papes the length of hys sword, and into my brest will draw the force therof euē vnto the hilts: That thus I being maryed vnto Christ my spouse,* may surmount and escape all the darckenes of this world, that reacheth euen vnto y^e skyes. O eternal gouernour, vouchsafe to opē the gates of heauen once shut vp agaynst al the inhabitantes of the earth, and receaue (oh Christ) my soule that seeketh thee. Thus speaking and kneeling vpon her knees, she prayeth vnto Christ aboue in heauen, that her necke might be the redyer for the sword,* now hāging ouer the same. The executioner then with his bloody hand, finished her hope, & at one stroke cutteth off her head, & by such short & swift death doth he preuente her of y^e payne therof.

I haue oftentimes before complayned that the stories of Sayntes haue bene poudered and sawsed with diuers vntrue additions and fabulous inuentiōs of men,* who either of a superstitious deuotion, or of a subtyll practise, haue so mingle mangled their stories and liues, that almost nothing remayneth in them simple and vncorrupt, as in the vsuall Portues wont to be read for dayly seruice, is manifest and euident to be seene, wherein, few Legendes there be, able to abide y^e touch of history, if they were truly tried. This I write vpon the occasiō specially of good Katherine, whome now I haue in hand. In whom although I nothing doubt, but in her life was great holines, in her knowledge excellency, in her death constancy: yet that all thinges be true that be storyed of her, neyther dare I affirme, neyther am I bound so to thinke: So many strange fictions of her be fained diuersly of diuers writers, wherof some seeme incredible, some also impudent. As where Petrus de Natalibus,* writing of her conuersion declareth, how that Katherine sleeping before a certayne picture or table of the Crucifixe, Christ with his mother Mary appeared vnto her: And when Mary had offered her to Christ to be his wife, he first refused her for her blackenes. The next tyme, she beyng baptised, Mary appearing againe, offered her to mary with Christ, who then being liked, was espoused to hym and maryed, hauing a golden ring the same tyme put on her finger in her sleep. &c. Bergomensis writeth thus, that because she in y^e sight of the people openly resisted the Emperour Maxentius to hys face and rebuked hym for hys crueltie,* therefore she was commaunded and committed vpon the same to prison, which seemeth hetherto not much to digresse from trueth. It followeth moreouer, that the same night an angell came to her,* comforting and exhorting her to be strong and constant vnto the Martyrdome, for that she was a mayd accepted in the sight of God, and that the Lord would be with her, for whose honor she did fight, and that he would geue her a mouth and wisdom, which her enemies should not withstand: with many other thinges mo, which I here omit. As this also I omit concerning y^e 50. Philosophers, whom she in disputation conuicted, and conuerted vnto our religion, and dyed martyrs for y^e same. Item, of the conuerting of Porphyrius kinsmā to Maxentius and Faustina the Emperours wife. At length (saith the story) after she proued the racke, and the foure sharpe cutting wheelles,* hauing at last her head cut off with the sword, so she finished her martyrdome, about the yeare of our Lord (as Antoninus affirmeth) 310 Symeon Metaphrastes, writing of her, discourseth the same more at large, to whome they may resort, which couet more therein to be satisfied.

Among the workes of Basill a certayne Oration is extant concerning Iulitta the martyr,* who came to her martyrdome (as he witnesseth) by this occasion. A certayne auaricious and greedy person, of great authoritie, and as it may appeare, the Emperour his deputy, or other like officer,* (who abused the decrees and lawes of the Emperour agaynst the Christians, to hys own lucre and gayne) violently tooke from this Iulitta all her goodes, landes, cattell, and seruaunts, contrary to all equity and right. She made her pittifull cōplaint to the Iudges, a day was appointed, when the cause should be heard.* The spoyled woman, and the spoiling extorcioner stode forth together, y^e woman lamentably declareth her case, y^e man frowningly beholdeth her face. When she had proued that of good right the goods were her owne & that wrongfully he had dealt with her: the wicked & bloudthirsty wretch, preferring vile worldly substaunce, before the precious substaunce of a Christen body, affirmed her action to be of no force, for that she was as an outlaw in not seruing the Emperors Gods, since her christian faith hath bene first abiured.* His allegation was allowed as good and reasonable. Whereupon incense & fire were prepared for her to worship the Gods, which vnles she would do,* neither the Emperors protectiō, nor lawes, nor iudgment, nor life, should she enioy in that cōmon weale. When this handmaid of the Lorde heard these wordes, she saide, farwell life, welcome death: farwell ryches welcome pouerty. All that I haue if it were a thousand times more,* would I rather loose, then to speake one wicked & blasphemous word against God my creator. I yeeld thee thanks most hartly, O my God, for this gift of grace, that I can contemne & despise this frayle and transitory world, esteeming Christian profession aboue all treasures. Hence forth whē any question was demaunded, her aunswere was: ^{}I am the seruaunt of Iesus Christ. Her kindred & acquaintaunce flocking to her, aduertised her to chaunge her minde. But that vehemently she refused, with detestation of their Idolatry. Forthwith the Iudge, with the sharpe sworde of sentēce not only cutteth of al her goodes & possessions, but iudgeth her also to the fire most cruellye. The ioyfull Martyr imbraceth the sentence as a thing most sweete and delectable. ^{}She addresseth her selfe to the flames, in countenance, iesture, and wordes, declaring the ioy of her hart, coupled with singular constancy. To the women beholding her, sententiouslye shee spake: Sticke not, ^{*}O sisters, to labour and trauell after true piety and godlines. Cease to accuse the fragilitie of feminine nature. What? are not we created of the same matter, that mē are? Yea, after Gods Image and similitude are we made, as liuely as they. Not flesh only God vsed in the creation of the woman, in signe and tokē of her infirmitie, & weaknes, but bone of bones is she, in token that shee must be strong in the true and liuing God, all false Gods forsaken. Constant in faith al infidelity renounced patient in aduersity, all worldly ease refused. Waxe wery, (my dere sisters) of your liues lead in darkenes, & be in loue with my christ, my God, my redeemer, my comforter which is the true light of the worlde. Perswade your selues, or rather the spirite of the liuing God perswade you, that there is a world to come, wherein the worshippers of idoles and deuils shal be tormented, perpetually, the seruauntes of the high god shalbe crowned eternally. With these words she embraced the fire, and swetely slept in the Lord.

There haue bene moreouer beside these aboue recited diuers godly women and faithfull Martirs, ^{*}as Barbara a noble woman in Thuscia, who after miserable prisonmēt sharpe cordes, & burning flames put to her sides, was at last beheaded. Also Fausta the virgin, which suffered vnder Maximinus by whome Euelasius a ruler of the Emperours palace, and Maximinus the President were both conuerted and also suffered martirdome, as witnesseth Metaphrastes. Item Iuliana a virgine of singular beautie in Nicomedia, who after diuers agonies suffered likewise vnder, Maximinus. Item, Anysia a mayd of Thessalonica, who vnder the said Maximinus suffred. Metaphr. ibid. Iustina which suffered with Cyprianus bishop of Antioche, not to omit also Tecla although most writers doe accorde that she suffered vnder Nero. Platina in vita Caij, maketh also mentiō of Lucia, & Agatha. All which holy maides and virgins glorified the Lord Christ with their constant martirdome in this tenth & last persecution of Dioclesian.

During the time of which persecution these bishops of Rome succeded on after another ^{}Caius who succeded next after Xist{us} mētioned. pag. 71. Marcellinus Marcellus (of whō, Eusebius in his story maketh no mention) Eusebius, & then Miltiades: al which, died martirs in the tempest of this persecution. First Marcellinus after the Martirdome of Caius was ordeined Bishoppe, he being brought by Dioclesian, to the Idoles, ^{}first yeelded to their Idolatry & was seene to sacrifice, wherefore being excommunicated by the Christians, fell in such repentaunce, that he returned agayne to Dioclesian, where he standing to his former confession, and publicly condemning the idolatry of the heathen, recouered the crowne of martirdome: suffering with Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus.

Page 96 Marcellus likewise was vrged of Maxentius to renounce his bishoprick & religion, ^{*}& to sacrifice with them to idols. which when he constantly refused, was beaten with cudgels, and so expelled the city. Then he entring into y^e house of Lucina a widow, assembled there the cōgregation, which when it came to the eares of Maxentius the tiraunt, he turned the house of Lucina into a stable, and made Marcellus the keeper of the beasts, and so with the stinch thereof and miserable handling was put to death. Eusebius late byshop of Rome, as Euseb. in Chron. saith. 7. monethes: Marianus Scotus saith 8. months.*Damasus affirmeth 6. yeares, Sabellicus alledgeth certaine authors that say, that he was slayne by Maximinianus: but correcteth that himselfe, affirming that Maximinianus died before him.

Miltiades by the testimony of Platina, and other that follow him sat 3. yeares, & 7. moneths, & suffred vnder Maximinianus. But that semeth not to be true, as both Sabellicus doth rightly note,* affirming that the same cannot stand by the supputation of time: Forasmuch as the saide Galerius Maximinus raigned but 2. yeares, and died before Miltiades. Also Eusebius manifestly expresseth the example of a letter of Constantine written to this Miltiades Byshop of Rome,* playnely conuicting that to bee false, which Platina affirmeth.

In the booke collected of general counceles among the decretal epistles, there is a long tractation about y^e iudgement and condemnation of Marcellinus: wherof the Maysters & Patrones of popery, in these our daies, take great hold to proue the supremacy of the pope to be aboue al generall counceles, and that he ought not to be subiect to the condemnation of any person or persons, for that there is written: Nemo vnquam iudicauit Pontificem, nec Praesul sacerdotem suum, quoniam prima sedes non iudicabitur a quoquā. &c. Although this sentence of Miltiades seemeth apparantly to be patched in, rather by some Heldibrandus, then by Miltiades: both for that it hangeth with little order of sense, vpon that which goeth before: & againe bicause that prima sedes here mentioned, was not yet ordained nor attributed to the sea of Rome before the counsell of Nice, where the order and placing of byshops was first established. But to let this sentence passe, yet notwithstanding the circūstance & proceeding of this iudgement, if it be rightly weyed, maketh very little to the purpose of these men. Neither is it true that the bishops of this counsell of Sinuesse, did not condemne Marcellinus: for the wordes of the counsell bee plaine. Subscripserunt igitur in eius damnationem & damnauerunt eum extra ciuitatem. That is: They subscribed therfore to his comdemnation, and condemned him to be expelled out of the citie. Moreouer by y^e said counsell were brought in, the 42. witnesses against Marcellinus. In the saide counsell the verdit of the same witnesses was demaunded and also receiued. Furthermore, Quirinus there, one of the Byshops openly protested, that he would not depart y^e counsell, before the malice of the bishops were reuealed: what doth al this declare, but that the bishop of Rome was called there,* and did appeare before the iudgement seat of the Counsell, and there stode subiecte to their sentence & authoritie, by the which he was expelled out of the City? As for the wordes of the counsell, whereupon our Papistes stand so much. Non enim nostro, sed tuo ipsius iudicio cōdemnaberis, &c. Item: Tuo ore iudica causam tuā. &c. These words import not here the authority of the Romane bishop to be aboue the councel, neither do they declare what the counsell could not do, but what they would and wished rather to be done, that is, that he should rather acknowledge his crime before God & them, with a voluntary yelding of his hart, then that the confession of such an hainous fact should be extorted from him through their condemnatiō: for that they saw to be expedient for hys soules health. Otherwise their cōdemnation should serue him to smal purpose. And so it came to passe. For he being vrged of thē to condemne himselfe,* so did: prostrating himselfe and weeping before them. Wherupon immediatly they proceded to the sentēce against him, condemning & pronouncing him to be expelled the city. Now whether by this may be gathered, that y^e Byshop of Rome ought not to be cited, accused, and condemned by any person or persons, let the indifferent Reader iudge simply.

*As touching y^e decretal epistles, which be intituled vnder the name of these foresaide bishops: who so well aduise them, and with iudgement will examine the stile, the time, the argument the hanging together of the matter, & the constitutions in them contained (little seruing to anye purpose, and nothing seruing for those troublous dayes then present) may easely discerne them: either in no part to be theirs, or much of the same to be clouted and patched by the doings of other, which liued in other times: speciallye seing al the constitutions in them for the most part tend to the setting vp and to exalt the sea of Rome aboue al other, Bishops and churches, and to reduce all comes & appeals to the said sea of Rome. So the epistle of Caius beginnyng with the commendation of the authoritie of his sea, endeth after the same tenor, willing and cōmaunding all difficult questions in al prouinces whatsoever emerging, to be referred to the sea Apostolicall. Moreouer, the greatest part of the said epistle from this place. Quicunque illi sunt ita obcaecati. &c. to the ende of this periede: Quoniam sicut ait. B. Apostolus Magnum est pietatis. &c. is conteyned in the epistle of Leo, vnto Leo the Emperour: & so rightly agreeth in al poynts with the stile of Leo, that euident it is the same to be borrowed out of Leo, out of the epistle of Caius, or to bee patched into the epistle of Caius taken out of Leo.

Likewise the epistle of Marcellinus to get more authoritie with y^e reader, is admixed with a great part of S. Paules epistle to the ephesians, worde, for worde. And howe is it like that Marcellinus which died in the 20. yeare of Dioclesian coulde write of consubstantialitie of the diuine persons, when that controuersie and terme of Consubstantialitie, was not heard of in the Church, before Nicene councell, which was 23. yeares after him? But especially the two epistles of Marcellus bewray themselues, so that for the confuting therof needeth no other probation, more then onely the reading of the same. Such a glorious stile of ambition therein doth appeere, as it is easie to be vnderstoode, not to proceede either frō such an humble Martir, or to sauour any thing of the misery of such a time. His wordes of hys first epistle written to the brethren of Antioche, and alleaged in the popes decrees by Gratianus are these:

We desire you brethren that ye doe not teach nor conceiue any other thing, but as yee haue receiued of the blessed Apostle S. Peter, and of other Apostles & fathers. For of him ye were first of all instructed. wherefore you must not forsake your owne father and followe others. For hee is the head of the whole Church to whom the Lord sayd: Thou art Peter and vpon this rocke I will build my church. &c. whose seate was first with you in Antioche: which afterward by the commaundement of the Lord was trāslated frō thence to Rome, of the which church of Rome I am this day placed (by the grace of god) to be the gouernour. Frō the which church of Rome, neither ought you to separate your selues, seeing to the same church all maner causes ecclesiasticall, being of any importance (Gods grace so disposing) are comended to be referred: by the same to be ordered regularly, from whence they tooke their first beginning. &c. And followeth consequently vpon the same. And if your Church of Antioche, which was once the 1. wil now yeld her self vnto the sea of Rome, ther is no other Church els, which will not subiect it selfe to our dominion: to whom all other Byshops, who so euer listeth, and as they must needes do (according to the decrees of the the Apostles and of their successors) ought to flee vnto, as to their head, and must appeale to the same, there to haue their redresse, and their protection from whence they tooke their first instruction and consecration. &c.

Whether this be like matter to proceed from the spirit of Marcellus that blessed martyr, in those so dreadfull dayes, I say no more,* but onely desire thee (gētle reader) to iudge.

In hys second Epistle moreouer, the sayd Marcellus, writing to Maxentius, the bloody tyraunt, first reprehendeth him for his crueltie, sharply admonishing him howe & what to do: to learne and seeke the true religion of God, to mayntayne hys Church, to honor and reuerence the Priestes of God, and specially exhorteth him to charitie, and that he would cease from persecution. &c. All this is possible,* and like to be true: but now marke (good reader) what blanched stuffe here followed withall: as where hee alledging the statutes and sanctions of hys predecessors, declareth and discusseth that no byshop nor minister ought to be persecuted, or depriued of hys goodes. And if they be, then ought the to haue their possessions and places againe restored (by the law) before they were bound (by the law) to aunswere to their accusations layd in agaynst thē. And so after that, in conuenient tyme, to be called to a councell. The which councell notwithstanding, without the authoritie of the holy sea, cannot proceede regularly (albeit it remayne in hys power to assemble certayne Byshops together.) Neyther can he regularly condemne any Byshop, appealing to this hys Apostolicall sea, before the sentence diffinite do proceede from the foresayd sea. &c. And it followeth after: and therefore (sayth he) let no Byshop of what crime soeuer he be attached, come to hys accusation or be heard, but in hys owne ordinary Synode at hys conuenient time: the regular and Apostolicalll authoritie beyng ioyned withall. Moreouer in the sayd Epistle writing to Maxentius, hee decreeth that no lay men, or any suspected Byshop, ought to accuse Prelates of the Church:

so that if Page 97 they be either laye men, or men of euill conuersation, or proued manyfest enimies, or incensed with anye hatred, their accusations against any Byshops ought not to stande. Wyth other such matters moe, concerning the disposition of iudiciall court. Which matter, if Pope Gregory the seuenth, had written to Henrye the third Emperour, or if Pope Alexander the third, had written to the Emperour Predericus the first: it might haue stand with some reason and opportunity of time.

But nowe for Marcellus to write these decrees in such persecution of the Church, to Maxentius the Heathen and most cruell Emperour: howe vnlyke it is to bee true, and howe it serued then to purpose, the Reader may soone discerne. And yet these be the epistles and constitutions decretal, whereby (vnder the pretended title of the fathers) al churches of late time,* & al ecclesiastical causes haue beene, & yet are in this realme of england to this day gouerned, directed, and disposed.

The like discussion & examination I might also make of the other epistles that followe of Eusebius and Miltiades, which al tende to the same scope, that no Prelate or bishop ought to come to his answeere (or ad litem cōtestatam, as the words of their writing do terme it) before they be orderly & fully restored again to their possessiōs. Who moreouer in y^e said their epistles stil harpe vpon this key of y^e scripture: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram aedificabo ecclesiam meam, Declaring more ouer that this priuiledge of iudging al mē and to be iudge of no man, but onely to be left to y^e iudgement of the Lord: was gyuen to this foresayd holy sea of Rome, from tyme of the Apostles, & chiefly left w^t Peter the holye key keeper: so that although the election of the Apostles was equall, yet this was chiefly graunted to Saint Peter; to haue preheminenes aboue the rest. Concluding in the ende hereby.*Quod semper maiores causae, sicut sunt episcoporum, & potiorum curae negotiorum, ad vnam beati principis Apostolorum Petri sedem confluerent: That is: that alwaies all greater causes, as be the matters of Byshoppes, and such other cares of weighty importaunce, should be brought to the sea of S. Peter, the blessed prince of the Apostles. &c. These be the wordes of Miltiades and Eusebius, whereby it may partly be smelled of him that hath any nose, what was the meaning of thē which forged these writings and letters, vpon these auntient holy martirs.

This I cannot but maruell at, in the thirde Epistle of Eusebius the bishop of Rome, that where as Marcellius his late predecessor before,* in his owne time and remembrance did fall so horribly, and was condemned for the same iustly to be expulsed the Citie by the counsell of 300. Byshops: yet notwithstanding the foresaid Eusebius in his third epistle alledging y^e place of Tu es Petrus, bringeth in for a profe of the same and saith: Quia in sede Apostolica extra maculam semper est Catholica seruata religio. &c. That is, for in the Apostolicall sea, alwaies the Catholike Religion hath bene preserued without any spot or blemish.

But howsoever the forgers of these decretal Epistles haue forgottē themselues,* most certeine it is that these holy bishops, vpon whom they were and are ascribed: liued perfect good men, and died blessed martirs. Of whom this Miltiades was the last among all the Bishoppes of Rome here in the west Church of Europe, that euer was in daūger of persecution to be Martired, yet to this present day.

And thus haue ye heard the stories and names of such blessed Saintes, which suffered in the time of persecution, from the xix. yeare of Dioclesian, to the vij. and last yeare of Maxentius with the deathes also & plagues described vpon these tormentors,* and cruel tiraunts, which were the captaines of the same persecutiō. And here commeth in (blessed be Christ) the ende of these persecutions here in these West Churches of Europe, so far as the dominion of blessed Constantinus did chiefly extend.

Yet notwithstanding in Asia al persecution as yet ceased not for the space of foure yeres, as aboue is mentioned by the meanes of wicked Licinius.* Under whome diuers there were holy and constant martirs, that suffered greuous torments: as Hermylus a Deacon, and Stratonicus a keeper of the prison, which both, after their punishments sustained,* were strangled in the flood Ister. Metasth. Also Theodorus y^e Captaine, who being sent for of Licinius, because he would not come, and because he brake his Gods in peeces, and gaue them to the pore, therfore was fastned to the crosse, and after being pearsed with sharpe pricks or bodkins, in the secret parts of his body, was at last beheaded. Adde to this also Milles, who first being a Souldiour, afterward was made bishop of a certaine Citie in Persia, where he seing himselfe could do no good to conuert them, after many tribulations and great afflictions among thē, cursed the Citie and departed. Which citie shortly after by Saporess king of Persia was destroied.

In the same countrey of Persia, about this time suffered vnder Saporess the king (as recordeth Symeon Metasthenes) diuers valiant & constant martirs,* as Acindymus, Pegasius, Anempodistus, Epidephorus, also Symeon Archbishop of Seleucia, with Ctesiphon an other bishop in Persia, with other ministers & religious men of that region, to y^e number of 128. Of this Symeon and Ctesiphon thus writeth Zozomenus lib. 2. That the idolatrous Magitians in Persia, taking counsaile together against y^e Christians, accused Symeon & Ctesiphō, to Saporess y^e king, for y^f they were gratefull & accepted vnto y^e Romane Emperor & bewraied to him, such things as were done in y^e land of Persia. Whereupon Saporess being moued, toke great displeasure against y^e christians, oppressing them with taxes & tributes vnto their vtter impouering, killing also their Priestes with the sword: After that calleth for Symeon the Archbyshop, who there before the king declared himselfe a worthy & a valiant captaine, of Christs church. For when Sapores had cōmaūded him to be led to suffer torments, he neither shronk for any feare, nor shewed any great humble sute of submission for any pardon: wherat the king partly marueiling, partly offended, asked why he did not knele downe, as he was wont before to do. Symeon to this aūswered, for that saith he, before this time I was not brought vnto you in bondes to betray the true God,* as I am now, so long I refused not to accomlishe that which the order & custome of the Realme of me required: but now it is not lawful for me so to do, for now I come to stand in defence of our Religion and true doctrine. When Symeon thus had aunswered, the king persisting in his purpose, offereth vnto him y^e choise, either to worship with him after his maner (promising to him many great gifts, if he would so doe) or if he would not,* threatneth to him and to al the other christians within his land, destruction. But Symeon neither allured with his promises, nor terrified with his threatnings, cōtinued constaunt in his doctrine professed, so that neyther he could be induced to Idolatrous worship, nor yet to betray the truth of his religion. For the which cause he was committed into hands, and there commaūded to be kept to the kings pleasure further knowne.

It befel in the way as he was going to y^e prison, there was sitting at the kings gate a certaine Eunuche,* an olde Tutor or scholemaister of y^e kings, named Vsthazares, who had bene once a christian, and afterward falling from hys profession, fell with the Heathen multitude to their Idolatrie. This Vsthazares sitting at the doore of the kinges pallace, and seing Symeon passing by led to the prison, rose vp and reuerenced the Bishop. Symeon againe with sharpe wordes (as the time would suffer) rebuked him & in great anger cried out against him:* which being once a christian, woulde so cowardly reuolt from his profession, & returne againe to the Heathenish Idolatry. At the hearing of these words the Eunuch forthwith brasting out in teares, laying away his courtly apparell, which was sumptuous & costly & putting vpon him a blacke and mourning weede, sitteth before the court gates weping and bewailing, thus saying with himselfe:* wo is me, wyth what hope, wyth what face, shall I looke hereafter for my God, which haue denied my god: whē as this Symeon my familiar acquaintance, thus passing by me, so much disdaineth me, that he refuseth with one gentle word to salute me?

These things being brought to the •ares of the King (as such tale cariers neuer lacke in Princes courtes) procured against him no litle indignation. wherupon Sapores the king sending for him, first with gentle words & courtly promises began to speake him faire, asking him what cause he had so to mourne, & whether there was any thing in his house, which was denied him, or which he had not at his owne will and asking.* Whereunto Vsthazares aunswering againe saide: That there was nothing in that earthly house, which was to him lacking, or wherūto his desire stod. Yea would god (said he) O king any other grief or calamitie in al the world, whatsoeuer it were, had happened vnto me, rather thē this for y^e which I do most iustly mourne and sorrow. For this sorroweth me that I am this day aliue, who should rather haue died long since, & that I see this sonne, which against my hart and mynde, for your pleasure dissēblyngly I appeared to worship, for which cause doublewise I am worthy of death. First, for y^t I haue denied Christ. Secondly, because I did dissemble with you. And incontinent vpon these wordes, swearing by him that made both heauen & earth, affirmed most certainly, that although he had plaid y^e foole before, he would neuer be so mad againe, as in steede of the creator and maker of all thinges, to worship the creatures which he had made and created. Saporess the king being astonied at the so sodaine alteration of this man, and doubting with hym selfe, whether to be angry with those inchaunters, or with Page 98 him, whether to intreat him wyth gentlenes, or wyth rygour, at length in this moode commaunded the sayde Vsthazares his old auncient seruaunt,* and first Tutor & brynger vp of his youth, to be had away, and to be beheaded: as he was going to the place of execution, he desired of the executioners, a lyttle to staye, whyle he myght sende a message vnto the king, which was this (sent in by certayne of the kings most trusty Eunuches) desiring him that for all the old and faythfull seruyce he had done to his Father,* & to him, he would now requite him w^t thys one office agayne, to cause to bee cryed openlye by a publike cryer in these wordes followyng: that Vsthazares was beheaded not for any trechery or cryme committed against the king or the Realme,* but onelye for that hee was a Christyan, and woulde not at the Kinges pleasure denye hys God. And so accordyng to hys requeste it was performed and graunted. For thys cause dyd Vsthazares so much desire the cause of hys death to be publyshed: because that as his shrynking backe from Christ, was a great occasion to manye Christians to doe the lyke: so nowe the same hearing y^t Vsthazares dyed for no other cause but only for y^e religion of Christ, shoulde learne lykewyse by hys example to bee feruente and constaunt in that which they professe. And thus thys blessed Eunuch dyd consummate hys Martyrdome.* Of the which hys Martyrdome, Symeon hearing being in pryson was very ioyfull, and gaue god thanks. Who in the nexte daye followyng, being brought foorth before the Kyng, and constantly refusyng to condescende to the Kynges request,* to worship visible creatures, was lykewyse by the commaundement of the Kyng beheaded, wyth a great number mo, whiche the same daye also did suffer, to the number as is sayd of an hundreth and more. All whiche were put to death before Symeon,* he standing by, and exhortyng them, wyth comfortable wordes: admonishing them to stande fyrme and stedfast in the Lord, Preachyng and teachyng them concernyng death, resurrection, and true pietye, and prooued by the Scriptures y^t to be true which he had sayde. Declaryng moreouer that to be true lyfe in deede, so to dye: and that to be death in deede, to deny or to betray God for feare of punishment. And added further, that there was no man alyue, but needes once must dye. For so much as to all men is appoynted necessarelye, here to haue an ende. But those thyngs which after this lyfe followe hereafter, to bee eternall, which neyther shall come to all men after one sorte. But as the condition and trade of lyfe in dyuers men doth dyffer, and is not in all men like: so the tyme shall come, when all men in a moment shall render and receaue accordyng to theyr dooynges in thys present lyfe immortall rewardes: such as haue here done well, of lyfe and glory, such as haue done contrary, of perpetual punishment: As touching therefore our well doying, here is no doubte but of all other our holy actions and vertuous deedes, there is no hyer or greater deede, then if a man here loose his lyfe, for hys Lord God. Wyth these wordes of comfortable exhortation, the holye Martyrs beyng prepared, willyngly yeelded vp their liues to death. After whom at last followed Symeon, with two other Priestes or Mynisters of his Church,* Abedecalaas, and Ananias, which also wyth him were pertakers of the same Martyrdome. At the sufferyng of those aboue mentioned, it happened that Pusices one of the Kynges offycers, and ouerseer of hys Artificers,* was there present: who seeyng Ananias beyng an aged olde Father, somewhat to shake and tremble at the syght of them that suffered: O Father (sayde he) a lyttle moment shut thyne eies, and be strong, and shortly thou shalt see the sight of God. Upon these words thus spoken, Pusices immediately was apprehended & brought to the King.* Who there confessing himselfe constantly to be a Chrystian, and for that he was very bould and hardy before the king in the cause of Christs faith, was extremely and most cruelly handled in the execution of his Martyrdome.* For in the vpper part of hys necke they made a hole to thrust in theyr hande, and pluckt out hys tongue out of hys mouth, and so he was put to death. At y^e which time also the daughter of Pusices, a godly virgine, by the malicious accusation of the wicked, was apprehended & put to death.

The next yere followyng, vpon the same day, when the Christians did celebrate the remembraunce of y^e Lords passion,* which wee call good Frydaye before Easter (as wytnesseth the sayde Zozomenus.) Sapores the king directed out a cruell and sharpe Edict throughout al his land, condemning to death all them, whosoever confessed themselues to be Christians.* By reason whereof an innumble multitude of Christians, through the wicked procuring of the malignant Magitians suffered the same tyme by the sworde, both in Citie and in Towne: some beyng sought for, some offeryng themselues willyngly, least they shoulde seeme by their sylence to deny Christ. Thus al the Christians that could be founde, without pitie were slaine and diuers also of the kinges owne court and housholde. Amonge whome was also Azades an Eunuche,* and whome the Kyng did entirely loue and fauour. Which Asades after that the King vnderstoode to be put to death, beyng greatly mooued with the sorrow thereof commaunded after that,* no Christians to bee slayne, but them onely which were the Doctours and teachers of Chrystian Religion.

In the same tyme it happened that the Queene fell into a certaine disease:* vpon the occasion whereof the cruell Iewes with the wicked Magicians, falsely and maliciously accused Trabula, the sister of Symeon, the Martyr, a godly Uirgine, with an other sister also of hers: that they had wrought pryue charmes to hurt the Queene, for the reuenging of the death of Symeon. This accusation beyng receaued and beleued: innocent Trabula, with the other were condemned, and with a sawe cut in sunder by the middle. Whose quarters were then hanged vpon stakes: the Queene goyng betweene them, thinking thereby to be deliuered of her sickenes. This Trabula, was a mayde of a ryght comelye beauty, and verye amiable, to whome one of the Magicians cast great loue, much desiring and labouryng by gyftes and rewardes sent into the pryson to wyne her to hys pleasure: promising that if she woulde applye to hys request shee shoulde bee deliuered and set at lybertye.* But she vtterly refusing to consente vnto hym, or rather rebukyng him for his incontinent attempt dyd chuse rather to dye, then to betray eyther the Religion of her minde or the virginie of her body. Zozom.

Now forsomuch as the king had cōmaunded that no Christians should be put to death,* but onely such as were the teachers and leaders of the flocke: the Magicians and Archmagitians, left no diligence vntried, to set forward the matter. Whereby great affliction and persecutions was among the Byshops and teachers of the Church, which in all places, went to slaughtre, especially in the country of Diabenor, for that part of Persia aboue al other was most Christian.* Where Acepsimas y^e Byshop with a great number of his flocke and clergy, were apprehended and taken: vpon the apprehension of whō the Magicians to satisfie y^e kings commaundement, dismissed al the rest, onely depriuing them of their liuing and goods. Onely Acepsimas the bishop they retayned, with whom one Iacobus a Minister or priest of his church was also ioined: not of any compulsion, but onely as himselfe so desired and obtained of those Magicians, y^t he might folow him, & be coupled in y^e same bonds to serue the aged byshop, and to relieue (so much as he might) his calamities, and heale his woundes. For he had bene sore scourged before of the Magians,* after they had apprehended him, and brought him to worshippe the sunne, which thing because he would not do, they cast him into prison againe, where this Iacobus was waiting vpō him. At the same time likewise Athalis a Priest or Minister, also Azadanes and Abdiesus Deacons were imprysoned, and miserably scourged for the testimony of the Lorde Iesus. After this the Archimagus espying his time, complaineth to the king of them, hauing authoritie and commission giuen him (vnles they would worship the sunne) to punish them as he pleased. This commaundement receyued of the king, the master Magus doth declare to thē in prison. But they aunswered againe plainly, that they would neuer be either betrayers of Christ, or worshippers of the sunne. wherupon without mercy they were put to bitter torments. Where Aceptsimas strongly persisting in the confession of christ, endureth to death. The other being no lesse rent & wounded with scourges, yet cōtinued meruailously aliue. And because they woulde in no case turne from their constant sentence, were turned againe into prison. Of whome Athalas in the time of his whipping was so drawne & rackt with pulling, that both his armes being loosed out of the ioynts, hanged downe from his body: which he so caried about without vse of any hande to feede himselfe,* but as he was fed of other.

Miserable and almost innumerable were the slaughters vnder the raigne of this Saporess, of Bishops, Ministers, Deacons, religious men holy virgins, and other ecclesiasticall persons such as did then cleaue to the doctrine of Christ and suffered for the same. The names of the bishops besides the other multitude taken in that persecution, is recited in Sozom. lib. 2. and in Niceph. lib. 8 cap. 37. in this order following, Barbasymes, Paulus, Gaddiabes, Sabinus, Mareas, Mocius, Iohannes, Hormisdas, Papas, Iacobus, Romas, Maares, Agas, Bochres, Abdas, Abiesus, Ioannes, Abramius, Agdelas, Sabores, Isaac, Dausas Bicor. also with Maureanda his fellow bishop, and the rest of his Churches vnder hym, Page 99 to the number of 250. persons, which were the same time apprehended of the Persians.* &c. Briefly to cōprehend the whole multitude of them that suffered in that persecution, the maner of their apprehension, the cruelnes of their tormēts, how and where they suffered, & in what places it is not possible for any history to discharg. Neither are y^e Per'sians them selues (as Zozomenus recordeth) able to recyte them. In summe, the multitude and number of thē whom they are able to recite by name, commeth to the summe of xvj. thousand men and women.

The rumor and noyse of this so miserable affliction of the Christians in the kingdome of Persia, comming to the eares of Constantinus the Emperour, put him in great heauines, studing and reuoluing with himselfe, howe to helpe the matter, which in deede was very hard for him to do. It so befell the same time, that certaine Embassadors were then at Rome from Saporess king of Persia, to whom Constantinus did easely graunt, and consent, satisfying all their requestes, and demaundes, thinking thereby to obtaine the more friendship at the kings handes, that at hys request, he would be good to the Christians to whome he writeth his Epistle in their behalfe, and sendeth the same by his messengers beginning thus:

Diuinam fidem seruans veritatis lucem sortior. Veritatis luce ductus diuinam fidem cognosco. Per ea igitur, quibus illa res agēdas confirmat, sanctissimam religionem cognitam redd•, & hunc m• cultum doctorem cognitionis sancti dei habere confiteor. &c. Eusebius. de vita. Constantinus. lib. 4. The contentes whereof, briefly do tende to this effect. Declaring vnto him how he should stand much beholden to him, if at his request he would shew some quiet and rest to the Christians. In whose religion there was nothing which he could iustly blame. For so much as in their sacrifices they vse to kil nothing, nor to shed no bloud, but only to offer vp vnbloudy sacrifices, to make their praiers vnto God, who delighteth not in bloud shedding, but onely in the soule that loueth vertue, and followeth such doctrine and knowledge, which is agreeing to true pietie. And therefore such men as doe leade him and learne so to beleue, and to worship God, are more to bee commended. Moreouer he assureth him to finde God more mercifull to him, if hee woulde embrace the godlye pietye and truth of the Christians. And for example thereof, bringeth in the stories of Galienus and Valerianus,* who so long as they were fauorers of the Christiāns did prosper and flourish. But as soone as they moued any persecution agaynst them, it happened to them, as it did to all other Emperors before them, that all went backward with them, as especially might appere by Valerianus, who after he had raged so cruelly against the Christians, was eftsoones ouercome of the Persians, the reuenging hand of God falling vpon him, where hee led euer after a miserable life, in wretched captiuitie. Farther also for the more euidēce of the same, inferreth the examples of those Emperors and tyrants in his time, whom he vanquished & subdued only by his faith in Christ, for the which faith, God was hys helper, and gaue him the victory in many battailes, and triumph ouer great tyrants, whereby he hath also enlarged the dominiō of the Romane monarchie from the west Ocean, to the vttermost parts wel neere of al the East. To the doing and working wherof, he neither called to him the helpe of any charmer, or diuination of southsayer, nor vsed the killing of any sacrifice: but onely the following of the crosse, and prayer made to almightie God, without any other bloudy sacrifice, was the armour wherewith hee ouercame, &c. And in the end of the Epistle addeth these words What ioy (saith he) what gladnes would it be to my hart, to heare the state also of the Persians to flourish, as I wish it to do, by embracing this sort of men, the Christians I meane? so that both you with them, and they with you in long prosperite may enioy much felicity together as your harts would desire, & in so doing no doubt ye shall. For so shall you haue God, which is the author and creator of all this vniuersall worlde, to be mercifull and gracious to you. These men therefore I commend vnto you vpon your kingly honour, And vpon your clemency and piety, wherewith you are indued, I commit them vnto you, desiring you to embrace & receaue them according to your humanitie and benignity, agreing and conuenient to your estate: who in so doing shal now both procure to your selfe grace through your faith, and also shall declare to me a great pleasure and benefit worthy of thanks.

This Epistle wrot Constantinus to king Saporess Such care had this godly Prince for them that beleued in Christ not onely in his owne Monarchie,* but also in all places of the world: neither is it to be doubted but this intercessiō of the Emperour did something mitigate the heate of the Persians persecution. Although thereof we reade no certaine thing in our histories.

Of other troubles and persecutions we read of, which happened afterward in the said country of Persia, vnder Isdigerdes the king, but these followed long after about the time of the Emperour Theodosius. At which time suffered Andas their bishop, and Hormisda a great noble mans sōne, and of great reputation among the Persians:* whom whē the king vnderstod to be a Christian, and to deny to turne from his religion, condemned him to kepe his Elephants naked. In processe of time the king looking out, and seeing him all swarted and tanned in the sunne, commanded him to haue a shirt put on, & to be brought before him. Whome then the king asked, if he woulde denye Christ. Hormisda hearing this, tare of his shirt from his body, and cast it frō him saying: If yee thinke that I will denye my faith to Christ for a shirt, haue heere your gift againce &c. And so was vpon that expelled the country. Theodor. lib. 5.

An other there was that same time, named Suenes, which had vnder him an hundreth seruaunts. The king takyng displeasure with him, for that he would not alter from hys religion and godly truth, asked who was the worst of all his seruaunts. And him the king made ruler of all y^e rest, and coupling him with his maisters wife,* brought also Suenes vnder his subiection, thinking therby to subdue also the faith of Suenes, but it was builded vpon a sure foundation.

Of Beniamin the Deacon thus writeth the saide Theoret,* in his fift booke, that after two yeares of his imprisonment, at the request of the Romaine Legate hee was deliuered, who afterward contrary to the kings commaundement hee preached and taught the Gospell of Christ, was most miserable excarnificate, hauing xx. sharpe prickes of reeds thrust vnder his nayles, but when he did laugh at y^t, then in his priuye yarde had a sharpe reede thrust in with horrible paine. After that a certaine long stalk ragged and thorny being thrust into his body by the nether part, was forced into him with the horriblenes of the paine,* whereof the valiant and inuincible souldiour of the Lord gaue ouer his life. Theodor. ibid. And thus much concerning the martirs and persecutions among the Persians, although these persecutions belong not of this time, which came (as it is sayd) long after the daies of Constantinus, about the yeare of our Lorde. 425.

Likewise vnder Iulianus the wicked Apostata, certaine there were which constanly suffered Martyrdome by the Heathen Idolaters,* as Emilyanus, who was burned in Thracia, and Domitius, which was slayne in hys caue. Theodorus also for singing of a Psalme at the remoouing of the body of Babylas (wherof mention is made of before pag 60.) being apprehended, was so examined with exquisite torments, and so cruelly excruciate from morning almost to noone,* that hardly he scaped with life. Who being asked afterward of his friendes, howe he coulde abide so sharpe torments, said that at the first beginning he felt some paine but afterward there stode by him a yong man, who as he was sweating, wiped of his sweate, and refreshed him w^t cold water, oft times: wherewith he was so delited, that when he was let downe from the engine, it greeued hym, more then before. Ruff. lib. 5. cap 36. Theodor. lib. 3. cap. 11. Zozom. lib. 5. cap. 10.

Artemius also the captaine of the Egiptian soldiours the same time lost his head for his religiō indede: although other causes were pretended against him. Theo. Niceph. lib. 10. cap. 11.

Adde to these moreouer, Eusebius and Nestabus twoo brethren, with Nestor also, which for their christianitie were dragged through the streetes, and murdered of the idolatrous people of Gaza. Sozo. Lib. eod. cap. 11.

But especially the crueltie of the Arethusians, a people of Syria, exceeded against the Christian virgines, whome they set out naked before the multitude to be scorned, after that being shauen, they couered them with swil and draffe woont to be giuen to their hogs, & so caused theyr bowels and flesh to be deuoured of the hungry swine. This rage & furye of the wicked Arethusians, Zozomenus supposeth to come of this, because that Constantinus before had broken them from their country maner, of setting forth and exposing their virgins, filthely to whom soeuer lusted, and destroyed the temple of Venus in Heliopolis, restrayning the people there from their filthines and vile whoredome. Sozom. Lib. 5 cap. 10.

Of the lamentable story or rather Tragedy of Marcus Arethusius, their Byshop, thus writeth the said Sozomenus, and also Theodoretus in his third booke, in these words as followe.

This Tragedye (saith hee) of Marcus Arethusius,* doth require the eloquence and worthines of Aeschilus, and Sophocles, which may, as the matter deserueth, set forth, and beautify his great afflictions. This man at the commaundement of Constantinus, pulled downe a certayn temple dedicated to Idols, and in the stead thereof built vp a church where the Christians might congregate. The Arthusians remembring the little good wil that Iulianus bare vnto him Page 100 accused him as a traitour and enimie to him. At the first, according as the scripture teacheth he prepared him selfe to flee. But when he perceiued that there were certaine of his kinsmen or frynds apprehēded in his steed,* returning agayne of his owne accord he offred himselfe to those that thirsted for his bloude. whome when they had gotten as men neither pytiyng his old age & worne yeares, nor abashed at his vertuous conuersation, being a man so adourned both with doctrine & maners, first strypt him naked, & pittifully beate him, then within a while after, they cast him into a foule filthy sinke, & from thence being brought, they caused boyes to thrust him in with sharpned stickes, made for the nonce to prouoke his paine the more.* Lastly, they put him into a basket, and being annointed with hony, & broth, they hung him abroad in the heate of the sunne as meate for waspes and flies to feede vpon. And all this extremity they shewed vnto him, for that they woulde enforce him to do one of these things (y^t is either to build vp-againē y^e temple, which he had destroied, or else to giue so much money as should pay for the building of y^e same:) but euen as hee purposed with him selfe to suffer & abide theyr greuous torments, so refused he to doe that they demaunded of him. At the length they taking him to be but a poore man, and not able to pay such a summe of mony, promised to forgiue him the one halfe, so that he would be contented to pay the other halfe. But he hanging in the basket woūded pitifully with the sharpned sticks of boies & children, and all to be bitten with waspes & flies, did not only conceale his paine & griefe, but also derided those wicked ones and called them, base, low, and terrene people, and he himselfe to be exalted and set on high. At length they demaunding of him but a small some of money, he answered thus, it is a great wickednes to confer one halfe penyē in case of impietie, as if a man should bestow the whole. Thus they beyng not able to preuaile against him, let hym downe. And leauyng him went their waye, so that euery man might learne at his mouth the example of true pietie and faithfulness.

Although the tractation of these foresayd stories & persecutions of Persia, aboue premised, do stray somewhat out of the order & course of time and place, as which came neither in the time of Constantine, nor be pertinent to the monarchy of Rome: yet because in this present history we are in hand with the holy martirs and Saintes of Christ, for as much as these also gaue such a faithfull testimony of the Lord Iesus with their bloud, I thought therefore not to passe them ouer with some testimony in this our Catalogue of holy Martirs. And here an end of these persecutions of the primitiue church.

It may peraduenture be marueiled of some, reading the history of these so terrible persecutions aboue specified, why God the almighty director of al things, would suffer his owne people and faithfull seruants, beleeuing in his owne and onely begotien sonne Iesus, so cruelye to bee handled, so wrongfully to be vexed, so extreemly to be tormented and put to death, & that the space of so many yeres together, as in these foresaid persecutiōs may appeare. To the which admiration I haue nothing to aunswere, but to say with the words of Hierome:) Non debemus super hac rerum iniquitate, perturbare videntes, &c. We ought not to be mooued with this iniquitie of things, to see the wicked to preuaile against the godly: for so much as in the beginning of the worlde we see Abell the iuste to bee killed of wicked Cain. And afterward

Jacob being thrust out, Esau to reigne in his fathers house. In like case the Egyptians with bricke and tyle, afflicted the sonnes of Israel. Yea and the Lorde himselfe, was hee not crucified of the Iewes, Barrabas the thief being let go? Time would not suffise me, to recite, & reckon vp how the godly in this world go to wracke, the wicked flourishing and preuailing. Hiero. Briefly, howsoever the cause hereof proceedeth, whetherfor our sins here in this life, or how else, soeuer, yet this is to vs, & may be to all men a sufficient stay,* that we are sure these afflictions and persecutions of God his people in this worlde, not to come by any chaunce, or blinde fortune, but by the prouydent appointment, and forewarning of God. For so in the old law by the affliction of the children of Israell,* he hath prefigured these persecutions of his Christians. So by the words of Christes owne mouth in the Gospell, he did forwarne his church of these troubles to come. Again neither did he suffer these so great afflictions to fall vpon hys seruants, before that he had premonished them sufficientlye by speciall Reuelation in the Apocalips of Iohn his seruaūt,* in the which Apocalips he declared vnto his church before, not onely what troubles were comming at hande toward them, where, and by whome, they shoulde come, but also in playne number, if the wordes of the prophecye be well vnderstoode assygneth the true tyme,* howe longe the sayde persecutions shoulde continue, and when they shoulde cease. For as there is no doubt, but by the beast with seauen heades, bearing the whoore of Babylon, dronken wyth the bloude of Saintes, is signified the Citie of Rome: So in my iudgement, the power of making fortie two moneths (in the thirteene of the Apocalips) is to bee expounded,* taking euery Moneth for a Sabboth of yeares, that is, reckonyng for seauen yeares a moneth: so that forty and two such Sabbots of yeares, being gathered together make vppe the yeres iust,* betweene the time of Christes death, to the last yeare of the persecution of Maxentius, when Constantinus fyghting vnder the banner of Christ, ouercame him, and made an ende of all persecution, wythin the Monarchie of Rome. The number of which yeares,* by playne computation come to 294. to the which 294. yeares, if yee adde the other sixe yeares, vnder the persecution of Licinius in Asia, then it fylleth vp full the three hundreth yeares. And so long continued the persecution of Christes people, vnder the heathen tirants and Emperours of the Monarchie of Rome, accordyng to the number of the fortye two monethes which the beast had power to make, specified in the thirteenth of the Apocalips. For the better explication wherof, because the matter, being of no small importance greatly apperteineth to the publike vtilitie of the Church, & least any shoulde misdoubt me herein to follow any priuate interpretation of mine own, I thought good to cōmunicate to the Reader, that, as hath bene imparted to me, in opening these mis•ycall numbers in the foresayd booke of Reuelation conteyned, by occasion as followeth.

As I was in hand with these histories, and therin cōsidered the exceeding rage of these persecutions, the intolerable tormentes of the blessed Sainctes, so cruelly rackt, rent, torne, and pluckt in peeces, with all kinde of tortures paynes and punishmentes that could be deuised, more bitter then any death it selfe, I coulde not without great sorrow & passiō of minde, behold their sorrowfull afflictions, or write of their bloody passiōs. Wherin much like it happened to me, as did to T. Liuius, who writing of the warres of Carthage, was so moued in the writing thereof: Ac si in parte aliqua laboris ac periculi ipse pariter fuisset. Further I proceeded in the story, & the hoater the persecutions grew, the more my grieve with them, & for thē encreased, not onely pityng their wofull case, but also almost reasoning with God, thus thinking like a foole with my selfe, why God of hys goodnesse would suffer hys children and seruants, so vehemently to be cruciated and afflicted. If mortal things were gouerned by heauenly prouidence (as must needs be graūted) why did y^e wicked so rage & flourish, & the godly so to go to wrack? If sinnes deserued punishmēt, yet neyther were they sinners alone, & why was their death aboue all other so sharpe and bitter? At least why woulde the Lord suffer the vehemency of these so horrible persecutiōs to endure so long tyme agaynst hys poore Church, shewing to thē no certayne determined end of their tribulatiōs, wherby they knowing the appoynted determinatiō of almighty God, with more consolatiō might endure out the same. As the Israelites in the captiuitie of Babilon had 70. yeares limitted vnto them. And vnder Pharaο they were promised a deliuerance out. Also vnder the Syrian tyrautes. 62. Weekes were abridged vnto them. Onely in these persecutions, I could finde no end determined, nor limitation set for their deliuerance. Wherevpō much marueiling w^t my selfe, I searched the booke of Reuelatiō, to see whether any thing there might be found. Where although I well perceaued, the beast there described to signifie the Empire of Rome, which had power to ouercome the Saintes: yet cōcerning the tyme & continuance of these persecutions vnder the beast, I found nothing to satisfie my doubt. For albeit I read there of. 42. monethes, of a tyme, tymes and halfe a tyme, of 1260. dayes, yet all this by computation cōming but to 3. yeares & a halfe, came nothing neare the lōg continuance of these persecutiōs, which lasted. 300. yeares. Thus being vexed and turmoyled in spirite, about the reckening, of these numbers and yeares, it so happened vpon a Sondag in the morning lying in my bed, & musing about these nūbers, sodēly it was answered to my minde, as with a maiestie, thus inwardly saying within me: thou foole count these monethes by Sabbots, as the Weekes of Daniell are counted by Sabbots. The Lorde I take to witnes thus it was. Wherupon thus being admonished, I began to reckon the 42. monethes by Sabbats, first of monethes, that would not serue, thē by Sabbots of yeres wherein I began to feele some probable vnderstāding. Yet not satisfied herewith, to haue the matter more sure, eftsoones repaired to certaine Merchaūts, of myne acquaintance. Page 101 Of whom one is departed a true faythfull seruauent of the Lord, the other two be yet aliue, and witnes hereof. To whom the number of these foresayd 42. monethes, being propounded and examined by Sabbots of yeares, the whole summe was found to surmount to 294. yeres, conteining the full and iust tyme of these foresayd persecutions neither more nor lesse.

Now this one claspe beyng opened, the other numbers that follow, are plaine and manifest to the intelligent reader to be vnderstood. For where mention is made of three yeares and a half: of one tyme, two times, & halfe a tyme, also of 1260. dayes, all these come to one reckoning, & signifie 42. monethes, by which monethes, as is sayd, is signified the whole tyme of these primitiue persecutiōs, as here in order may appeare.

The mysticall numbers in the Apocalyps opened.

First, where mention is made, Apocal. chap. 11. that the two Prophetes shall prophesie 1260. dayes. And also that the woman fleing into the desert shall there be fed. 1260. dayes: who knoweth not, that. 1260. dayes make three yeares & a halfe: that is, monethes

142

Secondly, where we read, chap. 11. the bodyes of the two foresaid Prophets shal lye in the streetes of the great citie vnburied, the space of iij. days & a half, and after the said iij. dayes & a half they shall reuiue againe, &c. let the houres of these iij. dayes and a half (which be 42.) bee reckoned euery day for a Sabboth of yeares, or els euery day for a moneth, and they come to moneths

242

Thirdly, where as in the same booke is expressed that the woman had ij. wings geuen her to flye vnto the desert for a tyme, tymes, and halfe a tyme, geue for one time, one yere, or one day: for ij. times ij. yeares, or ij. dayes: for halfe a tyme, halfe a yere, or half a day. And so it is manifest, that those three yeares & a halfe, mounteth to monthes

342

Fourthly, account these 42. moneths aforesaid (which the beast had power to make. Apoc. 11.) by Sabbots of yeares, that is, vij yeares for a moneth: or euery moneth for seuen yeares, & it amounteth to the summe of yeares

And so haue ye the iust yeares, dayes, times, & months of these foresaid persecutions vnder the beast, neither shorter nor longer, reckoning from the death of Iohn Baptist vnder Herode the Romain king to the ende of Maxentius, and of Licinius, ij. last great persecutors, the one in the West the other in the East, who were both vanquished by godly Constantinus. And so peace was geuen to the Church, albeit not in such ample wise, but that diuers tumultes and troubles afterward ensued, but they lasted not long: & the chief brunt, to speake of these Romain persecutions, which the holy ghost especially considered aboue all other, in this his Reuelatiō thus ended, in the time of this Constantinus. Then was the great Dragon the deuill, to witte, the fierce rage & power of his malicious persecuting, tied short for a thousand yeres after this, so that he could not preuaile in any such sort, but that the power and glory of the gospel by little and litle encreasing and spreading with great ioy and libertie, so preuailed that at length it got the vpperhand, & replenished the whole earth,* rightly verifiyng therein, the water of Ezechiel, which issuing out of the right side of the aulter, the farther it ran, the deeper it grew, till at length it replenished the whole Ocean Sea, & healed all the fishes therin. No otherwise the course of the Gospell proceeding of small & hard beginnings kept still his streame, the more it was stopped, the swifter it ranne: by bloud it seeded, by death it quickned: by cutting it multiplied, through violence it sprong, till at last out of thraldome and oppressiō it brast forth into perfect libertie, & florished in al prosperitie, had it so bene, that the christians wisely & moderatly could haue vsed this rest & libertie, & not abused the same, forgetting their former estate to their own pride, pomp & worldly ease, as it came afterward to passe, wherof more is to be seene & said (the Lord willing) in place & time conuenient.

And thus much touching the propheticall numbers in the Apocalips. Wherein is to be noted and magnified the eternall wisdom, and hie prouidence of almighty God, so disposing and gouerning his church, that no aduersitie or perturbation hapneth at any time vnto it, which his prouident wisdom doth not foresee before & preordaine, neither doth he preordaine or determine any thing, which he doth not most truly perform, both foreseeing the beginning of such persecutions, and limiting the end therof how long to continue and when to cease.* In much like sort we reade in the bookes of Genesis, how the stocke of Israell, was. 400. yeares in the lande of Egipte. During the space of which 400. yeares, after the death of Ioseph, (who beareth a playne figure of Christ) they were hardly intreated and cruelly afflicted of the Egiptians, about the space of. 300. yeares, reckning from after the death of Ioseph, to their deliuerance out of the bōdage of Egipt, semblably as these Christians, after Christes time suffered the like bondage vnder the Romane tyrauntes.

Thus much by the way I thought to insinuate, least any should ••se, or take any offēce in himself, to see or read of the Church, so long & so many yeares to be vnder so miserable & extreme afflictions.* Wherin neither chaunce nor fortune, nor dispositiō of man, hath had any place: but onely the forecounsaille & determination of the Lord so gouerned and desposed the same. Who not only did suffer thē to fall, and foresee those persecutions before they fell: but also appointed the times and yeares how long they should last & when to haue an ende. As by the foresaide. 42. monethes in the 13. and 11. chap. of S. Iohns Apocalips haue beene declared. Which monethes conteyning. 294. yeares, if they be rightly gathered, make the full time betweene the first yeare of the persecution of Christ vnder the Iewes & Herode, till the last yeare of persecution vnder Licinius, which was from the natiuitie of Christ, an. 324. from the fyrst persecution of Christ, an. 294. as is aforesaide. After the which yeare, according to the preordinate counsel of God, when his seueritie had bene sufficiently declared vpon his own house, it pleased him to shew mercy againe, & to bind vp Sathan the old serpent, according to the xx. chap. of the Reuelation for the space of a thousand yeares, that is, frō this time of Licinius, to the time of Iohn Wickleffe, and Iohn Husse. During all which time, albeit certaine conflicts and tumults haue bene among Christian byshops themselves in the church, yet no vniuersal murdering persecutiō was stirring, before the preaching of Iohn Wickleffe, of Husse, and such other, as in the further processe of this history (Christ willing and aiding vs) shall more appeare hereafter.

Thus hauing at large discoursed these horrible persecutions past, and heauy afflictions of Christian Martyrs, now by the grace of God, cōming out of this redde sea of bloody persecution, leauing Pharaο and his host behynde: let vs sing gloriously to the worthy name of our god, who through the blood of the lambe, after long & tedious afflictions at length, hath visited his people with comfort, hath tide vp Sathan shorte, hath sent his meeke Moses (gentle Constantine I meane) by whom it hath so pleased the Lord to worke deliuerance to his captiue people, to see his seruants at liberty, to turne their morning into ioy, to magnifie the church of his sonne, to destroy the Idoles of al the world, to graunt life and liberty (and would God also not so much riches) vnto them which before were the abiectes of all the world: and all by the meanes of godly Constantinus, the meeke and most christian Emperour of whose diuine victories against so many tyraunts and Emperours persecutors of Christes people, and lastly against Licinius, an. 324. of whose other noble actes & prowesses of whose blessed vertues and his happy birth and progeny, part we haue comprehended before, part now remaineth (Christ willing) to be declared.

This Constantine was the sonne of Constantius the Emperour,* a good and vertuous childe, of a good and vertuous father, borne in Britaine, as saith Eutropius whose Moother was named Helena, daughter, in deede of King Coilus, although Ambrosius in his funerall Oration of the death of Theodosius, sayth was an Inhouders daughter. He was a most bountifull and gracious Prince, hauyng a desire to nourishe learning and good artes,* and did oftentimes vse to read, write, and study himselfe. He had marueilous good successe & prosperous atchieuing of al things he tooke in hand, which then was (and truely) supposed to proceede of this, for that he was so great a fauourer of the Christian fayth.* Which faith when he had once embraced, he did euer after most deuoutly and religiously reuerence: and commaunded by especiall commission and proclamations, that euery man shoulde professe the same Religion throughout al y^e Romaine Monarchy.* The worshipping of Idoles, whereunto he was addict, by the allurement of Fausta his wife: in so much that he did sacrifice vnto them: after the discomfite of Maxentius in battaile, he vtterly abiured. But Baptisme he deferred euen vnto his olde age, because hee had determined a iourneye into Persia, and thought in Iordan to haue beene baptised.*Eusebius. lib. 4. de vita Constantini.

As touching his naturall disposition and wit, he was Page 102 very eloquent, a good philosopher, & in disputation sharp and ingenious.* He was accustomed to say, that an Emperour ought to refuse no labor, for the vtilitie of the common weale: yea, & that to aduenture the mangling of hys body for the remedy thereof, but if otherwaies it maye bee holpen to cherish the same. This Aurelius, Victor, Pomponius, Letus, & Ignatius write of him. And Aelius Lampridus saith writing vppon the life of Heliogabalus, that Constantinus was woont to saye, that an Empire was giuen by the determinate purpose of God, that he to whom it was giuen should so imploy his diligēce, as he might be thought wor^thy of the same at the hands of the gyuer. Which same saing also Augustine noteth in his 3. booke against Cresconius.*epist. 49. and 50.

He first entred into the Empire, by the mercifulnes of God minding after long waues of dolefull persecution to restore vnto his church peace and tranquillitie, an. 311. as Eusebius accompteth in his Chronicle.* His raigne cōtinued, as Eutropius affirmeth, 30. yeares, Letus saith 32. yeares lacking, 2. monethes. Great peace and tranquillitie enioied the Church vnder the raigne of this good Emperour, which tooke great paine and trauell for the preseruatiō thereof. First, yea and that before he had subdued Licinius, he set forth many edictes for the restitution of the goods of the church,* for the reuoking of the Christians out of exile, for taking away the dissension of the Doctours out of the Church, for the setting of them free from publike charges, and such like, euen as the copies of his constitutions here vnder declare, which Eusebius in his 10. booke, and 5. chapter, repeateth in this wise.

Victor Constantinus Maximus, Augustus, to our louing subiectes inhabiting throughout the east parts, sendeth greting.

The thing it selfe, which in the sure and most firme law of nature is conteyned, doth giue vnto all men (euen as God hath ordeyned the same) sufficient perseuerance and vnderstanding,* both of such things as man ought to foresee, as also what things presently he ought to meditate. Neither is there any thing therein to be doubted, of such as haue their mindes directed to the scope or marke of perfect vnderstanding: so that the perfect comprehending of sound reason, and the perseuerance thereof, be compared with the knowledge of God,* being the true and perfect vertue. Wherefore let no wise man be troubled, although he see diuers men of diuers dispositions. For wisdom which springeth of vertue cannot abide, or acquaint her selfe with fonde ideotes, vnles, that (on the other side) the malice of peruerse lithernes prolong her daies, and cause the same Ideocie to suruiue. Wherefore assuredly the crowne and price of vertue lieth open vnto all men, & the moste mightie God ordereth the iudgement of the same. I vndoubted as manifestly as possible is, will endeuour my selfe to testifie and confesse vnto you al, the hope which is in me. I think verily that the Emperours which before this time haue latelie bene, euen for their tiranny had the Empire taken from them: & my father onely exercising and vsing al meekenes and lenity in his affaires, calling vpon God the father, with great deuotion & humility, hath beene exalted to the same. And all the rest, as men wanting their wits, and in comparison as sauage beastes, rather did giue themselues to like cruelty, then vnto any lenitie & gentlenes towards their subiects: in which tyranny euery one for his time being noosed, * vtterly subuerted the true and vnfallible doctrine. And so great malice was their kindled in their brestes, that when all things were in peaceable tranquillitie, they made and raysed most cruell and bloody intestine or ciuill warres. It is credibly informed vs, that in those daies, Apollo gaue aunsweres but not by any mans mouth, but out of a certaine caue & darke place (saying) that he was much disquieted by those that were the iust men and liuers vpon the earth, so that he could or would not for them, declare a truth of such things as others demaunded: & hereby it came to passe that such false deuinations were geuen from the golden tables in Apollos temple. And this thing did his propheticall priest complayne of, when he tooke vp againe the heare of his head, that other had cōtemptuously cast down, & that the neglecting of his diuination was the cause of so many euils, amongst men. But let vs see what was the ende hereof: we now boldly & without all feare inuocate & worship the omnipotent God▪ when I was a childe I heard, that he which then was chiefe Emperour of Rome, vnhappy, yea, most vnhappy man being seduced, and brought into errour, by his souldiers, curiously inquired who were those iust men vpō the earth that Apollo ment: and one of his priests which was nere about him, made answere that they were the christiās. This answere hereupon vnto him be'lyng as delectable, as hony vnto the mouth, drew the sword giuen vnto him to be a reuenger vpon euill doers and malefactours against the professors of the irreprehensible sanctimony and relygion. * And straight way he gaue forth a commission (to bloody homicides as I may well cal them) & gaue commaundement to all the Iudges, that they should endeuour themselues with all the cunning they had to the deuising of more greuouser, & sharper punishments against the poore Christians. Then, then I say, a man myght haue seene, how greatly the honest professors of that religion, were molested with cruelty, and daily suffered no smal iniuries and contumelies, * and that also they suffered and sustained the same with such tēperancy as though they had had no iniuries done vnto them at all. Which temperancie and patience of theirs was the cause why the furious citizens were the more madder & raging against them. What fires, what tortures, what kinde of torments were there, but they without respecte either of age, or sexe were enforced to feele?

Then did the earth without doubt, * herselfe bewayle her children and the round worlde which containeth all things, beyng sprinkled and imbrued with their blood made dolefull lamentation for them, and the daye it selfe prouoked for to mourne, was made amased for them. But what is this to purpose. Now the very barbarous nations reioyce for their sakes which receaued and harboured them, when they were afraid and fled from vs: keping them as it were in most louing & amiable captiuitie. And they saued not onely their liues, but also were a defence for their religion. And now also the Romaine nation remembreth and hath before there eies this blame and spotte, which the Christians that were of that time, worthely gaue vnto them when they by them were banished (as vnfitte members of their common wealth) amongst the barbarous people. What needeth to make further rehearsall of the mourning lamentation, which the heathen people themselues throughout all the world, made for the pittifull murther and slaughter of them? After this it came to passe that they which were authors of all these mischiefes died also, * and were cōmitted for there reward to the most filthy & horrible dungeon of hel. They being so intangled with intestine and ciuile warres, left aliue neyther name nor kinsmen of their owne: which thing vndoubtedly had not chaūsed vnles the wicked deuinatiōs of Apol^los oracles had deceiued & bewitched thē.* To thee therfore now I pray, oh most mightie God, that thou wilt vouchsafe to be mercifull, and pardon all the east parts and inhabitaunts of the same, being oppressed with present calamitie: and that by mee thy seruauant thou wilt of thy goodnes helpe and relieue the same. And these things rashly craue I not at thy hands: oh Lord, most mighty and holiest God of all.* For I being perswaded by the onely oracles haue both begone and also finished wholesome and profitable things, and further by the bearing and shewing of thine ensigne, haue ouercome a mighty and strong host, and when any necessitie of the common weale (to my charge committed) requireth thereunto, (following those signes & tokens of thy vertues) I bouldly go forth and fight against mine enimies: and for this cause haue I sacrificed my soule vnto thee, purified and clensed both with thy loue and feare. Yea truely, thy name doe I sincerely loue,* and thy power doe I reuerence, which by many tokens and wonders hast shewed and confirmed thereby my beleefe & faith. Therefore will I doe my endeuour, and bende my selfe thereunto, that I may redifie thy most holy house, which those wicked & vn^godly Emperours haue with so great ruine laid wast, thy people do I desire to bring & stablish, in firme peace & trāquilitie, & that for the publike vtilitie of all the inhabitants of the earth. Those which yet erre & are out of the way, enioy the benefite of peace and quietnes, with, and amongst the number of the faithful sort: for I trust the restitution of the like societie, and participation may be a meanes to bring them also that erre into the perfecte way of verity. Let no man therfore be greeuous one vnto another but what euery man thinketh best that let him doe.* For such as are wi^e ought throughly to be perswaded, that the onely meane to liue holily and as they should doe, whome the spirite of God moueth,* to take their delight and recreation in reading his holye will. And if others wilfully will go out of the way, cleauing to the Synagogues of false doctrine, they maye at their owne perill: as for vs we haue the most worthy house or congregation of Gods veritie, which he according to his owne goodnes & nature hath giuen vs. And this also we wish vnto the, that with like participation & common consente,* they may fele wyth vs the same delectation of mind. For this our religiō is neither new nor newly inuented, but is as old as wee beleue the creation of the worlde to be: and which God hath commaunded to be celebrated with such worship as both seemed and pleased him. But all liuing men are lye^s,* and are deceiued with diuers and sundrye illusions. Thou O God for Christ thy sonnes sake, suffer not this wickednes againe to take roote: thou hast set vp a cleare burning light, that thereby as manye as thou hast chosen maye come vnto thee. These thy myracles approoue the same. It is thy power that kepeth vs in innocencye and fydelitye. The Sunne and the Moone runne their appointed course: neyther yet in ranging wi^e, wander the starres to what place of the worlde they list themselues. Page 103 The dayes, yeares, monethes, and times, keepe their appoynted turnes The earth abideth firme and vnremoueable at thy worde, and the winde at the time (by thee directed) stormeth & bloweth. The streaming waterie floudes, ebbe in time according as they flow. The raging sea abideth within her bounded limites And for that the Ocean Sea stretcheth out her selfe in equall length and breadth with the whole earth: this must needes be wrought with some marueilous workmanship of thine owne hand: which thing vnlesse it were at thy will made and disposed,* without all doubt, so great difference and partition betweene, woulde or this time haue brought vtter ruine & destructiō, both to the life of man, as to all that belōgeth to man beside. Which for that they haue such great and huge conflictes amongst themselues, as also the inuisible spirites haue: we geue thee thanks, O Lorde most mighty God of all Gods, that al mankinde hath not bene destroyed thereby. Surely,* euen as greatly as thy benignitie and gentlenes, is manifested by diuers & sundry benefites bestowed vpon vs: so much also is the same set foorth and declared in the discipline of thy eternall word, to those that be heauenly wise, & apply themselues to the attainment of sincere & true vertue. But if any such there be, that litle regard or haue but small respect vnto the consideration thereof▪ let them not blame or lay a fault in others that do the same.* For that Phisicke whereby health is obtained, is manifestly offered vnto all men: now therefore let no man go about to subuert that, which experience it selfe doth shew (of necessitie) to be pure and good. Let vs therefore altogether vse the participation of this benefite bestowed vpon vs, that is to say, the benefite of peace and tranquillitie, setting a part all controuersie. And let no man hurt or be preiudiciall to his fellowe for that thing, wherein he thinketh him selfe to haue done wel. If by that, which any man knoweth and hath experience of, hee thinketh he may profite hys neighbour, let him doe the same, if not, let him geue ouer, and remit it til on other time. For there is a great diuersitie betwixt the willing and voluntary embracing of religion, and that whē a man is thereunto inforced and coacted. Of these things haue I made a more larger discourse, then in deede, the scope of mediocritie requireth: especially because I woulde not haue my faith (touching the veritie) to be hid.* For that I heare there be some, which complaine the olde accustomed haunting of their temples, & that the power of such darkenesse is cut of and taken away: which thing surely I would take in better part, were it not that the violent rebellion of flagitious error, were so fixed in many mens heartes, whereby they thirst after the vtter subuersion of the common weale and Empire.

Such was the goodnesse of this Emperour Constantinus, or rather such was the prouidēce of almighty God toward his Church, in stirring him vp: that all his care and study of minde was set vpon nothing els, but onely howe to benefit & enlarge the commodities of the same. Neither was it to him inough to deliuer the Church and people of God,* from outward vexation of foraine tyrants and persecutors. No les beneficial was his godly care also in quieting the inward dissensions and disturbaunce within the Church among the Christian bishops themselues, according as we read of Moses the deliuerer of y^e Israelits, in agreing the brethren together, when he saw them at variance. Exod. 2. No lesse also did his vigilant study extend in erecting, restoring, & enriching the Churches of God in al Cities, and in prouiding for the ministers of the same. And therefore wryting to Anilinus his chiefe captaine, declareth his will & minde to him in letters, concerning the goodes whych did appertaine to the Churches of the Christians: that hee shoulde procure vigilantly for the same: that all suche goodes, houses, and gardens, belonging before to the right of Churches, shoulde agayne be restored in all speedie wise: and that hee therein might be certified with speede. &c.

Moreouer, he wryting to the saide Anilinus in an other letter, signifieth vnto him in this effect: that for so much as the contempt of God his reuerent religion, is & hath bene euer the greatest decay to the name & people of Rome, as contrary the maintaining and reuerencing the same, hath euer brought prosperitie to all common weales: Therefore he in consideration therof, hath taken that order, & geueth to him in charge, that through y^e prouince, where he hath to doe, which was in Aphrica where Cecilianus was Byshop, he should there see & prouide, that all such ministers and Clerkes, whose vocation was to serue in the Church, should be freed and exempted from all publike duties and burdens: whereby they being so priuileged, and all impediments remoued, which shoulde hinder their diuine ministration: thereby the cōmon vtilitie of the people might the better flourish,* &c.

Furthermore, the sayde Constantinus in an other letter wryting to Miltiades, Byshop of Rome, and to Marcus, declareth in his letters to them, howe Cecilianus Byshop of Carthage, hath ben accused vnto him by diuers of his colleages and fellow byshops. Wherefore his will is, that the sayd Cecilianus, with x. byshops his accusers, with x. other his defendants should repaire vp to him at Rome,* where in the present assistance of the foresayde Miltiades, Rheticus, Maternus, Marinus, and of other their fellowe Colleages, the cause of Cecilianus myght be harde, and rightly examined, so that all schisme and deuision might be cut of from among them: wherein the feruent desire of Constantinus to peace and vnitie, may well appeare.

Upon the lyke cause and argument also,* he wryteth to Chrestus Byshop of Syracusa, so desirous to nourish peace and concord in the church, that he offereth to him with his vnder Ministers and three seruants, hys free caryage to come vp to him vnto the Councel of other bishops, for the agreeing of certaine matters belonging to the Church.

Hee writeth also an other letter to the forenamed Cecilianus Byshop of Carthage.

To the prouinces likewise of Palestina & those partes about,* hee directeth his Edict in the behalfe of the Christians: for the releasing of such as were in captiuitie: and for the restoring againe of them, which had sustained any losse in the former persecution before, & for the refreshing of such as heeretofore had bene oppressed with any ignominie, or molestation, for their confession sake: declaring in the sayd Edict, howe that his whole body, life and soule, and what soeuer is in hym, hee oweth to God, and to the seruice of him, &c.

Moreouer an other leter he wryteth to Eusebius,* for the edifying of newe Christian Churches, & restoring of them whych had bene wasted before by forreine enemies. And after hee had collected the Synode of Nice, for the studie of peace and vnitie of the Church,* he wryteth vpon the same to Alexander and Arrius. In which hys letters hee most lamentably vttered the great grieve of his hear•, to see and heare of theyr contention and diuision: whereby the peace and common harmonie of the Church was broken, the Synode prouoked & resisted, the holy people of the Lorde deuided into partes and tumultes, contrary to the office of good and circumspect men, whose duetie were rather to nourish concorde and to seeke tranquillity. And though in some small poynts and light trifles they did disagree from other: yet as the example of Philosophers might teache them, who although in some part of a sentence or peece of a question, some might dissent from other: yet in the vnitie of their profession, they did all ioyned as fellowes together. In like case were it theyr duetie in such fruitles questions (or rather peeces of questiōs) to keepe them in the conceptions of their mindes, in silence vnto themselues, and not to bring them forth into publicke Synodes, to breake therefore from the communion of the reuerent Councell. Declaring moreouer in the sayde Epistle, the first origine and occasion of thys theyr contentious dissention to ryse vpon vaine & trifling termes, vile causes, and light questions, and peeces rather of questions: about such matters as neither are to be moued, nor to be answered vnto, being mooued, more curious to be searched, and perillous to be expressed, then necessary to be inquired, magisque puerilibus ineptijs, quam sacerdotum ac cordatorum virorum prudentiae conuenientia, as he there doth terme them. Wherefore by al maner meanes he doth labour them, doth entreate them, and perswade them, not onely with reasons, but also with teares and sighing sobbes, that they would restore againe peace vnto the Church, and quietnesse to the rest of his life (which otherwise would not be sweet vnto him) and that they would returne againe to the communion of the reuerent Councell. Who in so doing should open his way and purposed iourney into the East partes, which otherwyse hearing of their discorde and dissention, would be sorye to see with his eyes, that which greueth him now to heare with hys eares: with much more in the same Epistle contained, but this is the effect of the whole. Euseb. de vita Constant. Lib. 2. Thus much I thought summarely to comprehende,* whereby the diuine disposition and singular gentle nature of this meeke & religious Constantine might more notoriously appeare to all Princes: for them to learne by hys example, what zeale and care they ought to beare toward the Church of Christ, & how gently to gouerne, and how to be beneficiall to the same.

Many other Edicts & Epistles wrytten to other places and parties, be expressed at large in the seconde booke of Euseb De vita Constantini: wherein the zealous care and Princely beneficence of this noble Emperour toward the Church of Christ may appeare. Wherof in a brieue recapitulation such specialities we haue collected as here followeth, and is to be seene in Zozo. Lib. 1. Cap. 8.9.

First hee commaunded all them to be set free, who soeuer for the confession of Christ, had bene condemned to banishment, Page 104 or to the mines of metall,* or to any publike or priuate labour to them inflicted. Such as were put to any infamie or open shame among the multitude, hee willed them to be discharged from all such blemish of ignominie. Souldiours whych before were depriued eyther of theyr place, or put out of theyr wages: were put to their liberty, eyther to serue againe in theyr place, or quietly to lyue at home. Whatsoeuer honour, place, or dignitie had bene taken away frō any man, should be restored to them againe. The goods and possessions of them that had suffered death for Christ, howsoeuer they were alienated, should returne to theyr heires, or next of kinne: or for lacke of them should be geuen to the Church. Hee commaunded moreouer that onely Christians shoulde beare office. The other he charged and restrayned, that neither they should sacrifice, nor exercise any more diuinations and ceremonies of the Gētiles, nor set vp any Images, nor to keepe any feastes of the heathen Idolaters. He corrected moreouer and abolished all such vnlawfull manners and vnhonest vsages in Cities, as might be hurtfull any waies to the Church, as the custome that the Egyptians had in the flowing of Nilus, at what time the people vsed to runne together lyke brute beasts,* both men & women, and with all kinde of filthines and Sodomitrie to pollute their Cities, in celebrating the increase of that riuer. This abomination Constantine extinguished, causing that wicked order called Androgynae, to be killed. By reason whereof the Riuer afterward (through the benefite of God) yelded more increase in his flowing, to the greater fertilitie of the ground, then it did before.

Among the Romanes was an olde lawe, that such as were barren hauing no fruite of children, should be amerced of halfe their goodes. Also, that such as being aboue the yeares of xxv. vnmarried, should not be nūbred in the same priuileges with them that were married, neither should be heires to them, to whom notwithstanding they were next in kinde. These lawes because they seemed vnreasonable, to punish the defect of nature, or gift of virginity, by mā's lawe, hee abrogated and tooke away. An other order was among the Romanes, that they which made their willes being sicke, had certaine prescribed and conceiued wordes appoynted to thē to vse, which vnlesse they followed, their willes stode in none effect. This law also Constantine repealed, permitting to euery man in making his testament to vse what wordes, or what witnesses he woulde. Likewise among the Romaines hee restrained and tooke away the cruel and bloudy spectacles & sights, where men were wont with swordes one to kill an other. Of the barbarous and filthy fashion of the Arethusians in Phoenicia, I haue mentioned before, pag. 104. where they vsed to expose and set foorth their virgines to open fornication, before they should be married,* which custome also Constantine remooued away. Where no Churches were, there he commaunded new to be made: where any were decayed, he commāded them to be repaired: where any were to litle, he caused them to be enlarged, geuing to the same great giftes and reuenues: not onely of such tributes and taxes comming to him from certaine sundry Cities, which hee transferred vnto the Churches, but also out of his owne treasures. When any Byshops required any Councell to be had, hee satisfied their petitions: And what in their Councils and Synodes they established, being godly & honest, hee was ready to confirme the same.

The armour of his soldiours, which were newly come from Gentilitie, he garnished with the armes of the crosse, whereby they might learne the sooner to forget their olde superstitious idolatry. Moreouer like a worthy Emperour he prescribed a certaine forme of prayer in steade of a Catechisme for euery man to haue, & to learne how to pray and to inuocate God. The which forme of prayer is recited in the fourth booke of Eusebius De vita Constantini,* in wordes as foloweth.

Te solum nouimus Deum, te regem cognoscimus, te adiutorem inuocamus, abs te victorias referimus, per te victorias inimicorum constituimus, tibi praesentium bonorum gratiam acceptam ferimus, & per te futura quoque speramus, tibi supplices sumus omnes: Imperatorem nostrum Constantinum, ac pientissimos eius filios, in longissima vita incolumes nobis ac victores custodire supplices oramus, per Christum dominum nostrum. Amen.

In English.

We knowledge thee onely to be our God, we confesse thee onely to be our king, we inuocate and call vpon thee our onely helper, by thee we obtaine our victories, by thee we vāquish and subdue our enemies, to thee we attribute whatsoever present commodities we enioy, & by thee we hope for good thinges to come, vnto thee we direct all our sute & petitions: most humbly beseeching thee to conserue Constantine our Emperour, and his noble childrē in long life to cōtinue, and to geue them victory ouer all their enemies, through Christ our Lord.* Amen.

In hys owne palace, hee set vp an house peculiar for prayer and doctrine, vsing also to pray and sing with his people. Also in hys warres hee went not without hys tabernacle appoynted for the same. The Sonday he cōmanded to be kept holy of all men, and free from all iudiciarie causes, from markets, martes, faires, & all other manuall labors, onely husbandry excepted: especially charging that no Images or Monuments of Idolatry should be set vp.

Men of the Clergy and of the ministry in al places he endued with speciall priuileges and immunities,* so that if any were brought before the ciuill Magistrate, and listed to appeale to the sentence of his Bishop, it should be lawfull for him so to doe: and that the sentence of the Byshop should stande in as great force as if the Magistrate or the Emperour himselfe had pronounced it.

But here is to be obserued & noted by the way, that y^e Clerkes & ministers thē newly creeping out of persecutiō, were in those dayes, neyther in nūber so great nor in order of life, of y^e like dispositiō to these in our dayes now liuing.

No lesse care and prouision the sayd Constantinus also had to the maintenance of scholes pertayning to y^e Church and to the nourishing of good artes and liberall sciences,* especially of Diuinitie: not onely with stipends and subsidies furnishing them, but also with large priuilegies and exemptiōs defending y^e same, as by the wordes of his own law is to be seene: and read as followeth: Medicos, Gramaticos, & alios professores literarum & doctores legum, cum vxoribus & liberis.*&c. In English: Phisitions, Gramarians, and all other prefessors of liberal artes, and Doctors of the law, with their wiues and childrē, and all other their possessions, which they haue in Citties: we commaund to be freed from all ciuill charges and functions, neyther to receaue forren straungers in prouinces, nor to be burdened with any publique administration, nor to be cited vp to ciuill iudgement, nor to be drawne out, or oppressed with any iniury. And if any man shall vexe them, he shall incurre such punishment, as the Iudge at his discretion shall awarde him. Their stipendes moreouer and solaries, we commaunde truely to be payd them, whereby they may more freely instruct other in artes and sciences. &c.

Ouer and besides this,* so farre did hys godly zeale and princely care and prouision extend to the Church of Christ, that he commaunded and prouided bookes and volumes of the Scripture, diligently and playnly to be written and copied out, to remayne in bublique Churches to the vse of posteritie, Whereupon writing to Eusebius byshop of Nicomedia in a speciall letter (recorded in the 4. booke of Eusebius, De vita Constant.) he willet him with all diligence to procure 50. volumes of parchment well bound and cōpacted: wherein he shoulde cause to be written out of the scripture in a fayre legeable hād, such things as he thought necessary and profitable for the instruction of the Church. And alloweth him for that busines two bublique Ministers. Also writeth concerning the same, to the generall of hys army, to support and further hym with such necessities, as thereunto should appertayne.* &c.

In vewing, perusing, and writing this story, and in considering the Christian zeale of this Emperour, I wish that eyther this our Printing and plēty of books had bene in his dayes: or that this so heroycal hart toward Christes Religion, as was in this so excellent Monarche, might something appeare in inferiour Princes raigning in these our Printing dayes.* &c.

The liberal hand of this Emperor, borne to do al men good, was no lesse also open and ready towarde the needie pouertie of such, which either by losse of parents, or other occasions were not able to helpe them selues: to whom he commaunded and prouided dew subuention both of corne and raiment to be ministred out of his owne coffers, to the necessary reliefe of the poore men, women, children, orphanes, and widowes, Euseb. de vita Constant. Lib 4.

Finally,* among al the other monuments of his singular clemencie and munificence, this is not to be pretermitted: that through all the Empire of Rome and prouinces belonging to the same, not only he diminished such taxes, reuenewes, and impostes, as publickly were comming to him, but also clearely remitted and released to the contributors, the fourth part of the same.

This present place would require something to be sayd of the donation of Constantine whereuppon as vpon their chieftest anchor holde,* the Byshops of Rome doe grounde theyr supream dominion and right, ouer all the politicall gouernement of the West partes, & the spiritual gouernement of all the other Seas and partes of the world. Which Page 105 donation to be falsly fained and forged, and not to procede from Constantine, many arguments might heere be inferred, if laisure from other matters would suffer me.*

1. First, for that no ancient history, nor yet Doctour maketh any mention thereof.

2. Naclerus reporteth it to be affirmed in the hystorie of Isidorus: but in the olde copies of Isidorus no such thyng is to be founde.

3. Gracianus the compiler of the decrees, reciteth that decree, [unspec 3] not vpon any auncient authoritie, but only vnder the title of Palea.

[unspec 4] 4. Gelasius is sayd to geue some testimony therof, in Dist. 15. Sancta Romana, but that clause of the said distinction touching that matter, in the olde ancient bookes is not extant.

[unspec 5] 5 Otho Phrasingensis, who was about the time of Gracian, after hee hath declared the opinion of the fauourers of the Papacie: affirming this donation to be geuen of Constantine, to Siluester the Pope: induceth consequently, the opinion of them that fauour the Empire, affirming the contrary.

[unspec 6] 6. How doth thys agree, that Constantine did yeelde vp to Siluester all the politicall dominion ouer the West, when as the sayd Constantine at hys death, deuiding the Empire to his three sonnes, gaue the West part of the Empire to one, the East part to the secōd, the middle part to the third?

[unspec 7] 7. How is it like that Theodosius after them, being a iust and a religious Prince, would or could haue occupied the Citie of Rome, if it had not bene his right, but had belonged to the pope, & so did many other Emperors after him?

[unspec 8] 8. The phrase of this decree being conferred w^t the phrase and stile of Constantine, in his other Edictes and letters aboue specified doth nothing agree.

[unspec 9] 9. Seeing the papists themselues confesse that the decree of this donation was writtē in Greeke, how agreeth that with truth: when as both it was written not to the Gretians, but to the Romanes, and also Constantine himselfe for lacke of the Greeke tounge, was faine to vse the Latine tounge in the Councell of Nice?

[unspec 10] 10. The contents of this donation (who soeuer was the forger thereof) doeth bewray it selfe. For if it be true which there is confessed, that he was Baptised at Rome of Siluester, & the iiij. day after his baptisme this patrimonie was giuen (which was before his battaile against Maximinus or Licinius, An. 317. as Niceph. recordeth) howe then accordeth this wyth that which followeth in the donation, for him to haue iurisdiction geuen ouer the other iiij. principall seas of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople and Hierusalem? when as the Citie of Constantinople was not yet begun, before the death of Maximinus or Licinius, and was not finished, before the xxviii. yere of the raigne of Constantine, an. 339. or if it be true, as Hierome counteth, it was finished the xxiiij. yere of his raigne, which was the yere of our Lorde 334. long after this donation by their owne accōpt.

[unspec 13] 13. In summe, briefly to conclude: who so desireth more abundantly to be satisfied touching this matter, let hym read the bookes of Marsilius Patauinus, intituled: defensor pacis, An 1324. of Laurētius Valla, An. 1440. of Antoninus archbishop of Florence, who in hys hystorie, plainely denieth the tenour of thys donation to be founde in the old bookes of the decrees. Of Cusanus Cardinalis. Lib. 3. Cap. 2. wryting to the Councell of Basil, Anno 1460. Of Aeneas Syluius in Dialogo, of Hier. Paulus Cattalanus, An. 1496. of Raphael Volateranus, An. 1500. of Lutherus, An. 1537. &c. all which by many and euident probations, dispute and proue this donation taken out of a booke De gestis Syluestri, and translated (as they faine) by one Bartholomeus Picernus, out of Greke into Latine: not to proceede from Constantinus, but to be a thing vntruelly pretended, or rather a fable imagined, or els to be the deede of Pipinus or Charles, or some such other, if it were euer the deede of any.

And thus hast thou (beloued Reader) briefly collected the narration of the noble actes and heauenly vertues of thys most famous Emperour Constantine the great: a a singulare spectacle for all Christian Princes to beholde and imitate, and worthy of perpetuall memorie in all congregations of Christian Saintes. Whose feruent zeale & pietie in generall, to all cōgregations, and to all the seruants of Christ was notable: but especially the affection and reuerence of hys heart toward them was admirable, whych had suffered any thyng for the confession of Christ, in the persecutions before, them had hee principally in price and veneration, in so much that hee embraced and kissed theyr woundes and stripes, and their eyes, being put out. And if any suche Byshops or any other Ministers brought to hym any cōplaints one against an other, a (as many times they did) he would take theyr bils of complaint, and burne them before theyr faces: so studious and zealous was hys mind to haue them agree, whose discord was to hym more grieve, then it was to themselues. All the vertuous actes and memorable doings of this diuine & renowned Emperour to comprehend or commit to hystorie: it were the matter alone of a great volume: wherfore contented with these aboue premised, because nothing of him can be sayde inough, I cease to discourse of him any further.

One thyng yet remaineth not to be omitted,* wherein (as by the way of a note) I thought good to admonish the learned Reader, suche as loue to be conuersant in reading of auncient authors: that in the Ecclesiasticall hystorie of Eusebius, where in the latter ende of the booke, is added a certaine Oration, Ad cōuentum Sanctorum, vnder the name of Eusebius Pamphilus, here is to be vnderstād, that the sayd Oration is wrongly intituled vpon the name of Eusebius, whych in very truth is the Oration of Constantinus hymselfe. For the probation whereof, beside the stile and matter therein contained, and tractation heroycall) liuely declaring the religious vaine of Constantine) I alledge the very testimonie of Eusebius hymselfe in his fourth booke De vita Constantini, where he in expresse wordes not onely declareth that Cōstantine wrote such an Oration intituled Ad Conuentum Sanctorum, but also promiseth in the end of hys booke, to annexe the same: declaring moreouer what difficultie the interpretors had, to translate the same from the Romaine speeche, to theyr Grecian tounge. Eusebius de vita Constantini. Lib. 4 pag. 211.

And here an end of these lamentable & doleful persecutions of the primitiue Church, during the space of the 300. yeres frō the passion of our Sauour Christ, til the cōming of this Constantinus, by whom, as by the elect instrumēt of God, it hath so pleased his almighty maiesty, by his determinat purpose to giue rest after lōg trouble to his church, according to that S. Cyprian declareth before,* pag. 68. to be reueled of God vnto his Church: that after darkenes and stormy tempest should come peaceable calme, & stable quietnes to his church, meaning this time of Constantine now present.* At which time it so pleased the almightie, that the murdering malice of Sathan should at length be restrained, and he him selfe to be tied vp for a thousande yeares, through his great mercie in Christ, to whome therefore •e thankes and praise now and for euer. AMEN.

The ende of the first Booke.

THE SECOND BOOKE, CONTAINING the next 300. yeares following, with such things specially touched, as haue happened in England, from the time of king Lucius, to Gregorius, and so after to the time of king Egebert.

BY these persecutions hytherto in the Booke before precedent, thou maiest vnderstand (Christian reader) how the furie of Sathan and rage of men, haue done what they could to extinguish the name and religion of Christ. For what thing did lacke, that eyther death coulde doe, or torments coulde worke, or the gates of hell coulde deuise: all was to the vttermost attempted. And yet all the furie and malice of Sathan, al the wisdom of the world, & strength of men, doing, deuising, practising what they could: notw^lstanding the religion of Christ (as thou seest) hath had the vpper hand. Which thing I wish thee greatly (gentle reader) wisely to note, and diligently to ponder, in cōsidering these former histories. And because thou canst not consider them, nor profit by them, vnles thou do first read & peruse them: let me craue therfore thus much at thine handes, to turne & read ouer the said hystories of those persecutiōs aboue described: * especially aboue all the other hystories of this present volume: for thy especiall edification, whych I trust thou shalt finde not vnworthy the reading.

Nowe because the tying vp of Sathan geueth to the Church some rest, & to me some leisure to addresse my selfe, to the handling of other stories: I minde therefore (Christ willing) in thys present booke, leauing a while the tractation of these generall affaires, pertaining to the vniuersal Church: to prosecute such domesticall hystories, as more neare concerne this our country of England & Scotland, done here at home: beginning first with king Lucius, with whome the faith first begā here in this Realme, as the sentence of some writers doth hold. * And for somuch as here may rise, yea and doth rise, a great cōtrouersie in these our Popish daies, cōcerning the first origine & planting of the faith in this our Realme: it shall not be greatly out of our purpose, * somewhat to stay & say of this question, whether the Church of England first receiued the faith from Rome or not. The which, although I graunt so to be, yet being so graunted, it little auaileth the purpose of them whiche woulde so haue it: for be it so, that England first receaued the Christian faith and Religion from Rome, both in the time of Eleutherius theyr Byshop. 180. yeares after Christ: and also in the time of Austen, whome Gregory sent hether 600. yeares after Christ: yet their purpose followeth not thereby, * that we must therefore fetch our Religion from thence still, as from the chiefe welhead and fountaine of all godlines. And yet as they are not able to proue the second, so neither haue I any cause to graunt the first: that is, that our Christian faith was first deriued from Rome, which I may proue by vj. or vij. good cōiectural reasons. Wherof the first I take of the testimony of Gildas, * our coūtreymen, who in his history affirmeth plainly, 1 that Britaine receaued the Gospell in the time of Tiberius the Emperour, vnder whome Christ suffered. Lib. De victoria Aurelij Ambrosij. And sayth moreouer, that Ioseph of Arimathie after dispersion of the Iewes, was sent of Philip the Apostle frō France to Britayne, about the yeare of our Lord. 63. and heere remained in this land al his time: and so with his fellowes, laide the first foundation of Christian faith amōg the Britayne people. Whereupon other preachers and teachers comming afterward confirmed the same, and increased it.

22. The secōd reason is out of Tertullian, who liuing neare about, or rather somewhat before the time of this Eleutherius, in hys booke Contra Iudaeos, manifestly importeth the same: where the sayde Tertullian testifying how the Gospel was dispersed abroad by the sound of the Apostles, & there reckening vp the Medes, Persians, Parthiās, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, Iewry, Cappadocia, Pōtus, Asia, Phrigia, Egypt, Pamphilia, with many mo, at length cōmeth to the coasts of the Moorrians, and al the borders of Spayne: with diuers natiōs of Fraunce, & there amongst all other reciteth also the partes of Britayne, whyche the Romaines could neuer attaine to, and reporteth the same now to be subiect to Christ, as also reckeneth vp the places of Sarmatia, of the Danes, the Germanes, the Scithiās, with many other prouinces and Iles to him vnknown: in all which places, sayth he, raigneth the name of Christ, which now beginneth to be commō. This hath Tertullian. Note here, how amōg other diuers beleuing nations, he mentioneth also the wildest places of Britaine to be of the same number. And these in his time were Christened, who was in the same Eleutherius time, as is aboue sayd. Then, was not Pope Eleutherius, the first whych sent the Christian fayth into this Realme, but the Gospell was heere receiued before hys time, eyther by Ioseph of Arimathia, as some Chronicles recorde, or by some of the Apostles or of their scholers, which had bene heere preaching Christ, before Eleutherius wrote to Lucius.

3. My thirde probation I deduct out of Origen, Home. 4. in Ezechielem,3 whose words be these: Britāniam in Christianam consentire religionem. Whereby it appeareth that the faith of Christ was sparsed here in England before the daies of Eleutherius.

4. For my fourth probation I take the testimony of Bede, where he affirmeth that in his time, and almost a thousand yeare after Christ, here in Britayne: Easter was kept after the maner of the East Church,4 in the full moone: what day in the weeke soeuer it fell on, and not on the Sunday, as we do now. Wherby it is to be collected, that the first preachers in this land, haue come out from the East part of the world,5 where it was so vsed, rather then from Rome.

5. Fiftly, I may alledge the woordes of Nicephorus, Lib. 2. cap 40. where hee sayeth, that Symon Zelotes did sprede the gospel of Christ to the West Oceane, and brought the same vnto the Iles of Britayne.

6. Sixtly may be added here also the words of Petrus Cluniacensis, who wryting to Bernard, affirmeth that y^e Scots in his time did celebrate their Easter,6 not after y^e Romane maner, but after the Greekes. &c. And as the said Britains were not vnder the Romane order in the time of this Abbot of Cluniake: so neither were they nor woulde be, vnder the Romane legate, in the time of Gregory: nor would admit any primacy of the bishop of Rome, to be aboue thē.

7. For the seuenth argument, moreouer I may make my probation by the plaine woordes of Eleutherius, by whose Epistle wrytten to king Lucius,7 we may vnderstande, that Lucius had receaued the faith of Christ in his lande, before the king sent to Eleutherius for the Romane lawes: for so the expresse woordes of the letter do manifestly purport, as hereafter followeth to be seene. By all which coniectures, it may stand probably to be thought, that the Britaynes, were taught first by the Grecians of the East Church, rather then by the Romaines.

Peraduenture Eleutherius might helpe something, eyther to conuert the king, or else to encrease the Faith then newly sprong among the people: but that he precisely was the first, that cannot be proued. But graunt he were, as in deede the most part of our English stories confesse, neither will I greatly sticke with them therin: yet what haue they got thereby, when they haue cast all their gaine? In fewe wordes to conclud this matter, if so be that the Christian faith and religiō was first deriued from Rome to this our nation by Eleutherius, then let them but graunt to vs the same faith and religion, which then was taught at Rome: and from thence deriued hether by the sayd Eleutherius, and we wil desire no more. For then neither was any vniuersal Pope aboue all Churches and Councils,* whych came not in before Bonifacius time, whych was 400. yeres after: neither any name or vse of the Masse, the partes whereof how and by whom they were compiled, here after in this booke following appeareth to be seene. Neither any sacrifice propiciatorie for the scouring of Purgatory was then offered vpon halowed altars, but onely the Communion frequented at Christian tables: where oblations and gifts were offered, as well of the people, as of the Priestes to God: because they should appeare neither emptie nor vnkinde before the Lord, as we may vnderstand by the time Page 107 of Cyprian. Neither was then any transubstātiation heard of, which was not brought in before a thousand yere after. Neither were then any images of Saints departed, set vp in Churches, yea a great number of the Saints worshipped in this our time, were not as yet borne, nor the Churches wherein they were worshipped, were yet set vp: but came in long after, especially in the time of Irene & Constans the Emperour. Likewise neyther Reliques nor peregrinations were then in vse. Priestes Mariage was then as lawfull, and no lesse receiued as now: neither was it condemned before the dayes of Hildebrand, almost a thousande yeaes after that. Their seruice was then in the vulgare tounge,* as witnesseth Hierome. The Sacrament ministred in both kindes, as wel to lay men, as to Priestes, the witnes wherof is Cyprian. Yea, and that temporal men which would not then communicate at Easter, Whitsontide, and Christenmasse: were not coūted for Catholiks, the Popes owne distinction can testifie. In funeralles, Priestes then flocked not together, selling trentals and diriges for sweping of Purgatorie: but onely a funeral cōcion was vsed, with Psalmes of praises, & songs of theyr worthy deedes: and Alleluya sounding on high, which did shake the gilded seelings of the temple, as witnesseth Nazianzene, Ambrose, and Hierome, &c.

In the Supper of the Lord, & at Baptisme, no such ceremonies were vsed, as now of late hath bene intruded, in so much that as in this story is shewed hereafter, both Austen and Paulinus Baptised then in Riuers not in halowed fountes,* as wytnesseth Fabianus. The Portuis of Sarum, of Yorke, of Bangor, with Mattens and Euensong of the day: againe neither the orders and religions of Monks & Friers, were not yet dreamed of, to the space almost of a thousand yeaes after, &c. So that, as I sayde, if the Papistes would needes deriue the faith & religion of this Realme, from Rome: then let them set vs & leaue vs there, where they had vs: that is, let them suffer vs to stand content w^t that faith and religion, which then was taught & brought from Rome by Eleutherius (as now we differ nothing frō the same) and we wil desire no better. And if they wil not, then let the wise Reader iudge, where the fault is, in vs or them which neither themselues will persist in the antiquitie of the Romish religion, whych they so much bragge of, neither will they permit vs so to do.

And thus much by the way, to satisfie the foresayd obiection: whereby we may haue now a more ready passage into the order and course of the Hystorie.* Beyng therefore graunted vnto them, whych they so earnestly sticke vpon, that the Christian faith and Religion of this Realme was brought from Rome, first by Eleutherius, then afterwarde by Austen: thus wryteth the Chronicles of that matter.

About the time and yeare of the Lord. 180. king Lucius sonne of Coilus,* which builded Colchester, king of the Britaines, who then were the inhabitors & possessors of this land (which now we Englishmen call England) hearing of the myracles & wonders done by the Christians at that time in diuers places (as Monumetensis wryteth) directed his letters to Eleutherius Byshop of Rome, to receaue of him the Christian faith. Although about the computation of the yere and time: great difference there is in authours, when this shoulde be. Naclerus sayth it was An. 156. but that cannot be, forsomuch as Eleutherius was not yet Byshop by the space of 20. yeres after that. Henricus de Erfordia sayth,* it was An. 169. in the 19. yere of Verus Emperor, but that agreeth not with approued histories: which all consent, that Verus reigned not 19. yeres, and if he had, yet that yere commeth not to the yere of our Lord. 169. but to the yere. 181. Some other say, that Eleutherius was made Byshop, in the 6. yeare of Commodus, which was the yeare of our Lorde. 186. but that seemeth to goe to farre, but let the authours agree as they can. Let vs returne to Eleutherius the good Byshop, who hearing the request of this king, & glad to see the godly towardnes of his well disposed mind: sendeth him certaine teachers & preachers,* called Fugatius, or by some Faganus, and Damianus, or Dimianus: which conuerted first the king and people of Britaine, and Baptised them w^t the Baptisme and Sacrament of Christes faith. The Temples of Idolatry and all other Monuments of Gentilitie they subuerted, conuerting the people frō their diuers & many gods to serue one liuing God. Thus true religion with sincere faith increasing, superstition decayed, w^t al other rites of Idolatrie. There were thē in Britaine 28. head Priestes, which they called Flamines, & 3. Archpriests among them, which were called Archflamines: hauing the ouersight of their maners,* & as Iudges ouer the rest. These 28. Flamines they turned to 28. Bishops. And the 3. Archflamines, to 3. Archbyschoppes, hauyng then their seates in three principall Cityes of the Realme: that is, in London, in Yorke, and in Glamorgantia, videlicet, in Vrbe legionum, by Wales. Thus the Countreys of the whole Realme, being deuided euery one vnder his owne Bishop, and all things settled in a good order: the foresaide king Lucius sent againe to the sayd Eleutherius, for the Romane lawes: thereby likewise to be gouerned as in Religion nowe they were framed accordingly. Unto whome Eleutherius againe writeth, after the tenour of these words ensuing.

The Epistle of Eleutherius Bishop of Rome,* sent to king Lucius.

ANno. 169. a Passione Christi scripsit Dominus Eleutherius Papa Lucio Regi Britanniae, ad correctionem Regis & procerum regni Britanniae, and so foorth, as foloweth in English.

Yee require of vs the Romane lawes and the Emperours, to be sent ouer to you: which you may practise & put in vre wythin your Realme. The Romane lawes, & the Emperours, we may euer reprove, but the lawe of God we may not. Yee haue receaued of late through Gods mercie in the realme of Britaine, the lawe and faith of Christ: ye haue with you within the Realme both the parties of the Scriptures.* Out of them by gods grace, with the Coucel of your realme, take ye a law, and by that lawe (through gods sufferance) rule your kingdome of Britayne. For you be Gods Vicare in your kingdome, according to the saying of the Psalme. Deus iudicium tuum Regi da, &c. That is. O God geue thy iudgement to the King, and thy righteousnes to the kings sonne. &c. He sayd not the iudgement & righteousnes of the Emperour, but thy iudgement and iustice: that is to say, of God. The kinges sonnes be the Christian people & folke of the Realme, which be vnder your gouernement, and liue and continue in peace within your kingdome, as the Gospel sayeth: like as the henne gathereth her chickē vnder her wings, so doth the king his people. The people and folke of the Realme of Britayne be yours, whome if they be deuied ye ought to gather in concord and peace: to call them to the faith and lawe of Christ, and to the holy church, to cherish and maintaine them, to rule and gouerne them, and to defende them alwaies from such as would do them wrōg, from malicious men and enemies. A king hath his name of ruling, and not of hauing a Realme. You shalbe a king while ye rule wel, but if you do otherwise, the name of a king shall not remaine with you, & you shall lose it, which God forbid. The almightie God graunt you so to rule the Realme of Britayne, that you may raigne wyth him for euer, whose Vicar ye be in the Realme.

After this maner, as you haue heard, was the Christiā faith either first brought in, or els confirmed in this realme of Britayne, by the sending of Eleutherius, not w^t any crosse or procession, but onely at the simple preaching of Fagane and Damian, through whose ministerie this realme & Ileland of Britaine was eftsoones reduced to the faith & lawe of the Lord,* according as was prophecied by Esay, as wel of that, as other Ilelands mo, where he sayth, chap. 42. he shall not faint, nor geue ouer till hee hath set iudgement in earth, and Ilelands shal waite for hys lawe. &c. The faith thus receiued of the Britaynes cōtinued among them and florished the space of 216. yeres, till the cōming of the Saxones: who then were Paganes: whereof more followeth hereafter to be sayde, the Lorde Christ assisting thereunto. In the meane time somthing to speake of this space before, which was betwixt the time of Lucius, and the first cōming in of the Saxones: first is to be vnderstanded, that all this while as yet the Emperours of Rome had not receiued the faith, what time the kings of Britaine, & the subiects therof, were cōuerted now, as is sayd, to Christ: for the which cause much trouble and perturbation, was sought against them, not onely here in Britayne, but through all parts of Christendome by the Heathen infidels. In so much that in the persecution onely of Dioclesian & Maximinian raigning both together within one moneth xvij. thousand martyrs are nūbred to haue suffered for the name of Christ, as hath bene hetherto in the booke before sufficiently discoursed.

Thus therefore although the foresayd Lucius, the Britaine king, through the mercifull prouidence of God, was then Christened and the gospel receaued generally almost in all the land:* yet the state thereof as wel of the Religion, as of the common wealth, coulde not be quiet, for that the emperours & nobles of Rome were yet infidels, & enemies to the same: but especially for this cause, the cause so happening, that Lucius the Christen king died without issue: for therby such trouble & variance fel amōg the Britaines (as it happeneth in al other Realmes, namely in this our Realme of England when soeuer succession lacketh) that not onely they brought vpon them the Idolatrous Romaines, & at length the Saxons: but also in wrapped them selues in suche miserie and desolation, as yet to thys day amongst them remayneth. Such a thyng it is (where a Prince or a King is in a kingdome) there to lacke succession, as especially in this case may appere. For after y^e death Page 108 of Lucius, when the Barons and Nobles of the land could not accord wthin themselves vpon succession of the crowne: stept in the Romaines, & got the crowne into their owne hands, wherupon followed great misery and ruine to the realme: for sometimes the Idolatrous Romaines, sometimes the Britaynes raigned and ruled, as violence and victorie would serue, one king murder yng an other, till at length the Saxones came and depriued them bothe, as in processe hereafter followeth to be seene.

In the meane season touching the story of king Lucius, here is to be reproued the fable of some wryters falsely faining of him, that he shoulde after hys Baptisme receaued, put of all his kingly honor, and forsake the land & be made a preacher: who after long trauaile in preaching and teaching, in Fraunce, in Germany, in Augusta, & in Sueuia, at length was made Doctor and Rector of the Church of Cureak: where (as this fable sayeth) he suffered Martyrdome. But this phātasie of whomsoeuer it first did spring, disagreeeth from all our English stories: Who with a full consent do for the most part cōcord in this, that the said Lucius, after he had fōūded many Churches, and geuen great riches and liberties to the same: deceased with great tranquillitie in his owne lande,* and was buried at Glocester, the 14. yeare after his Baptisme, as the booke of Flores Historiarum, doeth counte, which was the yeare of our Lorde (as he sayeth) 201. and reckoneth his conuersion to be. An. 87. In some I finde hys decease to be the fourth, & in some the tenth yeere after his Baptisme, and holde that he raigned all the space of lxxvij. yeares, and thus much concerning king Lucius.

Now to proceede in order of the storie, briefly to touch the state of the foresaid land of Britayne, betwene the time of king Lucius, and the entring of the Saxones, who were the kings thereof: and in what order they succeeded, or rather inuaded one after an other, this Catalogue heere vnder written will specifie.

Kinges of Britaine from the time of Lucius till the cōming of the Saxons.

again.

By this table may appere a lamentable face of a common wealth so miserably rent and diuided into two sortes of people, differing not so much in coūtrey, as in religion. For when the Romaines raigned: so were they gouerned by the Infidels. When the Britaynes ruled, so they were gouerned by Christians. Thus what quietnesse was or could be in the Church, in so vnquiet and doubtful dayes, it may easely be considered.

Albeit, notwithstanding al these foresayd Heathen rulers of the Romaines, which here gouerned, yet (God be praised) we read of no persecution, during all these x. persecutiōs aboue mentioned, that touched the christian Britaynes, before the last persecution onely of Dioclesian,* and Maximianus Herculus, whych here then exercised much crueltie. Thys persecution, as it was the last among the Romane Christians, so it was the first of many & diuers that followed after in thys Church and Realme of England: wherof we will here after intreate (Christ willing) as order of the matter shall leade vs. In the meane tyme this rage of Dioclesian as it was vniuersally through all the churches in the world fierce & vehement: so in this realme of Britayne also it was so sore, that as all our English Chronicles do testifie, and recorde, all Christianitie almost in the whole land was destroyed: Churches were subuerted, all bookes of the Scripture burned, many of the faythfull both men and women were slaine. Among whom the first and chiefe was Albanus, then Iulius, Aaron, and Amphibalus. Of whome sufficiently hath bene sayde before. What were the other, or howe many they were that suffered beside, stories make no rehearsall. And thus much therof.

Nowe as concerning the gouernement of these aboue named kinges of Britayne,* although I haue little or nothing to note, which greatly appertaineth to the matter of this Ecclesiasticall hystorie: yet this is not to be past ouer: first how in the order of these kings commeth Constantinus the great & worthy Emperour,* not onely a Britayne borne by hys mother Helina being kyng Coilus daughter, but also by the helpe of the Britaynes army (vnder the power of God) whych the sayde Constantine tooke wyth hym out of Britain to Rome: obtained with great victory, peace and tranquillitie to the whole vniuersall Church of Christ: hauing iij. legions w^t him out of this realme, of chosen & able soldiours. Wherby the strēgth of the lād was not a litle impaired & indangered, as afterward in this story foloweth.

After him likewise Maximian following his steppes, tooke wyth him also (as stories recorde) all the power and strength whych was left: and whatsoeuer he could make, of able and fighting men, to subdue Fraunce: besides the garrisons whych he had out wyth him before, sending for mo to the number of C.M. souldiours at once, to be sent to hym out of Britayne into Fraunce.* At whych time also Conanus his partener being then in Fraunce, sent ouer for virgins from Britaine to the number of xi.M. who with Vrsula, the Prince Dionets daughter being shynned ouer, many perished in the sea:* some were taken of the infidels, marching vppon the borders, wyth whome because they wold not be polluted, all were destroyed, being miserably dispersed (some one way, some an other) so y^t none escaped.

Thus poore Britayne being left naked and destitute on euery side, as a maimed body w^tout myght or strength: was left open to hys enemyes, not able to succour it selfe, without helpe of forreine friendes. To whome they were then constrained to flie, especially to the Romans to whō the Britaynes sent this worde or message. Aetio ter Consuli gemitus Britannorum. Repellunt nos Barbari ad mare. Repellit nos mare ad Barbaros. Hinc oriuntur duo sunerum genera, quia aut iugulamur, aut submergimur. But the Romans then began to forsake them, whereby they were in nearer danger to be oppressed by Gwanus and Melga,* had not Gwetelinus the Archbyshop of London made ouer to lesser Britayne, and obtayning theyr helpe, had brought Constantinus the kings brother, to rescue his countrey against the infidels. Thys Constantinus was brother to Aldroenus king of litle Britayn, and father to Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, & Vter, who after raigned kings in Britayne.

Thus by the meanes of the good Archbyshop and Constantinus, the state of the Religion and Realme of Britayne was in some meane quiet & safetie, during the time of the sayd Constantine and of the good Archbishop. But as the Realme of Britayne almost from the beginning was neuer without ciuill warre, at length came wicked Vortigerne, who cruelly causing Constans his Prince to be muredred,* ambitiously inuaded the crowne: who then fearing the other two brethren of Constans, whych were Aurelius & Vter, being then in litle Britayne: did send ouer for the aide of the Saxons being then infidels, and not onely that: but also married with an infidell, the daughter of Hengist called Rowen. Whereupon the sayde Vortigerne not long after, by the sayd Hengist and the Saxones was with like trayterie dispossessed of his kingdome, & the people of Britayne driuen out of their countrey, after that the Saxons had slaine of their chiefe Nobles & Barons at one meeting, ioynning together subiltie with crueltie, to the number of CC.lxxi. some stories say CCCC.lx.* This wicked acte of the Saxones, was done at Almisbury, or at a place called Stonehenge, by the monument of which stones there hanging, it seemeth that the noble Britaynes there were buried.

This fabulous Storie of the Welshemen, of brynging these stones from Ireland by Merlyn I passe ouer. Some storyes record that they were slaine being bid to a banquet, other do say that it was done at a talke or assembly, where the Saxons came with priuie kniues contrary to promise made, with the which kniues they geuing a priuie watchword, in their Saxones speache, neme your sexes) slewe the Britaynes vnarmed: and thus farre concerning the historie of the Britaynes. As this great plague could not come to the Britaynes without Gods permissiō, so Gildas sheweth in hys Chronicle, the cause thereof, wryting thus:

Quòd Britones propter auaritiam & rapinā Principum, propter iniquitatem & iniustitiam ludicum, propter desidiam praedicationis Episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidisse. &c.

The entring and rainging of the Saxons.

THis was the comming in first of the Angles or Saxones into this realme, being yet vnchristened and infidels: which was about the yeare of our Lord, as William Malmesbury testifieth * .CCCC.lxix. the Captaines of whō were Hengistus and Horsus. Although the sayd Hengist and Saxones at their first comming, for all their subtile working and cruell attempt, had no quiet setling in Britayne, but were driuen out diuers times by the valiantnesse of Aurelius Ambrosius, and his brother Vter aboue mētioned, who raigned after that among the Britaynes: yet notw^tstanding they were not so driuen out, but that they returned againe, and at length possessed all, driuing the Britaynes (such as remained) into Cambria,* whych we call nowe Wales. Hengistus, as some Chronicles recorde, reigned. 43. yeares, and died in Kent. Galfridus in suo Britannico sayeth: that he was taken in warre by Aurelius Ambrosius, and beheaded at Coningesburgh, after he had raigned xxxix. yeare.

After the death of Hengist, hys sonne Osca, raigned xxiiij. yeres leauing his sonne Octa, to whose reigne with hys sonne Ymenricus, hystories doe attribute liij. yeares, who also were slaine at length by Vter Pendragon,*Polichroni. Lib. 5. cap. 4.

The Saxones after they were setled in the possession of England, distributed the Realme among themselues, first in seuen partes: euery part to haue his king, that is: The first to be the king of Kent. The second to be king of Sussex and Southerye, holding hys Palace at Cicester. The thirde king was of Westsexe. The fourth king of Essex. The fift king was of the Eastangles,* that is, of Cambridgeshire, Northfolke, and Southfolke. The vj. king of Merceland, or Mercia, and in his kingdome were cōteined the Countesses of Lincolne, Leycester, Huntynghdon, Northampton, Orford, Darby, Warwike. &c. The vii. king had all the countries beyond Humber, and was called king of Northumberland.

Of these seuen kingdomes, although they continued not long, but at length ioyned all in one, comming all into the possession & subiECTION of the Westsaxons: yet for the space they cōtinued (which was w^t continuall trouble & warres among themselues) thys is the race and order of them, as in this Table particularly followeth to be seene.

A Table describing the seuen kingdoms of the Saxons, raigning here in England.

IN the tyme of Vortiger aboue mentioned, began the raigne of the Saxons in this land, the which comming out of 3. sortes of the Germaine people (to witte) the Saxons, the Intes and Angles, replenished the land, of them called now Anglia. Of whom first Hengistus raigned in Kent, which countrey of Kent he had obtayned by Rowen his daughter, of king Vortiger, which was about the yeare of our Lord as some doe count, 476. or as I finde in the computation of our English Tables, 456. in some, 463. After Hengist, came in Octha, with Eosa, or Ysse his kinsman: who afterward succeeded the sayd Hengist in Kent. Not long after came in an other company of the Saxons, with Elle their Captaine, which planted themselues in Southsexe. And after them agayne an other garrison of the Saxons with Cerdice their Captain, which did occupy the West part of the land, called by them Westsaxon. And so likewise the other multitude of the Saxōs after them, which as yet beyng vnchristened and Infidels, deuided the whole land among themselues into vij. kingdoms, as in this Table followeth.

456. The Kings of Kent, with the yeares how long they raigned.

Kent. Hengistus, slaine. 31

 Eosa, or Ysse. 24

Ocha, or Octha.

Emenricus, or Emericus. 26

Ethelbertus, the first of y^e Saxon kings that receyued the fayth by
Aug. an. reg. 35.56

This Ethelbert first of all the Saxons receiued the fayth, and subdued all the other vj. kings, except onely the king of Northumberland.

Edbaldus. 24

Ercombertus. 24

Ercombert commaunded Lent first to be fasted in his dominion.

The kings of Kent.

Egebertus, or Edbrieth slayne. 9

Egebert killed two Sonnes of his Uncle.

Lotharias slayne. 12

Eadrichus. 6

Unto the time of Eadrick all the bishops of Canterbury were Italians.

Nidredus. 7

Some Chronicles doe place these two, Nidredus and Wilhardus, after Edricke, and geue to them seuen yeaes, some agayne do omit them.

Wilhardus. 7

Withredus. 33

Egfertus, or Edbert. 23

Ethelbert. 11

Alricus. 34

Betweene the raygne of Alricke, and Cuthred, some Stories do insert the raigne of Eadbert, which raigned two yeaes.

Eadbertus, surnamed Pren. 2

Cuthredus. 18

Baldredus, expulsed. 81

In the raigne of this Baldred the kingdom of Kent was translated to Egbertus, otherwise called Egbrict, king of the Westsaxōs, who subduing the foresaid Baldred, an. 832. gaue the said kingdome to Athelstan his younger sonne. After whose decease it came to Ethelwolfe the elder sonne of Egbrict, and so was vnited to the Westsaxons, who then began to be the Monarch of the whole land. This kingdom began nere about the yeare of our Lord, 456. and continued 342. yeares, and had xv. kings.

478. The Kings of Southsaxe, with the yeares of their raigne.

Southsaxe.	Elle, or Alle. 31 Cissa.	Of this Cissa came Cicester, which he builded, and where he raigned.
------------	--------------------------	--

Now called Sussex.	Nancanleus, or Nancanleodus.	This Nathanleod seemeth by some old stories to be a Britaine, & the chief Marshall of king Vter, whome Porth the Saxon slew.
-----------------------	------------------------------	--

Porth.	This Porth a Saxon, came in at the hauen, which now is called of him Porthmouth.
--------	--

Ethelwelfus.	Because I find but little mention of these two I thinke it rather like to bee the same Ethelwold or Ethelwaldus, which after followeth.
--------------	---

The kings of Sussex.	Redwallus.
-------------------------	------------

Condebertus.	Of Condebertus and Ethelred I find no mention but in one table only, supposing therfore that the true names of these were Ercombertus and Egebertus, which were kings of Kent the same tyme, and peraduenture might then rule in Sussex.
--------------	--

Ethelredus, or Ethereus.

Adelwood, or Ethelwaldus, slayne.	This Adelwold was the first kyng of Sussex Christened, and as Fabian saith, the iiij. king of the Southsaxōs: as other say the vij. so vncertain be the histories of this kingdom.
-----------------------------------	---

Adelbrich, or Berethunus, slayne. 5

Adhumus. 15

This kingdome endured y^e shortest season of all other, and soonest passed into other kingdoms, in the dayes as some write of Iue king of Westsaxe, and so endured not aboue an hundred & twelue yeres vnder seuen or at most xj. kings, beginning first in the yeare of the Lord, 47• and about the 30. yeare of the first comming of the Saxons.

Westsaxe. 522. The principall kingdome of the Westsaxons, and of their raignes.

This kingdome contained
Cerdicus, or Sommersetshire, Barkshire,
Credicus. 17 Dorsetshire, Deuonshire,
Cornewall, &c.

Kenricus. 26

Chelingus 30.33. lib. cycl.

Celricus, or Ceolfricus. 5

Celwulfus, or Ceolulfus. 14

Kynigilsus & Quicelinus. 32 This Kynigilsus was first Kyng Christened in that prouince, conuerted by Birinus after made Monke.

Kinewalkins. 31

Sexburga. •

Escwynus, Ascwynus, or Elkwinus. 2

The kings of Centwinus, dyed at Rome.
Westsaxe. 7

Cedwalla. 3 Cedwalla went to Rome, and there was Christened and dyed.

Ina, or Iue.

35

Edelardus, or Athelardus.

14

Ina also went to Rome, and was made Monke.

Cuthredus, or Cuthbert. 16

Sigebertus, or Sigherus,
slayne. 1

Sigebert for his pride and crueltie was deposed of his people.
And as he had killed before one of hys faythfull counsel geuing him wholesome counsaile: so after was he slayne of y^e same counsellors Swynard, as he hid him selfe in a wood.

Kynulfus, or Kynewlfus,
slayne. 31

Brithricus. 13

Egbertus, or Egbrichtus, otherwise Athelbert{us}, or Athelbrich, &c. 37

This Egbert was first expelled by Brithricus, who after returning againe and raigning, was much deryded and scorned with mocking runes for a coward of Bernulfus king of Mercia.
At lēgth the sayd Egbert subdued hym first, then all the rest, to his kingdome• causing the whole land to be called no more Britayne, but Anglia. Concerning the other kings after him in that Lordship hereafter followeth.

This Egebert subdued all the other seuen kingdomes, and first began the Monarchie of all the Saxones, which after by Alured was perfected, as hereafter followeth (the lord willing) to be declared. This kingdom of the Westsaxons began the yere of grace, 522. & as it subdued all the other, so it did the longest continue, til about the comming of William Conqueror, which is about the tyme of 554. yeares.

547. Northumberlād.

The Kings of Northumberland, with the yeares of their raigne.

Ida. 12

This Ida of his wife had vj.
children, Adda, Elricus, Osmerus, Theodledus, of concubines other 6.

After Ida the kingdome of Northumberland was deuided into two prouinces, Deyra and Bernicia.

Alle, or Elle, Deirorum. 30

This Alle was the sonne of Iffe, & raigned in Deyra, 30.

Adda, Bernicorum. 7

Some Chronicles set vnder
Adda, to raigne in Bernicia these kings, Glappa or Clappa, Theonulfus, or Husa, or Theowalrus, Frihulfus, Theodoricus.

Alricus, or Alfricus Deirorum. 5

This Alfricus was the sonne of Ida and raigned fiue yeares.

This Ethelfridus was he that slew the monkes of Bangor, to the number Page 111 of 2200.
whyche came to praye for the good successe of the Britaynes, and by hys wife Accan, the daughter of Elle, had vij. sonnes, Eaufridus, Osualdus, Oswius, Oslacus, Osmundus, Os•,
Of•a. Flor. Histor.

Ethelfridus Bernicorū.

Edwinus, Northumberland,
slaine. 17

Thys Edwinus was the first of the Northumberland kings, whych was conuerted and Christened by Paulinus Byshop of London.

Osricus Deirorum, slaine.

These two are put out of the rase of kings, because they reuolted frō the Christian faith, and were both slayne miserablie by Cedwalla a Brittayne, which then raigned in Northumberland, and in Mercia.

Eaufridus Bernicia, slaine.

The kings of Northūberland.

Oswaldus, Northumberland,
slaine.

This Oswaldus, called S. Oswald, fought with Cedwalla, & Penda with a small army, and by strength of prayer vanquished thē in the field. He sent for Aedanus into Scotlād to preach in hys cōūtry, & as he preached in Scottish, y^e king expōūded in English. He was a great geuer of almes to y^e poore. Of his other actes more appeareth hereafter.

Oswius, Northumberland. 28

This Oswius lighting against Penda, vowed to make his daughter Elfred a Nonne, geuing wyth her .12. Lordships, to build 12. Monasteries .vj. in Bernicia .vj. in Deira.

Oswinus raigned together with Oswius in Deira slaine. 7

The same Oswius in the beginning of hys raigne tooke one Oswinus the sonne of Edwyne to be his partener ouer the countrey of Deyra. Afterward causing him to be killed, tooke to hym an other called Edelwald, the sonne of Oswalde. Of thys Oswynus more followeth hereafter to be declared.

Egfridus, Northumberberland.
slayne. 15

Thys Egfrid married Etheldrida, who being xij. yeares married to hym, could after, by no meanes be allured to lye with him, but obtaining of him licence, was made Nunne, & then Abbes of Elye. She made but one meale a day, & neuer weare linen. At last the same Egfrid fighting against y^e Scots, was slayne in the fiede by a trayne of the Scots, faining themselues to flee.

Alridus, Northumberland,
slaine. 20

Of this Alfride, Bede in his historie testifieth that he was exactly and perfectly seene in the holy Scriptures, & recouered much that hys predecessors had lost before. Bed. lib. 4. cap. 24. Some say he raigned not 18. yeares.

Osred{us}, Northumberland,
slaine. 11

Osred began his raigne being but viii. yeares old, and raigned the space of x. yeares.

Kenredus, North. 2

Oriscus, North. 20	Some affirme that Oriscus raigned but xi. yeares.
Celulfus, Northumb. made a Monke. 9	This Celulf after he had raigned .8. yeares was made a Monke. To hym Beda wrote his storie.
Egbertus, or Eadbertus, Northumberlād, Monke. 21
Osulfus, Northumber. slaine. 1
Mollo, or Ethelwold, North. 11.	Mollo by the subtil traine of Altredus was made away, whych Altredus also himselfe after he had raigned x. yeres, was expulsed by his owne people.
In some Chronicles vj. yeeres.
Altredus, Northum. expulsed. 10	In some Chronicles this Altredus raigned but viij. yeares.
Ethelbertus, or Edelredus, Northumberland, expulsed. 5
Alfwoldus, Northumberland slaine, 11
Osredus.
Ethelbertus, or Adelwaldus, North. slaine. 16

After this Ethelbert, the kingdome of Northumberland ceased the space of xxv. yeares, till Egbertus King of the Westsaxons subdued also them, as hee did the other Saxons to his dominion. After the whych Egbert king of the Westsaxons succeeded in Northüberland hys sonne.

Kings of Westsaxons, rainging in Northumberland.

- Ethelwolfus.
- Ethelbertus.
- Ethelbaldus.
- Ethelredus.

In the tyme of thys Ethelredus there were two vnder Kinges in Northumberland Ella, and Osbright, whom the Danes ouercame and raigned in theyr place, whose names were these.

Danes.

- Exbertus.
- Richsi.
- Egebert.
- Gurthed.
- Guthrid.

After the raigne of these foresayd Danes, the kingdome of Northumberland came into the hands of the Westsaxons, in the time of A^thelstane and his brother Edmundus. It began first. An. 547. and so endured. 409. yeares. It contained Yorkeshyre, Notinghamshyre, Darbishyre, the Byshopricke of Dyrham, Copeland and other.

(561) The kings of Mercia, or Merceland with the yeares of their raigne.

Mercia. Grida, or Creodda. 35

Wibba. 20

Ceorlus. 10

Penda slew in battaile Edwyne and Oswald kinges of Northumb. Also Sigebert, Edrike, and Anna, kinges of the Eastangles. Also he droue out Kenwalkins king of the Westsaxons.

Peda, or Weda, slayne by his wife. Under Peda, and Wlferus, Chris^{••}s faith was receiued in those parts, they being conuerted by Finianus Bishop.

The same Peda raygned in a part of Mercia, with hys brother Wlferus, which were both the sonnes of Penda.

Wlferus. 29 This Wlfer{us} by his wife Erneburg had iii. daughters, Milburg, Mildrith, and Mildgith, holy virgines, Adelredus, or Ethelred, made Monke. 30 or. 19 This Adelredus, or Ethelredus was Monke of Baroney, whose sisters were Kynedrid, and Kynswith, holye virgines.

Kenredus made also Monke

at Rome. 5

The Kinges of Mercia.

Ceolredus, or Kelredus.

In the tyme of this Ceolred was Guthlake otherwise called S.
Guthlake, the Popish Eremite of Crouland.

Ethelbaldus,
slaine. 41

Under Ethelbaldus dyed
Beda. Ethelbad gaue that all churches should be free from all exactions and publike charges.

Bernredus. 1

This Bernred for his pride & stoutnes toward his people, was by thē deposed, & the same yeare by the iust iudgement of God burned. Histor. Cariens. Offa causing or cōsenting to the death of good Ethelbert king of the Eastangles, peaceably

Egfredus. 1

Kenulphus, slaine, 20 or.
16.

Kenelmus, murthered
Ceolwolfus expulsed, 1. or 3.

This Kenelme beyng of vii. yeares of age, was wickedly slayne after hee had raygned vi. monethes.

Bernulphus, slaine. 3

Ludecanus, slaine. 2Some
Chronicles here insert
Milefred{us}.

This Ludicane after the 2. yeare of his raigne was slayne of Egbert, king of the Westsaxons, by whome the rest of the Saxons were also subdued.

Wilafius, or Withlacus beheaded. 12

This Withlacus in the beginning of his raigne was vanquished by Egfrid king of Westsaxe, to whome hee became tributarie wyth hys successours here following.

Some wryters say that these kinges were subdued by the Danes.

- Berthulfus. 12
- Buthredus. 20
- Celustus. 1
- Elfredus. 1

After this Elfride the kingdome of the Mercians was translated vnto the Westsaxons, in the latter time of king Alfred, or in the beginning of Edwardus Senior, and so was adioyned to the Westsaxons, beginning. An. 561. It endured the space of 250. yeares, til about the latter end of Aluredus, by whome it was ioyned to the kingdome of Westsaxons. This kingdome stretched out to Huntingtongshire, Hertfordshire, Glocestershire, Worceter, Warwick, Lichfield, Couentry, Chester, Darbshire, Staffordshire, Shrosecbury, Oxforde, Buckingham Dorceter, Lincolne, Leicester. &c.

Segebertus Bonus, or Sibertus, slaine. This Segebertus Bonus or Sibertus, much resorting to Oswy, king of Northumberland, by his perswasion was brought to Christiā baptisme, baptised of Finlanus Bish. to whō also was sent Cedde with other ministers to preache & to baptise in hys countrey. Swithredus, Thys Swithredus was subdued vnto Egbert King of Westsaxons, Albeit London remained vnder the Mercias to the time that they also were subdued to the Westsaxons. This kingdom began. An. 561. and so continued till the time of Egbertus. Some stories say it continued to the time of Edward sonne of Aluredus, about the cōming of the Danes, and contained vnder it the Lordship of Midlesex and London. The Metropolitane sea of this prouince of Essex was London, where the famous Church of S. Paul was builded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert king of Essex, whō Ethelbert had lately before turned to Christes faith: wherof the first bishop was Mellitus, the ij. byshop was Ceddus, y^e third came in by Simonie, whose name was Wine. Malmesb. de vitis Pont. After him was Erkenwaldus, of whom writeth Bede, that he being diseased in hys legges that he could neither go nor ride, yet would be caried about in a litter to preach in his Dioces. &c. Although W. Malmesb. wryting of the Byshoppes of London in his booke De vitis Ponti. sayth that Mauritius first the kings Chauncelor, then Byshop there, did first begin this so large and famous building of the Church of S. Paul in London: Which worke after him Richardus his successour did prosecute, bestowing al the rents of his Bishopricke vpon the same, and yet was scarsely seene: yet herein may be answered peraduenture, that the Church builded before by King Ethelbert, and king Sigebert, myght be ouerthrowen by the Danes, and afterward was reedified by these Bishops aboue mentioned.

After this sinfull murther of Ethelbert, the kingdome of Eastangles during the time of certaine yeares, was in great trouble and desolation, vnder diuers kings and tyrants, sometime the king of Westsaxe, somtimes of Kent, or of Mercia, hauing dominion ouer them, till the comming of S. Edmund, whych was the last King there ruling vnder the Westsaxons.

- S. Edmund, Martyred. 16.

After the death of S. Edmund, being slaine of the Infidel Danes, the kingdom remained with the Danes .50. yeares, till at length Edward King of the Westsaxons, expelled the Danes, and ioyned it to hys kingdome. It began about the yere of our Lord .561. and continued neare about 377. yeares. Fabian numbreth but 12. kinges, but in other I finde moe.

The Metropolitane sea of this prouince of Eastangles, which was first at a towne called Dunmoke or,* or Dūwich (which in time past hath bene a famous & populous towne w^t a maior & 4. bailifs, & also diuers Parish Churches, & hospitals, whereunto great priuiledges by diuers kings haue bene graunted, whych towne is nowe fallen into ruine and decay, and more then half consumed by the eating in of the Sea, as also greatly impouerished by losse of the Hauen, which heretofore hath flourished wyth diuers tall shippes belonging to the same (the inhabitantes therof being not able of them selues to repaire it wythout the helpe of other good people,) where the first bishop was Felix, a Burgundian, who sate there 14. yeres. After this, vnto the time of Egbert King of Westsaxe, thys prouince was euer ruled by two Bishops, wherof the one had hys sea at Dunmoke, now called Dunwich. The other at Demaham, where 12. sate, one after an other. From thence it was translated to Thetford, where sate three Bishops. At last by Byshoppe Herbert it was remooued to Norwich, where he erected a Monasterie of Monkes.

And thus standeth the order and race of the Saxon kinges, raigning together wyth the Britaines in thys Realme. Nowe foloweth the description of the Britayne kings, raigning with the Saxons in like maner.

Although the miserable Britaines thus were beried of their land, by the cruel subtilty of the Saxons, yet were they not so driuē out or expelled, but that a certaine kingdom remained amōg them, in some part of the lād, namely about Cornewall, and the partes of Cambria, which is deuided in two partes, Southwales, called Demetia, and Northwales called Venedocia. The sayd Britaines moreouer through the valiant actes of their kings, sometimes raigned also in other countreis, displacing the Saxons, & recouering againe their owne: somtimes more, somtimes lesse, till the time of Carecius, when as the Britaines being deposed by Godmundus, (whose help they themselues sent for out of Irelande, agaynst Carecius theyr wicked King) vtterly lost their land and kingdome: being thence driuen vtterly into Wales and Cornewale, the yere of our Lorde 570. What the order of these kings was, what were theyr actes, their names, and times when they raigned: in this briefe table vnder wrytten is expressed. Wherein first is to be premonished that Constantinus secundus had three childrē, to wit, Constans, whych was made a Monke in Winchester, and after made a king: the seconde was Aurelius Ambrosius: the thirde was Vter Pendragon. This being premised, we wil now enter the description of our Table, beginning with Vortigernus.

A Table declaring the Kings of Britayne, which raigned together with the Saxones, after their comming into this land. Kings of Britaine whiche here raigned in the time of the Saxones.

- Vortigernus.
- Vortimerius.
- Vortigernus, againe.
- Aurelius Ambrosius.
- Vter Pendragon.
- Arthurus.
- Constantinus 3.
- Aurelius.
- Conanus.
- Vortiperius.
- Malgo.
- Carecius.

Here is to be vnderstand that these Britaine kings aboue mentioned, did not so raign here in this land, frō the time of Vortigerne, that they had the full possession and gouernement ouer all the whole realme: but only ouer parcels or partes, such as by force of armes, they could either Page 113 hold or win from the Saxons: * which cōming in daily and growing vpon thē, did so replenish the land w^t multitudes of them, that y^e Britains at lēgth were neither able to hold y^t which they had, nor to recouer that which they lost: Leauing exaple to al ages & countreis, what it is, first to let in forreine nations into their dominion, * but especially what it is for Princes to ioyne in mariage with infidels: as this Vortiger did w^t Hengistus daughter, which was the mother of al this mischief: geuing to the Saxons not only strēgth, but also occasion and courage to attempt that whych they did. Neyther was this vncōsidered before of the Britaine Lords and Nobilitie: who worthely being therew^t offended, iustly deposed their king, & introned Vortimerus hys sonne in his rounge. By the which Vortimer being a punāt prince, the Saxons were then repulsed and driuen againe into Germany, where they stayed a while till the death of Vortimer whome Rowen daughter of Hengistus caused traiterously to be poysoned. * Then Vortiger being again restored to his kingdome, through the entreatie of Rowen hys wife, sent into Germanie againe for Engist, who eftsoones making his returne, came in wyth a name of 300. shippes wel appointed. * The Nobles of Britain hearing this, prepared them selues to the contrary side in all forceable wise to put them of. But Engist through Rowen hys daughter so laboured the king: excusing himselfe, and saying that he brought not the multitude, to worke any violence eyther against him or against his coūtrey, but only thinking that Vortimer had yet bene aliue, whom he minded to impugne for the kings sake, and to take hys part. And nowe for so much as he heareth of y^e death of Vortimer hys enemie, hee therefore committeth both himselfe & his people to his disposition, to appoint how few or how many of thē he wold to remaine within his land: the rest should returne. And if it so pleased the King, to appoynt day & place, where they might meete and talke together of the matter, both he and his would stande to such order as the king with his counsaile should appoynt. With these faire words the king and his nobles (wel contented) did assigne to them both day & place, which was in the towne of Ambry: where he ment to talke with them, adding thys condition w^t all, that eche part shoulde come without any maner of weapon. Engist shewing him selfe well agreed thereto,* gaue priuy intelligence to his side, that eche man should cary w^t him secretly in his hose a long knife, w^t their watch worde also geuen vnto them whē they should draw their kniues: wherwith euery Saxon shoulde (and so did) kill the Britayne, wyth whō he talked, as is aboue declared. The Britaine Lords being slayne, the Saxons tooke Vortigerne the King, and bound him: for whose ransome they required to be deliuered to them the Cittie of London, Yorke, Lincolne, Winchester, w^t other the most strongest holdes within the lande whych being to them graunted, they begin to make spoile & hauocke of the Britaine nation, destroying the Citizens, plucking downe Churches, killing vp the Priestres, burning the Bookes of the holy Scripture, leauing nothyng vndone that tyrannie could worke, whych was about the yeare of our Lorde. 462. The King seeing thys miserable slaughter of the people fled into Wales.

This whyle Aurelius Ambrosius, & Vter Pendragon brethren to king Constans aboue mentioned, whō Vortigerne wickedly caused to be killed,* were in little Britayne. To whome the Britaynes sent woorde, desiring theyr ayde in helping their countrey. Aurelius vnderstanding the wofull state of the Realme,* speedeth hym ouer to satisfie their desire, and to rescue (what in him was) their necessitie. Who at his first commyng eftsoones being crowned for theyr king seeketh out wicked Vortigerne, the cause of all thys trouble and murder of king Constās hys brother. And finding him in Wales in a strong tower, wherein he had immured him selfe,* setteth hym and his castell on fire. That done he moued his power against the Saxons, w^t whom, and wyth Elle Captaine of the Southsaxons (who then was newly come ouer) he had diuers conflicts.

Our English old Chronicles make record that Horsus the brother of Engist was slaine before in the time of Vortimer. The same also doe recorde, that thys Engist was taken prisoner in the field, fighting against Aurelius Ambrosius▪ who then cōsulting with his Nobles and Barons, what was to be done with him: the Byshop of Glocester, called Eldadus, standing vp, gaue this counsaile, saying: that 〈◇〉 all men would deliuer him, yet he with his owne hāds wold cut him in peeces, alleaging the exāple of Samuel against Agag King of the Amelech, taken by King Saul in the field: whome the sayde Samuel caused to be cut in peeces. Euen so (saith he) do you to this Agag here: that as he hath made many a woman widow, and without childrē: so his mother mai be made this day of him likewise. And so was Engist taken out of the Citie by Eldo Consull or Maior of Glocester, and there was beheaded: if truth or credit be to be geuen to these our old Britaine stories: wherof I haue nothing certainly to pronōuce, but that I may suspect the truth therof, which was about the yeare of our Lord. 490. Henr. Hunting. Galfr. cum alijs.

A certaine auncient written history I haue in Latine, compiled in the .xiiij. yeare of king Richard the seconde, and by him caused to be writtē as the title declareth: whych because it beareth no name of the author: I cal it by the name of him of whom I borrowed thys booke,* wyth many other likewise without name, Historia Carians. This hystorie recordeth that Hengistus dyed in Kent the xxxii. yeare of hys raigne: which if it be true, then is it false that he was taken at Cunynburgh, and slaine in the North. Thys Aurelius Ambrosius before mentioned,* is thought of Polidorus Vergilius citing the authoritye of Bede, to descende of the stocke of the Romaines: whych as it is not vnpossible to be true: so this is certaine by the full accord of al our old wrytten stories, that both the sayde Aurelius, and his brother Vter Pendragon being the sonnes of Constantinus, brother to Andoenus king of litle Britaine, were nursed and brought vp in England, in their tender age, and instructed by Gultelinus Archbyshop of London, and after the murder of Constans their elder brother, were conueied from hence to litle Britaine: whereby it is manifest that they were borne in thys land, and though their father were a Romaine as Polydorus pretēdeth, yet lyke it is that they were Britains borne, and had a Britaine to their mother.

After the death of Aurelius, who (as the storie sayeth) was poysoned by the crafty meanes of Pascentius,* sonne of Vortigernus (suborning one, vnder the weede of a Monke to play the Phisicion, and so to poyson him) next succeeded hys brother Vter, surnamed Pendragon, about the yeare of our Lord. 497. who fighting against Octa and Cosa,* tooke them and brought them to London there to be kept. But they breaking out of pryson returned into Germanie for more aid. In this meane time daily recourse was of Saxons, with great companies cōming out of Saxonie: with whom the Britains had diuers & sundry conflictes,* sometimes winning, sometimes loosing. Not long after Octa & Cosa, renuing their power in Germany, in all most speedy hast did returne againe, and ioyne with the other Saxons against the Britaines. Heere began the state of miserable Britaine daily more and more to decay,* while the idolatrous Saxons preuailed in number and strength against the Christian Britaines: oppressing the people, throwing downe Churches and Monasteries, murdering the Prelates, sparing neither age nor person, but wasting christianity almost through the whole realme. To these miseries it fell moreouer that Vter their king was sicke & could not come out. Notw^tstanding being greeued with the lamentable destructiō of his people, caused his bed to be brought into the campe, where God gaue him victorie: Octa & Cosa there being slaine. After this victorie in short space Vter died of poyson (as is sayde) put into a fountaine of water, whereof the king was wont to drinke, about the yeare of our Lorde. 516. Hor. Hist.

About which time and yeare,* came in Stuph and Wigarius two nephewes of Certhice king of Westsaxons, wyth their companies so violently vpon the Britains, that they of the West part of the realme, were not able to resist them. Then the merciful prouidence of almighty God, raised vp for them King Arthure,* the sonne of Vter: who was then crowned after him and victoriously raigned. To thys Arthure the old Britaine historyes do ascribe xij. great victories against the Heathen Saxons: whose notorious & famous conquests, mētioned in the Britain stories, I leaue them as I finde them: referring them to the credite of their authors in whom they are found. Notwithstanding as I do not thinke contrary, but God by the foresayde Arthure, gaue to the Britaines some stay and quietnes during his life,* and certaine of his successours: so touching certaine of great victories & conquests, not onely ouer thys land, but also ouer all Europe, I iudge them more fabulous, then y^t any credit should be geuen vnto them, more worthy to be ioyned with the Iliades of Homere, then to haue place in any Ecclesiasticall hystorie.* After Arthure next King of the Britaines, was Constantinus the third. After him Aurel[•]us Conanus. Then Vortiporius, after whome followed Malgo, noted in storyes to be a Sodomite. And after hym the last King of the Britaines, was Carecius, all geuen to Ciuill warre, execrable to God & man. Who being chased out by the Britains thēselues, the land fell to the possession of the Saxons: about the yere of our Lord. 568. by whom all the Clergy and the Christiā ministers of the Britaines, were then vtterly driuen out: In so much that Theonus Archbishop Page 114 of London,* & Thadeseus Archbishop of Yorke, seeing theyr Churches all wasted, and Parishes dispersed, wyth their cariages and monumēts: left theyr seas in Britaine, and fled into Cambria, which we nowe call Wales. Touching which matter, and touching also the cause of this desolation & ruine of the Britaines kingdom, the first fountaine & origin therof partly before is declared, where was shewed in the time of Cōstantinus Magnus and Maximinian, pag. 108. howe these noble Princes with other moe, achieuing their venturous affaires in other countreis, tooke w^t them great multitudes & armies out of Britaine: through the occasion whereof, the land was greatly empaiied and depriued of his most chiefe and principall nobles, being caried away to serue in forreine warres. Whyche was no small cause, why the realme of Britaine (being so wasted) was the lesse able to helpe it selfe against theyr enemyes. Although this was not the chief occasion, but other causes there were greater, wherfore God by his iust iudgement, suffered this plague and ouerthrow to fall vpon that people, as here out of an olde author,* and partly out of Gildas, as I haue found it, so I thought to annexe it in hys owne woordes, first in Latine, then afterwarde Englishing the same, for the more credite of that which shalbe alleaged, in tenour as foloweth.

Nobiliores totius regni praedictos duces sequ•ti fuerunt & ignobiles remanebāt,* qui cum vicem nobilium obtinere coepissent, extulerunt se vltra quod dignitas expetebat. Et ob affluentia diuitiarum superbi coeperunt, tali & tantae fornicationi indulgere, qualis nec inter gentes audita est. Et, vt Gildas historicus testatur, non solū hoc vitium sed omnia quae humanae naturae accidere solent, & praecipue quod totius boni euertit statu, odium veritatis, amor mendacij, susceptio mali pro bono, veneratio nequitiae pro benignitate: exceptatio Sathanae pro angelo lucis: vngebantur reges, non propter dominium, sed qui caeteris crudeliores essent. Si quis verò eorum mitior, & veritati aliquatenus propior videretur, in hunc quasi Britanniae subuersorem omnia odia, tela{que} torquebantur. Omnia quae Deo placebant & displicebant aequali lance inter eos pendebantur. Et non solū hoc seculares viri, sed & ipse grex domini, eius{que} pastores sine discretione faciebant. Non igitur admirandum est degeneres tales patriam illam amittere quam praedicto modo maculabant.

*In English thus: The nobles of this realme folowing the Princes and Captaines aboue named: by the reason thereof the vulgare and rascall sorte remained behinde at home. Who when they had gotten the rouses and places of the nobles, they aduanced them selues aboue that their dignitie required. And through their aboundāce of riches, they surprised wyth pride, began to fal into such & so great fornication, as was neuer heard of euen among the Gentiles. And as Gildas the Hystoriographer witnesseth, not into vice only, but also into al maner of wickednes, wherto mans nature is inclined: and especially into that which is the ouerthrow of al good estates, the hatred of the truth, loue of lies, imbracing of euil in stead of goodnesse, regardyng of mischiefe in stead of vertue, receauing of the deuill in stead of an Angell of light. They annoynted kings not such as could wel rule a common wealth, but those which exceeded all other in cruelty. And if any might be perceaued to be somewhat more humble or meeke, or to be more inclined to fauour the trueth then the residue, him did euery one hate and backbite as the ouerthrower and destroyer of Brittain. All thinges whether they pleased or displeased God, they regarded alyke. And not secular men onely did this. but also the congregation of the Lorde and their Bishops and teachers without any difference at all. Therefore it is not to be marueiled, that such people so degenerating and going out of kinde should lose that countrey, which they had after this maner defiled.

And thus much hetherto concerning the history of the Britaines, till, by the grace of Christ, the order of time shal bring vs heereafter to the treatise of Cedwalla and Calwalladrus. Nowe remaineth, in returning againe to the matter of the Saxons, to discourse particularly, that which before in the table aboue we haue sommarely comprehended.

In this order and rase of the Saxon kings, aboue specified which had thus thrust out the Britones, & now deuided their land in seuen kingdomes: as there were many noughty and wicked kings (whose pernicious examples, being all set on warre and bloudshed, are greatly to be detested and eschued of all true godly Princes) so some there were againe (although but fewe) very sincere & good. But none almost from the first to the last, which was not either slaine in warre, or murdered in peace, or els constrained to make him selfe a monke. Such was the rage then and tyranny of that time. Whether we shuld impute it to the corruption of mans nature, or to the iust iudgement of Gods hand, so disposing the matter, that as they had violently & falsely dispossessed the Britons of their right: so they most miserably were not onely vexed of the Danes, and cōquered at last by the Normās: but also more cruelly deuoured them selues, one warring still agaynst an other, till they were neyther able to helpe themselues, nor yet to resist others. Of thē which are noted for good among these Saxon kings,* the first and principal is Ethelbertus, or Ethelbrict the first king of Kent aboue specified, who by the meanes of Austen, and partly through hys wife, named Berda, firste receiued and preferred the Christian faith, in al this land of the English Saxons, wherof more foloweth hereafter to be said (the Lorde so permitting) as place and oportunitie shall require. The next place I geue to Oswaldus of Northumberland, who not onely did hys endeuour in furthering the faith of Christ amongst his people: but also being king, disdained not himselfe to stande vp and interprete to his nobles & subiectes the preaching of Aidanus, preaching Christ to them in his Scottish language. In the same cōmendation also, like as in the same line, commeth hys vncle Edwin, king of Northumberlād, a good Prince, and the first receauer of Christes faith in that land, by the meanes of his wife, and Paulinus Byshop. Adde to these also Sigebert, first Christened king of the Eastangles, & Sebert, first Christened king of Essex: of whome the one was a great furtherer of Religion, & setter vp of scholes: y^e other which is Sebert or Sexbrieth, was neuew to Ethelbert of Kent, vnder whom he ruled in Essex. By the which Ethelbert, in the time of the sayd Sebert the Church of Paules was builded at London, and Christian faith much enlarged. &c. Of the same name there was also an other Ethelbert King of the Eastangles, a good Prince: who by the aduise of his counsaile perswaded to mariage (though against his wil) went peaceably to King Offa for despousage of Athilride hys daughter, wher the good king meaning innocētly through the sinister and deuilishe counsaile of king Offa hys wife, was secretely beheaded and made away. Whereupon Offa through repentance thereof, made the first Peter pence to be geuen to S. Peters church in Rome.

In the Cathologue of these good kinges is also to be numbered Kenelmus king of the Mercians, and Edmundus king of the Eastangles:* of the which ij. the first was falsely & abominably circumuented & beheaded, by the meanes of his cruell sister and hys tutor; as he was in his hunting at Corfcastle. The other whych is called king Edmund the Martyr, was slaine at Bury, or as some wryte at the Castle of Halesdon by the Danes: vpon what occasion, histories do vary. The author of Flores Historiarū sayeth, it was by reason of one Lothebrocus a Dane: who being of the kings bloud, & being with his Hawke on the sea side in a litle boat, was driuen by force of weather into the coast of Northfolke, wher he being presented to king Edmūd, was retained in his Court with great fauour: til at length one Bericke the kings Fawkner, enuying and despiting hym, for his great dexteritie in that facultie, priuily did murder him in a wood. This being at last spied

(as murder lightly will come out) Bericke was set in Lothbrockes boate alone without all tackling, to be cōmitted vnto the Sea: and as it chāced so, was driuen into Denmarke, who there being seene in Lothbrockes boate, was straitly examined of the partie. He then to excuse himselfe, falsly sayd he was slaine by the cōmandement of the king. Upō the occasion wherof Inguar and Hubba sonnes to the sayde Lothebroke gathering an army of Danes, inuaded first Northūberland: after that bursting into Northfolke on euery side, sent thys message to king Edmund after this tenor: Signifying that king Inguar the victorious Prince (dreade both by sea and lande) as he had subiect diuers other landes vnder him,* so arriuing now to the coasts of Northfolke, where he intēdeth to winter: chargeth and commaundeth him to deuide with him his olde treasures, and his fathers riches, and so to rule vnder him: which if he would not do, but wold cōtemne his power so strōgly furnished wyth such an army, he should be iudged as vnworthy both of kingdom & life. &c. The king hearing this message, not a little astonysed therat, calling his cōsaile about hym, consulted w^l them, especially with one of his Bishops, being then his Secretarie, what was best to be done: who fearing the kinges life, exhorted him by wordes & diuers examples to agree to the message. At this a while the king holding his peace, at length thereto made aunswere againe in these wordes, saying: Go (saith he) tel your Lord, and let him know that Edmundus the Christened King, for the loue of this temporal life, wil not subiect him selfe to a Pagane Duke, vnles before he become a Christiā, &c. The messenger taking his answere was not so soone out of the gates, as Inguar meeting him and bidding him to be short in declaring hys answere, caused all the kings garrison to be set round about. Page 115 Some say that the king flying to Thetforde, there pitcht a field with the Danes, but the Danes preuailing,* the good king from thence did flie to the Castle of Halesdon aboue mentioned: where he beyng pursued of the Danes was there taken, and at length being bounde to a stake, there, of the raging Danes was shot to death. And thus much for the good kings.

Now as concerning those kinges which made them selues Monks (which in number be vij. or viij.) although the example be rare & straung,* and much commēded of the chroniclers of that time: yet I cannot rashly assent to their cōmendation, albeit the case therof is no matter of our history. First in altering their estate from kings to monkes, if they did it to finde more ease, and lesse trouble thereby: I see not howe that excuse standeth with the office of a good man, to chaunge his publike vocation, for respect of priuat commodity. If feare of ieoperdy & daunger did driue them therunto: what praise and commendation they deserue, in so doing let the monkish histories iudge what they lyst: me seemeth so much prayse as they deserue in prouiding their owne safetie, so much they deserue againe to be discōmended in forsaking the common welth. If they did it (as most like it is) for holinesse sake, thinking in that kinde of life to serue and please God better: or to merite more toward their saluaciō then in the estate of a king, therin they were far deceaued: not knowing tha• the saluation which cōmeth of God, is to be measured & estemed, not by mans merits, or by any perfectiō of life or by differēce of any vocation more of one then another, but only by the free grace of the gospell, which freely iustifieth all them, that faythfully beleue in Christ Iesu. But here will be saide againe peraduenture, in the solitary life of Monkery, be fewer occasions of euils, then in kings courtes, wherefore that lyfe serueth more to holines,* & more is to be preferred then the other. To this I aunswere, to auoid the occasions of euill is good where strength lacketh to resist. But otherwyse, where duety & charge bindeth to tary, there to auoyde the occasiōs of euil, where rather they are to be resisted: rather declareth a weakenes of the man, thē deserueth any praise. As it is truely saide of Tullie: Out of Asia, saith he, to liue, a good life, is no god a mercy: but in Asia where so great occasiōs of euils abound, there to liue a good mā that is praise worthy. With the like reason I may infer, if a man be called to be a king, there not to chaunge the vocation for voiding of occasions, but rather to resist occasions, & to keepe his vocation, declareth a good & perfect man. But of these bymatters hetherto sufficient.

*These things now thus premised, concerning the order & raigne of kinges, as is aboue prefixed: consequently it remaineth to enter the tractation of such thinges, as in the time and raigne of the foresaide kings happened in the Church: first putting the Reader againe in minde of the former persecutions within the realme, partly before touched in the time of the Britaine kinges, which speciallye were three or foure before the commyng of Austen into Englande.

1, The first was vnder Dioclesian, and that not onely in England but generally throughout al the Romaine Monarchie, as is aboue specified. In this persecution Albanus Iulius, Aaron, with a great number moe of other good Christian Britanes, were martyred for Christes name.

2. The seconde persecution or destruction of Christian faith, was by the inuading of Gnauius and Melga, whereof, the first was captaine of the Hunnes, the other of y^e Pictes. These two tyrauntes, after the cruell slaughter of Vrsula, and other. 11000 noble virgines, made their rode into Brytaine hearyng the same to be destitute of y^e strength of men. At what time they made miserable murder of Christes Saints, spoiling & wasting Churches, without mercy either of women or children, sparing none.

3. The third persecution came by Hengist, and the Saxones: who likewise destroied and wasted the christen congregations within the lande, like raging Wolues fleeyng vpon the sheepe, & spilling the bloud of Christians, til Aurellus Ambrosius came, and restored againe the Churches destroyed.

4. The fourth destruction of Christen faith & Religion was by Gurmundus a Pagan king of the Africanes: who ioyning in league with the Saxons, wrought much greuaunce to the christians of the land. In so much that Theonus Byshop of London, and Thadioceus Bishop of Yorke, with the rest of the people so many as were left, hauing no place wherin to remaine with safety, did flee some to Corn^wall, and some to the mountaines of Wales about the yere of our Lord 550. and this persecution remained to the time of Ethelbert king of Kent, an. 589.

In the raigne of this Ethelbert, which was then the 5. king of Kent, the faith of Christ was first receaued of the Saxons or Englishmen, by the meanes of Gregory bishop of Rome, in maner and order as here foloweth, out of old histories collected and recorded.

First then to ioyne the order of our history together: The Christē faith first receiued of king Lucius, endured in Britaine till this time, neare vpon the season of CCCC. yeares and odde: when by Gurmundus Africanus, (as is saide) fyghting wyth the Saxons against the Brytaynes, it was neare extinct in all the land, duryng the space about fortie foure yeares.* So that the first springing of Christes Gospell in thys lande, was an. 180. The comming of the Saxons was. an. 449. or an. 469. The comming of Austen, was an. 596. From the first entring in of the Saxons to their complet conquest, and the driuing out of the Brytanes (which was aboute the latter time of Gadwalader) were 240. yeares.* In summe from Christ to Lucius were, 180. yeares. The continuaunce of the gospel frō Lucius to the entring of the Saxons was 302. yeares. The decay of the same to the entring of Austen, was. 143. yeares which being added together make from Lucius to Austen. 445. from Christ to Austen they make 598. yeares. In this yeare then. 598. Austen being sent from Gregory came into England: the occasion wherupon Gregory sent him hether was this.

In the daies of Pelagius Byshop of Rome,*Gregory chauncyng to see certayne chyldren in the market place of Rome (brought thether to be sould out of England) being faire and beautifull of visage,demaunded out of what coūtrey they were: and vnderstanding they were Heathenish out of England, lamented the case of y^e land being so beautifull and Angelicall, so to be subiecte vnder the Prince of darknes. And asking moreouer out of what prouince they were it was aunswered, out of Deyra, a part of Northsaxons: wherof as it is to be thought, that which we now cal Deyrham taketh his name. Then he alluding to the name of Deyra, these people (saith he) art to be deliuered de Dei'ira, which is from Gods wrath, Moreouer vnderstanding the kings name of that prouince to be Alle (aboue mentioned) alluding likewise to his name: there (saith he) ought Alleluia to be song to the liuing God. Wherevpon beyng moued and desirous to go and helpe the cōuersion of that country, was not permitted of Pelagius and the Romanes for that time to accomplish his desire. But afterwarde being Bishop himselfe next after Pelagius, he sent thether the foresaide Austen with other preachers neere about to the nūber of xl. But by the waye, howe it happened I cannot saye: As Austen with his company were passing in theyr iourney, such a sodaine feare entred in their harts (that as Antonius saith) they returned all. Other write that Austen was sent backe to Gregory againe, to release them of that viage so daungerous and vncertaine, amongst such a barberous people: whose language neither they knewe, nor whose rudenes they were able to resist. Thē Gregory with pithy perswasions confirming and comforting him, sent him againe with letters both to the Bishop of Arelalensis, willing him to helpe and aide the said Austen,* and his company in all whatsoever his neede required. Also other letters he directed by the foresaid Austine, vnto his fellowes, exhorting them to go foreward boldly in the Lords work, as by the tenour of the said Epistle here followyng maye appeare.

Gregorius seruus seruorum Dei,seruis Domini nostri. Quia melius fuerat bona non incipere, quam ab ijs quae coepta sunt cogitatione retrorsum redire, &c. In Englishe. Gregory the seruaunt of Gods seruaunts, to the seruaunts of the Lord. Forasmuch as it is better not to take good things in hande, then after they be begon, to thinke to reuolt backe from the same againe therefore now you may not nor cannot (deare children) but with all feruent study and labor, must needes go forward in that good busines, which through the helpe of God you haue wel begunne. Neither let the labor of your iourney, nor the slanderous tounge of men appalle you, but that with all instaunce and feruency yee proceede, and accomplish the thing which the Lorde hath ordeyned you to take in hande: knowing that your great trauell shalbe recompensed with rewarde of greater glorie hereafter to come. Therefore as we sende here Austen to you againe, whom also we haue ordeined to be your gouernour, so doe you humblye obey him in all thinges, knowing that it shall be profitable so for your soules, whatsoever at his admonition yee shall doe. Almighty God with his grace defend you and graunt me to see in the eternall country the fruite of your labour, that although I can not labour as I woulde wyth you, yet I may be found pertaker of your retribution, for that my will is good to labour in the same felowship with you together. The Lord God keepe you safe, most deare and welbeloued children. Dated the x before the Calendes Page 116 of August, in the raigne of our soueraigne Lord Mauritius most vertuous Emperour, the .xiiij. of his Empire.

Thus they emboldened & comforted through the good wordes of Gregory, sped forth their iourney till they came at length to the Ile of Thene•• lying vpon the East side of Kent. Neare to the which landing place, was then the Manory or palace of the king, not farre from Sandwiche (Eastward from Caunterbury) which the inhabitauntes of the Isle, then called Richbourgh: whereof some part of the ruinous walles is yet to be sene. The king then raigning in Kent, was Ethelbert, as aboue appeareth, the fifte King of that prouince: who at that time had Married to wyfe a French woman beyng Chrystened,* named Berda: whom he had receiued of her parents vpon this conditiō, that he shoulde permitte her with her Bishop committed vnto her, called Lebardus, to enioye the freedome of her fayth and Religion: by the meanes whereof he was more flexible, and sooner induced to embrace the preaching and doctrine of Christ. Thus Austen beyng arryued sent forth certayne messengers and interpreters to the Kyng, sygnifying that such a one was come from Rome, brynging with hym glad tydings to him and all his people, of lyfe and saluation eternally to reygne in heauen, with the onely true and lyuing God, for euer: if he would so willingly harken to the same, as he was gladly come to preache and teach it vnto him.

The King, who had heard of this Religion before by meanes of his wife, within a few daies after commeth to the place where Austen was to speake with him: but that shoulde be without the house, after the maner of his lawe. Austen against his cōming, as stories affirme, erected vp a banner of the crucifixe (such was then the grosenes of that tyme) and preached to him the word of God.* The Kyng aunswering againe saith in effect as followeth: the words be very faire that you preach and promise. Neuerthesse, because it is to me vncoth and new, I can not soone starte away from my country law wherwith I haue bene so lōg inured and assent to you.* Albeit yet notwithstanding for y^e ye are come, as ye saye, so farre for my sake: ye shall not be molested by me, but shall be rightwell intreated, hauing al thinges to you ministred necessarye for your supportatiō. Besydes this, neither doe we debarre you, but to haue fre leaue to preach to our people and subiects to conuert, whō ye may to the faith of your Religion.

When they had receaued this comfort of the king, they went with procession to the Citie of Dorobernia, or Caunterbury, singyng Alleluya with the Letanie, which then by Gregory, had beene vsed at Rome in the time of the great plague reigning thē at Rome, mentioned in old histories. The wordes of the Letany were these:Deprecamur te Domine in omni misericordia tua, vt auferatur furor tuus & ira tua a ciuitate ista, & de domo sancta tua: quoniam peccauimus. Alleluya. That is. We beseech thee O Lorde in all thy mercyes, that thy fury and anger maye cease from this Citie, & from thy holy house for we haue sinned. Alleluya. Thus they entryng in the Citie of Dorobernia, the head Citie of all that dominion at that time, where the king had gyuen them a mansion for there abode: there they contynued preaching and baptising such as they had conuerted in the east side of the Citty in the old church of S. Martine (where the Queene was woont to resorte) vnto the time that the kyng was conuerted himselfe to Christ. At length when the king had wel cōsidered the honest conuersation of their life, and moued with the myracles wrought through gods hand by thē, he heard them more gladly, and lastly by their wholsome exhortations, and example of godly life he was by them conuerted and christened in the yeare aboue specified. 586. and the 36. yeare of his reigne. After the King was thus conuerted, innumerable other daily came in, & were adioyned to the Church of Christ: whom the King did specially embrace but cōpelled none: for so he had learned that the faith and seruice of Christ ought to be voluntary, and not coacted. Then he gaue to Austen a place for hys Byshops sea at Christes Church in Dorobernia, & builded the Abbey of Saint Peter and Paule,* in the East side of the sayde Citie, where after Austen, and all the Kinges of Kent were buried, and that place is now called S. Austen.

In this while Austen sailed into Fraunce to the Byshop Arelatensis, called Ethereus: by him to bee consecrated Archbishop, by the commaundement of Gregory, & so was. Also the said Austen sent to Rome, Laurentius one of his cōpany, to declare to Gregory how they had sped, and what they had done in Englande: sending with all to haue the counsaile and aduise of Gregory, concerning ix. or x. questions, whereof some are partly touched before.

The tenour of his questions or interrogations, wyth the aunsweres of Gregory to the same: here follow in English briefly translated.

The questions of Austen Archbyshop of Caunterbury sent to Gregory, with the aunswere againe of Gregory to the same.

The first interrogation.

MY first question (reuerende father) is concerning Byshops,* how they ought to behaue themselues towarde their clerks Or of such oblations as the faithfull offer vpon the altar: what portions or diuidentes ought to be made thereof.

The aunswere.

How a Bishop ought to behaue himselfe in the Congregation,* the holy scripture testifieth which I doubt not but you know right well, especialye in the Epistles of S Paule to Timothie: wherein he laboureth to informe the sayd Timothe, how to behaue his conuersation in y^e house of the Lord. The maner is of the sea Apostolike, to warne and charge all such as be ordeined Bishops, of all their stipend or that which giuen, to make foure pertitiōs. One to the Bishop for hospitalitie, and receauing commers in. An other to the Clergy,* The third to the pore. The fourth to the repairing of Churches. But because your brotherhode instructed with rules of Monasticall discipline, cānot liue separated from your clerkes about you, therfore in the English Church (which nowe through the prouidence of God is brought to the faith of Christ) you muste obserue this institution, concerning your conuersation, which was in the first Fathers in the begynning of the prymitiue Church, among whom there was not one which counted any thing to be his owne proper, of all that he did possesse: but all was common among them.

The seconde interrogation.

I desire to know and to be instructed,* whether Clerkes that cannot containe, may marry. And if they do mary whether then they ought to returne to the secular state againe or no?

The aunswere.

If there be any Clerkes out of holy orders,* which can not contene, let them haue their wiues, and take their stipends or wages without. For we read it so written of the foresayd fathers, that they deuised to euery person, according as their worke was. Therefore as concerning the stipend of such, it must be prouided and thought vpon. And they must be also holden vnder Ecclesiasticall discipline, to liue a godly cōuersation: to employ themselues in singing Psalmes, & to refraine their tongue, hart and body (by the grace of God) from all things vnseemely, and vnlawfull▪ As for the vulgar and common sort, which lyue after the common condition of men: to describe what partitions to make, what hospitalitie to keepe, or what works of mercy to exhibite to such, I haue nothing to saye but to giue (as our maister teacheth) in all our deedes of mercy; of that which aboundeth. Of that (saith he) whiche aboundeth or is ouerplus, gyue almes, and beholde all thinges bee cleane vnto you.

The thyrd interrogation.

Seing there is but one faith, how happeneth it then, the ceremonies and customes of Churches to bee so diuers.* As in the Church of Rome there is one custome, and maner of Masse▪ and the French Church hath an other?

The aunswere.

The custome of the Church of Rome,* what it is you know: wherin ye remēber that you 〈◇〉 bene brought vp frō your youth: but rather it pleaseth me better, that whether it be in the church of Rome, or in any Frēch Church: where ye finde any thing that seemeth better to the seruice and pleasing of God: that ye chuse the same: and so inferre & bring into the English Church (which is yet new in the faith) the best & pikedst thinges chosen out of many Churches: for thinges are not to be beloued for y^e place sake,* but the place is to be beloued for the thinges that be good: wherfore such thinges as be good, godly, and religious: th••• chose out of all Churches, and induce to your people, that they may take roote in the mindes of Englishmen.

The fourth interrogation.

I praye you what punishment iudge you for him,* that shall steale or pylfer any thing out of the Church.

The aunswere.

This your brotherhood may soone discerne,* by the person of a theefe, how it ought to be corrected. For some there be which hauing sufficient to liue vpon yet doe steale. Other there be which steale of meere necessity. Wherfore considering the qualite & difference of the crime, necessarye it Page 117 is that some be corrected by losse of goodes, some by stripes some other more sharply, and some more easly: yea, & whē sharpee correction is to be executed, yet that must be done with charity, and with no fury: for in punishing offenders this is the cause and ende wherfore they are punished, bicause they should be saued & not perish in hell fire. And so ought discipline to proceede in correcting the faithfull, as doe good Fathers in punishing their children, whom both they chasten for their euill, and yet being chastened, they looke to haue them their heires, and thinke to leaue them all they haue, notwithstanding they correct them sometimes in anger. Therefore this charitie must be kepte in mind. And in the correction there is a measure to be had, so that the mind neuer do any thing without the rule of reason. Ye adde moreouer with what recompence of measure those things ought to be required againe which be stollen out of Churches. But God forbid that the Church should euer require againe with increase, that which is lost in outwarde thinges, and to seeke her gaine by endamaging other.

The fift interrogation.

*Item, whether two brethen may mary two sisters, beyng far of from any part of kindred?

The aunswere.

This in no part of scripture is forbidden, but it may well and lawfully be done.*

The sixt interrogation.

Item, to what degree of kyndred may the mat••mony of the faythfull extende with their kindred,* or wheth•• 〈◇〉 it lawfull to marry with the stepmother and her kinsfolkes?

The aunswere.

A certaine terrene law amongst the old Romaines doth permit, that either brother or sister, or the sonne & daughter of two brethren may marry together.* But by experyence we learne, that the issue of such mariage doth neuer thryue, nor come forewarde. Also y^e holye law of God forbiddeth to reueale the turpitude of thy bloude or kindred.

Wherefore necessary it is, that in the third or fourth degree the faithfull may lawfully marry, for in the seconde as being vnlawfull, they must needes refraine. To be copled with the stepmother is vtterly abhominable, for it is written in the law. Thou shalt not reueale the turpitude of thy Father. Forsomuch then as it is so written in y^e law and they shall be two in one flesh: the sonne then that presumeth to reueale then the turpitude of his stepmother, which is one flesh with his Father, what doth he then but reueale the turpitude of his owne father.* Likewise it was forbidden and vnlawfull to mary with thy kinswoman, which by her first Mariage was made one flesh with thy brother. For the which cause Iohn y^e Baptist also lost hys head, and was crowned a Martyr. Who though he dyed not for the confession of Christ: yet for so much as Christ saith: I am the truth, therefore in that Iohn Baptist was slayne for the truth, it may be sayd his bloud was shedde for Christ.

The seuenth interrogation.

Item, whether such as be so coupled together in filthy and vnlawfull matrymony ought to be separated and denied the partaking of the holy Communion.*

The aunswere.

Because there be many of the nation of English men which being yet in their infidelitie,* were so ioyned & coupled in such execrable mariage: the same comming now to faith, are to be admonished hereafter to abstaine from the like, & that they know the same to be greuous sinne. That they dread the dreadfull iudgement of God, least for their carnall delectation, they incurre the tormentes of eternall punishment. And yet notw^tstanding they are not to be secluded therefore from the participation of Christes body & bloud,* lest we should seme to reuenge those things in them which they before their baptisme, through ignoraunce did commit. For in this time the holy Church doth correct some faultes more feruently, some faultes she suffereth againe through mansuetude and mekenes, some wittingly and willingly she doth wink at, and dissemble: that many times the euil which she doth detest, through bearing and dissembling she may stop & bridle. All they therfore which are come to the faith, must be admonished that they cōmit no such offence. Which thing if they doe, they are to be depriued of the Communion of the Lords body & bloud. For like as in them that fall through ignoraunce, their default in this case is to be tolerate: so in them againe it is strōgly to be ensued, which knowing they do nought, yet feare not to commit.

The eight interrogation.

*Item, in this I desire to be satisfied, after what maner I should deale or do with the Bishops of Fraunce, and of Brittaines.

The aunswere.

As touching the Bishops in Fraunce,* I geue you no authoritie or power ouer them. For the Bishop of Arolas, or Orlance hath by the olde tyme of our predecessours receiued the Palle, whome now we ought not to depriue of hys authoritie. Therefore when your brotherhoode shall goe vnto the Prouince of Fraunce, what soeuer yee shal haue there to doe with the Byshop of Orlance, so do, that he loose nothing of that which he hath found and obtayned of the auncient ordinaunce of our foreelders. But as concerning the Bishops of Brittain, we commit them all to your brotherhoode,* that y^e ignoraunt may be taught the infirme by perswasion may be confirmed, the wilful by authoritie may be corrected.

The ninth interrogation.

Whether a woeman being great with childe,* ought to be baptised, or after she hath children, after how long time she ought to enter into the Church. Or els that which she hath brought forth, least it should be preuented with death, after howe many dayes it ought to receaue Baptisme. Or after howe long tyme after her childebyrth is it lawfull for her husband to resorte to her? Or els if she be in her monthly course, after the disease of women, whether then she may enter into the Churche, and receaue the Sacrament of the holy Communion? Or els her husband after the lying with hys wife, before he be washed with water, whether is it lawfull for him to enter the Church, and to draw vnto the mistery of the holy Communion? All which thinges must be declared and opened to the rude multitude of Englishmen.

The Aunswere.

The childing or bearing woman,* why may she not be Baptised: seeing that the fruitfulness of the flesh is no fault before the eyes of almighty God. For our first parentes in Paradise, after they had transgressed: lost their immortallitie by the iust iudgement of God which they had takē before. Then, because almighty God woulde not mankinde vtterly to perish because of hys fall (although he lost nowe hys immortallitie for hys trespasse) yet of hys benigne pietie, left notwithstanding to hym the fruit and generation of issue. Wherefore the issue and generation of mans nature, which is conserued by the gift of almighty God, how can it be debarred from the grace of holy Baptisme?

As concerning the churching of women after they haue trauailed: where ye demaund after howe many dayes they ought to goe to the Church, this you haue learned in y^e old law,* that for a man child .30. dayes, after a womā child .66. dayes be appoynted her to keepe in. Albeit this you must take to be vnderstād in a mistery. For if she should y^e houre after her trauayle enter into the Churche to geue thanks, she committed therein no sinne. For why the lust and pleasure of the flesh, and not the trauaile and payne of the flesh is sinne. In the coniunction of the fleshe is pleasure, but in the trauaile and bringing forth of the child is payne & gronyng. As vnto the mother of all it is sayd: In sorrow thou shalt trauaile. Therefore if we forbid the woman after her labour to enter the church, thē what doe we els but count y^e same the punishment geuen vnto her, for sinne? Therefore for the woeman after her labour to be baptised,* eyther that whiche shee hath trauailed foorth (if present necessitie of death doth so require) yea in the selfe same houre, eyther shee that hath brought foorth, eyther that which is borne in the same houre when it is borne, to be baptised we doe not forbid.

Moreouer,* for the man to company with his wife, that he must not: before the child that is borne be wayned. But now there is a lewd and naughty custome risen in the conditiō of maryed folks, that mothers do contemne to nurse their owne children, which they haue borne, but set them to other woemen out to nurse: whiche seemeth onely to come of the cause of incontineny. For while they will not contayne themselues, therefore they put from them their children to nurse. &c.

As concerning the woman in her menstruous course whether she ought to enter the Churche? To this I aunswere: she ought not to be forbid. For the superfluitie of nature in her ought not to be imputed for any fault, neyther is it iust that she shold be depriued of her accesse to the Church, for that which she suffereth agaynst her wil. And if the woeman did well, presuming in touching the Lords coate in the tyme of her bloody issue: why then may not that be graunted vnto all woemen infirmed by the fault of nature, which is commended in one person done in her infirmitie? Therefore to receaue the misterie of the holy communion, it is not forbidden them. Albeit if she dare not so farre presume in her great infirmitie, she is to be prayسد: but if she do receaue, she is not to be iudged. For it is a point of a good minde in some maner to knowledge hys sinnes there, where is no sinne: because manye times that Page 118 is done without fault, which commeth of fault. As when we be hungry, we care without fault, notwithstanding it commeth by the fault of our first father to vs that wee are hungrye, &c.

Where ye aske, if a man after the company with hys wyfe, may resort to the Church or to the holy Communion, before he be purged with water. The law giuen to the old people, commaunded that a man after the companye wyth his wife, both shoulde be purified with water, and also should tary the Sunnes set before he came to the congregation. Which seemeth to be vnderstand spiritually: for then most true it is, that the man companieth with the woman, when his minde through delectation is ioyned to vnlawfull concupiscence in his hart and cogitation. At what time, before the said fire of concupiscence shall be remooued, let the person thinke himselfe vnworthye the entraunce to the congregation, through the viciousnes of his filthy will. But of this matter sondry nations haue euery one their sondry customes: some on way & some another. The auncient maner of the Romanes frō our forefathers, hath beene, that in such case, first they purged themselues with water, then for a little they abstaine reuerently, and so resort to the Church. &c.

After many other words debated of this matter, thus he inferreth: but if any person not for voluptuousnes of the flesh, but for procreation of children, do company with his wife, that man concerning either the comming to the Church, or the receauing the misteries of the Lords body & bloud, is to be left to his owne iudgement: for he ought not to be forbid of vs to come, which when he lieth in the fire will not burne. &c.

There is an other question also to these adioyned, with his aunswere likewise to the same, concerning pollutions in the night, but I thought these at this present to our english eares, sufficient.

To returne now to the story againe, Gregory after he had sent these resolutions to the questions of Austen, sendeth moreouer, to the Church of Englande moe coadiutors, and helpers, as Mellitus, Iustus, Paulinus, and Ruffianus, with bookes and such other implemēts as he thought necessary, for the English Church. He sendeth moreouer to the foresaide Austen a palle with letters wherein he setteth an order betweene the twoo Metropolitane seates, the one to be at London the other to be at Yorke. Notwithstanding he graunteth to the sayde Austen during his lyfe to be the onely chyefe Archbyshop of al the lande: and after hys tyme, then to returne to the two foresaide seats of London and Yorke, as is in y^e same letter contened, the tenour whereof here followeth in hys owne wordes as ensueth.

The copie of the Epistle of Gregory, sent to Augustinus into Englande.

REuerendissimo & sanctis. fratri Augustino coepiscopo, Gregorius seruus seruorum Dei. Cum certum sit, pro omnipotente Deo laborātibus ineffabilia aeterni Regis praemia reseruari, nobis tamen eis necesse est bonorum beneficia tribuere, vt in spiritualis operis studio ex remuneratione valeant multiplicius insudare: and so forth as followeth here in English.

TO the reuerende and vertuous brother Augustine, his fellow Byshop, Gregorius the seruaunt of the seruauents of God. Although it be most certaine that vnspeakeable rewardes, of the heauenly king, be laide vp for all such, as labour in the wordes of almighty God, yet it shall be requisite for vs, to reward the same also with our benefites, to the ende, they may be more encouraged, to go forward in the study of their spirituall worke. And for asmuch now, as the new church of Englishmen is brought to the grace of almightie God, through his mightie helpe, and your trauaile, therefore we haue graunted to you the vse of the palle, only to be vsed at the solemnitie of your Masse: so that it shall bee lawfull for you to ordaine twelue Bishops, such as shal be subiect to your prouince or dition. So that hereafter alwaies the Byshop of the Citie of London, shall be ordeyned and consecrate by his owne proper Synode: and so to receaue the palle of honour frō the holy and Apostolike seate, wherein I here (by the permission of God) doe serue. And as touching the Citie of Yorke, we wyll sende also a Bysh. thether, whō you may thinke meet to ordayne. So that if that Citie with other places bordering thereby, shall receiue the word of God, he shall haue power likewise to ordayne twelue byshops, and haue the honour of a Metropolitane: to whō also if God spare me life, I intend by the fauour of God, to sende a palle: this prouided, that notwithstanding he shal be subiect to your brotherly appointment. But after your decease, the same Metropolitane, so to be ouer the Byshops whom he ordereth, that he be in no wise subiect to the Metropolitane of Londō after you. And here after betwixt these two Metropolitanes, of London, & Yorke, let there be had such distinction of honour, that hee shall haue the prioritie, which shall in time first bee ordeyned: Wyth common counsell, and affection of hart, let them go both together, disposing with one accord, such things as be to be done, for the zeale of Christ. Let them forethinke and deliberate together prudently, and what they deliberate wisely, let them accomplish concordly, not gerryng, nor swaruing, one from the other. But as for your part, you shall be indued with authoritie, not onelye ouer those Byshops, that you constitute, and ouer the other constituted by the byshop of Yorke. But also you to haue all other Priestes of whole Brytaine, subiect to our Lord Iesus Christ: to the ende that through your preaching and holines of life, they may learne both to beleue rightly and to liue purely, and so in directing their life, both by the rule of true faith and vertuous maners, they may attaine, when God shall call them, the fruition and kingdome of heauen.*

God preserue you in health reuerend brother:

the x before the Kalend. of Iuly, in the raygne of our soueraigne Lord Mauritius, most vertuous Emperour.

Besides this, the said Gregory sendeth also an other letter to Mellitus,* concerning his iudgement what is to bee done with the idolatrous temples and Phanes of the Englishmen newly cōuerted, which Phanes he thinketh not best to plucke downe, but to conuert the vse thereof, and so let them stand. And likewise of their sacrifices and killyng of Oxen, how the same ought to be ordered, and howe to bee altered: disputing by the occasions therof, of the sacrifices of the old Egiptians, permitted of God vnto the Israelits the ende 〈...〉 thereof being altered. &c.

He sendeth also an other letter to the foresaid Austen,* wherein he warneth him not to be proude or puffed vp, for the myracles wrought of God by him, in conuerting the people of Englande, but rather to feare and tremble, least so much as he were puffed vp by the outward work of miracles, so much he shoulde fall inwardly through the vayne glory of his hart: and therfore wisely exhorteth him to repress the swelling glory of hart, with the remembraunce of his sinnes rather against God, whereby he rather hath cause to lament, then to reioyce for the other. Not all the elect of God (saith he) worketh miracles, and yet haue they their names written in the booke of life. And therefore he shoulde not count so much of those miracles done, but reioyse rather with the Disciples of Christ, & labor to haue his name written in the booke of life, where al the electe of God be contained, neither is there any ende of that reioicing. And whatsoeuer miracles it hath pleased god by him to haue beene done, he shoulde remember they were not done for him: but for their conuersion, whose saluation god sought thereby, &c.

Item,* he directed an other Epistle to king Ethelbert, as is expressed at large in the Chronicle of Henry Huntynghon, Lib. 3. in the which Epistle, first he praised God, then commendeth the goodnes of the king, by whom it pleased god so to worke such goodnes of the people. Secondly exhortteth him to persist and continue in the godly profession of Christes faith, and to be feruent and zealous in the same: in conuerting the multitude, in destroying the temples and works of idolatry, in ruling and gouerning the people in all holines & godly conuersation, after the godly example of the Emperour Constantinus the great. Lastly, cōforting him with the promises of lyfe and reward to come, wyth the Lord that raigneth and liueth for euer: premonishyng him besides, of the terroures & distresses that shall happen (though not in his dayes) yet before the terrible daye of Gods iudgement: wherfore he willeth him alwaies to be sollicitous for his soule, and suspectfull of the houre of hys death, and watchfull of the iudgement, that he may be alwaies prepared for the same, when that iudgement shall come. In the ende he desireth him to accept such presentes as giftes which he thought good to sende vnto him from Rome, &c.

Austen thus receyuing his palle from Gregory,* as is aboue said, and now of a Monke beyng made an Archbyshop, after he had baptised a great part of Kent: hee after made two Archbyshops or Metropolitanes, by the commaundement of Gregory, as witnesseth Polychronicon, the one at London, the other at Yorke.

Mellitus, of whō mention is made before, was sent specially of the Eastsaxons in the prouince of Essex, where after he was made Bishop of London, vnder Sigebert kyng of Essex: which Sigebert together with his vncle Ethelbert, first built the church and minster of saint Paule in Londō, and appointed it to Mellitus for the byshops sea, Austē (associate with this Mellitus and Iustus through the help of Ethelbert) assembled and gathered together the Byshops & Doctours of Britaine in a place, which taking the name of the sayd Austen, was called Austens Oke. In this assēbly Page 119 he charged the sayd Byshops, y^t they should preach w^t him y^e word of God to the Englishmen,* & also that they should among themselues reforme certayne rytes and vsages in their church, specially for keping of their Eastertyde: baptising after the maner of Rome, and such other lyke. To these the Scotese and Brytons woulde not agree refusing to leaue the custome, which they so long time had contynued, wythout the assent of them all which vsed the same. Here the stories both of Bede, Cestrensis in Polychron. Huntynghonensis, Iornalensis, Fabianus and other moe, write of a certaine miracle wrought vpon a blinde Englishe man: whom when the Britons could not helpe, Austen kneeling downe and praying, restored the blynde man to sight before them all: for a confirmation (as these authours saye) of hys opinion in keeping of Easter. But concerning the credite of this miracle, that I leaue, to the authours of whom I had it.* Then Austen gathered an other Synode, to the which came seauen Byshops of Brytons, with the wisest men of that famous Abby of Bangor. But first they tooke counsell of a certayne wyse and holye man amongst them, what to doe: and whether they shoulde be obedient to Austen or not. And he saide: if he be the seruauant of god agree vnto him. But howe shall wee knowe that, sayde they? To whom he aunswered againe: If he be meeke and humble of hart, by that know that he is the seruant of god. To this they said againe: & how shal we know him to bee hūble & meeke of hart? By this quoth 〈◇〉 seing you are y^e greater number, if he at your comming 〈◇〉 your Synode rise vp, & courteously receaue you, 〈...〉 him to bee an humble and a meke man. But if he shall contemne and despise you (being as ye are) the greater part, despise you him agayne. Thus the Brytaine Byshops entring into the Counsell, Austen after the Romishe maner keeping hys chaire would not remoue. Whereat they being not a little offended, after some heate of words, in disdain & great displeasure departed thence. To whō then Austen spake: and said, that if they would not take peace with their brethren, they should receaue war with their enimies: And if they disdained to preach with them the way of life to the English nation, they should suffer by their handes the reuenge of deth.* Which not lōg after so came to passe by the meanes of Ethelfride king of Northumberlande: who being yet a Pagan, and stirred with a fierce fury against the Britanes came with a great army against the city of Chester: where Brocmayl the Consull of that Citie, a fryend and helper of the Britaines side, was readye with his force to receaue him. There was at the same time at Bangor in Wales an exceding great Monastery,* wherin was such a number of Monkes, as Galfridus with other authors doe testifie that if the whole company were deuided into seuen parts in euery of the seuen parts were contained not so few as 300. Mōkes: which al did liue with the sweat of their browes, and labor of their owne hands, hauing one for their ruler named Dinoe. Out of this Monastery came the Monks to Chester to pray for the good succes of Brocmayl, fighting for them against the Saxons. Thre daies they cōtinued in fasting and praier. When Ethelfride the foresaide king, seing them so intent to their praiers: demaunded the cause of their comming thether in such a cōpany. When he perceaued it was to pray for their Consull, then (saith he) although they beare no weapon, yet they fight against vs, & with their praiers & preachings they persecute vs. Whervpon after that Brocmayl, being ouercome did flee away, the king commaunded his men to turne their wepons against the sely vnarmed Monkes: of whome he slewe the same time, or rather Martired .1100. onely fiftie persons of that number did flee and escape away with Brocmayl: the rest were all slaine. The authors that write of this lamentable murder, declare & saye howe the forespeaking of Austen, was here veriefied vpon the Britanes: which because they would not ioine peace with their friends, he said should be destroyed of their enimis. Of both these parties, the reader may iudge what he pleaseth.* I can not see but both together were to be blamed. And as I cannot but accuse the one, so I cannot defend the other. First Austen in this matter can in no wise be excused, who being a monke before, & therefore a scholer & professor of humilitie: shewed so litle humilitie in this assembly, to seuen Byshops & an Archbishop, cōming at his cōmaundement to the Councell, that he thought scorne once to stirre at their comming in. Much lesse would his Pharisaicall solemnity haue girded himselfe, & washed his brethrens feete, after their trauaile, as Christ our great maister did to his Disciples: seyng his Lordship was so hie, or rather so heauy, or rather so proude, that coulde not finde in his hart to giue them a little moouing of his body to declare a brotherly & humble hart. Againe the Britaynes were much, or more to blame, who so much neglected their spirituall duety, in reuenging their temporal iniury: that they denyed to ioine vnto their helping labour, to turne the Idolatrous Saxons to the way of lyfe and saluatiō. In which respect all priuate cases ought to geue place, and to be forgotten. For the whiche cause, although lamentable to vs, yet no great meruaile in them, if the stroke of gods punishment did light upon thē: according to the wordes of Austen, as is before declared. But especially the cruell king, in this fact, was most of all to blame, so furiously to flee vpon them, which had neither weapō to resist him, nor yet any will to harme him. And so likewise the same or like, happened to himselfe afterward. For so was he also slayne in the field by Christian Edwine, who succeeded him: as he had slayne the Christians before, whiche was about the yeare of our Lord. 610. But to returne to Austen agayne, who by report of authors was departed before this cruelty was done: after he had baptised and christened x. thousand Saxons or Angles in the West riuer, that is called Swale, beside Yorke on a Christēmasse day: perceauing hys end to draw neare, he ordayned a successor named Laurentius to rule after him the Archbishops see of Dorobernia.* Where note by the way Christian Reader, that whereas Austen baptised then in riuers: it followeth, there was then no vse of fontes. Agayne, if it be true that Fabian sayth,* he baptised x. thousā in one day: the rite thē of Baptising at Rome was not so ceremoniall, neither had so manye trinkets at that tyme, as it hath had since, or els it could not be, that he coulde baptise so many in one daye.

In the meane season, about this time departed Gregory Byshop of Rome: of whom it is sayd, that of the number of al the first Bishops before him in the primitiue time, he was the basest.* of all them that came after him, hee was the best. About whiche tyme also dyed in Wales, Dauid Archbishop first of Kayrleion, who then translated the see from thence to Meneuia,* and therefore is called Dauid of Wales. Not long after this also, deceased the foresayd Austen in England after he had set there xv. or xvi. yeares: by the which count we may note it, not to be true that Henry Huntington and other doe witnesse, that Austen was dead before that battaile of Ethelfride agaynst the Mōkes of Bāgor. For if it be true that Polycronicon testifieth of this murder,* to be done about the yeare of our Lorde. 609. and the comming of Austen first into the Realme, to be an. 596. then Austen enduring xvi. yeares could not be dead at thys battell. Moreouer Galfridus Monumetensis declareth, concerning the same battell,* that Ethelbert the king of Kent, beyng (as is sayd) conuerted by Austen to Christes fayth: after he saw the Britaynes to disdayne and deny their subiection vnto Austen, neyther would assist him w^t preaching to the English nation: therefore stirred vp he the foresayd Ethelfride to warre agaynst the Britaynes. But that seemeth rather suspicious then true, that he being a Christen king, eyther could so much preuayle with a Pagan Idolater, or els would attempt so farre to commit such a cruell deede. But of vncertayne things I haue nothing certainly to say, lesse to iudge.

About this present tyme aboue prefixed,* which is 610. I read in the story of Ranulphus Cestrensis, the writer of Polychronicon, of Iohn the Patriarche of Alexandria who for his rare example of hospitality and bountifulnes to the poore:* I thought no lesse worthy to haue place amongst good men, then I see the same now to be followed of few. This Iohn (beyng before belike a hard and sparing man) as he was at hys prayer vpon a tyme (it is sayd) there appeared to him a comely virgine hauing on her head a garland of Oliue leaues: which named her selfe mercy, saying to him and promising that if he would take her to wi•e, he should prosper well. This, whether it were true or not, or els inuented for a morallitie,* I would wish this flourishing damsell so to be maryed to moe then to this Iohn, that shee should not liue so long a virgine now as she doth, because no man will marry her. But to returne to his Patriarch, who after that day (as the story recordeth: was so merciful and so beneficiall, especially to the poore and needy, that he counted them as hys maysters, and himself as a seruauent and steward vnto them. This Patriarch was wont commonly twice a weeke to sit at hys doore all the day long, to take vp matters, and to set vntie, where was any variaunce: One day it happened, as he was sitting all the day before hys gate, and saw no man come, lamented that all that day hee had done no good: To whome his Deacon standing by, aunswered agayne, that hee had more cause to reioyse, seeing he had brought the Cittie in that order and in such peace, that there needed no reconcilment amongst them. An other time as the sayd Iohn the Patriarche was at the Seruice and reading the Gospell Page 120 in the church, the people (as their vsed maner is) went out of the church to talke and iangle: he perceauing that, went out likewise, and sat amongst them: wherat they marueyling to see him do so. My children said he, where the flocke is, there ought the shepherd to be:

wherefore either come you in, that I may also come in with you, or els if you tary out, I will likewise tary out together with you, &c.

*As touching the actes and deedes of Gregory aboue mentioned, how he withstood the ambitious pryde of Iohn, Patriarche of Constantinople, which woulde be the vnyuersall Priest, and onely chiefe Byshop of all other: declaring him to be no lesse then the forerunner of Antichrist, that woulde take that name vppon him: howe and wyth what reasons he aunswered againe the letters of the Emperour Mauritius in that behalfe, sufficient relation is made thereof in the first entry and beginning of this booke. This Gregory among manye other thinges induced into the Church (the specialties whereof hereafter shall followe Christ willing more at large) fyrst beganne and brought in thys title among the Romaine Bishoppes, to be called Seruus seruorum Dei: * putting them in remembraunce therby both of their humblenes, and also of their duetie in the Church of Chryst. Moreouer as concerning his acte for the sole lyfe of Pryestes fyrst begonne, and then broken againe. Also concerning the order of Gregoryes Masse booke, to be receaued in all churches, hereof who so lifteth to read more, shall fynde the same in other places hereafter, namelye when wee come to the tyme of Pope Adrian the first.

*After the death of Gregory, aboue mentioned, first came Sabinianus, who as he was a malicious detractor of Gregory & of his works, so he continued not long, scarce the space of two yeres. After whom succeded next Bonifacius the 3. which albeit he reigned but one yere, * yet in y^e one yere he did more hurt then Gregory, with so great labours, and in so many yeres could do good before: for that which Gregorye kept out, he brought in, obtaining of Phocas the wicked Emperour for him and his successours after him, that the see of Rome aboue al other churches should haue the preeminence: and that the Bishop of Rome should be the vniuersall head, through all Churches of Christ in Christedome: alleading for him this friuolous reason, that S Peter had and left to his successours in Rome the keyes of byndyng and loosing, &c. And thus began first Rome to take an head aboue all other Churches, by the meanes of Boniface the 3. * who as he lacked no boldnes nor ambitiō to seeke it, so neither lacked he an Emperour fit and meete to gyue such a gift. Thys Emperours name was Phocas a man of such wickednes and ambitiō most like to his owne Bishop Boniface, that to aspire to the Empire, he murthered his owne maister and Emperour Mauritius, & his children. Thus Phocas coming vp to be Emperour, after this detestable vilanie done: thinking to establish his Empire with friendship and fauour of his people, & especially with the byshop of Rome: quickly condescended to al hys petitions, & so graunted him (as it is sayd) to be that he would, the vniuersall and heade Bishop ouer all Christen Churches. But as bloud commonly requireth bloud againe, so it came to passe on the said Phocas. For as he had crueltye slayne the Lorde and Emperour, *Mauritius, before, so he in lyke maner (of Heraclius the Emperour succeedyng hym) had his hands and seete cut of, & so was cast into the Sea. And this wicked Phocas which gaue the first supremacy to Rome, lost his owne. But Rome would not so soone loose his supremacy once giuen, as y^e gyner lost his life: for euer since frō that day it hath holden, defended, and maintained the same still, and yet doth to this present day, by al force & policy possible. And thus much concerning Boniface, whō, by the words of Gregory, we may well call the runner before Antichryst. For as Gregory brought into their stile, Seruus seruorum Dei, * so this Boniface brought into theyr heades, first Volumus ac mandamus: Statuimus ac praecipimus. That is. We will and commaunde, we enioyne and charg you. &c.

Mention was made a little before of Ethelbert kyng of Kent, and also of Ethelfride king of Northsaxone or Northumbria. This Ethelbert hauing vnder his subiection al the other Saxon kinges, vnto Number, after he had fyrst receaued himselfe, and caused to be receaued of other, the Christian faith by the preaching of Austen, being cōfirmed afterward in the same faith, amōg other costly dedes, with the helpe of Sigebert kyng of Essex his nephew,* then reigning vnder him, began the foundation of Paules Church within the Citie of London,* & ordained it for the Bishops see of Londō. For the Archbishops see which before tyme had bene at London, was by Austen and this Ethelbert at the praier of the Citizens of Dorobernia translated to the said Citie Malmesberie's Lib. de pontific.* Wherefore such authors as say that Paules was diuided by Sigebert, say not amisse: which Sigebert was y^e king o^f Essex, •n which prouince standeth the Citie of London. This Ethelbert also founded the Church of Saint Andrewe in the Citie of Dorubres in Kent, now called Rochester, of one Rot, distaunt from Dorobernia, 24. miles. Of this citie, Iustus was bishop ordained before by Austen. Moreouer the •orenamed Ethelbert, styrred vp a dweller or Citizen of London to make a Chappell or church of Saint Peter in the west end of Lōdon, then called Thorny, now the Towne of Westminster, which Church or Chappell was after by Edward the confessour enlarged or newe builded:* lastly of Henry the 3. it was newly agayne reedified and made as it is now a large Monasterye. &c. After these Christian and worthy actes this Ethelbert when he had reigned the course of lvi. yeares chaunged thys mortall life about the yeare of our Lorde 616. whome some stories say to be slaine in a fyghte betweene him and Ethelfride king of Northsaxons.*

In the meane time the foresaid Ethelfride king of Northumberland, after the cruell murder of the Monkes of Bangor, escaped not long vnpaid his hire, for after he had raigned.* 24. yeares he was slaine in the fiele of Edwine, who succeded in Northumberland after him.

This Edwyne being the sonne not of Ethelfride,* (as Galfridus Monumetensis saith) but rather of Alla (as Giraldus Gambrensis <◇> to witnes more truely) was first a Panim or <◇> : afterward by Paulinus was Christned and the first <◇> king in Northōberland. The occasion of which his calling or conuersion, as is in sundry stories contained, was this.

Edwine being yet a Pagane, maryed the daughter of Ethelbert king of kent, called Edelburge a Christian womā, otherwise called Tace. But before this marriage, Edwyne beyng yet young, Ethelfride the king, conceyuing enuy agaynst him: persecuted him so sore, that he was forced to flee to Redwaldus king of Eastangles, as in the table of the kings is expressed. The which Redwaldus what for feare, what with bribes being corrupted of Ethelfride, at length priuily had intēded to haue betrayed Edwyne. But as gods will was, Edwyne hauing warning thereof by a secrete frynde of his, was mooued to flee and to saue himselfe beyng promised also of his friendes to bee safely conueyed awaye, if he would thereto agree. To whome Edwyne said, whether shall I flee which haue so long fleene the handes of myne enymies, through all prouinces of the Realme? And if I must nedes be slayne I had rather that he should doe it, then an other vnworthy person. Thus he remayning by himselfe alone & solitarie, sitting in a great study, there appeared vnto him sodainely, a certaine straunger, to hym vnknowne, and saide, I knowe well the cause of thy thought and heauines. What wouldest thou giue him that should deliuer thee out of this feare, & should recōcile king Redwald to thee againe? I woulde gyue him (saide Edwyne) al that euer I coulde make. And he saide agayne: And what if he make thee a mightier king, then was anye of thy Progenitours? Hee answered againe as before. Moreouer, (saith he) and what if hee shewe thee a better kind and way of life, then euer was shewed to any of thine aunceters before thee: wilt thou obey him & doe after his counsell? yea (said Edwyne) promising most firmly, wyth al his hart so to do.* Thē he laying his hand vpon his head when (said he) this token hapneth vnto thee: then remember this time of thy tribulation, & the promise which thou hast made, and the word which now I say vnto thee. And with that he uanished out of his sight sodainely. After this so done as Edwyne was sitting alone by him selfe pensieue and sad:* his foresaid friend, which moued him before to fle commeth to him, bidding him be of good chere, for the hart (said he) of king Redwaldus which had before intended thy destruction, was nowe altered through the counsell of the Queene, and is fully bent to keepe his promise wyth you, whatsoeuer shall fall thereupon. To make the story short Redwaldus the King (although Fabian following Henry Huntynghton) saith it was Edwyne) with al conuenient speed assembled an host:* wherwith he sodainly comming vpon Ethelfryde, gaue battaile vnto him aboute the borders of Mercia, where Ethelfryde king of Northumberlande, also with Reyner Redwaldus sonne was slaine in the fiele. By reason wherof Edwyne (his enimies now being destroyed) was quietly placed in the possessiō of Northumberlād.* All this while yet Edwyne remained in his old Paganisme, albeit his Queene being (as is aboue declared) king Ethelbertes daughter a Christen woman, with Paulinus the byshop, ceased not to stirre and perswad the king to christian fayth. But he taking counsell with his nobles and counsellors vpon the matter, was hard to be wonne. Then the Page 121 Lord, who despoth all things after his purpose, to bring al good things to passe, sent an other trouble vpon him, by meanes therof to cal him.* For by affliction God vseth cōmonly to call them whom he wil saue, or by whom he wil worke saluation vnto other. So his diuine wisdometh thinketh good to make them first to knowe themselues, before they come to know him, or to teach him to other: so it was with Paule, who was stricken downe, before hee was lyfted vp, with Constantinus Edwynus and many moe. Howe long was Ioseph in prison before he bare rule? How hardly escaped this our Queene nowe being (Queene Elizabeth) by whō yet notwithstanding it hath pleased god to restore this his gospel now preached amongst vs? In what conflictes and agonies inwardly in his spirite was M. Luther before he came to preach the iustification of Christ openly? And so be all they most commonlye, which come to anye liuely feeling or sensible working of Christ the Lord.

But to returne to Edwyne againe. The occasion of hys trouble was this: Quicelinus with Kynegilsus his brother, Kings of Westsaxons (as aboue is mentioned in the table of the Saxon kings) conspiring the death of Edwyne now king of Northumberland. vpon enuy and malice sent vpon an Easter day, a swordman named Emner, priuelye to slay the said Edwyne.* This swordman or cutthroate came to a Citie beside the water of Darwent in Darbeshire, there to waite his time, and lastly founde the king smallye accompanied, and intēded to haue runne the ki•• through with a sword inuenemed. But one Lilla the kinges trustye seruaunt, disgarnished of a shield or other weapon to defēd his maister,* start betwene the king & the sword, and was strikē through the body and died, and the king was wōūded with the same stroke. And after he wounded also the third which was a knight, & so was taken, and confessed by whom he was sent to worke that treason. The other knight that was secondly wounded died, and the king lay after long sicke, or he were healed.

After this, about whitsontide the king being scantlye hole of his wounde, assembled his host, intending to make against the king of westsaxons: promising to Christ to be Christened, if he would giue him the victory ouer his enimies. And in token therof caused his daughter borne of Edelburge y^e same Easter day when he was woūded, named Eufled to be baptised: with xij other of his familie, of Paulinus. Thus Edwyne proceded to the battel against Quicelne and Kynegilsus with his sonne Kenwalcus and other enimies, who in the same battell being al vanquished & put to flight, Edwyn through the power of Christ returneth home victorer. But for all this victory & other things gyuen to him of God, as he was in wealth of the worlde, forgat his promise made, and had little mind therof, saue only that he by the preaching of Paulinus forsoke his maumentry. And for his excuse saide that he might not clearly deny his olde lawe, which his forefathers had kept so long, and sodeinly to be Christened without authority and good aduise of his counsaile.

About the same season Pope Boniface the 5. sent also to the sayd Edwyne letters exhortatory, wyth sundrye presentes from Rome to him, and to Edelburge the Queene. But neither would that preuaile. Then Paulinus seyng the king so hard to be conuerted, poured out his praiers vnto God for his cōuersion: who the same time had reuealed to him by the holy ghost, the oracle aboue mentioned, which was shewed to the King, when hee was with Redwaldus king of the Eastangles. Wherupon Paulinus comming afterward to the king, on a certaine day, and laying his hād vpon the kings head, asked him if he knew that tokē. The king hearing this & remembring wel the token, was ready to fall downe at his feete. But Paulinus not sufferyng that, did lift vp hym againe, saying vnto him: behold, O king, you haue vanquished your enimies, you haue obtained your kingdome, now performe the third, which you haue promised, that is to receaue the faith of Christ, and to be obedient to him. Wherupon the king conferryng with his Counsell, & his nobles, was baptised of the said Paulinus at Yorke, with many of his other subiectes with hym: Insomuch that Coyfi the chiefe of the Prelates of his olde maumentry armed him selfe wyth hys other Idolatrous Bishops, and bestrode good horses, which before by their old law they might not do, nor ride but onely a Mare: & so destroyed al the altars of the maumentrye, & their temple of Idoles, which was at Godmundham, not far from Yorke, and this was the xi. yeare of his raigne,

From that time forth, during the life of Edwyne which was the terme of vj. yeares moe, Paulinus christened, continually in the riuers of Gweny, & Swala, in both prouinces of Deira, and in Bernicia, vsing the said riuers for his fountes, and preached in the shire of Lincsesey, where he builded also a Church of stone at Lincolne.

In this time was so great peace in the kingdome of Edwyne after his conuersion, that a womā laden with gold might haue gone from the one side of the sea to the other, and no man molest hir. Moreouer by the hye waye sydes, through al his kingdom he caused by euery wel or spryng to be chayned a dish, or bole of brasse to take vp water; for the refreshing of such as went by the way, which boles of brasse there remained safe, that no man touched them, during all the life of the said Edwyne. Such was then the tender care and study of Christen Princes, for the refreshing of their subiectes. But that was then the Brasen worlde, which now is growne to yron and leade, called Aetas ferrea or rather plumbea.

This Edwyne, who first brought in the fayth in the North partes continuing after his Baptisme. vj. yeres, at length was slaine in battell by Cedwalla, king of the Britaines. and by wicked Penda, king of the Mercians, wyth his sonne also Offricus in the field called Hatfield.

This Paulinus was the first Archbyshop of Yorke, and as he was of Iustus Archbyshop of Caunterbury, ordained Archbyshop of the sea of Yorke, so he againe after the discease of Iustus, ordained Honorius to be Archbyshop of Caunterbury.

Paulinus after the death of godly Edwyne, seing vnmerciful Cedwalla or Cedwallon with his Britaines,* and wycked Penda w^t the Idolatrous merciās, to spoile the land in such sort, as they made no spare neither of age nor sexe, nor Religion, was compelled to fle with Edelburg the Queene and Eufride her daughter, by water into Kent: where the said Archbishop Paulinus remained Bishop of Rochester, the space of xix. yeares. And so the Church of Northumberland lacked a Byshop for the space of xxx. yeares after. Notwithstanding he lett there one Iames his Deacon,* a good man, who continued their baptising and preaching, in the North parts, till that peace being recouered, & the number of the faithfull increasing, the church came againe to his stay.*Hunting. Lib. 3.

By the meanes of this Edwyne Erpwaldus King of the Eastangles sonne to Redwaldus aboue mentioned, was reduced to Christes faith.*

After the decease of Edwyne and his sonne Offrike, both slayne in battell, reigned Ofricus and Eufridus the one in Deyra, the other in Bernicia. Osricus was the sonne of Elfricus which was brother to Ethelfride. Eaufridus, was the eldest sonne of Ethelfride (for Ethelfride had three sonnes to wit, Eaufridus, Oswaldus, & Osricus. These two kinges of Desyra and Bernicia, Osricus, and Eaufride, beyng fyrst Christened in Scotlande: after being kinges returned to their old idolatry, & so in the yeares following were slaine one after the other, by the foresaide Cedwalla, and wycked Penda, as is in the table aboue expressed.*

After whō succeded in Northumberlaad, the seconde sonne of Ethelfride named Oswaldus, hauing rule on both the Prouinces as well Deyra, as of Bernicia.* Whereof when the foresaide Cedwalla, (or Cadwallo) the Brytayne king had vnderstanding,* who before had made hauoke of the Saxons and thought to haue rooted them vtterlye out of England: he sent king Penda w^t a mighty host of y^e Brittaines, thinking to slea also Oswald, as he had before slaine his brother Eaufride, and King Edwyne before them. But Oswald when he was warned of the great strength of this Cadwal, and Penda made his prayes to God, and besought him meekely of helpe to withstand his enimie: for the saluation of his people. Thus after Oswald had prayed for the sauing of his people, the two hostes met in a fielde named Denesburne, some say Heuenfield, where was faught a strōg battell. But smally the armye and power of Penda, & Cedwall, which were farre exceeding the number of Oswaldus host, was chased and most part slaine by Oswaldus, after he reigned ouer the Britanes xxij. yeares leauing after him a sonne, whom Gaufridus called Cadwaladrus, the last king of the Britanes.

Of this Oswald, much praise and commendation is written in authors, for his feruent zeale in Christes Religion, & mercifull pittie toward the poore, with other great vertues moe. As touching the miracles of S. Oswald, what it pleased the people of that time to reporte of him, I haue not here to affirme: This I find in stories certaine, that he being well and vertuously disposed to the setting foorth of Christes faith and doctrine, sent into Scorlande for a certeine Bishop,* there called Aidanus, which was a famous preacher. The king what time he was in Scotland banyshed, had learned the scotish tounge perfectly: wherfore as this Aidanus preached in his scotish tounge to the Saxons, the king himselfe interpreting that which hee had said, disdayned not to preach & expounde the same to his nobles & Page 122 subiectes in the English tounge.

Moreouer, toward the poore and needy, his pittie & tendernes was such, being notwithstanding of so highe & Princely calling:  that vpon a time being then Easter day, he sitting with the saide Aidanus at meate and serued after the maner of kings in siluer, there commeth to him one of the seruitures bringing him word, that there was a great multitude of poore people sitting in the strete, which desired some almes of the king. Hee hearing this, commaundeth not only the meate prepared for his owne table to be caried vnto them,  but also taking a Siluer platter whiche stode before him, brake it in peeces and sent it among thē: And so relieued his pore subiectes, not onely with y^e meate of his table, but with his dishes also. Aidanus the Byshop seing this and marueiling therat, taketh him by the hand, wishing and praying in this wise. This hand, sayth he, I pray God may continue and neuer putrifie. What the stories say more concerning this hand of Oswald, I entēd not to medle farther then simple, true, and due probalitie will beare me out. In those dayes and partly by the meanes of the said Oswald Kynigilsus king of the Westsaxons was cōuerted to Christes faith,  especially through the godly labor of Berinus which was sent by Pope Honorius to preach in England, and was then made Bishop of Dorchester. To whom Quicelinus brother of Kynigilsus after he had also receiued baptisme of the said Berinus gaue to him y^e sayd Citie to make there his sea.  And as Guydo witnesseth the said Quicelinus gaue after to the Byshop of Winchester, seauen myles compasse of land, to builde there the Byshops sea, the which was accomplished and finished Kenwalkus hys sonne.

Of this Berinus Malmesbery, Polychronicon, with dyuers other writers do report, a thing straunge and myraculous which if it be a fable as no doubt it is,  I cannot but maruel that so many authors so constantly agre in reporting and affirming the same. The matter is this: this Berinus being sent as is said, by Honorius to preach in Englād promiseth him to trauell to the vttermost borders therof, and there to preach the Gospell, where the name of Christ was neuer heard. Thus he seting forward in his iourney passeth through Fraunce, and so to the sea side, where hee found a passage ready, and the winde serued so faire, that he was called vpon in such hast, that he had no leysure to remember himselfe to take all things with him, which hee had to cary. At length as he was on the sea sailing and almost in the middle course of his passage, remembred himselfe of a certaine relique left behinde him for hast: which Honorius had giuen him at his comming out. Malmesberiensis calleth it Corporalia. Historia Iornalensis calleth it Pallulam super quam Corpus Christi consecraret, which wee call a Corporas or such a like thing, and what els enclosed with in it I can not tell. Here Berinus in great sorow coulde not tell what to doe, if he should haue spoken to the Heathen mariners, to turne their course backe againe, they woulde haue mocked him,  and it had bin in vaine. Wherefore as y^e stories write, he boldly steppeth into the Sea, and walkeyng on fote back again, taketh w^t him that which was left behind, & so returneth to his company againe, hauing not one thred of his garments wette. Of his miracle, or whether I should cal it a fable rather, let the reader iudge therof, as he thinketh, because it is not written in the Scripture we are not bound to beleuee it. But if it were true, it is then thought to be wrought of god not for any holines in the man: or in the Corporas, but a speciall gifte for the conuersion of the heathen, for whose saluation God suffereth oft many wonders to be done. This Berinus being receiued in the ship againe with a great admiration of the Maryners, beyng therewyth conuerted and Baptysed: was driuen at last by the weather, to the coast of the Westsaxōs, where Kynigilsus and his brother Quicelinus aboue mentioned did raigne.  Which two kinges, the same time by y^e preaching of Berinus were conuerted, and made Christen men, with the people of the country, being before rude and barbarous. It happened the same time when the forsaid kings shoulde bee christened, that Oswaldus (mentioned a little before) king of Northumberland, was thē present, and the same day married Kynigilsus his daughter, and also was godfather to the king.

Thus Oswald after he had reigned ix. yeares in such holines and perfectnes of life, as is aboue specified, was slayne at length in the field called Maxfield, by wicked Pēda, king of the Mercians, which Penda, at length after all his tyranny was ouercome and slaine by Oswy brother to Oswald, next king after Oswald of Northumberland, notwithstanding he had thryse y^e people which Oswy had: this Penda being a Panim had iii. sonnes Wolferus, Weda, and Egfridus. To this seconde sonne Weda, Oswy had before time married his daughter, by consent of Penda hys father. The whiche Weda by helpe of Oswy was made Kyng of Southmercia,* the which Lordship is seuered from northmercia by the ryuer of Trent. The same Weda moreouer, at what time he married the daughter of Oswy, promised to him that he would become a christen man, which thing he performed after the death of Penda his Father, but afterward within iij. yeares of his reigne, he was by reason of his wife slaine: And after him the kingdome fell to Wolferus the other brother, who beyng wedded to Ermenilda, daughter of Ercomber kyng of Kente, was shortly after Christened, so that he is accounted the first christened king of Mercia. This Wolferus conquered Kenwalcus Kyng of Kent, and gat y^e Ile of Wight, which after he gaue to Sigbert King of Theastangles,* vpon condition he would be Christened. And thus the Eastangles, which before had expulsed Mellitus there bishop,, as is declared recouered againe the Christian faith vnder Sigbert their King, who by the meanes of the foresayd Wolferus was reduced and Baptised by Finanus the Byshop.

But to returne againe to Oswy,* from whom we haue a litle digressed, of whom we shewed before how he succeeded after Oswald in the prouince of Bernicia, to whom also was ioyned Oswynus hys cosin, ouer the Prouince of Deyra, and therwith his fellow, Oswy, raigned the space of vij. yere: this Oswyne was gentle, & liberal to his people and no •sse deuout towarde God: who vpon a time had giuen to Aidanus the bishop aboue mentioned, a Princely Horse with the trappers, & al that appertained therto:* because he should not so much trauel on foote but some tyme ease himselfe withall. Thus Aidanus the Scottishe Byshop as he was riding vpon his kingly horse, by the way meteth him a certaine poore man asking and crauing hys charitie. Aidanus hauing nothing els to giue him: lighted down,* and giueth to him his horse trapped and garnished as he was. The King vnderstanding this, & not contented therewith, as he was entring to dinner with the sayd Aidanus what ment you father Byshop, (sayd he) to giue away my horse I gaue you, vnto the begger? Had not I other horses in my stable that might haue serued him well enough, but you must giue awaye that which of purpose was pickt out for you among the chieftest? To whome the Bishop made aunswere againe saying or rather rebuking the king, what be these wordes (O king saide he) that you speake? Why set you more price by an horse, which is but the sole of an horse, then you do by him which is the sonne of Mary, yea which is the sonne of God? He said but thys when the king forthwith vngirding his sword frō about him (as he was then newly come in from hunting) falleth downe at the feete of the Bishop,* desiring him to forgiue him that, and he would neuer after speake word to him, for any treasure he should afterward giue away of his. The Bishop seing the king so mekely affected, hee then takyng him vp, & chering him againe with words, began shortly after to weepe & to be very heauy, his minister asking the cause therof, Aidanus aunswered in his scottish language saying to him: I weepe saith he for that this king cannot liue lōg. This people is not worthy to haue such a Prince as he is to raigne among them.* And so as Aidanus sayd, it came to passe. For not long after Oswy the king of Bernicia disdainng at him, when Oswyne either being not able or not willing to ioyne with him in Battaile,* caused hym traiterously to be slaine. And so Oswy, with his sonne Egfride raigned in Northumberland alone.

In the time & also in the house, of this Oswy king of Northūberland, was a certaine man named Benedict, who was the bringer vp of Bede from his youth, & tooke him to his institution, whē he was but seuen yere old, & so taught him during his life. This Benedict, or Benet, descending of a noble stocke and rich kinne & in good fauour with Oswy: forsoke seruice, house, and al his kindred to serue Christ, & wēt to Rome (where he had bene in his life time v. times) and brought from thence bookes,* into Monasteries, wyth other things which he thought then to serue for deuotion. Thys Bennedict surnamed Byshop, was the fyrst that brought in the arte and vse of glasing into this lande. For before that, glasse windowes were not knowen, either in churches, or in houses.

In the raigne of the foresaid Oswye and Egfride hys sonne, was Botulphus Abbot: which builded in the East part of Lincolne an Abbey. Also Aidanus, Finianus, & Colmannus, with iii. Scottish Bishops of Northumberlande holy men, held with y^e Britaines, against the Romish order, for the keeping of Easter daye. Moreouer Cutbertus Iarumannus, Cedda, and Wilfridus liued the same time, who as I iudge to be Byshops of an holy conuersation, so I thought it sufficient here only to name them. As touching Page 123 their miracles wherefore they were made Saintes in the Popes calender, seing they are not written in the Gospel, nor in my Crede, but in certaine old chronicles of that age so they are no matter of my faith: notwithstanding as touching there conuersation,* this I read, and also do credite, that the Clergy both of Britaine & Englande at that time, plied nothing that was worldly, but gaue thē to preching and teaching the word of our Sauour, and followed the life that they preached, by giuing of good ensample. And ouer that, as our histories accord, they were so voyd of couetousnes, that they receiued no possessions or territories as was forced vpon them.

About this season or not much before, vnder the raigne of Oswy & Oswyne,* kynges of Northumberlande, an other Synode or Councell was holden against the Brytaines and the Scottish bishops, for the ryght, obseruyng of Easter, at Sternehalt. At what time Agilbertus Byshop of westsaxons came to Northumberlande, to instytute Wilfride, Abbot of Rypon, where this question for Easter day began to be moued.* For Colmannus then Byshop of Northūberland followed not y^e custome of Rome, nor of the Saxons: but followed the Brytaynes, and the Scottish Bishops, his predecessors in the same sea before. Thus on the one side was Colmannus the Archbyshop of Yorke and Hilda the Abbes of Sternhalt: which alleaged for them the doinges and examples of their predecessours, both godly and reuerend byshops: as Aidanus, Finianus, Archbishops of that sea of Yorke before them, and diuers moe. Who had vsed alwaies to celebrate the Easter, from the xiiij. day of the first moneth, till the xxviij. of the same. And specially for that S. Iohn y^e Euangelist at Ephesus, kept and obserued that day, &c. On the otherside was Agilbert bishop of westsaxons, Iames the Deacon of Paulinus aboue mentioned: Wilfride Abbot of Ripon: and King Alfride Oswyes sonne, with his Queene, holding on the same side. The full contentes of which disputation here followeth, according as in the story of Bede at large is described: with their reasons and argumentes, on both sydes as insueth, &c.

*The question of Easter, and of shauing, and other Ecclesiasticall maters being moued, it was determined that in the Abbey which is called Streneshalch, of the which Hilda a deuout woman was Abbes: a conuocation should be had and this question there determined. To the which place came both the kinges, the father and the sonne. Byshop Colman with his clergy of Scotland. Aigelbert wyth Agathon and Wilfride Priestes,James and Roman were on their sides. Hilda the Abbes with her company was on the Scottish part. And the reuerend Byshop Cedda was appointed Prolocutor for both parties in that Parliament. King Oswye begā first with an Oration: declaring that it was necessary for such as serued one God, to liue in one vniforme order, and that such as loked for one kingdome in heauen should not differ in celebration of the heauenly sacraments, but should rather seeke for the true tradition & follow the same. This said, he commaunded his Byshop Colman to declare what the rite and custome was in thys behalfe that he vsed, and from whence it had the originall. Then Colman obeying his princes cōmaundement, sayd: the Easter,* which I obserue I receaued of my auncestors that sent me hether a Bishop. The which, all our forefathers being men of God, did celebrate in like maner, & left it should be coutēned or despised of any man, it is manifestly aparant, to be y^e very same, which y^e holy Euangelist S. Iohn (a disciple especially beloued of the Lord) did customably vse, in al churches and congregations, where he had authoritie. When Colman had spoken manye thinges to this effect, the king cōmaunded Aigelbert to declare his opinion in this behalfe, and to shew the order that he then vsed, from whence it came & by what authoritie he obserued the same. Aigelbert requested the king, that his scooler Wilfride, a Priest, might speake for him: in as much as they both with the rest of h^{is} clergy, were of one opinion herein: and that the said Wilfride coulde vttey his minde better and more plainely in the Englishe tounge then he himselfe could.* Then Wilfride at the kings cōmaundements, began on this sort and sayd: The Easter which we keepe, wee haue seene at Rome, whereas the holye Apostles, Peter, & Paule, did liue and teach, did suffer and were buried. The same also is vsed in Italy, and in Fraunce: the which coūtries we haue traueled for learning,* and haue noted it to be celebrated of them all. In Asia also and in Aphricke, in Egipt and in Greece, and finally in all the world, the same maner of Easter is obserued, that we vse▪ saue onelye by these here present with their accomplice & the Pictes & the Britanes: with the which two (& yet not altogether agreing) they condescend & striue foolishly in this order against the vniuersal world.* To whom Colman replied, saying, I maruel you wil cal this order folish, that so great an Apostle as was worthy to lie in the Lordes lap, did vse, whom all y^e world doth wel know to haue liued most wisely: and Wilfride aunswered,* god forbid that I should reprooue S. Iohn of folye who kept the rites of Moses law according to the letter (the Church being yet Iewishe in manye pointes) and the Apostles not as yet able to abdicate al the obseruations of the law before ordained: as for example y^e could not reiect Images inuented of the Diuel, the which all men that beleue on Christ ought of necessitie to forsake, and detest:* least they should be an offence to those Iewes that were amongst the Gentiles. For this cause dyd S. Paule Circumcise Timothie, for this cause did hee sacrifice in the temple, and did shau his head with Aquila and Priscilla, at Corinth. all which thinges were done to none other purpose, then to eschue the offēce of the Iewes. Hereupon also said James to Paule, thou seest brother howe many thousand Iewes do beleue & all these be zealous (notwithstanding) of the law. Yet seing the Gospell is so manifestly preached in the worlde, it is not lawfull for the faithfull to bee Circumcised, neither to offer sacrifice o^f carnall things to God. Therefore Iohn according to the custome of the law, the xiiij. day of the first moneth at euening, did begin the celebration of the feast of Easter, nothing respecting whether it were relebrated in the Sabbath, or in any other feriall day. But Peter when hee preached at Rome, remembring that the Lord did arise from death on the first day after the Sabbath giuing thereby an hope to y^e world of the resurrection,* thought good to institute Easter on y^e day, & not after the vse and precepts of the law (that was) the xiiij. day of the first moneth. Euen so Iohn looking for the Moone at night if it did arise, & the next day after were Sunday, which was then called the Sabbath, then did he celebrate the Easter of the Lord in the euening like as wee vse to do euē at this day. But if Sunday were not the next day after the xiiij,* day, but fel on the xvi. day, or xvij or on a'ny other day vnto the xxi: he taried alwayes for it, and did begin the holy solemnitie of Easter, on the euening nexte before y^e sabbath. And so came it to passe that Easter, was alwaies kept on the Sunday, and was not celebrated but from the xv. day vnto the xxj. Neither doth this tradition of the Apostle breake the law, but fulfilled the same. In the which it is to be noted, that Easter was instituted frō the xiiij. day of the first moneth at euening vnto the xxj. day of the same moneth at euening, the which manner all S. Iohns successours in Asia, after his death did follow, and the Catholike Church throughout the whole worlde. And that this is the true Easter, and onely of all Christians to be obserued, it was not newly decred: but confirmed by y^e Councell of Nice,* as appeareh by the Ecclesiasticall history. Wherupon it is manifest that you (Colman) do neither folow the example of S. Iohn as ye thinke, nor of S. Peter whose tradition you do willingly resist, nor of y^e church nor yet of the gospel, in the celebration of Easter. For S. Iohn obseruing Easter according to the preceptes of the law kept it not on the first daye after the Sabbath. But you precisely keepe it, onely on the first day after the Sabbath. Peter did celebrate Easter from the xv. daye of the moone to the xxj. day, but you keepe Easter from the xiiij. vnto the xx. day, so that you begin Easter oftentimes the xiiij. day at night: of which maner neither the law nor the Gospell maketh any mention.* But the Lord in y^e xiiij. day either did eate the olde passouer at night, or els did celebrate the sacraments of the new Testament in the remēbraunce of his death and passiō. You doe also vtterly reiect from the celebration of Easter the xxj. daye, the whiche the law hath chiefly willed to be obserued. And therefore as I saide in the keeping of Easter, you neither agree wyth S. Iohn, nor with Peter, nor with the lawe, nor yet with the Gospel. Then Colman againe aunswere to these things, saying. Did then Anatholius a godly man and on much cōmended in the foresaid Ecclesiasticall history, agaynst the law & the Gospell? who writeth that the Easter was to be kept frō the xiiij. day vnto the xx: or shal we thinke that Columba our reuerend father, and his successors being mē of God, who obserued the Easter, after this maner, did against the holye Scripture? where as some of them were men of such godlines and vertue as was declared by their wonderful miracles. And I hereby (nothing doubting of their holines) do endenor to fallow their life,* order, & dyscipline. Then saide Wilfride, it is certaine that Anatholius was both a godly and a learned man, and worthy of great commendation, but what haue you to do with him, seyng you obserue not his order? For he following y^e true rule in keping his Easter, obserueth the circle of xix. yeares. The which either you know not, or if you do, you cōtemne the Page 124 common order obserued in the vniuersal church of Christ. And moreouer the saide Anatholius doth so count the xiiij. day in the obseruation of Easter, as he confesseth the same to •e the xv day at night, a•ter the maner of the Egiptiās. and likewise noteth the xx. day to be in the feast of Easter, the xxi. in the euening: the which distinctiō that you know not, by this may appeare, for that you keepe the Easter on the xiiij. daye before the full Moone. Or otherwise I can aunswere you touching your father Columba, and his successors, whose order you say you follow, moued therto by their miracles on this wise: that the Lorde will aunswere to many that shall say in the day of iudgement,* that in his name they haue prophesied & cast out deuils, & haue done many miracles. &c. that he neuer knew thē. But God forbid that I should say so of your fathers, bicause it is much beter to beleue wel of those we know not, then ill. Wherevpō I deny not, but they were the seruaunts of God and holy men,* the which loued the Lord of a good intēt, though of a rude simplicitie. And I thinke that the order whiche they vsed in y^e Easter, did not much hurt them, so long as they had none amongst them that could shew thē the right obseruation of the same, for them to follow. For I thinke if the truth had beene declared vnto them, they woulde as well haue receiued it in this mater as they did in others. But you and your felowes if you refuse the order of the apostolicall sea, or rather of the vniuersal Church, which is confirmed by the holy scripture, without al doubt you doe sinne:* and though your forefathers were holy mē, * what is their fewnes being but a corner of an Ilelād, to be preferred before the vniuersall Church of Christ dyspersed throughout the whole world? And if Columba your father (& ours also being of Christ) were mighty in miracles, is he therefore to bee preferred before y^e Prince of the holy Apostles? to whom the Lord said, thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I builde my Church, and the gates of hell shal not preuayle against it, & I will giue thee the keyes of the Kingdome of heauen?

Wilfride hauing thus ended his argument, the kyng said to Colman: Is it true that the Lord spake these things to S. Peter?*_ And Colman aunswered yea. Then sayde the King: Can you declare any thing that the Lorde gaue to Colum. Colman aunswered no. Then quoth the king doe both of you agree and consent in this matter, without any controuersie, and that these wordes were principally spoken to Peter, and that the Lord gaue him the keyes of the kingdome of heauen? And they both aunswered yea. Then concluded the king on this wise: for asmuch as S. Peter, is the doore keper of heauen. I will not gainesay him: but in that I am able, I will obeye his orders in euery point least when I come to the gates of heauen, he shut them against me.

Upon this simple & rude reason of the king, the multitude eftsoones consented:*_ and with them also Cedda was contented to giue ouer. Onely Colmanus the Sto•, beyng thē Archbishop of Yorke, in displeasure left the Realme, & departed into Scotlande, carying with him the bones of Aidanus, Bed. Lib. 3. cap. 25. And thus much concerning this matter of Easter.

After the decease of Oswy,*Egfride his sonne was King after him in Northumberland xv. yeares. By this Egfride Cutbert was promoted to the Bishopricke of the Ile of Farne. And Wilfride which before had bene Archbishop of Yorke, was displaced through the meanes of Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury:*_ and Cedda possessed that sea, Wilfride when he was put out, went to Rome & complained of him to Agathon the Bishop, and was well allowed in some things. But the king and Theodorus had there such Proctors and frindes, that hee returned without speeding of hys cause. Wherefore he returned into the Southsaxons and builded an Abbey in Silesey, and preached vnto the Southsaxons xv. yeares. The king of the Southsaxons at that time, Ethelwold, to whom he declared a little before, that Wolferus king of the Mercians, gaue the Ile of wight vpon condition, that he would be Christened, and so was baptised by Berinus:_ the sayd Wolfer being his Godfather and sonne in law, both in on day. Wherefore Wolferus now being licensed by Ethelwod the king, preached vnto his nobles & people of Southsexe, and conuerted thē to Christ. In y^e tune of whose baptising the raine which before they lacked three yeares together, was giuen them plentifully: whereby their great famine slaked, and the countrey was made frutefull, which before was dried vp with barēnes: In so much that as in some storyes is said, the people penured with famine, would go▪ xl. together, vpon the rocks by the seaside, and taking handes together would throw themselues downe to the sea. Moreouer, where they lacked before the arte of fishing, the foresaide Wilfride taught them how with nets to fish,

And thus by processe haue we discoursed from tyme to tyme how and by what meanes the Idolatrous people were induced to the true fayth of Christ: * of whome these Southsaxons with the Ile of wight was the last.

After Egfride who was slaine in the strayghtes of Scotland, next succeeded Alfride his brother, and bastarde sonne to Oswy, & raigned xvij. or xix. yeres in Northumberland. This Alfride restored againe the foresaid Wilfride to the sea of Yorke, whom his brother had before expelled, & put in Cedda. Notwithstanding, the same king within v. yeares after, expelled the saide Wilfride againe and so went he to Rome. But at length by Osrike his successour was placed againe, the Archbishop of Yorke: and Cedda was ordayned by Theodorus Byshop of Mercia. The which prouince of Mercia, * y^e said Theodorus Archbishop of Canterbury by the authoritie of the Synode holdē at Hatfield, did after diuide into fiue bishoprickes: that is, one to Chester, the second to worceter, the third to Lichfield, y^e fourth to Cederna, in Lindesey, the fift to Dorchester, which was after translated to Lincolne.

Neare about this time, * in the yeare of our Lord, 666. y^e detestable sect of Mahumet, begā to take strēgth & place: Although Polychronicon differing a little in yeares, accoūteth the beginning of this sect somewhat before: * but y^e most diligent searchers of thē which write nowe, refer it to this yeare, which wel agreeth with the number of y^e beast, signed in the Apocalips. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , That is. 666. Of this Mahumet came the kingdome of Agarenes (whome hee after named Saracenes) to whom he gaue sondry lawes, patched of many sectes & religions together, he taught thē to pray euer to the South: And as we keepe the Sunday, so they keepe the friday, which they call the day of Venus. He permitted them to haue as many wiues as they were able to maintaine: to haue as many concubines as they list: to abstaine from vse of wyne, except vpon certaine solemne daies in the yeres: * to haue & worship onely one God omnipotent: saying that Moses & the Prophetes were great men, but Christ was greater, and greatest of all the Prophets, as being borne of the virgine Marye by the power of God, without mans seede: and at last was taken vp to heauen, but was not slaine: but an other in his likenes for him, with many other wicked blasphemies in his law cōtained. At length this kingdome of y^e Saracenes beganne to be conquered of the Turkes, & in processe of time wholly subdued to them.

But now to returne again to the time of our English Saxons. In this meane season Theodorus was sent from Italy into England by Vitellianus the Pope, to bee Archbyshop of Caunterbury, & with him diuers other monks of Italy, to set vp here in Englād Latine seruice, Masses, ceremonies, * letanies, with such other Romishe ware, &c. This Theodorus being made Archbishop and Metropolitane of Canterbury began to play the rex, placing & dysplacing the byshops at his pleasure. As for Cedda & Wilfride Archbishops of Yorke he thrust them both out vnder the pretence, that they were not lawfully consecrated, notwithstanding they were sufficientlie authorised by theyr kinges, and were placed against their willes. Wherefore Wilfride as is before touched went vp to Rome, but could haue no redres of his cause: yet to shew what modesty this Wilfride vsed against his enimie, being so violently molested as he was, because the wordes of his complainte are expressed in W. Malmesbery, I thought here to expresse the same both for the commendation of the partie, and also for the good example of other, in case any such be, whome good examples will mooue to well doing. This Wilfride therefore hauing such iniury and violence offered vnto him by the handes of Theodore: although he had iust cause to doe his vttermost, yet in prosecuting his complaint, how hee tempered himselfe: what wordes of modestie he vsed, rather to defende his innocencie, then to impugne his aduersary, by this his suggestion offered vp to the Byshop of Rome, may appeare: whose words in effect were these: Quid autem acciderit,*vt Theodorus sanctiss. Archiepiscopus (me superstite in sede) quam, licet indignus dispensabam: absque consensu cuiuslibet Episcopi ex sua autoritate (mea humilitate non acquiescente) ordinauit tres Episcopos: omittere magis quam vrgere, pro eiusdem viri reuerentia cōdecet. Quem quide, pro eo quod ab hac Apostolicae sedis summitate directus est, accusare non audeo, &c. In English. Howe it chaunceth that Theodorus, the most holy & reuerend Archbishop (my selfe being aliue in the sea, which I though vnworthy did rule and dispose) hath of his own authority, without the cōsent of any bishop (neither hauing my simple voice agreing to the same) ordained iij. Bishops: I had rather passe ouer in silence, then to stir any farther therin, because of the reuerence Page 125 of that man, and no lesse thought I it my duetie so to doe. The which man for that he hath beene dyrected by the authoritie of this sea Apostolicall, I wyll not nor dare not here accuse, &c. Thus the cause of the sayd Wilfride, albeit it was sufficiently knowne in the Court of Rome, to be well allowed for iust and innocent, yet it was not then redressed. In such estimation was this Theodorus then among y^e Romaines. Upon this controuersie of these two Bishops I may wel here inter y^e words of W. Malmelbury, not vnworthy in my minde, to be noted, whiche be these in his Latine story: *Vbi videri & doleri potest humana miseria, quod videlicet quantum libet, quis sanctitate polleat, non ad plenum peruicaces mores exuat, &c. That is: In the whiche Theodore, saith hee, the weake and miserable infirmitie of man, may be sene and also lamented, considering, that although a mā be neuer so holy, yet in the same man is some thing, whereby it may be perceaued, that hee hath not vtterly put of all his stubburne conditions, &c.

In the time of this Theodorus, and by the meanes of hym, a prouincial Synode was holden at Thetford, mentioned in the storie of Bede: the principall contents wherof were these.

[unspec 1] First that Easter day shoulde bee vniformely kept and obserued through the whole Realme, vpon one certayne daye videlicet prima, 14. Luna mensis primi.

[unspec 2] Secondly, that no Byshop should entermedle within the Dioces of an other.

Thirdly, that monasteries consecrated vnto GOD, [unspec 3] should be exempt and free from the iurisdiction of the byshops.

Fourthly that the Monkes should not stray from one [unspec 4] place (that is) from one Monastery to another, without y^e license of his Abbot: also to kepe the same obedience which they promised at their first entryng.

Fiftly, that no Clergyman shoulde forsake his owne [unspec 5] Byshop, and to be receaued in any other place, wyth out letters commendatory of his owne Byshop.

Sixtly, that forraine Byshops & Clergimen cōming [unspec 6] into the Realme, should be content onely with the benefite of such hospitality, as should be offered thē: neither should entermedle any further within the precinct of any bishop, without his speciall permission.

[unspec 7] Seuently, that Synodes prouinciall should be kept within the Realme at least once a yeare.

[unspec 8] Eightly, that no Bishop shoulde preferre himselfe before an other, but must obserue the time and order of hys consecration.

[unspec 9] Ninthly, that the number of Byshops should be augmented, as the number of the people encreaseth.

[unspec 10] Tenthly, that no mariage should be admitted, but that which was lawfull, No incest to be suffered: neyther any man to put away his wyse for any cause, except onelye for fornication, after the rule of the Gospell. And these bee the principall chapters of that Synode. &c.

In the next yere following was the sixt general councell kept at Constaunce, whereat, this Theodore was also present vnder Pope Agatho, where Mariage was permitted to Greeke priests, and forbidden to the Latin. In this Councell the Latine Masse was first openly saide by Iohn Portuensis the Popes Legate, before the Patriarche and Princes at Constantinople, in the temple of S. Sophy.

After the decease of Alfride king of Northumberlande (from whom he was digressed) succeeded his sonne Osredus,* rainging xj. yeares. After whome raigned Kenredus 2. yeares.* And next Osricus after him .xj. yeares.

In the time and raigne of these 4. kings of Northumberland, king Iua reigned in westsaxe: who succeeding after Cadwalder, the last king of the Britaines, began his reigne about the yeare of the Lorde, 689. and raigned with great valiauntnes ouer the westsaxons, the tearme of xxxvij. yeares. Concerning whose actes and wars mayntayned against the Kentish saxons, and other kinges: because I haue not to entemedie withal, I referre the reader to other Chroniclers.

About the sixt yeare of the raigne of this Iua or Iue, Polychronicon, & other make mentiō of one Cuthlacus, whō they call S. Cuthlake a confessor, who about the 24. of hys age, renouncing the pompe of the world, professed himself a Monke in the abby of Repindon, and the third yeare after went to Crowlande, where he led the life of an Anker. In the which Ile and place of his buryng was builded a faire Abbey, called afterward for the great resort and gentle entertainment of straungers, Crowlande the courteous: but why this Cuthlake should be sainted for his doinges, I see no great cause, as neither doe I thinke the fabulous miracles reported of him to be true: as where the vulgare people are made to beleue, that he enclosed the deuill in a boyling pot, and caused wicked spirits to erecte vp houses,* with such other fables and lying miracles, &c. Among which lying miracles also maye be reckened that, which the stories mention in the xi. yeare of the raigne of Iua, to be done of one Brithwalde or Drithelmus: who •eing dead a long season, was restored to lyfe againe, & told many wonders of straunge things that he had seene, causing thereby great almes & deedes of charitie to bee done of the people. And so y^e disposing of his goods giuen in iij. partes went to the Abbey of Mailroos, where he continued the rest of his life.

Moreouer, about the xvj. yeare of the saide Iua Etheldred king of Mercia, after he had their raigned, 30. yeares, was made a Monke: and after an Abbot of Bacdncy.

And about the xvij. yeare of the raigne of Iue, died the worthy and learned bishop Aldelmus, first Abbot of Malmesbery, afterward bishop of Schirborn: of whō William Malmesbery, writeth plenteously, with great commendation, and that not vnworthelye as I suppose: especially for the notable praise of learning and vertue in him aboue the rest of that time (nexte after Bede) as the great number of bookes and Epistles and Poemes by him set forth, will declare. Although concerning the miracles which the sayd author ascribeth to him,* as first in causing an infant of ix. daies old to speak at Rome, to cleare pope Sergius, which was then suspected the father of the said child. Also in hanging his cauiule vpō the sunne beames. Item, in making whole the altarstone of Marble, brought from Rome. Itē in drawing a length one of the timber peces, which wente to the building of the temple in Malmesbery. Item, in sauing the Mariners at douer, &c. As concerning these and such other myracles, which William Malmesbery, to hym attributeth, I can not consent to him therein, but thynke rather the same to be Monkishe deuises,* forged vpon their Patrons, to maintaine the dignitie of their Houses. And as the Authour was deceaued (no doubt) in beleuing such fables himselfe: so maye he likewise deceaue vs, through the dexteritie of his style,* and fyne handling of the matter, but that father experience hath taught the worlde nowe a dayes more wisdomē, in not beleuing such practises: this Aldelmus was Byshoppe of Schyrborne, which sea after was vnited to y^e sea of Winton. In which Church of Winchester the like miracles also are to be read of Byshop Adelwod, and S. Swithune, whom they haue canonized likewise for a Saint.

Moreuer neare about the xxv. yeare of Iue,* by the report of Bede S. Iohn of Beuerley, which was then Byshop of Yorke died, and was buried at the porche of the Minster of Deirwod or Beuerley. In the which portch it is recorded in some Chronicles, that as the said Iohn vpon a time was praying, being in the portch of S. Michael in Yorke: y^e holy Ghost in the similitude of a Doue sat before him vpon the altar, in brightnes shining aboue the sunne. This brightnes being sene of other,* first commeth one of his Deacons running vnto the portche: who beholding the Bishop their standing in his praier,* and all the place replenished with the holy ghost, was strokē with the light therof, hauing al his face burnt, as it were with hote burning fire. Notwithstanding the Bishop by and by cured the face of his Deacon againe, charging him as the storye saith, not to publishe what hee had seene duryng hys lyfe time. &c. which tale semeth as true, as that we read about the same time done of S. Egwyne,* in Polychron Abbot of Eusham, and Byshop of Worcester (then called Wyctes:) who vpon a time when he had fettered both his feete Inyrans fast locked, for certaine sinnes done in his youth, and had cast the key therof in the sea:* afterward a fish brought the key againe into the ship, as he was saying homeward from Rome.

But to leaue these Monkishe phantasies, and returne into the right course againe of the story. In y^e time of this foresaide Iue, began first the right obseruing of the Easter day to be kept of the Pictes,* and of the Britaines. In the obseruation of which day (as is largely set foorth in Bede, and Polychron, Lib. 5. cap. 17. and 22.) three thinges are necessary to be obserued, the full Moone of the first Moneth, that is of the month of March: Secondly, the Dominical Letter: Thirdly, the Equinoctiall day, which Equinoctiall was wont to be counted in the East church, and especially among the Egyprians, to bee about the 17. daye of Marche.* So that the full Moone either vpon the Equinoctiall day, or after the Equinoctiall day being obserued the next dominicall day following that full moone, is to be taken for Easter day. Wherin is diligētly to be noted two thinges. First the fulnes of the Moone, must be perfectly ful, so that it be the beginning of the third weke of y^e mooue which is the 14. or 15. day of the moone. Secondly, is to be Page 126 noted, that the said perfect fulnes of the moone beginnyng the thirde weeke,* must happen either in the very euening of y^e Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day. For els if it happen either on the Equinoctiall day before the euening, or before the Equinoctial day, then it belongeth to y^e last moneth of the last yeare, and not to the first moneth of the first yeare, and so serueth not to be obserued.

This rite and vsage in keping Easter day being receiued in the Latin church, began now to take place amōg the Pictes & Britaines, through the busie trauaile of Theodorus Cuthlacus, but namelye of Elbert the holy Monke, as they terme him: and of Colfrid Abbot of Sirwin in Northumberlande, which wrote to Narcanus, or Naitonus the King of Pictes, concerning the same: who also among other thinges writeth of the shauen crownes of Priestes, saying:* that it was as necessary for the vow of a Mōke, or degre of a Priest, to haue a shauen crowne for restraunte of their lustes: as for any Christen man, to blesse him against spirits, when they come vpon him. Bede Lib. 5. The copy of which letter as it is in Bede, I haue here annexed, not for any great reason therin contained, but only to delite y^e Reader with some pastime, in seing the fond ignorance of that Monkish age: the copy of the letter thus proceedeth.

Of the shauing of Priestes, out of the fift booke of Beda the xxi. chap.

* CONCERNING the shauing of Priestes (wherof you wryte also vnto me) I exhort you that it be decently obserued according to the Christian faith. We are not ignorant that the Apostles were not al shauen, after one maner, neither doth the Catholicke Church at this day agree in one vniforme maner of shauing, as they do in faith, hope, and charity. Let vs consider the former time of the Patriarches, and we shall finde that Iob (an example of patience) euen in the very point of his afflictions, did shaue his head: and he proueth also: that in y^e time of his prosperitie, he vsed to let his heare grow. And Ioseph an excellent Doctour & executor of chastity, humilitie, pietie and other vertues: whē he was deliuered out of prison & seruitude was shauen: wherby it appeareth that whilst he abode in prisō he was vnshauen.* Behold doth these being men of god did vse an order in the habite of their body one contrary to the other, whose consciences notwithstanding within did wel agree in the like grace of vertues. But to speake truely and rely the difference of shauing hurteth not such as haue a pure faith in the Lord, & sincere charity, towards their neighbor: especially for that there was neuer any controuersie amongst the Catholike fathers about the diuersitie thereof, as there hath beene of the difference of the celebration of Easter and of faith. But of all these shauinges that wee fynde either in the Church or els where: there is none in mine opinion so much to be followed & embraced, as that which he vsed on his head, to whō the Lord said, thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke. I will builde my Church and the gates of hel shall not preuaile against it, & I will gyue thee the keyes of the kingdome of heauen. And contrarywise there is no shauing so much to be abhorred and detested as that which he vsed to whom the same S. Peter said, thy money bee with thee to thy destruction,* because thou thinkest to possesse the gift of God by thy money, therefore thy part nor lot is not in this worde. Neither ought we to bee shauen on the crowne onely because Saint Peter was so shauen, but because Peter was so shauen; in the remembrance of the Lords Passion: therefore we that desire by y^e same Passion to be saued, must weare the signe of the same passion with him vpon the top of our head which is the highest part of our body. For as euery Church that is made a Church by the death of the Sauour, doth vse to beare the signe of the holy crosse in the front: that it maye the better by the defence of that banner, bee kept from the inuasions of euill spirits: & by the often admonition therof, is taught to crucifie the flesh, with the concupiscence of the same: In like maner it behoueth such as haue y^e vowes of Monkes and degrees of the Clergy, to bind them selues with a straiter bit of continencie for the Lords sake. And as the Lord bare a crowne of thorne on his head in his passion,* wherby he tooke & caried away from vs the thornes and prickes of our sinnes: so must euery one of vs by shauing our heads, patiently beare and willinglye suffer, the mockes and scornors of the worlde for his sake: That wee may receaue the crowne of eternall life, which God hath promised to all that loue him, & shall by shauing their corporal crownes beare the aduersity, & contemne the prosperity of this worlde. But the shauing which Symon Magus vsed, what faithful man doth not detest together with his magickall arte? The which at the first apparance hath a shew of a shauen crowne, but if you marke his necke, you shal finde it curtailed in such wise as you will say it is rather meete to be vsed of the Symonistes then of the Christians.* And such (of foolish men) be thought worthy of the glory of the eternall crowne, whereas indede for their yll liuing they are worthy not only to be deprived of the same but also of eternall saluation.* I speak not this against thē that vse this kinde of shauing, & liue Catholically in fayth and good workes, but surely I beleue there be diuers of them be very holy and godly men. Amongst the which is Adamnan, the Abbot and worthy Priest of the Columbians: who when he came Embassadour from his country vnto king Alfride desired greatly to see our Monastery: where he declared a wonderful wisdom, humilitie and Religiō both in his maners and wordes. Amongest other talke I asked him why he, that did beleue to come to the crown of life y^t should neuer haue end, did vse contrary to his belief a definite Image of a crowne on his head. And if you seke (quoth I) the felowship of S. Peter, why doe you vse the fashion of his crowne whom S. Peter did accurse, and not of his rather with whom you desire to liue eternally? Adānā answered saying: you know right well brother though I vse Symons maner of shauing, after the custome of my country, yet doe I detest & with all my heart abhorre hys infidelitie.* I desire notwithstanding to imitate the footsteps of the holy Apostle as far forth as my power wil extend. Then said I: I beleue it is so. But then is it appaunt you imitate those thinges which the Apostle Peter did frō the bottom of your hart, if you vse the same vpon your face that you know he did. For I suppose your wisdom vnderstandeth that it is right decent, to differ in the triming your face or shauing, frō his whom in your hart you abhorre. And cōtrariwise as you desire to imitate the doings of him whom you desire to haue a * mediator betweene God & you, so it is meete you imitate the maner of his apparell and shauing. Thus much saide I, to Adamnan, who seemed then well to like our Churches: in so much that he returning into Scotland, reformed many of his churches there, after our celebratiō, albeit he could not do so amongst the Monks,* with whom he had special authority. He endeouored also to haue reformed their maner of shauing if he had bene able. And nowe (O King) I exhort your maiestie to labor together with your people (ouer whom the King of Kinges and Lorde of Lordes hath made you gouernor, to imitate likewise in all these points the Catholicke and Apostolical churches. So shall it come to passe that in the end of this your temporall kingdome y^e most blessed prince of the Apostles shall opē you the gates of the heauenly kingdome together with the other elect of god. The grace of the eternal king preserue you most derely beloued sonne in Christ long time to reigne ouer vs to the great tranquility of vs all.

When this letter was read before king Nayton wyth other of his learned men, and diligently translated into his proper language, he semed to reioyce very much at the exhortation therof, insomuch as rising vp from among his noble men, he kneled on the ground and gaue God thanks that he had deserued to receaue so worthye a presente out of England, & so caused it forthwith by publike proclamation to be writen out, learned, & obserued throught out all the prouinces of the Pictes, defacing the errours that had bene vsed there by the space of 700. and 4. yeares. For all the ministers of the altar & all Monkes, were shauen, on the crowne. And al the people reioiced for the new dyscipline of the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, S. Peter which they had receaued.

By this monkish letter aboue prefixed,* voide of all Scripture, of all probation & truth of history, thou maiest note gentle Reader: howe this vaine tradition of shauen crownes hath come vp, & vpon how light and trifling occasion: which in very deede was none other but the dreaming phantasies of Monkes of that time, falsely grounding vpon the example of Peter: when by no olde monument of any aūtient record they can euer proue, either Peter or Symon Magus to haue bene shauen. Moreouer in the said leter also is to be noted, how the Scottish Clergy at that season, did weare no such Priestly crownes, as our English Churchmen then did.

But to cut of this matter of shauing,* more worthy to be laught at thē to be storied, let vs now againe returne where as we left at king Iue, of whom W. Malmesbery, and Fabian in his chronicle do record that whē the foresaide Iue had ruled the west saxons by y^e tearme of 37. yeares, by the importunate perswasion, and subtile policie of his wife Ethelburga, was allured to go to Rome, & there to be made a Monke. Which Ethelburga, after she had a long tyme laboured Page 127 him to leaue the world, and could not bring about her purpose:* vpon a season when the king and she had rested them in a faire pallace richly behanged, & were vpon the morow thence departed: she by her commaundement caused the pallace to be replenished with all kinde of filth & dong,* and hogs and vile beasts therin to be sayd, as wel in the chambers as other houses of office. And in theyr owne chamber where they did lye, there was a Sow laid with her yong pigs. And when she knew that this palace was thus deformed, being a certain space out of the town, she besought the king to visite the said pallace. And when she had brought him therunto, she said to him: I pray you my Lord behold now this house, where are now the rich tappets and clothes of gold & silke,* and other rich apparel, that we left here this other day? And where be the delicacies & pleasant seruitors, and costly dishes, that you and I lately were serued with? Be not all these passed & gone? My Lord (saith she) in like maner shall we vanish away, as sodainly as you see these worldly things bene passed. And our bodies which now be delicately kept, shal fal and turne into the filth of the earth. Wherefore haue in mynde my wordes that before tyme to you I haue often shewed & told, and busie you to purchase that palace that euer shal endure in ioy without transmutation.

By meane of these wordes and other, the Queene turned so the kings mynd,* that shortly after he resigned the gouernance of his kingdom vnto Ethelardus his nephew: & for the loue of Christ tooke vpon him the habite of a poore man. And setting apart all the pompe & pride of this wicked world, associated himself in the felowship of poore men, and trauelled to Rome with great deuotion, when he had bene king of Westsaxons, as before is sayd 37. yeares. After whose departing, the foresaid Ethelburga his wife, went vnto Barking 7. miles from London, where in the Nunry of Barking before of Erkenwald founded,* she continued & ended the rest of her life, when she had bene Abbes of the place a certaine time. The said Malmesbery in his story also testifieth, that this Iue was the first king that granted a peny of euery fire house through his dominion to be paid vnto the Court of Rome, which afterward was called Romescot, or Peter pence, & long after was paid in many places of England.

This Iue, like as for his time, he was worthy and valiaunt in his actes: so was he the first of the Saxon kings (that I read of) which set forth any lawes to his country: the rehearsall of which lawes, to the number of 80. & odde, were not vnprofitable here to be inserted together with other lawes of the Westsaxon kings after him, before the tyme of William Conquerour: in case it were not for the length & prolixitie of this present volume. And thus much concerning the raigne of king Iue, king of Westsaxons by the way. Now to repaire againe to the course of Northūberland kings something intermitted.

*Next vnto the foresaid Osricus, folowed Celulfus, whom he had adopted, brother to Kēred aboue specified. This Celulfus as he was himselfe learned, so were in his tyme diuers learned mē then flourishing in England, among whō was Beda, who vnto the same king Celulfus offred his story intituled Anglorum Historia, not onely to be ratified by his authoritie, but also to be amended, as Malmesburiensis writeth by his knowledge and learnyng.

And for as much as I haue here entred into the mention of Bede, a man of worthy and venerable memory, because of the certifiyng of the truth of that man: and for that I see all writers (as touching his life) do not agree, some saying that he was no Englishman borne: I thought so much to report of him, as I finde by his owne words testified of himselfe in the latter end of his ecclesiastical history of England, offred to the said Celulfus aboue mentioned the wordes of whom be these.

Thus much by the helpe of God, I Bede the seruant of Christ, and Priest of the Monastery of Peter and Paule at wire, haue compiled and digested concerning the Britain history. And so the same Bede proceding further in his narration, declareth that he being borne in the territorie of the sayd Monastery, beyng of the age of vij. yeares, was committed of his parents and friends,* to the tuition and education of Benedict (of whom aboue relation is made) and of Celfride Abbots of the foresaid Monastery. In the which place or Monastery he continuyng, from that tyme forth, all his lyfe long, gaue hymselfe and all his whole study to the meditating of holy scripture. Whatsoever tyme or laisure he had frō his daily seruice in the church, that he spent either in learning, or in teaching, or writing somthing. About xix. yeares of his age, he was made Deacon, the xxx. yeare of his age he was made priest. From the which time to the age of 59. yeares, he occupied himself in interpreting the workes of the auncient fathers for his owne vse, and the necessitie of others: and in writing of treatises, which came in all to the number of 37. volumes, which he digested into 78. bookes.

Some say that he went to Rome either there to defend his bookes to be consonant to catholike doctrine either els if they should be found faulty, to amend & correct the same as he should thereto be commaunded. Albeit the reporter of this his life dare not certainly affirme that euer he was at Rome: but that he was inuited and called thether to come: both it is manifest in stories, and also this Epistle of Pope Sergius doth sufficiently prooue, declarnig moreouer in what price and estimation Bede was accepted, as wel in the court of Rome, as in other places besides. The Epistle of Sergius sent to Celfride, thus proceedeth in tenor and forme as followeth in Latin.

The Epistle of Pope Sergius sent to Celfride Abbot of Wire Abbey, requiring Bede to be sent vp to him to Rome for the same of his worthy learning.

Sergius Episcopus seruus seruorsi Dei,* Celfrido religioso Abbati. Sal. So notable and famous was the learning of this foresayd Bede,* that the Church of Rome (as by this letter appeareth) both stood in need of his helpe, and also requireth the same, about the discussing of certaine causes and controuersies appertaining to learning. Moreouer the whole Latin church at that time, gaue him the maisterie in iudgement and knowledge of the holy Scripture.* In all his explanations his chieffest scope and purpose did euer driue, to instruct and informe his Reader simply and without all curiousnes of stile, in the sincere loue of god, & of his neighbour. As touching the holynes and integritie of his life, it is not to be doubted: for how could it be, that he should attend to any vicious idlenes, or had any laisure to the same, who in reading & digesting so many volumes, consumed all his whole cogitations in writing vpon the scriptures: for so he testifieth of himselfe in the 3. booke vpon Samuel, saying in these wordes. If my treatises and expositions, saith he, bring with them no other vtilitie to the Readers therof: yet to my selfe they conduce not a little in this, that while all my study and cogitatio was set vpon them, in the meane while of the slipperie intitements and vayne cogitations of this world I had little mynd. Thus in this trauail of study he continued til the age of 62. yeres.* At length drawyng to his latter end, beyng sicke vij. wekes together besides other occupiyngs of his mynde,* and other studies which he did not intermit: he translated also the gospell of S. Iohn into English. At length with great comfort of spirite departed this lyfe, pronouncyng many comfortable sayings to them that stood about him, vpon the Ascension day, the same yeare when Nothelinus was instituted Archbishop of Caunterbury. And thus much concernyng the story of Bede.

This Celulfus king of Northumberland afore mentioned,* after he had raigned viij. yeares was made a Monke in the Abbey of Farne, otherwise called Lindefar, or holy Iland: where by his meanes licence was geuen to the monkes of that house to drinke wyne or ale, which before by the institution of Aidanus aboue mentioned, dronke nothing but milke and water. After whom succeded Egbert his cosin, brother to Egbert (the same tyme beyng bishop of Yorke) which brought againe thether the palle that hys Page 128 predecessors had forgone,* since the tyme that Paulinus had left the sea, & fled to Rochester, as is before declared. The said Egbert also erected a noble Library in Yorke, whose example I would other bishops now would follow.

About the beginning of the raigne of this Egbert, was Cutbert Archbishop of Canterbury: who collected a great Synode of Bishops and Prelates, in the yere of our Lord, 747. in the month of September,* neare to the place called Clonesh*. In the which Synode assembled, these decrees were enacted.

- 1. First, that Bishops should be more diligent in seing to their office,* and in admonishing the people of their faults.
- 2. That they shoulde liue in a peaceable minde together, notwithstanding they were in place disseuered a sunder.
- 3. That euery Bishop once a yere should go about al the Parishes of his Dioces.
- 4. That the said Bishops euery one in his dioces should monish their Abbots & monks to liue regularly: and that Prelates should not oppresse their inferiors, but loue thē.
- 5. That they should teach the Monasteries which the secular men had inuaded, and coulde not then be taken from them, to liue regularly.
- 6. That none should be admitted to orders, before his life should be examined.
- 7. That in Monasteries the reading of holy Scripture should be more frequented.
- 8. That Priests should be no disposers of secular busines.
- 9. That they should take no mony for baptising infants.
- 10. That they shoulde both learne and teache the Lordes Prayer and Creede in the English tounge.
- 11. That all should ioine together in their ministry after one vniforme rite and maner.
- 12. That in a modest voice they should sing in the church.
- 13. That all holy and festinall dayes should be celebrate at one time together.
- 14. That the Sabboth day be reuerently obserued & kept.*
- 15. That the vij. houres Canonical euery day be obserued.
- 16. That the Rogation dayes both the greater and lesser should not be omitted.
- 17. That the feast of S. Gregory, and S. Austen our Patron, should be obserued.
- 18. That the fast of the foure times shoulde be kept and obserued.
- 19. That Monkes and Nunnes should go regularly apparelled.
- 20. That Byshops should see, these decrees not to be neglected.
- 21. That the Churchmen should not geue them selues to dronkeunesse.
- 22. That the Communion should not be neglected of the Churchmen.
- 23. Item, that the same also should be obserued of the laye men, as time required.
- 24. That lay men first shoulde be well tried, before they entred in Monkerie.
- 25. That almes be not neglected.
- 26. That Byshops should see these decrees to be notified to the people.

- 27. They disputed of the profite of Almes.
- 28. They disputed of the profite of singing Psalmes.
- 29. That the Congregation shoulde be constitute, after their habilitie of their goodes.
- 30. That Monkes should not dwell among lay men.
- 31. That publike prayer should be made for kinges and Princes.

These decrees and ordinaunces beyng thus among the Bishops concluded: Cutbert the Archbishop, sendeth the copy therof to Boniface, whiche Boniface otherwise named Winfride an English man borne, was than the Archbishop of Mentz, and after made a Martyr, as the Popish stories terme him.

This Boniface being, as is sayd, Archbishop of Mentz in the time of this foresayd Synode, wrote a letter to Ethelbald king of Merceland: which Ethelbald was also present in the same Synode, of whome Bede maketh mention in his historie, calling him proude Ethelbald, and the greatest of the Saxon kinges in his time. First this Ethelbald after the departing of Ceolulph into his Monkerie, inuaded and spoiled the countrey of Northumberland. Moreouer he exercised mortall and horrible warre a long space wyth Cudred, otherwise of some named Cutbert, King of Westsaxons. Furthermore he with other Saxon kings, so impugned the Britains, that from that time they neuer durst prouoke the Saxons any more. At length the said Cudred refusing the intollerable exactions of proud Ethelbald, doth incounter with him in battaile: Where notwithstanding the great power that Ethelbald had to him adioyned, of the Mercians, of the Eastsaxons, of the Eastangles, and of Cantuarites: yet the saide Cudred through Gods power, and the meanes of a certaine valiant warriour called Edelhim a Consul,* ouerthrew the pride of Ethelbald, after a sore and terrible cōflict. Which Ethelbald notwithstanding repairing his power againe the next yere after, renued battaile with the foresayd Cudred. In the which battaile Ethelbald after he had raigned xli. yeaeres in Mercia, was slaine by one Beornred, who after raigned in that dition but a smal tyme. For Offa nephew to the sayd Ethelbald expelled the sayd Beornred, and succeeded king in that prouince of Mercia, where he raigned xxxix. yeaeres, of whom more followeth hereafter (the Lord Iesu speeding therein our purpose) to be declared as place and time shal require. In the meane season not to forget the letter before mentioned of Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, sent vnto thys Ethelbald: I thought the same not vnworthy here to be inserted (at the least the effect thereof) not so much for the authors sake, as for that some good matter peraduenture may be picked thereout, for other Princes to behold & consider.

The copy and tenor of the Letter of Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, and Martyr of God (an Englishman) sent to Ethelbald king of Mercia, freely and yet charitably admonishing him of his adulterous lyfe, and oppression of Churches.

REgi & filio charissimo,* & in Christi amore caeteris regibus Anglorum praeferendo Ethelbaldo, Bonifacius Archiepiscopus legatus Germanicus Romanae Ecclesiae perpetuam in Christo charitatis salutem. Consistemus coram Deo, qui nouit an verè atque ex animo dicam: Quando prosperitatem vestram, & fidem, & bona opera audimus, laetamur. Quando autem aliquid aduersum vel in euentu bellorum, vel de periculo animarum de vobis cognoscimus, tristamur. Audiuius enim quòd eleemosinis intentus, furta & rapinas prohibes, & pacem diligis, & defensor viduarum & pauperum es, & inde gratias Deo agimus. Quòd verò legitimum matrimonium spernis, si pro castitate faceres, esset laudabile. Sed quia in luxu & adulterio & cum sanctimonialibus volutaris, est vituperabile, & damnable. Nam & famam gloriae vestrae, coram Deo & hominibus confundit, & inter idololatrās cōstituit, quia templum Dei violasti. Quapropter fili Charissime poenitere, & memorare oportet, quàm turpe sit, vt tu qui multis gentib{us}, dono dei, dominaris, ad iniuriā eius sis libidinis •er uis. Audiuius praeterea quòd optimates penè omnes gentis Merciorum, tuo exemplo legitimas vxores deserant, & adulteras & sanctimoniales constuprent. Quod quàm sit peregrinum ab honestate, doceat vos alienae gentis institutio. Nam in antiqua Saxonia, vbi nulla est Christi cognitio: si virgo in materna domo, vel maritata, sub coniuge suerit adultera, manu propria strangulatam cremant, & supra fossa sepultae corruptorem suspendunt, aut cingulo tenus (vestibus abscissis) flagellant eam castae matronae, & cultellis pungunt. Et de villa in villam missae occurrunt nouae flagellatrices: donec interimant. Insuper & vinuli, quod est faedissimum genus hominum, hunc habent morem vt mulier viro mortuo, se in rogo cremantis pariter arsura praecipiter. Si ergo gentiles Deum ignorantes, tantum zelum castitatis habent: quid tibi conuenit fili Charissime, qui Christianus & rex es? Parce ergo animae tuae: Parce multitudini populi tui pereūtis exemplo tuo: de quorum animabus redditurus es rationem. Attende & illud, quid si gens Anglorum (sicut in Francia, & Italia, & ab ipsis Paganis nobis impropertur) spretis legitimis matrimonijs per adulteria deficit: nascitura{que} sit ex ea commixtione gens ignaua & Dei contemptrix,* quae perditis moribus patriam pessundet: sicut Burgundionibus & prouincialibus, & Hispanis contigit, quos Saraceni multis annis infestarunt propter peccata praeterita? Praeterea nunciatum est nobis, quòd multa priuilegia Ecclesiarum & monasteriorum auferens, ad hoc audendū duces tuos exemplo prouoces. Sed recogita quaeso quàm terribilem vindictam Deus in anteriores reges exercuit, eiusdem culpae conscios, quam in te arguimus. Nam Celredum praedecessorem tuum stupratorem Sanctimonialium, & ecclesiasticorum priuilegiorum fractorem, splendidè cum suis comitibus epulantem spiritus malignus arripuit: & sine confessione & viatico, cum diabolo sermocinanti, & legem Dei detestanti animam extorsit. Osredum quo{que} regem Deiorum & Bernicorum, earundem culparum reum, ita effrenatum regem egit: vt regnum & iuuenilem aetatem contemptibili morte amitteret. Carolus quo{que} princeps Francorum monasteriorum multorum euersor, & Ecclesiasticarū pecuniarum in vsus proprios commutator, longa tortione, & verenda morte consumptus est. Et mox infra: Quapropter fili Charissime, paternis & obnixis precibus deprecamur. vt non despicias consilium patrum tuorum, qui pro Dei amore celsitudinem tuam appellare satagunt. Nihil enim bono regi salubrius, quàm, fi talia commissa cum arguuntur, libenter emendentur. Quia per Salomonem dicitur: Qui diligit disciplinam, diligit sapientiam. Ideo, fili Charissime, oftendentes consilium iustum, contestamur Page 129 & obsecramus per viuientem Deum & per filium eius Iesum Christum, & per spiritum sanctum, vt recorderis quàm fugitiua sit vita praesens, & quam brevis & momentanea delectatio spurcae carnis: & quam ignominiosum sit, vt brevis vitae homo mala exempla in perpetuum posteris relinquat. Incipe ergo melioribus moribus vitam cōponere, & praeteritos errores iuuentutis corrigere: vt hic coram hominibus laudem habeas, & in futuro aeterna gloria gaudeas. Valere celfitudinem tuam, & in bonis moribus proficere optamus.

In this Epistle here is to be seene and noted, first the corruption and great disorder of lyfe, which alwayes from tyme to tyme hath bene found in these religious houses of Nūnes,* whose professed vow of coacted chastitie, hath yet neuer bene good to the Church, nor profitable to the common wealth, and least of all to themselues. Of such yong & wanton widowes, S. Paul in his tyme complayneth, 1. Tim. 5. which would take vpon them the wilfull profession of single lyfe, which they were not able to perform, but falling into damnable luxurie deserued worthily to be reprehended. How much better had it bene for these lasciuious Nunnes not to haue refused the safe yoke of christian matrimonie, then to intangle themselues in this their superstitious vow of perpetuall maidēhood, which neither was required of them, nor they were able to keepe.

Secondly, no lesse are they also to be reprehēded, which mainetayned these superstitious orders of vnprofitable Nunnes and of other religions: In the number of whom was this foresayd Boniface otherwise called Winfride, who although in this epistle doeth iustly reprehend the vicious enormities both of secular, and of religious persons: yet he him self is not without the same or rather greater reprehē^sion,* for that hee gaue the occasion thereof in maintaining such superstitious orders of such lasciuious Nunnes and other religions, & restraining the same from lawful mariage. For so we finde of him in stories that hee was a great se•ter vp & vpholder of such blinde superstition, and of all Poperie. Who being admitted by Pope Gregory the secōd, Archbishop of Magunce, and indued 〈◇〉 full authoritie legantine ouer the Germanes, brought diuers countreys there, vnder the Popes obedience: held many great Coūcels, ordained Bishops,* builded Monasteries, canonised Saints, commaunded reliques to be worshipped, permitted religious fathers to cary about Nunnes with them a preaching. Amongst all other he founded the great monastery of Fulda in Germany of English monkes: into the which no women might enter, but only Lieba, & Tecla, two English Nunnes. Item, by the authoritie of y^e said Archbishop Boniface, which he receiued frō Pope Zacharie, Childericus king of Fraunce, was deposed from the right of his crowne:* and Pipinus betraier of his maister was cōfirmed, or rather intruded in. From this Boniface proceeded that detestable doctrine which now standeth registred in the Popes decrees, Dist. 40. cap. Si Papa which in a certaine Epistle of his, is this. That in case the Pope were of most filthy liuing, and forgetfull or negligent of himselfe, and of the whole christianitie, in such sort, that he led innumerable soules with him to hell: yet ought there no man to rebuke him in so doing. For he hath (saith he) power to iudge all men, and ought of no man to be iudged agayne.

In the tyme of this Archbishop, Pope Gregory the second, also Gregory the third, and Pope Zachary, and before these also Pope Constantine the first: wrought great maisteries against the Greeke Emperours, Philippicus, & Leo, and others, for the maintaining of Images to be set vp in Churches. Of whom Philippicus lost both his Empire and also his eyes. Leo for the same cause likewise was excommunicate of Gregory the third. This Gregory the third (so farre as I can coniecture) was he that first wrote the foure bookes of Dialogues in Greeke, falsely bearyng the name of Gregory the first, which bookes afterward Zachary hys successour translated out of Greeke into Latin. Item, the same Gregory the third; first brought into the Masse Land, the clause for reliques beginning, Quorum solemnitates hodie in conspectu, &c. Item, brought into the sayd Canon the memoriall, the offring, and sacrifice for the dead: Lyke as Zachary brought in the Priests vesture and ornaments: & as the foresaid Constantinus also was the first that gaue his feete to be kissed of the Emperours. But turne agayne into the course of our English story.

In the tyme of this Egbert king of Northumberland, Sigebert or Sigbert raigned in Westsaxony: a man of so cruell tyranny to his subiectes (turning the lawes & customs of his forefathers after his owne will and pleasure) that when he was somewhat sharpely aduertised by one of his nobles, an Earle called Combranus, to chaūge his maners, and to behaue him more prudently toward his people: he therfore maliciously caused him to be put to cruell death. Whereupon,* the sayd king Sigebert continuing in his cruell conditions, by his subiectes conspiring agaynst hym, was put from his kingly dignity: and brought into suche desolation, that wandring alone in a wood without comfort,* was there slayne euen by the swineheard of the sayd Earle, whom before he had so wrongfully murdered, as partly is aboue touched: whereby is to be seene, the cruell tyranny of Princes neuer to prosper well▪ without the iust reuenge both of God and man.*

This Sigebert being slayne, in his place succeeded Kenulphus, in the yeare of our Lord 748. who with the agreemēt of the westsaxons was one of the chiefe doers against Sigebert his Maister. This Kenulphus kept stronglye his Lordship agaynst Offa; and agaynst the power of all hys enemies: till at length, after that he had raigned, as Fabian sayth 31. yeares,* he resorting to a paramour which he kept at Merton, was there beset & likewise slayne by the trayn and meanes of a certayne kinsman of the foresayd Sigebert, named Clito or Cliton, in reuengement of king Sigebertes death.*

Moreouer in the raigne of the foresayd Egbert kyng of Northumberland, and in the viij. yeare of Kenulphus king of Westsaxons: Offa after he had slayne the tyraunt Beoruredus, which before had slayne Ethelwald kyng of Mercia, and Uncle to this foresayde Offa: raigned King of that Prouince.

Of this Offa are told many notable deedes, which because they concerne rather politicall affaires, and doe not greatly appertayne to the purpose of this ecclesiastical history, I omit here to recite.* As his warres and victories against Egbert & the Northumbres, as also against Etheldred king of East Angles. Item, against Egbert king of Kent, otherwise called Wren, whom Fabian saith he tooke prisoner, & led him bound with him to Mercia. Malmesbury witnesseth otherwise, this to be done not by Offa, but by Kenulphus, as Christ willing hereafter shall appeare. After these victories Offa had such displeasure vnto the Citizens of Canterbury,* that he remooued the Archbishops see, and landes of Lambrith Archbishop of Caunterbury (by the agreement of Pope Adrian) vnto Lichfield. He also chased the Britaines or Welchmen into Wales, and made a famous dyke betwene Wales and the vtter bonds of Mercia or middle England, which was called Odfitche. And builded there a Church which long tyme a•ter was called Offekyrke.* This Offa also married one of his daughters to Brightricus that was king of Westsaxons. And for that in his tyme was variance betwene him and the Frenchmen, in so much that the passage of merchants was forbidden: therfore he sent Alcuinus a learned man, vnto Charles the great, then king of France, to common the meanes of peace: which Charles had after that, y^e said Alcuinus in great fauour and estimation, and afterward made him Abbot of Turonia in Fraunce.

About the latter tyme of the raigne of Offa,* kyng of Mercia: Ethelbert beyng then kyng of Eastangles (a learned and a right godly Prince) came to the Court of Offa: prouoked by the counsell of his Nobles, to sue for the mariage of his daughter, wel accompanied like a prince, with his men about him. Wherupon, the Queene conceiuyng a false suspicion, and fearing that which was neuer minded: that Ethelbert with his company vnder the pretence and made matter of mariage,* was come to worke some violence against her husband, and the kingdom of Mercia, so she perswaded with king Offa: and cetrine of her counsel that night: that the next day followyng, Offa caused him to be trayned into his pallace alone from his company, by one called Guymbertus: who tooke him and bound him, & there stroke of his head,* which forthwith he thā presented to the king & Queene. And thus the innocent king Ethelbert was wrongfully murdered, about the yeare of our Lord, 793. but not without a iust reuenge at Gods hand. For as the story recordeth, the foresayd Queene worker of this villanie, liued not iij. monthes after: and in her death was so tormented, that she was fayne to bite and rent her tong in pieces with her owne teeth. Offa vnderstanding at length the innocencie of this king, and the haynous cruelty of his fact: gaue the tēth part of his goods to holy church and to the church of Hereford, in remembraunce of this Ethelbert, he bestowed great landes.* Moreouer, builded the Abbey of S. Albons, with certayne other monasteries beside. And so afterward he went vp to Rome for his penāce, where he gaue to the Church of S. Peter a peny through euery house in his dominion, which was called commonly Romeshot, or Peterpence, payed to the Church of S. Peter: and there at length was transformed from a king to a monke, about the yeare of our Lord .794. with Kenredus Page 130 king of Northūberland aboue mentioned, although some storyes deny that he was a Monke.*

After Offa king of Mercia, when he had raigne xxxix. yeares succeded his sonne Egfredus, who raigne but foure monthes: of whome thus writeth the foresayd Alcuinus: Non arbitror quòd nobilissimus iuuenis Egfredus,*propter peccata sua mortuus sit: Sed quia pater suus, pro confirmatione regni eius multum sanguinem effudit, &c. That is: This noble yong man died not so much for offences of his owne, as for that his father had spilled much bloud, to confirme him in his kingdome.

Next to which Egfredus, succeded Kenulphus in the said kyngdome of Mercia, which Kenulphus keping and retaining the hatred of Offa his predecessor against the Cantuarites, made warre against them: where he tooke Egbert their king otherwise called Wren, whom he bound and led prisoner to Mercia. Notwithstanding, shortly after being mollified with princely clemency in the towne of Winchcombe, where he had builded the same tyme a church: vpō the day when he should dedicate the same in the presence of xij. bishops, and of Cutbert, whom he had placed in y^e same kingdom of Canterbury before, and x. Dukes, and many other great estates. Kyng Kenulphus brought the sayd Egbert king of Kent out of prison into the Church, where he enlarged him of imprisonment, and restored hym to his place agayne.* At the sight whereof, not onely Cutbert the foresayd king reioyced, but also all the estates and people beyng there present, made such an exclamation of ioy and gladnes, that the church, (and not onely the Church, but also the streetes) range withall. At which tyme such boūtifulnes of gifts and iewels was then bestowed, that from the highest estate to the lowest, none departed without somthing geuē, according as to euery degree was thought meete.* Although Fabian referreth this story to king Offa, yet causes there be, why I assent rather to Malmesbury and to Polychronicon, which attribute the same to Kenulphus the second king of Mercia, after Offa.

A little before in speaking of certain bishops of Rome, mention was made of Pope Constantine the first, Pope Gregory the second, Pope Gregory the third, & of Pope Zachary, which deposed Childerike, & set vp Pipinus the French king,* &c. Next after this Zachary, in order followed Pope Stephen the second, to whom the foresayd Pipinus to gratitie agayne the sea of Rome for this their benefite shewed to him, gaue and contributed to the said sea of Rome, the exarchat or Princedome of Rauenna, the kingdome of the Lombardes, and many other great possessions of Italie, with all the Cities thereto adioyning vnto the borders of Uenice.* And this donation of Pipine, no doubt if the truth were rightly tried, should be found to be the same, which hitherto falsly hath bene thought to be the donatiō of Constantine. For els how could it be, that the exarchate of Rauenna could belong all this while to the Emperours of Constantinople, if Constantine before had geuen it and all Italy from the Empire to the sea of Rome?*

To this Pipinus, as witnesseth Polychronicon, was sent first into France, the mention of the Organs out of Grecia, by Constantine Emperour of Constant. 757.

Next to this Stephen the ii. succeeded Paule the first, who following his predecessors, thundred out great excōmunications against Constantinus the Emperor of Constantinople, for abrogating and plucking downe Images set vp in Temples. Notwithstanding this Constantine neglecting the Popes vaine curses perseuered in his blessed purpose, in destroying Idolatry till the end of his lyfe. Then came to be Pope, Constantinus the second a lay man, and brother to Desiderius the king of Lombardy: for the which cause he was shortly deposed, and thrust into a monastery, hauing his eyes put out.

In whose stead succeeded Stephen the iij. who ordained that after that, no lay man should be Pope: condemnyng moreouer the councel of Constantinople the vii. for heretical, because in that councell the worshiping of Images was reprooued and condemned. Contrary to the which Councell, this Pope not only maintained the filthy Idolatry of Images in Christian Temples, but also aduaunced their ueneration, commaunding them most Ethnically to be incensed, &c. At this tyme Carolus Magnus called Charles the great a little before mentioned, began to raign, by whom this Pope caused Desiderius the Lombard king, to be depriued,

Then in this race of Popes, after this Stephen the iij. commeth Hadrianus the first, who likewise followyng the steps of his forefathers the Popes, added and attributed to the veneration of Images more then all the other had done before, writing a booke for the adoration and the vtilitie proceding of them, commaunding them to be takē for lay mens Calenders, holdyng moreouer a Synode at Rome against Felix,* and all other that spake against the setting vp of such stockes and Images. And as Paul the first, before him made much of the body of Petronilla S. Peters daughter: so this Hadrian clothed the body of S. Peter all in siluer, and couered the aulter of S. Paule with a Palle of gold,* This Pope Hadrian was he, whome we declared in the former part of this treatise, to ratifie and confirme by reuelation the order of S Gregories Masse, aboue the order of S. Ambrose masse, for vnto this time which was about the yeare of our Lord, 780. the Liturgie of S. Ambrose was more vsed in the Italian churches. The story whereof, because it is registred in Durandus,*Naclerus, and Iacobus de Voragine, I thought here to insert the same, to this especiall purpose, for the Reader to vnderstand the tyme, when this vsuall Masse of the Papists began first to be vniuersall & vniforme, & generally in churches to be receaued. Thus it foloweth in the story by the foresayd authors set forth. Iacobus de Voragine in the life of Pope Gregory the first telleth a tale concerning this matter.

In tymes past (saith he) when the seruice which Ambrose made, was more frequented and vsed in Churches, then was the seruice which Gregory had appointed, the bishop of Rome then called Adrian, gathered a Councell together: in the which it was ordained, that Gregories seruice should be obserued and kept vniuersally: which determination of the Councell, Charles the Emperor did diligētly put in executiō while he ran about by diuers Prouinces, & inforced all the Clergy, partly with threatnings, and partly with punishments, to receiue that order. And as touching the bookes of Ambrose seruice, he burnt them to ashes in all places, and threw into prison many priests that would not consent and agree to the matter. Blessed Eugenius the Bishop comming vnto the Councell, found that it was dissolued iij. dayes before his comming. Notwithstanding through his wisdom, he so perswaded the Lord Pope, that he called agayne all the Prelates that had bene present at the Councell, and were now departed by the space of three dayes. Therefore when the Councell was gathered agayne together, in this all the fathers did consent and agree, that both the Masse bookes of Ambrose and Gregory should be layd vpon the aulter of blessed Peter the Apostle, and the church dores diligently shut, and most warily sealed vp with the signets of many and diuers bishops. Againe, that they should all the whole night geue themselues to prayer, that the Lord might reueale, open & shew vnto them by some euident signe or token, which of these two seruices he would haue vsed in the Temples.* Thus they doing in all pointes as they had determined, in the morning opened the church dores, and founde both the Myssals or Masse bookes open vpon the aulter: or rather, as some say, they found Gregories Masse booke vtterly plucked asunder one piece from an other, and scattered ouer all the church. As touching Ambrose booke, they only found it open vpō the aulter in the very same place where they before laid it.* This miracle Pope Adrian like a wyse expounder of dreames, saith, that as the leaues were torne and blown abroad all the church ouer, so should Gregories booke be vsed throughout y^e world, whereupō they thought themselues sufficiently instructed and taught of God, that the seruice which Gregory had made, ought to be set abroad & vsed throughout the world, and that Ambrose his seruice should onely be obserued and kept in his owne church of Mediolanum, where he sometye was bishop.

Thus hast thou heard (brother Reader) the full and whole narration of this misticall miracle, with the Popes exposition vpon the same, which semeth to be as true, as that which Daniell speaketh of, how the Idoll Bell did eate vp all the meate that was set before him all the night, Daniel, 14. Concerning the which miracle, I need not admonish thee to smell out the blind practises of these nightcrowes, to blind the world with forged inuentiōs in stead of true stories. Albeit to graunt the miracle to be most true & vnfallible, yet as touching the exposition therof, another man beside the Pope, percase might interprete this great miracle otherwise, as thus: That God was angry with Gregories booke, and therefore rent it in pieces, and scatered it abroad, and the other as good, lay sound vntouched, and at the least so to be preferred. Notwithstanding, whatsoever is to bee thought of this miracle with the exposition therof,* thus the matter fell out, that Gregories seruice had only the place, and yet hath to this day in the greatest part of Europe, y^e seruice of Ambrose beyng excluded. And thus much touching the great act of Pope Adrian, for the setting vp of the Masse. By the relation wherof, yet this knowledge may come to the Reader, at least to vnderstand, how that commonly in christen nations abroad, as yet no vniforme Page 131 order of any Missall or Masse booke was receiued, as hath bene hetherto discoursed.

Now from the Popes to returne againe to the emperours from whence we digressed, like as Pipinus the father of Charles (as hath bene before sufficiently told) had geuen to the sea Papall all the pryncedome of Rauenna, with other donations and reuenewes, & landes in Italy: so this Carolus following his fathers deuotion, did confirme the same, adding moreouer therunto, the Citie and dominion of Venice,Histria, the Dukedome Foroiuliense, the dukedom Spoletanum and Beneuentanum, and other possessions moe, to the patrimonie of S. Peter, making him the Prince of Rome and of Italy. The Pope agayne to recompence his so gentle kindnes, made him to be intituled most Christen king, and made him Patricium Romanum Moreouer ordeined him onely to bee taken for Emperour of Rome. For these and other causes moe, Carolus bare no little affection to the sayd Adrian aboue all other Popes: as may well appeare by this letter of Carolus Magnus sent to king Offa, what tyme the said Offa (as is aboue prefixed) sent to hym Alcuinus for entreatie of peace: whereunto the foresayd Carolus aunswereth agayne to the message of Offa in a letter, the contents whereof be these.

The tenour of a Letter sent by Carolus Magnus to king Offa, answering to his request concerning the intreatie of peace betwene them.

*Carolus Rex Francorum & Longobardorum, Patricius Romanorum viro venerando, & fratri charissimo Offae Regi Merciorum Salut. Primò gratias agimus omnipotenti Deo, de Catholicae fidei sinceritate, quam in vestris laudabilibus paginis reperimus exaratam. De peregrinis verò qui pro amore Dei, & salute animarum suarum, beatorum Apostolorum limina desiderant adire, cum pace sine omni perturbatione vadant. Sed si aliqui religioni non seruientes, sed lucra sectantes inueniantur inter eos, locis opportunis statuta soluant telonia. Negociatores quoque volumus vt ex mandato nostro patrocinium habeant in regno nostro legitime. Et si in aliquo loco, iniusta affligantur oppressione, reclament se ad nos, vel nostros iudices, & plenam •stitiam iubemus fieri. Cognoscat quoque dilectio vestra quod aliquam benignitatem de Delmaticis nostris vel pallijs ad singulas sedes Episcopales regni vestri vel Ethelredi direximus, in eleemosinam Domini Apostolici Adriani, deprecantes vt pro eo intercedi iubeatis, nullam habentes dubitationem beatam illius animam in requie esse, sed vt fidem & dilectionem ostendamus in amicum nobis charissimum. Sed & de thesauro humanarum rerum, quum Dominus Iesus gratuita pietate concessit aliquid per Metropolitanas ciuitates: Direximus vestrae quoque dilectioni vnum baltheum, & vnum gladium & duo pallia serica, &c.

*The cause why this Carolus writeth so fauorablye of Adriā partly is touched before, partly also was, for y^e Carolomane his elder brother being dead, his wife called Bertha with her two Children came to Adrian, to haue them confirmed in their fathers kingdome: whereunto the Pope to shew a pleasure to Carolus would not agree: but gaue the mother with her two children, & Desiderius the Lombard king with hys whole kingdome, hys wife and Children, into the hands of the said Carolus, who led them with him captiue into Fraunce, and there kept them in seruitude during their lyfe.

Thus, Carolus Magnus beyng proclaymed Emperour of Rome, through the preferment of Adrian, and of Pope Leo the third which succeeded next after him, was the Empire translated from the Grecians about the yeare of our Lord 801.* vnto the Frenchmen: where it continued about 102. yeares till the comming of Conracus and hys nephew Otho, which were Germaines: and so hath continued after them amōg the Almanes vnto this present time. This Charles builded so many Monasteries as there be letters in the row of A.B C. he was beneficiall chiefly to Churchmen also mercifull to the poore, in hys actes valiaunt and triumphaunt, skilde in all languages, he held a counsell at Francford, where was condemned the Councill of Rice and Irene, for setting vp and worshipping Images, &c.

Concerning which Councell of Nice, & thinges there concluded and enacted (because no man shal thinke, the detesting of Images to be any new thing now begon) thus I finde it recorded in an auncient written history of Roger Houeden, called Continuationes Bede▪ His wordes in Latin be these: Anno 792. Carolus Rex Francorum misit Sinodalem librum ad Britanniam, sibi à Constantinopoli directum. In quo lib. Heu, proh dolor, multa inconuenientia, & verae fidei contraria reperiuntur, maximè quòd pene omnium orientalium Doctorum non minus quàm 300. vel eo amplius Episcoporum vnanimi assertionem confirmatum sit, imagines adorari debere: Quod omnino Ecclesia Dei execratur. Contra quod scripsit Albinus Epistolam ex autoritate diuinarum scripturarum mirabiliter affirmatam,illam{que} cum eodem libro ex persona Episcoporum ac principum nostrorum, Regi Francorum attulit. Haec ille. That is. In the yeare of our Lorde, 792. Charles the Frenche King sent a booke contayning the actes of a certeine Synode, vnto Brittainne, directed vnto hym from Constantinople. In the which booke (lamentable to behold) many thinges inconuenient, & cleane contrary to the true fayth are there to be found: especially for that by the common consent of almost all the learned bishops of the East Church, not so few as 300. it was there agreed that Images should be worshipped.* Which thing the church of god hath alwayes abhorred. Against which booke Albin{us} wrote an Epistle substantially grounded out of the authoritie of holy Scripture. Which Epistle with the booke, the sayde Albinus in the name and person of our Bishops and Princes, did present to the French king.

And thus much by the way of Romish matters: now to returne agayne to the Northumberland kings where we left at Egbert.* Which Egbert as is before declared, succeeded after Ceolulphus after he was made Monke.* And likewise the sayd Egbert also followyng the deuotion of hys vncle Ceolulphus, and Kenredus before him: was likewyse shorne monke after he had reigned 20. yeres in Northumberland, leauing his sonne Osulphus after him to succede: about which tyme, and in the saine yeare when Ceolulphus deceased in his Monastery, which was the yeare of our Lord, 764. diuers Cities were burnt with sodaine fire, as the citie of Wenta, the citie of London, the citie of Yorke, Dōacester, with diuers other townes besides. Roger Houeden. Lib. Contin. post Bedam, who the first yeare of hys raigne, which was the yere of our Lord, 757, beyng innocently slayne, next to him followed Mollo, otherwise called Adelwald, who likewise beyng slayne of Alcredus after hee had reigned ii. yeres departed. After, Alcredus whē he had reigned 10. yeres, was expulied out of his kingdom by his people. Then was Ethelbert otherwise named Edelred the sonne of the foresayd Mollo receaued kyng of Northumberland. which Ethelbert, or Adelred in like sort after he had reigned v. yeares, was expelled. After whome succeeded Alswold,* who likewise when he had reigned ii. yeres, was vniustly slaine. So likewise after him his nephew, and the sonne of Alcredus named Osredus reigned one yeare & was slayne. Then the foresayd Ethelbert the sonne of Mollo after 12. yeares banishment, reigned agayne in Northumberland the space of foure yeares, and was slayne: the cause wherof (as I finde in an old written story) was that forsaking his old wife, he married a new. Concerning the restoring of whō Alcuinus writeth in this maner: Benedictus Deus qui facit mirabilia solus. Nuper Edelredus filius Edelwaldis de carcere processit in solium, & de miseria in maiestatem, cuius regni nouitate detenti sumus ne veniremus ad vos, &c. And afterward the same Alcuinus againe speaking of his death, writeth to king Offa, in these wordes: Sciat veneranda dilectio vestra, quod Do. Carolus amabiliter & fideliter saepe mecum locutus est de vobis, & in eo habetis fidelissimum amicum. Ideo & vestrae dilectioni digna dirigit munera, & per Episcopales sedes regni vestri, similiter & Edelredo Regi, & ad suas Episcoporum sedes direxit dona. Sed heu Proh dolor, donis datis, & Epistolis in manus missorum, superuenit tristis legatio per missos qui de Scotia per nos reuersi sunt, De infidelitate gentis, & nece Regis. Ita Carolus retracta donorum largitate in tantum iratus est contra gentem illam, vt ait, perfidam & peruersam, & homicidam dominorum suorum, peiorem eam paganis estimans, vt nisi ego intercessor essem pro ea quicquid eis boni abstrahere potuisset, & mali machinari, iam fecisset, &c.

The kingdom of Northumberland ceaseth.

Thus as you haue heard,* after the raigne of king Egbert, before mentioned, such trouble and perturbatiō was in the dominion of Northumberland: with slaying, expulsiō, and disposing, their kings one after an other, that after the murdering of this Edelred aboue specified, none durst take the gouernemēt vpon him, seing the great danger thereupon insuing. Insomuch that the foresayd kingdome did lye void and waste the space of xxxiiij yeares together, after the terme of which yeares this kingdome of Northumberland, with the kingdomes also of the other Saxons besides, came all together into the handes of Egbert king of the Westsaxons and his progeny: which Monarchy began in the yeare of our Lord. 827. and in the 28. yeare of the raygne of the sayd Egbert: whereof more shall be sayd (Christ willing) hereafter.* Of this troublesome & ragious time of Northumberland people, speaketh also the sayd learned man Alcuinus otherwise called Albinus, in Page 132 the same country borne: writing out of Fraūce into England, and complayning of the same in diuers his letters, as first to Offa, where he thus writeth. Ego paratus eram eū muneribus Caroli regis ad vos venire, & in patriam reuerti. Sed melius visum est propter pacem gentis meae, in peregrinatione remanere,*nesciens quid fecissem inter eos, vbi nullus securus esse, vel in salubri consilio proficere potest. Ecclesia sancta a Paganis vastata, altaria periurijs faedata, monasteria adulterijs violata, terra sanguine dominorum & principum faedata, &c. Moreouer the sayd Alcuinus writing to the foresayd Edelred a little aboue mentioned, after the same tenor reporteth: Ecce Ecclesia sancti Cuthberti sacerdotum Dei sanguine aspersa (omnibus spoliata ornamentis) locus, cunctis in Britannia venerabilior. Paganis gentibus datur ad depraedādum. Et vbi primū post decessum S. Cuthberti ab Eboraco, Christiana religio in nostra gente sumpsit exordium: ibi miseriae & calamitatis caepit initiū, &c. Item, writing to Osbert a noble piere of the Mercians, complayning on the same maner, sayth: Regnum nostrum Northumbrorum penē perijt, propter intestinas dissentiones, & fallaces coniurationes, &c.

Item, in another place the sayd Alcuinus writing to Adelard Archbishop of Caunterbury, complayneth moreouer: Hoc dico propter flagellum, quod nuper accidit partibus insulae nostrae, quae prope trecentis & quadraginta annis à parentibus inhabitata est nostris. Legitur in libro Gildae sapientissimi Britonum, quòd ijdem Britones propter auaritiam & rapinam principum: propter iniquitatem & iniustitiam iudicum: propter desidiam praedicationis Episcoporum: propter luxuriam & malos mores populi: patriam perdidere. Caueamus haec eadem vitia nostris temporibus inolescere, quatenus benedictio diuina nobis patriam conseruet in prosperitate bona, quam nobis misericordissima pietate perdonare dignatus est, &c.

Ouer and besides the same author Alcuinus writyng to the foresayd Edelred king of Northumberland,* maketh record of a straunge sight which he himselfe did see the same time in y^e citie of Yorke, to raine bloud: wherof, his words which he wrote concerning the same,* to the said king Edelred be these. Quid significat pluuiā sanguinis, quam quadragesimali tempore in Eboraco ciuitate, quae caput est totius regni in Ecclesia beatiprincipis Apostolorum, vidimus de borealibus partibus domus, (sereno aëre) de summitate minanter cadere? Nonne potest putari, à borealibus partibus venire sanguinem super terram? That is: what signifieth the rayne of blood which in tyme of Lent in the Citie of Yorke, the chiefe Citie of that dominion, and in the church of S. Peter the chiefe of the Apostles, we our selues did see to fall from the Church top (the element being cleare) out of the North partes of the temple,* &c. This wondrous sight testified by Malmesburiensis, is thought of Fabian to happen in the second yere of the raigne of Brighthricus (as with the tyme doth well agree) which was the yeare of our Lord,* 780. & is thought of some expositors to betoken the comming of the Danes into this land, which entred shortly after about vij. yeres, in the 9. yeare of the raigne of Brighthricus king of the Westsaxons. Which Brighthricus in defence therof, sent forth hys Steward of his housholde with a small companie which shortly was slaine: but by the strength of the sayd Brighthricus and the other Saxon kings, they were compelled to voyd the land for that time,* which was, An. 790. To this Brighthricus king Offa, as is aforesaid, gaue his daughter Ethelburga to wife, by whom he at length was imployed, besides certaine other of his nobles: vpon whom, the said Queene before hym had practised the same wickednesse. Who then after that, fledde ouer to Charles the great into Fraunce, where she beyng offred for her beautie to marrie either to him, or to his sonne, because she chused rather his sonne, married neither the one nor yet the other: but was thrust in a Monastery,* where she then playing the harlot with a Monke, was expelled from thence, and ended her lyfe in penury and misery.

In the meane tyme while this Edelburga was thus workyng her feates in England: Irene Empresse of the Greekes, was as busie also for her part at Constantinople. Who first through the meanes of Pope Adrian, tooke vp the body of Constantine Emperour of Constantinople, her owne husbands father. And when she had burned the same, she caused the ashes to be cast into the sea, because he disanulled, Images. Afterward raigning with her sonne Constantine the 6. sonne to Leo the 4. (whome also we declared before to be excommunicate for taking away Images) beyng at dissention with him,* caused him to be taken & laid in prison. Who afterward through power of frends beyng restored to his Empire againe, at last she caused the same her owne sonne to bee cast in prison, and his eyes to be put out so cruelly, that within short space he dyed. After this the sayd Irene Empresse, with the counsaile of Therasius Bishop of Constantinople, held a Councell at Nicea, where it was decreed that Images should agayne be restored to the church: which Councell, after was repealed by an other Councell holden at Franckford by Charles the great.* At length she was deposed by Nicephorus (who raigned after) and was expelled the Empire: who after the example of Edelburga aboue mentioned (condignely punished for her wickednesse) ended likewise her lyfe in much penurie and miserie.

About the tyme when the foresayd Brighthricus was imployed by Edelburga his wife, died also king Offa,* which was about the yeare of our Lord, 795. or as some say, 802. After which Offa (as is aforesayd) succeeded Egbert, then Kenelphus, after whom succeeded Kenelmus his sonne, who in his yonger age was wickedly murdered by his sister Quindreda, and Askebertus, about the yeare of our Lorde, 819.* And in the Church of Winchcombe was counted for an holy Martyr. After him succeeded his vncle Ceolulphus, whom Bernulphus in the first yeare of his raigne expelled and raigned in his place. Who likewise the third yeare of his raigne was ouercome and expelled by Egbert kyng of the Westsaxons, and afterward slayne by the Eastangles. And the kingdom of Mercia also ceased, and came into the handes of the Westsaxons.

Hetherto I haue brought, as thou seest (good Reader) the confused and turbulent raignes of these vij. Saxon kings, who after the expulsion of the Britaines, ruled and raigned asunder in sundry quarters of this land together, vnto this present tyme of Egbert king of the Westsaxons. By whom it so pleased God to begin to reduce and vnite all these scattred kingdomes into one monarchicall forme of dominion. Wherefore, as in the foresayd Egbert beginneth a new alteration of the common wealth here in this land among the Saxons: so my purpose is (the Lord willing) with the same Egbert to enter a new beginnyng of my third booke, after a briefe recapitulation first made of such things as in this second booke before, are to be collected and noted, especially touching the monasteries builded, the kings which haue entered the life and profession Monastike: also Queenes & Queenes daughters, which the same tyme professed solitary life in monasteries, which they or their auncetors had erected.

The conclusion of the story precedent, concerning the seuen kingdoms of the Saxon kings aboue mentioned.

And thus hast thou (gentle Reader) concerning the vij. kingdoms of these Saxons, ruling altogether in England, the course and order of their doings briefly described and discoursed vnto thee, in such order, as the matter beyng so intricate, in such confusion & diuersitie of things incident together, would permit: followyng especially in this story hitherto, the line of the Northumberland kings as the other stories most folow the line of Westsaxō kings. The which seuen kingdoms of these sayd Saxones, after they had vntruely expulsed and chased out the Britaines from their land, like as they neuer were in quietnes amōg themselues, rainging thus together till the tyme of this Egbert: so also after the raigne of Egbert, the whole realme beyng reduced into one regimēt, no lesse were they impugned & afflicted by the Danes continually frō tyme to time, till the last conquest of William the Normand Thus it pleseth (God euer) lightly to reuenge with bloud,* bloody violence, and the vniust dealings of men, with iust and lyke retribution. But of this let the christian Reader consider, as Gods grace shall worke in him. In the meane tyme we, as much as in vs did lye, satisfiying the part of an Historician, haue thus hetherto set forth and declared concerning these vij. foresayd kingdoms: first the names and lineall descent of the kings seuerally by themselues, as by the table precedent may appeare, then what were the doings and actes of the same. How first being Pagans, they were conuerted to the christian faith: what things in their time happened in the church, how many of them, of kings were made monkes: how deuout they were then to holy church and to the churchmen, and especially to the church of Rome. But the churchmen then were much otherwyse in lyfe, then afterward they declared themselues to bee. Through which deuotion of the said kings, first came in, the Peterpence or Romeschots in this Realme, as by Iue first in his dominion, then by Offa in his Lordship, & afterward by Adelwulph brought in and ratified through the whole Realme: where also is to be noted, that by the foresayd Kings and Queenes of the sayd Saxons, the most part of the greatest Abbais & Nunneries in this realme, were first begun and builded, as partly the names of some Page 133 here follow to be seene.

*First the Church or Minster of S. Paule in London, was founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert kyng of Essex, about the yeare of our Lord. 604.

*The first crosse and aulter within this realm was first set vp in the North partes in Heuenfield, vpon the occasion of Oswald king of Northumberland, fighting against Cadwalla, where he in the same place set vp the signe of the crosse, kneelyng and praying there for victory, Polychron. lib 5. cap. 12. An. 635.

The Church of Winchester was first begon and founded by Kingilsus king of Mercians,* hauing 9. myles about it: after finished by his sonne Kewalcus, where Wyne, of englishmen was first bishop, An. 636. Guliel. Malmesb. Lib. De gestis pont. Ang.

*The Church of Lincolne first founded by Paulinus Bishop, An. 629.

The Church of Westminster began first by a certayne Citizen of London,* through the instigatiō of Ethelbert king of Kent, which before was an Ile of thornes, Bed. An. 614.

*The common schooles first erected at Cambridge by Sigebert king of Eastangles, An. 636.

The Abbey of Knouisburgh builded by Furceus the Hermite, An. 637.

The monasterie of Malmesbery by one Meldulfus a Scot, about the yeare of our Lord, 640. Afterward enlarged by Agilbert bishop of Winchester.

The Monasterie in Glocester, first builded by Ofricus King of Mercia,* as Cestrensis sayth. But as William Malmesb. writeth, by Vlferus, and Etheldred brethren to Kineburga Abbess of the same house, An 679.

*The monastery of Mailrose by the floud of Twide by Aidanus a Scottish bishop.

The Nunnery of Heorenton by Heui, who was the first Nunne in Northumberland,*Bede, Lib. 4. cap. 1.

*The Monastery of Hetesey by Oswy Kyng of Northumberlād, who also with his daughter Elfred, gaue possessions for twelue monasteries in the partes of Northūberland, An. 656.

*The monasterie of S. Martine in Douer, builded by Whitred king of Kent.

The Abbey of Lestingey by Ceadda (whom we call S. Cedd) through the graunt of Oswald, sonne to S. Oswald, King of Northum. An. 651.*

The Monastery of Whitby called otherwise Strenhalt by Hilda daughter to the nephew of Edwyne Kyng of Northumberland, An▪ 657.

Item an other monastery called Hakanos, not far from the same place builded by the sayd Hilda the same yeare.

The Abbey of Abbington builded by Cissa Kyng of Southsex, An. 666.

Item an Abbey in the East side of Lyncolne, called Ioanno, by S. Botulph. Polychro. Lib. 5. cap. 16. An. 654.

The monastery in Ely founded by Etheldred or Edeldrida daughter of Anna king of Eastangles, and the wyfe of Elfrid king of Northumb. An. 674.

The Monastery of Chertsey in Southrey, founded by Erkenwald bishop of London, an. 674. thrown down by the Danes, after reedified by king Edgar.

Item the Nunnery of Berking edified by the sayd Erkenwaldus bishop of London about the same tyme.*

*The Abbey of Peterborough called otherwise Modehamstede founded by King Ethelwald King of the Mercians, An. 675.

*Bardney Abbey by Etheldredus King of the Mercias, An. 700.

*Glastonbury by Iua king of the Westsaxons, and after repayred and enriched by King Edgar, an. 701.

*Ramesey in the tyme of king Edgar by one Ailwinus a noble mā, an. 973. King Edgar builded in his tyme 40. monasteries, who raigned, an. 901.

*The Nunnery of Winburne builded by Cuthburga sister to Ingilsus, king Iua his brother, an. 717.

*The Monastery of Sealesey by the Ile of Wight, by Wilfridus bishop of Yorke, an. 678.

*The Monastery of Wincombe by Kenulphus Kyng of the Mercians, an. 737.

*S. Albanes builded by Offa, King of the Mercians. Anno. 755.

*The Abbey of Eusham by Egwinus Byshop. An. 691.

*Ripon in the North by Wilfridus Bishop. An. 709.

*The Abbey of Echelinghey, by king Aluredus, an. 891.

*The Nunnery of Shaftesbury by the same Aluredus, the same yeare.

Thus ye see what monasteries in what tyme began to be founded by the Saxons kings, newly conuerted to the Christian fayth, within the space of 200. yeares: who, as they semed then to haue a certain zeale & deuotion to godward, according to the leading & teaching that then was: so it semeth againe to me, two things to be wished in these foresayd kings.* First, that they which began to erect these monasteries and celles of Monkes and Nunnes, to lyue soly and singly by themselues out of the holy state of matrimony: had forseene what daunger & what absurd enormities might and also did thereof ensue, both publikely to the Church of Christ, & priuately to their own soules. Secondly, that vnto this their zeale & deuotion had bene ioyned like knowledge & doctrine in Christes gossell, especially in the article of our free iustification by the faith of Iesu Christ.* Because of the lacke wherof, as wel the builders & founders therof, as they that were professed in the same, seeme both to haue run the wrong way, & to haue bene deceiued. For albeit in them there was a deuotion & zeale of mynd, that thought well in this their doynge, which I wil not here reprehend: yet the end and cause of their deedes & buildings cannot be excused, beyng contrary to the rule of Christes Gospel, for so much as they did these things seeking thereby merites with God, and for remedy of theyr soules, and remission of their sinnes, as may appeare testified in their owne recordes, wherof one here I thought to set forth for probation of the same. Read this Charte (if it please thee gentle Reader) of king Ethelbald his donation, & charter giuen to churches and religious persons, which Ethelbald was the builder (as is sayd) of Peterborough, the wordes of his record and instrument be those.

 The donations and priuiledges granted and geuen by King Ethelbald, to religious men of the Church.

PLerum{que} contingere sole•it,*pro incerta temporum vicissitudine, vt ea quae multarum fidelium personarum testimonio consilio{que} roborata fuerint fraudulenter per contumaciā plurimorum, & machinamenta simulationis, sine vlla consideratione rationis, periculose dissipentur, nisi auctoritate literarum (testamento Chyrogaphorum) aeternae memoriae comittantur. Quapropter, ego Ethelbaldus Rex Merciorum, pro amore caelestis patriae, & remedio animae meae studendum esse praeuidi: vt eam per bona opera liberam efficerem in omni vinculo delictorum. Quoniam enim mihi omnipotens Deus per misericordiam clementiae suae, absque vllo antecedente merito, sceptrum regiminis largitus est: ideo libenter ei, ex eo quod dedit, retribuo. Huius rei gratia hanc donationem, me viuente, concedo, vt omnia monasteria & Ecclesiae regni mei, à publicis vectigalibus, & operibus, & oneribus absoluantur: nisi instructionibus arcium, vel pontium quae nulli vnquam prosunt. Praeterea habeant famuli Dei, propriam libertatem in fructibus siluarum & agrorum, & in captura piscium, ne munuscula praebeant vel regi, vel principibus, nisi voluntaria. Sed liberi Deo seruiant, &c.

By the contentes hereof may well be vnderstand (as where he sayth, pro amore caelestis patriae, pro remedio animae, pro liberatione animae, & absoluteione delictorum, &c) how great the ignorance and blindness of these men was: who lacking no zeale, onely lacked knowledge to rule it withall: seeking their saluation not by Christ onely, but by their owne deseruings and meritorious deedes. Which I recite not here to any infamy or reprehensiō of them, but rather to put vs in minde and memory, how much we at this present are bound to God, for the true sincerity of his truth: hidden so long before to our foreauncetors, and opened now to vs by the good will of our God, in his sonne Christ Iesu. This onely lamēting by the way, to see them to haue such works, and to lacke our fayth: and vs to haue the right fayth, and to lacke their workes. And this blinde ignoraūce of that age, thus aboue prenoted, was the cause not onely why these kinges builded so many Monasteries vpon zealous superstition, but also why so many of them, forsaking their orderly vocation of Princely regiment, gaue themselues ouer to Monasticall profession, or rather wilfull superstition. Concerning the names and number of which kings that were professed Monkes, is sufficiently in the storye before declared:• the names of whome wee shewed to be seuen or eight, within the space of these two hundreth yeres. Such was then the superstitious deuotiō of kings & Princes in that age: and no lesse also to bee noted in Queenes and kings daughters, with other noble women, of the same age and time. The names of whom, it were to long here to recite. As Hilda daughter to the nephew of Edwine king of Northumberland. Abbesse of the house of Ely. Erchengoda with her sister Ermenilda daughters of Ercombertus king of Kent: * whiche Erchengoda was professed in Saint Brigets order in Fraunce. Item Edelberga wyfe and Queene to Kyng Edwyne of Northumberland, and daughter of kyng Anna, which was also in Page 134 the same house of S. Brigit made a Nunne. Item, Etheldreda whō we terme S. Eldride, wife to king Ekfride of Northumberland, who beyng married to two husbands, could not be obtained to geue her consent to either of them during the space of 12. yeares, but would needes liue a Uirgin, and was professed Nunne at Helings. *Werburga was the daughter of Vlferus king of Mercians, & made Nunne at Ely. *Kinreda sister of king Vlferus and Kinswida her sister, were both Nunnes professed. Sexburga daughter of kyng Anna king of Mercians, and wyfe of Ercombert kyng of Kent, was Abbess at Ely. Elfrida daughter of Oswy kyng of Northumberland, was Abbess of Whitney. Mildreda, Milburga, and Milguida, all three daughters of Merwaldus king of West Mercians, entred the profession and vow of Nūnish virginity. *Kineburga, wife of Alfride king of Northumberland, and sister to Ofricus king of Mercians, and daughter of king Penda, was professed Abbess of the Monastery in Glocester, Elfleda, daughter of Oswy king, and wyfe of Peda, sonne of king Penda, likewise inclosed her self in the same profession and vow of Romish chastitie. * Likewise Alfritha wyfe to king Edgar. And Editha daughter to the sayd Edgar, with Wolfrith her mother, &c. All which holy Nunnes with diuers mo, the Romish catholikes haue canonised for Saintes, and put the most part of thē in their Calender, and onely because of the vowe of chastitie solemnly professed. Concerning the which chastitie, whether they kept or no, little I haue to say against them, and lesse to sweare for them. But whether they so kept it or not, if this gift of chastitie which they professed, were geuen them of God, small prayse worthy was it in them to keepe it: If it were not geuen them, I will not say here of them so much, as hath bene sayd of some other, which sufficiently haue painted out to the world, the demeanour of these holy votaries. But this will I say, that although they kept it neuer so perfectly, yet it is not that which maketh saints before God, but only the blood of Christ Iesus, and a true fayth in him.

Likewise remayneth, that as we haue declared the deuotion of these noble women, which professing Monastick lyfe, haue cast of all worldly dignitie and delightes: so we should also intreate of such noble men, who among the Saxon kings in lyke zeale of deuotion, haue geuen ouer themselues from the world (as they thought) to the contemplatiue life of Monkish profession. The names of whō as in the Catalogue of the Saxon kings before is described, be these, to the number of ix.

A Table of such Saxon Kings, as were after made Monkes.

Of whiche kynges and their doynge, what is to be iudged, looke gentle Reader before▪ pag. 133.

By these historyes it is apparaunt: what mutations, what perturbations, and what alteratiō of state hath bene in this Realme of Britayne, first from Brittaines kings, to Romaines, then to Britaynes agayn, afterward to the Saxons. First to vij. altogether raigning, then to one. &c. And this alteratiō not onely happened in y^e ciuile gouernment, but also followed in the state Ecclesiastical. For as in the Britaynes tyme the Metropolitan see was in Londō: so in the Saxons time after the comming of Austen, it was remoued to Cāterbury, the Catologue and order of which Metropolitanes, from the tyme of Austen to Egbertus, is thus, as in the history of Malmesberiensis described.

The names and order of the Archbishops of Caunterbury, from Augustine, to the tyme of king Ethelbert.

1. Augustinus. 16.

2. Laurentius. 5.

3. Mellitus. 5.

4. Iustus. 3.

5. Honorius. 25.

6. Deus dedit. 10.

- . Theodorus. 22.

Hitherto from Augustine all the Archbishops of Caunterbury were Italians and foreiners.

8. Berctualdus In his tyme the Monasterie of S. Martin was builded in Dorobernia, by Witredus &
English. 37 hys brother, kings of Kent.
9. Tacuinus. 3
10. Nothelinus. 5
11. Cuthbertus. 17 This Cutbert after his death forbad all funerall exequies or lamentation for him to bee made. William Malm. De vitis, Lib. 1.
12. Breguinus. 3
13. Lambrihtus, or In his tyme king Offa translated the Metropolitane sea from Caunterbury to Lambertus. 27 Lichfield by the graunt of Pope Adrian, beyng ouercome with Apostolicall arguments, as sayth Flores Hist. that is with money.
- Ethelardus. 13
15. Vlfredus. 28
16. Fegeldus. 3 m. This Ethelardus by his Epistles to Pope Leo, obtayned the Metropolitane sea agayne to Cāterbury.
17. Celnochus. 41

Duryng the course of these 17. Archbishops of Cant. in Rome passed in the meane tyme 34. Popes, of whome partly heretofore we haue declared.

And thus much touching the tyme of the seuen kingdomes of the Saxones, rulyng together in Englande, from the raygne of Hengist, vnto Egbert, the first Kyng and Monarche of the whole lande, after the expulsion of the Britaynes.

NOW remayneth (by the grace of Christ) in the next booke followyng, to prosecute the order of such kings as principally rainging alone, had this realme in their possession: from the tyme of Egbert king of Westsaxons, to the comming of William Conqueror the Normand, comprehending therein the rest of the next 300. yeares, with the actes & state of Religion, as in that space was in the Church: wherin may appeare the declining tyme of the Church, and of true Religiō, preparing the way to Antichrist, which not long after followed. For here is to be noted, that during yet this mean tyme, Sathan (as is sayd) was bound vp from his raging and furious violence, counting from the tyme of Constantinus, to the next loosing out of Sathan, which was foretold by the Reuelation of S. Iohn aboue mentioned, to be a thousand yeares. Wherof by the order of the history (Christ graunting) more shall be sayd hereafter.

The ende of the second Booke.

THE THIRD BOOKE CONTAINING THE next 300. yeares, from the raigne of King Egbertus, to the tyme of William Conquerour.

NOW remayneth likewise as before I did in describing, the discent and diuersitie of the seuen kings altogether raigning and ruling in this land, so to prosecute in like order the lineal succession of them, which after Egbert king of Westsaxones, gouerned and ruled soly, vntill the conquest of William the Normand: first expressing their names, & afterward importing such acts as in their tyme happened in the Church worthy to be noted. Albeit, as touchyng the actes and doyngs of these kings, because they are sufficiently and at large described, and taken out of Latine writers into the English tong by sondry authors, and namely in the story or Chronicle of Fabian. I shall not spende much trauaile therupon, but rather referre the reader, to him or to some other: where the troublesome tumulis betwene the Englishmen and the Danes at that tyme may be seene, who so listeth to read them. Onely the Table of their names and raigne, in actes done vnder their raigne, I haue compendiously abridged, vsing such breuitie, as the matter would suffer.

A Table of the Saxon Kings, which ruled alone from King Egbert, vnto William Conquerour.

- Egbertus raygned 37. yeares and had issue.
 - Athelwulfus raygned 20. yeares had by his wife Osburga.
 - Ethelbaldus raygned 5. yeares.
 - Ethelbertus raygned 6. yeares.
 - Etheldredus raygned 5. yeares.
 - Aluredus or. Alfredus raygned 28. yeares
 - Edwardus raygned 24. yeares.
 - Adelstanus raygned 16. yeares.
 - Elfrede and Ethelwald•
 - Edmond raygned 6. yeares.
 - Edwin raygned 4. yeares.
 - Edgar raygned 16. yeares.
 - Edwardus raygned 4. yeares.
 - Ethelredus raygned 36. yeares.
 - Edmond Irenside raygned 2. yeres.
 - Alfredus.
 - Edward the Confessor who raygned 24. yeares.
 - Edredus raygned 9. yeares.
 - Egelwardu•

Here is to be noted, that before the raigne of Edward the confessor, the Danes obtayned the crowne vnder their captaine Canutus who raygned yeares

William Conqueror a Normand.

King Egbertus.

IN the raigne of Brightricus a little before mentioned,* about the yere of grace 7•5. there was in his dominion a noble personage, of some called Egbert, of some Ethelbert, of some Athelbright, who being feared of the same Brightricus, because he was of a kingly bloud, & nere vnto the crowne, was by the force & conspiracie of the forenamed Brightricus, chased & pursued out of the land of Britam into Frāce, where he endured till the death of the sayd Brightricus.* After the hearing whereof, Egbert sped him eftsoones out of Fraunce, vnto his countrey of Westsaxe, where he in such wise behaued himselfe, that he obtained the regiment and gouernance of the abouesaid kingdom.

Bernulphus king of Mercia aboue mentioned, with other kings, had this Egbert in such decisiō, that they made of him diuers scoffing gestes,* and scorning rimes, at which he susteined for a time. But when he was more established in his kingdome, & had proued the mindes of his subiects and especially God working withall:* he afterward assembled his knights, and gaue to the saide Bernulphus, a battaile in a place called Elindē, in the prouince of hāton. And notwithstanding in that fight was great oddes of number, as 6. or 8. against one, yet Egbert (through the might of the Lord which giueth victory as pleaseth him) had the better and wan the field:* Which done he seased that Lordship into his hand. And that also done, he made war vpon the Kentish saxons, and at length in likewise, of them obtained the victory.* And as it is in Polychronicon testified, he also subdued Northumberland, and caused the kings of these three kingdomes to liue under him as tributaries or ioyned them to his kingdome. Ex Flor. Hist. This Egbert, also wan from the Britons or Welshinē, the town of Chester, which they had kept possession of, till that daye. After these & other victories, he peaceably enioying the land, called a Councell of his Lords at Winchester, where by their aduises he was crowned king & chief Lord ouer this land,* which before that day was called Britaine: but thē he sent out into all coasts of the land his commaundements and cōmissions, charging straightly y^t from that day forward the Saxons should be called Angles, and the land Anglia.

About the 30. yeare of the raigne of Egbert,* the heathenish people of the Danes, which a little before had made horrible destruction in Northumberland, & especially in y^e Ile of Lindesarue, where they spoyled the Churches, and murthered the ministers,* with men, women, and children, after a cruell maner, entered now the second tyme with a great host into this land, and spoyled the Ile of Shepy in Kent, or nere to Kent, where Egbert hearing therof, assembled his people and met with them at Carrum. But in that conflict sped not so well as he was woont in tymes before, but with his knights was compelled to forsake the field. Notwithstanding in the next battail, the sayd Egbert with a small power ouerthrew a great multitude of them, and so droue them backe. The next yeare followyng, the sayd Danes presuming vpon their victory before, made theyr Page 136 return again into the land Westward,* where ioining with the Britaines, by the helpe and power of them, they assayled the landes of Egbert,* & did much harme in many places of his dominion, and els where, so that after this day, they were continually abiding in one place of the realme of england or other▪ till the time of Hardeknutus, last king of the Danes bloud, so that many of them were married to English women, and many that now be, or in times past were called Englishmen, are descended of them. And albeit that they were many and sundry times driuen out of the land, & chased from one countrey to an other, yet that notwithstāding, they euer gathered new strengthes and power, that they abode still within the land.

And thus (as by the storyes appeareth) this troublesome land of Britaine,* now called England, hath bene hetherto by v. sundry outward nations plagued. First, by the Romans, then by the Scots & Pictes, 3. by the Saxons, 4. by the Danes, of whose outrageous cruelty & hostilitie, our English histories do most exclaime & complayne:,* fiftly by the Normanes, which I pray God be the last.

Thē it followeth in the story, that the time of this persecution of the foresayd Paganes and Danes continuing, king Egbert when he had ruled the Westsaxons, and ouer the more part of England, by the terme of xxxvij. yeares, dyed, and was buried at Winchester, leauing to his sonne Ethelwolfe his kingdome, which first was Byshoppe of Winchester (as Houeden recordeth) and after vpon necessity made king, leauing withal and pronouncing this saying to his sonne: Foelicem fore, si regnum, quod multa rexerat industria, ille consueta genti illi non interrumperet ignauia.

 King Athelwulfus.

Athelwulfus, the sonne of Egbert, in his former age had entred into the order of Subdeacon, and as some other say was made Byshop of Winchester. But afterward being the onely sonne of Egbert was made king through the dispensation (as Fabian sayth) of Pope Paschalis, but that can not be: for Paschalis then was not Byshopp: so that by the computation of tyme, it should rather seeme to be Gregory the 4. This Athelwulfe (as being himself once nuseled in that order) was alwayes good and deuoute to holye Church and religious orders.* In so much that he gaue to them the rythe of all his goods and landes in Westsaxons, with liberty and freedome from all seruage and ciuil charges. Whereof, his charte instrument beareth testimony after this tenour proceeding: much like to the donation of Ethelbaldus king of Mercians, aboue mentioned.

 The Priuiledges and donations geuen by king Ethelwulfus to the Clergie.

REgnante Domino nostro imperpetuum. Dum in nostris temporibus per bellorum incendia, & direptiones opumstrarum, nec non & vastantium crudelissimas depredationes hostiū,* barbarum, paganarum{que} gentium, multiplices tribulationes ad affligendum vsque ad internecionem,*tempora cernimus incumbere periculosa. Quamobrem, ego Ethelwulfus Rex occidentalium Saxonum, cum consilio Episcoporum & principum meorum, consilium salubre, & vniforme remedium affirmaui: vt aliquam portionem terrarum haereditariam, Deo & sanctae Mariae, & omnibus sanctis iure perpetuo possidendam concedam, scilicet partem terrae meae,*vt sit tuta & immunis ab omnibus secularibus seruicijs, nec non regalibus tributis maioribus & minoribus siue taxationibus, quod nos dicimus Wittereden: sit{que} libera omnium rerum,*pro remissione animarum & peccatorum nostrorum, ad Deo soli deseruiendum, sine expeditione, & pontis constructione, & arcis munitione: vt eo diligentius pro nobis ad Deum preces sine cessatione fundant, quo eorum seruitutem in aliqua parte leuigamus, &c.

Hereby may it appeare, how when the Churches of England, began first to be indued with temporalities and lands: also with priuileges & exemptiōs enlarged. Moreouer (and that which specially is to be considered & lamented) what pernicious doctrine was this, wherewith they were led: thus to set remission of their sinnes, and remedy of their soules: in this donation and such other deedes of their deuotion, cōtrary to the information of Gods word, and no small derogation to the Crosse of Christ?

These thinges thus done within the Realme, then the sayd Ethelwulfus the king, taking his iourney to Rome, with Alured his youngest sonne, committed him to the bringing vp of Pope Leo the iiij. where he also reedified the English schole at Rome: which being founded by king Offa, or rather by Iue king of Mercians (as in the flowers of Hist. is affirmed) was lately in the tyme of king Egbert his father,* consumed with fire. Farther and besides, th•s king gaue and graunted there vnto Rome, of euery fire house a peny to be payd through his whole land, as king Iue in his dominion had done before. Also he gaue & graūted yearely to be payd to Rome. 300 markes, that is to the mainteining of the light of S. Peter .C. markes: to y^e light of S. Paul .C. markes: to the vse of the Pope also an other hundreth. This done, returning home through Fraunce, married their Iudith the daughter of Carolus Caluus, y^e•rēch king: whom he restored afterward, contrary to the lawes of Westsaxons, to the title and throne of a Queene. For before, it was decreed among the Westsaxons (by the occasion of wicked Ethelburga, who poisoned Brightricus her owne husband) that after that, no kinges wife there should haue the name or place of a Queene.

And forsomuch as I haue here entred into the mention of Iudith, daughter of Carolus Caluus: the occasion thereof putteth me in memory, here to insert by the way a matter bone, although not in this Realme, yet not impertinent to this ecclesiasticall history. And first to deduct the narration hereof from the first originall. The father of this Carolus Caluus, whose name was Ludouicus, first of that name, called Pius king of Fraunce, had two wiues: whereof by the first, he had iij. sonnes, Lothary, Pipin, and Lewys. Which iij. sonnes vnnaturally and vnkindly, cōspiring against their father,* and his second wife, with her sonne, their youngest brother, persecuted him so, that through a certaine councill of Lordes spirituall and temporall, they deposed the same their naturall and right godly father, dispossessing and discharging him of all rule and dominion. Moreouer, caused him to renounce his temporal habite, inclosing him in the Monastery of S. Marke, for a monke or rather a prisoner. All which done, they deuided his Empire and kingdome among themselues.

Thus was Ludouicus Pius,* of impious sonnes left desolate. But the power of God, whiche worketh when all earthly power ceaseth, of hys deuine mercy so ayded and recouered him out of all this tribulation to this Imperial dignitie agayne: that it was to all his enemyes confusion, and to all good men a miracle. But this by the way. By his 2. wife whose name was Iudith, he had this Charles the Bald here mentioned. Which Iudith was thought and so accused to the Pope, to be within such degree of aliance, that by the Popes law, she might not continue hys wife without the popes dispensation.* It so fell out in the meane time that this Ludouicus the Emperour, had promoted a young man named Frederick to be Bishop of Utricke•and to hym had geuen sad and good exhortation, that he remembring and following the constancy of his predecessours, woulde mayntayne right and trueth without all exception of anye person, & punish misdoers with excommunication, as wel the riche as the poore, with such like wordes of godly cōsaile. Fredericke hearing the king thus to say, sitting at dinner with him, as the manner was beyng newly inuested, in these words answered to the Emperor again. I thanke your maiestie saith he, which with your so wholesome exhortation putteth me in mind of my profession. But I beseech you of your benigne fauour & patience, that I may freely disclose, that which hath long encombred and pierced my conscience. To whō leaue being geuen, thus he began.* I pray you (Lord Emperor) to shew me herein your mynd (pointing to the fish before him) whether is it more according, to attain this fish here present, beginning first at the head or at the taile? What a tale is this, quoth the Emperor, of the taile & of the head: At the head quoth he. Then Frederike taking thereof his occasion, proceedeth: Euen so let it be (Lord Emperour) sayth he, as you haue sayd. Let Christian fayth and charitie first begin with your selfe, as with the head, admonishing you to cease frō your face, and error, that your subiects by your example be not boldned to follow your misdoing. Wherefore first forsake you, your vnlawful wedlock,* which you haue made with Iudith your neare kinswoman. These wordes of the new Bishop, although they moued Ludouicus the Emperor not a litle, yet he, with a gentle modestie, and modest silence was contented, suffring the bishop to go home in peace. But the word beyng vttred in such an audience, could not so be concealed but spread and brast out in much talke in the whole court, and especially among the Bishops, consultyng earnestly with themselues about the matter. Through whose counsaile and labour so at length it fell, that the Emperour was constrained to leaue the company of his wife, till hee had purchased a licence of the bishop of Rome, to retaine her again, who then forgauē the said bishop all that was past. But the woman hired two knights that slew him in hys vestimentes, when he had ended his masse. Ranulphus, and Guliel Libro de pontificib, geue forth this story in his great Page 137 commendation to dye a Martyr.* Whereof I haue not to iudge, nor here to pronouce: but that rather I think him to be comended in his dying, then the women for her killing.

And for asmuch as mention hath bene made of Ludouicus Pius, here is to be noted, that in Fraunce then was vied of Priestes and Churchmen, precious and shewing vestuce, and golden, and rich staring girdles, with rings and other ornamentes of golde. Wherefore the sayd Lewes purchased of the Bishop of Rome a correctiō, for all such as vsed such disordinate apparell, causing them to weare browne and sad colours, according to their sadnes. Fab.

Of this Lewes the Papistes doe fayne, that because he conuerted certayne of their Church goodes and patrimonie to y^e wages of his souldiours, his body (say they) was caryed out of his tombe by deuils, and was no more seene.

And thus a little hauing disgressed out of our course, now let vs returne out of Fraunce into England agayne: * kyng Ethelwulfus, who comming from Rome by the coūtre of Fraunce, was now returned agayne into his own dominion, where he continued not long after.

This Ethelwulfus, had especially about him two Bishops, whose counsell he was most ruled by, Swythinus Byshop of Winchester, and Adelstanus Byshop of Syreborne. Of the which two, the one was more skilfull in tēporall and ciuill affayres touching the kings warres, and filling of hys coffers, * and other furniture for the king. The other (whiche was Swythinus) was of a contrary sorte, wholly disposed and enclined to spirituall meditation, and to minister spirituall coūcel to y^e king: who had ben scholemaister to the king before. Wherein appeared one good cōdition of this kings nature, among his other vertues, not onely in following the preceptes and aduertisements of his old scholemaister: * But also in y^t he like a kinde & thākfull pupille did so reuerence hys bringer vp, and old scholmaister (as he called him) that he ceased not, till hee made hym Byshop of Winchester, by the consecration of Celnock then Archbishop of Canterbury. But as concerning the miracles which are read in the Church of Winchester, * of this Swythinus, them I leaue to be read together with the Iliades of Homere, or tales of Robenhood.

This Gregory the fourth here in this present Chapter aboue mentioned: was the third pope which succeeded after Paschalis the first, being but. 4. yeares betwixt them, which Paschalis succeeded after Steuen the 4. who followed after Leo the 3. next Pope vnto Hadrian aboue in our history mentioned, whereas we intreated of Charles the great. From the tyme of that Hadrian the first, vnto Pope Hadrian the 3. The Emperours had some stroke in the election (at lest in the confirmation) of the Romaine Pope. Notwithstanding, diuers of those foresayd popes in the meane time began to work their practises to bring that purpose about. But yet all their deuises could take no full effect, before the sayd Hadrian the iij. as hereafter (Christ willing) shalbe declared. So that the Emperours all this while bare some rule in chusing the Popes, and in assembling generall Councils. Wherefore by the commaundement of Ludouicus the Emperour, in the tyme of this Gregory the iiij. a generall Synode was commensed at Aquisgrauē, where it was decreed by the sayd Gregory and his assistaunce: first that euery Church should haue sufficient of his owne proper landes and reuenues, to finde the Priestes thereof: that none should need to lacke or go about a begging. Itē that none of the Clergy of what order or degree soeuer he be, should vse any vesture of any precious or scarelet coulour. Neither shall weare ringes on their fingers, vnlesse it be when Prelates be at Masse, or geue their consecrations. Item that Prelates should not keepe to great portes or families, nor keepe great horse, vse dice, or harlots. And the Monkes should not exceed measure in glotony or riot. Item that none of the Clergye being either annoynted or shauen: should vse either golde or siluer in their shooes, slippers, or girdles, like to Heliogabalus. By this it may be coniectured, what pompe and pride in those daies was crept into the Clergy. Moreouer, by the sayd pope Gregory the 4. at the commaundement of Ludouicus Emperour, the feast of all Saintes was first brought into the Church.

After this Pope, came Sergius the second which first brought in the altering of the Popes names, because hee was named before os porci, that is, Swines snout: which also ordayned the Agnus thrice to be song at the Masse, and the hoast to be deuided into three partes.

After him, was Pope Leo the iiij. to whom this kyng Ethelwulfus (as in this present chapter is aboue specified) did commit the tuition of his sonne Alured. By this Pope Leo, it came in, and was first enacted in a Counsell of hys, that no Bishop should be condemned vnder 72. witnesses, according as ye see in the witnesses, at the condemnation of Stephen Gardiner, orderly practised.*

Item contrary to the law of Gregory the iiij. his prediessor: this Pope ordayned the crosse (all let with golde & precious stone) to be caried before him, like a Pope.

And here next now followeth & commeth in, the whore of Babylon (rightly in her true colours by the permission of God and manifestly without all tergiuersation) to appeare to the whole world: and that not only alter the spiritual sense, but after the very letter, and the right forme of an whore in deed. For after this Leo aboue mentioned, the Cardinals proceeding to their ordinary electiō (after a solemne Masse of the holy Ghost,* to the perpetuall shame of them & of that sea) in stead of a mā Pope, elected an whore in deed to minister Sacraments, to say masses, to geue orders, to constitute Deacons, Priests, and bishops, to promote Prelates, to make Abbots, to consecrate Churches and altars, to haue the raigne and rule of Emperors and kings: And so she did in deede, called by name Ioan. the 8. This womans proper name was Gilberta (a Dutch woman of Magunce) who went with an english monke out of the Abbey of Fulda in a mans apparell vnto Athens, and after through her dexteritie of wit and learning, was promoted to the Popedom, where she sate two yeres & 6. monthes. At last openly in the face of a general procession, fell in labour & trauail of child, & so died. By reason wherof, the Cardinals yet to this day do auoid to come nere by that streete where this shame was taken.* By Benedictus the iij. who succeeded next in the whorish sea, was first ordained (as most writers record) the Dirge to be sayd for the dead. Albeit before him, Gregory the iij. had done in that matter, worthily for his part already.

After him sate Pope Nicholas the first,* who enlarged the Popes decrees with many constitutions, equallyng the authoritie of them, with the writings of the Apostles. He ordayned that no secular Prince, nor the Emperour himself, should be present at their Councils, vnles in matters concerning the fayth: to the end that such as they iudged to be heretikes, they should execute and murther. Also, that no lay men should sit in iudgement vpon the clergy men, or reason vpon the Popes power. Item that no Christian Magistrate should haue any power vpon any Prelate, alledging that a Prelate is called God. Item that all Church seruice should be in Latine: yet notwithstanding, dispensing with the Sclauonians, and Polonians, to retaine still their vulgar language. Sequences in the Masse were by him first allowed. By this Pope, Priestes began to be restrained and debarred from marrying:* whereof Hulderike Bishop of Ausbrough (a learned & an holy man) sending a letter vnto the Pope, grauely and learnedly refuteth and reclaimeth against his vndiscret proceedings touching y^t matter. The copy of which letter, as I thought it vnworthy to be suppressed, so I iudged it here worthy & meete for the better instruction of the Reader, to bee inserted. The wordes whereof here follow out of Latine into English translated.

 A learned Epistle of Hulderike bishop of Ausbrough, sent to Pope Nicholas the first, proouing by probations substantiall, that Priestes ought not to bee restrayned from Mariage.

Nicolao Domino & patri, peruigili sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae prouisor, Huldericus solo nomine Episcopus, amorem vt filius, timorem vt seruus. Cum tha (O pater & Domine) decreta super clericorum continentian, &c.*

The same in English.

Hulderike bishop onely by name, vnto the reuerend father Nicholas the vigilant prouisor of the holy church of Rome: with due commendation sendeth loue as a sonne, and feare as a seruaunt. Vnderstanding reuerend father your decrees which you sent to me concerning the single lyfe of the Clergy, to be far discrepant from all discretiō, I was troubled partly with feare, partly with heauinesse. With feare, (for that, as it is sayd) the sentence of the pastor, whether it be iust or vniust, is to be feared.

For I was afrayde for the weake hearers of the Scripture (which scarcely obey the iust sentence of their Pastour) much more despyssing this vniust decreement, through the onerous and importable transgression of their Pastor, should shew themselues disobedient. With heauines I was troubled, and with compassion for that I doubted how the members of the body should doe (their head being so greatly out of frame) For what can be more greuouse or more to be lamēted, touching the state of the church then for you, being the Bishop of the principall seat, to whom appertaineth the regiment of the whole church, to swarue neuer so little, out of the right way Certes, in this you haue not a little erred, in that you haue gone about to constraîne your Clergy to singlenes of life, through your imperious tyranny: whom rather Page 138 ye ought to stirre vp to the continency of mariage. For is not this to be counted a violence and tyranny to the iudgement of all wise men: when a man is compelled by your decrees to doe that which is against the institution of the Gospell,* and the proceeding of the holy Ghost? Seyng then there be so many holy examples both of the olde and new Testament, teachyng vs (as you know) due information: I desire your patience not to thinke it greuouse for me to bryng a few here out of many.

First in the olde law, the Lord permitteth mariage vnto the Priestes, which afterward in the new law, we doe not read to bee restrayned, but in the Gospel thus he sayth: There bee some Eunuches which haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of heauen, but all men do not take this word, he that can take it, let him take it. Wherefore the Apostle sayth, concerning virgins I haue no commaundement of the Lord, but onely I geue counsell. Which counsaile also all men do not take, as in the commaundement of the Lord before, but many there be, false dissemblers and flatterers,* goyng about to please men and not God, whome we see vnder a false pretence of continencie, to fall into horrible wickednesse: Some to lye with their fathers wiues, some to bee Sodomites, and not to abhorre to play the beastes with brute beastes. And therefore, least through the infection of this wicked pestilēce, the state of the Church should too much go to ruine: therefore he sayd, because of fornication, let euery man haue his owne wyfe. Touching which saying, our false hypocrites falsly do lye, & faine: as though onely it pertayned to the laitie, and not to them. And yet they themselues seming to be set in the most holy order, are not afrayd to abuse other mens wiues, and as we see with (weeping eyes) all they do outrage in the foresayd wickednes.

These men haue not rightly vnderstanded the Scripture, whose brestes while they sucke so hard (in stead of milke) they suck out bloud.* For the saying of the Apostle: let euery man haue his own wife: doth except none in very deede, but him onely which hath the gifte of continency, prefixing with himselfe to keepe and to continue hys virgine in the Lord. Wherefore (O reuerend father) it shalbe your part to cause & ouersee, that whosoever, either with hand or mouth, hath made a vowe of continencie, and afterward would forsake, either should be compelled to keepe his vowe, or els by lawfull authoritie should be deposed from his order.

And to bring this to passe, ye shall not onely haue me, but also all other of my order, to be helpers vnto you. But that you may vnderstand, that such which know not what a vowe doth meane, are not to be violently compelled thereunto: heare what the Apostle sayth vnto Timothie. A Bishop (sayth he) must be irreprehensible, the husband of one wife. Which sentence, least ye should turne and apply onely to the Church, marke what he inferreth after: he that knoweth not (sayth he) to rule his owne householde and familie, how should he rule the Church of God? And likewise the Deacons (sayth he) let them be the husbandes of one wyfe, which haue knowledge to gouerne their owne house and children. And this wyfe, how she is woont to bee blest of the Priest, you vnderstand sufficiently: I suppose, by the decrees of holy Siluester the Pope.

To these and such other holy sentences of the Scripture, agreeth also,* he that is the writer of the rule of the Clergy, writing after this maner. A Clarke must be chaste and continent, or els let him be coupled in the bandes of Matrimony, hauing one wyfe. Whereby it is to be gathered, that the Bishop and Deacon, are noted infamous and reprehensible, if they be deuied in mo women then one: otherwise, if they do forsake one vnder the pretence of Religion, both they together, as well the Bishop as the Deacon bee here condemned by the Canonically sentence, which sayth: Let no Bishop or Priest forsake his owne wife, vnder the colour and pretence of Religion. If he doe forsake her, let hym bee excommunicate. And if he so continue, let hym bee disgraded. Saint Augustine also, a man of discrete holynesse, sayth in these wordes: There is no offence so great or grieuous, but it is to auoyd a greater euill.

Furthermore, we read in the second booke of the Tripartite history: That when the Councell of Nice, goyng about to establish the same decree, would enact that Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, after their consecration, either should abstaine vtterly from their own wiues, or els should be deposed. Then Paphnutius (one of those holy Martyrs, whom the Emperor Maximus had put out the right eie, & hockt their left legs) rising vp amongst the, withstood their purposed decreement: confessing Mariage to be honourable, and calling the bed of matrimony to be chastitie, and so perswaded the Councell from making that law, declaring thereby what occasion might come to themselues & their wiues of fornication. And thus much did Paphnutius (being vnmarried himself) declare vnto thē. And the whole Councell commending his sentence, gaue place thereto, & left the matter freely without cōpulsion, to the will of euery man, to do therein as he thought.

Notwithstanding there be some, which take S. Gregory for their defence in this matter, whose temeritie I laugh at, & ignorance I lament, for they know not, being ignorauntly deceiued, how daungerously the decree of this heresie was (being made of S. Gregory) who afterward well reuoked the same, with condign fruit of repentaunce.

For vpon a certaine day as he sent vnto his fishpond to haue fish,* and did see more then sixe thousand infants heades brought vnto him, which were taken out of the same pond or mote: did greatly repent in himselfe the decree made before, touchyng the single lyfe of Priests, which he confessed to be the cause of that so lamentable a murther. And so purging the same with condigne fruite of repentaunce, altered agayne the things which he had decreed before, commending that counsaile of the Apostle, which sayth: It is better to marry then to •urne. Adding moreouer of himself thereunto, and saying: It is better to marry, then to giue occasion of death.

Peraduenture if these men had read with me this, which so happened: I thinke they would not be so rash in their doing and iudging, fearyng at least the Lordes commaundement: Doe not iudge, that ye be not iudged. And S Paule sayth: Who art thou that iudget an other mans seruant? Either he standeth or falleth to his owne maister, but he shall stand, for the Lord is mighty and able to make him stand. Therefore let your holynes cease to compell and enforce those, whom onely ye ought to admonish: least through your owne priuate commaundement (which God forbid) you be found contrary, as well to the olde Testament, as to the new. For as S. Augustine sayth to Donatus: this is onely that we do feare in your iustice, lest (not for the consideration of christian lenitie,* but for the grievousnes and greatnesse of transgressions committed) you be thought to vse violence in executyng punishment of that which onely we do desire you (by Christ) not to do. For transgressions are so to be punished, that the lyfe of the transgressours may repent. Also an other saying of Augustine we would you to remember,* which is this: Nil nocends fiat cupiditate, omnia consulendi charitate, & nihil fiat imman•ter, nihil inhumaniter. That is: Let nothing be done through the greedines of hurting, but all things through the charitie of profiting: Neither let any thing be done cruelly, nothing vngently. Item of the same Augustine it is written. In the feare and name of Christ I exhort you, which of you soeuer haue not the goods of this world be not greedy to haue them.* Such as haue them, presume not to much vpon them. For I say, to haue them is no damnation, but if ye presume vpon them, that is damnation, if for the hauing of thē ye shal seeme great in your owne fight, or if ye do forget the cōmon condition of man through the excellencie of any thing you haue. Vse therfore therin due discretion, tempered with moderation, the which cup of discretion is drawn out of that fountaine of the Apostolike preaching which sayth: Art thou loose frō thy wife? Do not seeke for thy wife. Art thou bound to thy wife? Seke not to be loosed from her? Where also it followeth, Such as haue wiues, let them be as though they had them not, and they that vse the world,* let them be as not vsing it.

Item concerning the widow he sayth: Let her marry to whō she wil, only in the Lord. To marry in the Lord, is nothing els but to attempt nothing in cōtracting of matrimony, which the Lord doth forbid, Ieremy also saith: Trust not in the words of lies, saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord. The which saying of Ieremy, Hierome expounding, saith thus: this may agree also, & be applied vnto such virgins, which brag & vaunt their virginie with an impudent face, pretending chastitie, when they haue an other thing in their conscience, and know not how the Apostle defineth the virgin,* that she should be holy in body, and also in spirit. For what auayleth the chastitie of the body, if the mind inwardly be defloured? Or if it haue not the other vertues, which the propheticall Sermon doth describe? The which vertues, for as much as we see partly to be in you, and because we are not ignorant, that this discretiō (although neglected in this part, yet in the other actiōs of your life to be kept honestly of you) do not dispaire, but you dispaire, but you wil also soone amend the little lacke which is behind. And therefore with as much grauitie as we can, we cease not to call vpō you, to correct and amend this your negligēce. For although according to our common calling, a bishop is greater then a Priest, yet Austen being lesse then Hierome (notwithstāding the good correctiō proceeding frō the lesser to the greater) was not to be refused or disdained, especially when he which is corrected, is found to striue against the truth to please mē.* For as S. Austen faith, writing to Boniface: the disputatiōs of all mē, be they neuer so Catholick or approued persōs: ought not to bee had in stead of the Canonickall Scriptures. So that we may disprooue or refuse (sauing the honor & reuerence which is due vnto thē) any thing that is in their writings: if any thing there be found, contrary to trueth: and what can be found more contrary to the trueth then this? When as the trueth him selfe speaking of continency, not of one onely, but of all men together, (the number onely excepted of them which haue professed continencye) sayth: He that can take, let him take: the which saying, these men (mooued, I cannot tell by what occasion) doe turne and say: he that cannot take, let him be accursed. And what can bee more foolishhe amongst men, then when anye Byshoppe or Archdeacon, runne themselues headlong into all kinde of lust, to adultery Page 139 and incest, and also Sodomity: yet shame not to say, that the chaste mariage of Priestes doe stincke before them. And as voyde of all compassion of true righteousnesse, doe not desire or admonish their Clerkes, as their fellow seruauntes to abstayne, but commaund them and enforce them as seruauntes, violentlye to abstayne.* Vnto the whiche imperious commaundement of theirs or counsell (whether you will call it) they adde also thys foolishhe and filthy suggestion, saying: that it is more honest, priuily to haue to doe with many women, then apertly in the sight and consciences of many men, to bee bounde to one wife. The whiche truely they would not say, if they were eyther of hym, or in him, which saith, wo to you Phariseis which do all thinges before men. And by the Psalmist: because they please men, they are confounded: for the Lord hath despised them. These be the men, who rather ought to perswade vs, that we should shame to sinne priuily in the sight of him, to whē all things be open, thē to seeme in the sight of men for to be cleane. These men therefore, although through their sinful wickednes, deserue no counsell of godlines to be giuen thē: yet we not forgetting our humanitie, cease not to giue them counsell by the authoritie of Gods word, which seketh al mens saluation, desiring thē by the bowels of charitie, & saying with the wordes of Scripture: Cast out thou hypocrite first the beame out of thine owne eye, and then thou shalt see to cast out the mote of the eye of thy brother.

Moreouer, this also we desire them to attend, what the Lord saith of the aduouterous woman: which of you that is without sinne let hym cast the first stone against her. As though hee would say, if Moses bid you, I also bid you. But yet I require you that be the competent ministers and executors of the law: Take heede what yee adde thereunto, take heede also I pray you, what you are your selues: for if (as the Scripture saith) thou shalt well consider thy selfe, thou wilt neuer defame or detract an other.

Moreouer it is signified to vs also, that some there be of them,* which (when they ought like good shepherds to giue their liues for the Lordes flocke) yet are puffed vp, with such pride: that without all reason they presume to rent and teare the Lords flocke, with whippings and beatings, whose vnreasonable dooynges Saint Gregory bewailing,, thus saith: Quid fiat de ouibus quando pastores lupi fiunt? That is, what shall become of the sheepe when the pastors themselues be Woolues? But who is ouercome but he which exerciseth cruelty,? Or who shall iudge the persecutor, but he which gaue patiently his backe to stripes? And this is the frute which commeth to the Church by such persecutors, also which commeth to the clergy, by such despitefull handling of their Byshoppes or rather Infidels. For why may ye not call them Infidels,* of whome Saint Paule thus speaketh and writeth to Tymothie? that in the latter dayes there shall certaine depart from the faith, geue heede to spirits of errour and doctrine of deuils, of them that speake false through hypocrisie, and hauing their consciences marked with an hote yron, forbidding to marry, and commaunding to abstaine from meates. &c. And this is if it be well marked, the whole handfull of the darnell and cockell growing amongst the corne: this is the couente of all madnes, that whiles they of the Clergye, be compelled to relinquish the cōpany of their own lawful wiues: they become afterward fornicators and adulterers with other women, and wicked ministers of other sinnefull filthinesse. These bee they which bring into the Church of God this heresie (as blinde guides leading the blinde) that it might be fulfilled which the Psalme speaketh of: as foreseeing the errors of such men, & accursing thē after this maner, let their eyes be blinded that they see not, & bow down alwaies their backe. For as much then (O Apostolical Sir) as no man which knoweth you, is ignorant, that if you, through the light of your discretion had vnderstanded and seene, what poysoned pestilence, might haue come into the Church thorough the sentence of this your decree: they would neuer haue consēted to the suggestions of certaine wicked persons. Wherefore we counsell you by the fidelitie of our due subiection, that wyth all diligence, you would put away so great slaūder from the Church of God: and through your discret discipline, you will remooue this Pharisaeicall doctryne from the flocke of God: so that thys onely Sunanite of the Lords (vsing no more adulterous husbāds) do not separate the holy people, and the kingly Priesthooe from her spouse which is Christ▪ through an vnrecouerable diuorment: seing that no man without Chastitie (not only in the virgines state,^{*} but also in the state of matrimony) shall see our Lord, who with the father and the holy ghost, lyueth and raigneth for euer, Amen.

By this Epistle of Byshop Huldericke, aboue prefixed, the matter is plaine (gentle Reader) to conceiue, what was then the sentence of learned men, concerning the mariage of ministers, but that here by the way, the Reader is to be admonished. that this Epistle which by error of the writer is referred to pope Nicholas y^e first, in my mind is rather to bee attributed to the name and tune of Nicolas the 2. or 3.

After this pope, Nicolas succeded Hadrianus. 2. Ioannes ix. Martinus. ij. After these came Hadrian the third and Stephē the v. By this Hadrian it was first decreed, y^t no Emperour after that time should intermedle or haue any thing to do in the election of the Pope. And thus began the Emperors fyrst to decay,^{*} and the Papacie to swell and ryse aloft. And thus much concerning Romish matters for this time.

Then to returne where we lefte, touching the storye of King Ethelwolfe. About the latter ende of his reigne, the Danes which before had inuaded the Realme, in the time of king Egbert, as is aboue declared: now made there reentre againe, with 33. shippes arriuing aboute Hamshyre: through the barbarous tyranny of whō, much bloudshed and murther happened here among englishmen, in Dorcet shire, about Pourtchmouth in Kent, in Eastangle, in Lindesey, at Rochester, about London, and in Wests•xe▪ where Ethelwolfe the king was ouercome, besides diuers other vnder kings and dukes, whome the Danes dayly approching, in great multitudes in dyuers victories had put to flight. At length king Ethelwolfe, with his sonne Ethelbaldus, warring against them in Southrey, at Oclea, draue them to the sea, where they houering a space, after a while brast in againe with horrible rage and crueltie, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared, so much as to our purpose shall serue, professing in this history, to write not of matters externe and politike, but onely pertaining to the Church. The cause of this great affliction sent of God vnto this realme thus I found expressed and collectlected in a certayne olde wrytten storye,* which hath noe name: the wordes of which writer, for the same cause as he thought to recite them, writing as he saith (ad cautelam, futurorum) I thought also for the same here not to be omitted, albeit in all partes of his commendation I doe not fully with him accorde. The wordes of the writer be these.

In Anglorum quidem Ecclesia primitiua,* religio clarissime, respēduit: ita vt Reges & Reginae et Principes ac Duces, Consules, & Barones &c.

In English thus.

In the primitiue Church saith he of the Englishmen, Relygiō did most clerely shine, in so much that kings Queenes, Princes and Dukes, Consuls, Barons, and Rulers of Churches, incensed with the desire of the kingdome of heauen, laboring and stryuing among themselues to enter into Monckery, into voluntarye exile and solitary life, forsoke all and followed the Lord. Where in processe of time, all vertue so much decayed among them, that in fraude and trechery none seemed like vnto them: Neither was to them any thing odious or hatefull but pietie and iustice Neither any thing in price or honor, but ciuill warre and sheddyng of innocent bloud. Wherefore almighty God sent vpon them pagane and cruell nations, like swarmes of Bees, which neyther spared women, nor children, as Danes, Norwagians, Gothes, Sueuians, Vandals, and Fresians. Who from the beginning of the reigne of king Ethelwolfe till the comming of the Normandes, by the space neere of 230. yeares, destroyed their sinfull land from the one side of the sea, to the other, from man also to beast. For why? they inuading England oft times, of euery side, went not about to subdue and possesse it, but onely to spoyle and destroy it. And if it had chanced them at any time to be ouercome of Englishmen, it auailed nothing, when as other nauies still with greater power in other places were ready vpon a sodaine and vnawares to approche vpon them, &c. Historia Cariana.

Thus farre haue ye the wordes of mine author, declaring the cause, which prouoked Gods anger, whereunto may be adioyned the wickednes, not onely of them but of their forefathers also before them, who falsely breaking the faith and promise made wyth the Britanes, did crueliye murther their nobles, wickedly oppressed their cōmons, impiously persecuted the innocent Christians, miliciously possessed their land and habitation: chasing the inhabitaunts out of house and country, besides the violent murther of the Monkes of Bangor, and diuers soule slaughters against the poore Brytaines, who sent for them to be their helpers. Wherefore, Gods iust recompence fallyng vpon them from that time, neuer suffered them to be quiet from forreine enimies, till the comming of William the Normande &c.

Moreouer,* concerning the outward occasiōs giuē of the Englishmens parts, mouing the Danes first to inuade the Realme, I find in certain stories two most especially assigned. The one iustly giue, & iustly takē. The other not giuen iustly, and 〈◇〉 taken. Of the which two, the first was giuen in Northumberland, by meanes of Osbryght,* reigning vnder king of Westsaxons, in the North partes. This Osbright vppon a time iourneyng by the way, turned into the house of one of his nobles called Bruer. Who hauing at home a wife of great beautie (he beyng Page 140 absent abroad) the king after his dinner (allured wyth the excellency of her beautie) tooke her to a secret chamber,* where he forceablye contrarye to her will did rauishe her, whereupon she being greatly dismaied, and vexed in her minde, made her mooue to her husband returning, of thys violence and iniury receaued. Bruer consulting with his frindes, first went to the king, resigning to his hands, all suche seruice and possessions which he did hold of him: that done tooke shipping and sailed into Denmarke, where he had great friends: and had his bringing vp before. There making his mone to Codrinus the king,* desired his aide in reuenging of the great vilany of Osbryght against him and his wife. Codrinus hearing this, and glad to haue some iust quarell to enter that land: leuied an army with al spede: & preparing all things necessary for the same, sendeth foorth Inguar and Hubba two brethren,* his chief Captaines, with an innumerable multitude of Danes into England. who first arriuing at Holdernesse, there brent vp the country, & killed without mercy both men, women, and chidrē, whō they could lay hāds vpon. Then marching toward York, entred their battaile, with the foresayde Osbryght, where he with the most part of his armye was slaine. And so the Danes entred the possession of the Citie of Yorke. Some other say, and is by the most part of storye writers recorded, that the chiefe cause of the comming of Inguar & Hubba with the Danes,* was to reuenge king Edmund reygnyng vnder the Westsaxons ouer the Eastangles in Nothfolke and Southfolk: for the murdering of a certaine Dane being father to Inguar and Hubba which was falselye imputed to king Edmund. The story is thus told.

A certaine noble man of the Danes of the kings stock called Lothebocus father to Inguar and Hubba entring vppon a time with his hauke into a certaine schaffe or cockebote alone: by chaunce through tempest was driuen with his hauke to the coast of Nothfolke named Rodhā, where he being found and detained was presented vnto the king. The king vnderstanding his parentage, & seing his case: entertained him in his court accordingly. And euery daye more and more perceiued his actiuities, and great dexteritie in hunting & hauking, bare speciall fauour vnto him. In so much that the kinges faukener, or maister of game, bearing priuy enuy against him, secretly as they were hūting together in a woode, did murther him, & threw him in a bush. This Lothebroke, being murthered, within two or three daies began to be missed in the kinges house: of whō no tidings could be heard, but onely by a dogge or spaniel of his,* which continuing in the wood with the corps of his maister, at sondry times came and fauned vpon the king: so long that at length they folowing the trase of the hound were brought to the place where Lothebroke laye. Wherevpō inquisition made, at length by certeine circumstances of words and other evidences, it was knowne how & by whom he was murthered, that was by the kings huntzman name•Berike. Who thereupon being conuicted, was set into the same bote of Lothebroke, alone and without any takeling to driue by seas, either to be saued by the weather or to be drowned in the deepe. And as it chaunced Lothebroke from Dennemarke to be driued to Northfolke, so it happened that from Northfolke he was caried into Denmarke. Where the bote of Lothebroke being well knowen, hands were laid vpon him, & inquisition made of the party. In sine in his torments, to saue himselfe, he vttered an vntruth of king Egmund, saying, that the king had put him to death in the country of Northfolke. Wherupon grudge first was conceiued, thē an army appointed, & great multitude sent into England, to reuenge that fact: where first they arriuing in Northumberland, destroyed (as is sayd) those parties first. From thence sayling into Northfolke they exercised the like tyranny there, vpon the inhabitaūts therof, especially vpon the innocent prince, & blessed matter of God, king Edmund. Cōcerning the farther declaration wherof, hereafter shal follow (Christ our Lord, so permitting) more to be spoken, as place and obseruation of time and yeares, shall require.

*In the meane seasō, king Ethelwulphe, in this chapter here presently touched, when he had chased y^e foresaid Daues (as is aboue rehearsed from place to place, causing thē to take the Sea, he in the meane while departeth him selfe both from land and life: leauing behinde him foure sons, which reigned euery one in his order, after the discease of their father. The names of whom were Ethelbaldus, Ethelbrightus, Ethelredus, and Aluredus.

King Ethelbalde.

KING Ethelbald the eldest sonne of Ethelwulfe, succeeding his father in the prouince of Westsaxe: and Ethelbright in the prouince of Kent: reigned both together, the terme of v. yeares,* one with the other. Of the which two, Ethelbald, the first le^t this infamie, behinde him in storyes, for marrying and lying with his stepmother,* wife to hys owne father named Iudith. After these two succeded Ethelred, the thirde sonne, who is his time was so encombred with the Danes, brusting in on euery side: especiallye about Yorke, (which Citie they then spoyled and brent vp) that he in one yeare stode in ix. battailes against them,* w^t the helpe of Alured his brother. In the beginning of thys Kinges reigne, the Danes landed in East Englande, or Northfolke & Southfolke. But (as Fabian writeth) they were compelled to forsake that country,* and so toke again shipping, and sayled Northward, and landed in Northūberlande: where they were met of the Kinges then there reigning, called Osbright, and Ella, which gaue to them a strong light. But notwithstanding the Danes, with help of such as inhabited the country, wanne the City of York, and helde it a certaine season as is aboue foretouched.

In the reigne of this Ethelred, the Northumberlanders rebelling against the king,* thought to recouer again the former state of their kingdome out of the Westsaxons hand, by reason of which discord (as happeneth in al lāds where dissention is) the strength of the Englishe nation was thereby not a litle weakned,* and the Danes the more thereby preuailed.

About the latter time of the reigne of this Etheldred▪ which was about the yeare of our Lord. 870. certayne of the foresaide Danes being thus possessed of y^e north country: after their cruel persecution and murther done there, (as partly is touched before) tooke shipping frō thence, intending to saile toward the Eastangles, who by the way vpon the sea, met with a flot of Danes: whereof the Captaines or leaders were named Inguar & Hubba. Who ioyning altogether in one counsel, made al one course, & lastly landed in East England, or Northfolke, & in proces of time came to Thetior•. Thereof hearing Edmund, then vnder king of that prouince: assembled an host, that gaue to them battall. But Edmund and his company was forced to forsake the field, & the king with a few persons fled vnto the castle of Framingham,* whō the Danes pursued. But he in short while after, yelded himselfe to the persecution of the Danes: aunswering in this maner to y^e messēger, that told him in the name of Inguar Prince of the Danes:* which most victoriously (saith he) was come with innumerable legions, subduing both by sea and land manye nations vnto him: & so now arriued in those parts, requireth him likewise to submit himself, yelding to him his hid treasures, and such other goods of his auncetors, and so to reign vnder him, which thing if he would not do, he shold (said he) be iudged vnworthy both of life & reigne. Edmūd hearing this proud message of y^e Pagane, consulted wyth certayne of his fryends: and amongst other, with one of his bishops being thē his Secretary, who seyng the present daunger of the king: gaue him counsell to yeeld to the conditions. Upon this the king pausing a little with him self, at length rendred this aunswere: Bidding the messenger go to tell his Lord in these words.* That Edmūd a christian king, for the loue of temporall life, will not submitte himselfe to Pagane Duke, vnlesse he before woulde bee a Christian Incontinent vpon the same, the wicked & crafty Dane approaching in most hasty speede vpon the King, encountred with him in battell (as some say) at Thetford: where the king being put to the worse, & pittieng the terrible slaughtre of his men: thinking with himselfe rather to submit his owne person to daunger, then his people should be slaine did flye (as Fabian sayth) to the Castle of Framingham: or (as my author writeth to Halesdō, now called S. Edmundesbury, where this blessed man, being on euery side cōpassed of his cruel enimies, yelded himself to their persecution. And for that he would not reny or deny Christ and his lawes, they therfore most cruelly bound him vnto a tree, & caused him to be shot to death: and lastly caused his head to be smitten from his body, & cast into the thicke bushes. Which head and body at the same time was by his frendes taken vp, and solemnely buried at the sayd Halesdon, otherwise now named S. Edmunds bury. Whose brother named Edwoldus (notwithstanding of ryght, the kingdome fell next vnto him) setting a part the lyking & pleasure of the world, became an Hermite at the Abbey of Cerum, in the Countrey of Dorset.

After the Martirdome of this blessed Edmund, when the cruell Danes had sufficiently robbed and spoyled that country: they tooke agayne their shippes, and landed in Southrey, & continued their iourney till they came to the towne of Reading, & there wan the towne with the castle where (as Cambrensis saith) within three dayes of their thether comming, the foresayde Inguar and Hubba Captaines of the Danes, as they went in purchasing of theyr prayes or booties: were slaine at a place called Englefelde. Which Princes of the Danes thus slaine, the rest of them kept whole together, in such wise that y^e Westsaxons might take of them none aduantage. But yet within fewe dayes after the Danes were holden so short, that they were forced to issue out of the castle, & to defend them in plain battaile. In the whiche (by the industry of king Ethelred and of Allured his brother) the Danes were discomfited, & many of them slaine: which discomfort made them flie againe into the castle, and there kept them for a certain time. The King then committing the charge of them to Ethelwolde Duke of Baroke or Barkshire, so departed. But whē the Danes knew of the kings departure, they brake sodeinly out of their hold, and tooke the Duke vnprouided, & slewe him, and much of his people. And so adioyning thēselues with other that were scattered in the countrey, enbattelled them in such wise, that of them was gathered a strōg host.

As the tidings hereof was brought to king Etheldred, (which put him in great heauines) word also was brought the same time of the landing of Osrike, king of Denmarke: who with assistance of the other Danes had gathered a great host, and were enbattelled vpō Ashdowne. To this battaile king Ethelred with his brother Alured (forced by great neede) sped them selues to withstand the Danes. At which time, the king a litle staying behind being yet at his seruice, Alured which was comen before, had entred already into the whole fight with the Danes: who strake together with huge violēce. The king being required to make speede (hee being then at seruice, and meditations) such was his deuotion: that he would not stirre out one foote, before the seruice was fully cōplete. In this meane while, the Danes so fearsly inuaded Alured and his mē, that they wanne the hill: and the Christen men were in the valley, and in great daunger to loose the whole felde. Neuerthesse through the grace of God, and their godly manhooe, the king comming from his seruice, with his fresh souldiours recouered the hill of the infidels: and so discōfited the Danes that day, that in fleing away not only they lost the victory, but most part also of them their liues. In so much that their Duke or king Osride or Osege, and fiue of their Dukes, with much of their people were slain, and the rest chased vnto Reding towne.

After this, the Danes yet resembled their people, and gathered a new host, so that within xv. dayes, they mete at Basingstoke,* and there gaue battaile vnto the king, & had the better. Then the king againe gathered his mē, which at that field were disparted, and with fresh souldiours to them accompanied, mete the Danes within two moneths after at the towne of Merton, where hee gaue to them a sharpe battaile: so that much people were slaine as well of the Christen, as of the Danes, but in the ende, the Danes had the honour of the fiede, and king Ethelred there was wounded, and therefore faine to saue himselfe.

After these ij. fields thus won by the Danes, they obtained great circuit of groūd, and destroyed man & childe, that would not yeld to them. And Churches and temples they turned to the vse of stables, & other vile occupations.

Thus the king beset with enemies on euery side, seing the land so miserably oppressed of the Danes: his knights and soldiours consumed: his owne land of Westsaxons in such desolation: he being also wounded himself: But especially for that he sending his commissions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and Eastanglia, could haue of them but smal or litle comfort (because they through wicked rebellion, were more willing to take the part of the Danes, then of their king) was sore perplexed therewithall,* as the other Kinges were both before him and after him, at that time. So that, as Malmesbury witnesseth, magis optarēt honestum exitium, quàm tam acerbum imperium. That is, They rather wished honestly to die, then with such trouble and sorrow to reigne. And thus this King not long after deceased, when he had reigned, as Fabian sayth viij. yeres, as Malmesbury wryteth,* but v. yeares. During which time of his reigne, notwithstanding hys so great troubles and vexations in martiall affaires, (as is in some stories mentioned) he founded the house or college of Chanōs at Exeter, and was buried at the Abbey of Winborn or Woborn.* After whose decease, for lacke of issue of his body, the rule of the land fel vnto his brother Alured.

 King Alured otherwise called Alfrede.

AMong the Saxon kinges hetherto in this historie afore mentioned: I finde fewe or none to be preferred (or almost to be compared) to this Alured, or Alfrede for the great and singulare qualities in this king worthy of high renowne and commendation. Whether we behold in him the valiant actes, and manifold trauailes which he continually from time to time sustained against his ennemies in warres, during almost all the time of his raigne, for the publicke preservation of his people: Or whether we consider in him, his godly and excellent vertues, ioyned with a publicke and tender care, and zealous study; for the common peace and trāquility of the weale publicke: appearing as wel in his prudēt lawes by him both carefully set forth, and with the like care executed, as also by his own priuate exercises touching the vertuous institution of his life. Or whether we respect that in him, which with equall praise matcheth with both the other before: That is, his notable knowledge of good letters, with a feruēt loue and Princely desire, to set forth the same through all his Realme (before his time being both rude and barbarous) All whych his heroical properties, ioyned together in one Prince, as it is a thing most rare, and seldome seene in Princes now a daies: so I thought the same the more to be noted and example fide in this good king. Therby either to moue other rulers and Princes in these our daies, to his imitation: or els to shew them what hath ben in times past, in their anceters, which ought to be, and yet is not founde in them. Wherefore of these three partes to discourse either part in order, first we wil enter to entreat of his actes and painefull trauailes sustained, in defence of the Realme publicke: against the raging tyrannie of the Danes, as they be described in the Latin histories of Rog. Houeden, and Huntington: * whome Fabian also seemeth in this part somewhat to follow. King Alfred therfore, first of al the English kings, taking his crowne and vnction at Rome of Pope Leo (as Malmesberiensis and Polycronicon do recorde) in the beginning of his raigne, perceauing his Lordes & people much wasted and decaied, by the reason of the great warres of Ethelred, had against the Danes: yet as well as he coulde, gathered a strength of men vnto him, and in the secōd moneth that he was made King, he met with the Danes beside Wylton, where hee gaue to them battaile. But being farre ouermatched, through the multitude of the contrary part, was put there to the worse: although not wythout a great slaughter of the Pagane army. Which army then of the Danes, after that victorie, by compaction made wyth King Alfrede, to depart out of his dominion of Westsaxe: remoued from Reading to London, where they abode all that winter. * Where Halden their king, taking truse wyth Burhered, King of Mercians, the next yeare followinge voyded those partes, and drewe to Lyndesey: in robbing and spoyling the townes and villages as they went, and holding the common people vnder their seruage. From thence after to Repyngdon: where they ioyning wyth the three other Kings of the Danes (called Surdrim, Osketel, and Hamond) grewe thereby in mighty force and strength. Who then deuiding their armie in two partes, the one halfe remained wyth Halden in the countrey of Northumberland: the residue were with the other three kings, wintering and sojourning all the next yeare at Grantbrige, which was the fourth yeare of King Alfred. In the which yeare King Alfred his men had a conflict on the Sea, with sixe of the Danes shippes, of which one they tooke, the other fled away. * In this yeare went Rollo the Dane into Normandie, where hee was Duke thirtie yeare, and afterwarde was Baptised in the faith of Christ, and named Robert The foresayde armie of the three Dane Kinges aboue mētioned frō Grantebryge, returned again to Westsaxonie, and entred the Castle of warrham: where King Alfrede with a sufficiēt power of men, was ready to assault them. But the Danes seeing his strength durst not attēpt with him, but sought delaies, while more ayd might come. In the meane season they were constrayned to intreat for truce: leauing also sufficient pledges in the Kinges hand, promising moreouer vpon their othe, to voyde the country of the westsaxons. The king vpon the surety let them go. But they falsely breaking their league, priuely in the night brake out, taking their iourney toward Exceter. In which iourney, they lost vi. score of their small ships, by a tempest at Sandwych (as Henry Huntington in hys storye recordeth.) Then kyng Alfrede followed after the horsmen of the Danes, but coulde not ouertake them, before they came to Exceter, where he tooke of thē pledges and fayre promises of peace, and so returned. Notwithstanding the number of the Pagāes did dayly more and more increase, in so much (as one of my authors sayth) that if in one day 30. thousand of them were slayn, shortly after they increased double as many agayne. After this truce taken with King Alfrede, the Danes then voyded to the land of Mercia, whereof part of that kingdome they kept themselues, part they committed to one Ceolulphus: vpon condition Page 142 that he should be vassall to them, and at their commandement, with his people at all times.

The next yere insuing, which was the vij. yeare of the raigne of Alfred, the Danes; who nowe hauing all the rule of the Northpart of Englande, from the riuer of Tames, with Mercia, London, and Essex: disdained that Alfrede shoulde beare any dominion on the other side of Tames southward. Whereupon the foresayde three kings with all the force and strength they coulde make, marched towarde Chippenham in Westsexe, with such a multitude, that the king w^t his people was not able to resist them. In so much that the people which inhabited there, some fled ouer the sea, some remained with the king, diuers submitted themselues to the Danes. Thus King Alfrede being ouerset w^t multitude of enemies, and forsaken of hys people, hauing neither lād to hold, nor hope to recouer that which he had lost: * withdrew himselfe w^t a fewe of his nobles about him, into a certaine wood countrey in Somersetshire, called Ethelyng: where he had right scant to liue with, but suche as he and his people might purchase by hunting and fishing. This Edelyng or Ethelyng or Ethelyngsey, standeth in a great Maresse or Moore, so that there is no accesse vnto it, without ship or boate: and hath in it a great woode called Selewood, and in the midle a litle plaine, about of two acres of ground. In which Ile is veneson. and other wilde beastes, with soule and fishes, great plenty. In this wood, King Alured at his first comming, espied a certaine deserte cotage of a poore Swynarde, keeping swine in the woode, named Dunwolphus: of whome the King then vnknown was entertained and chearished, with such poore fare as he and his wife could make him.* For the which, King Alfrede afterwarde, set the poore Swinarde to learning, and made him Bishop of Winchester.

In the meane season, while King Alfrede accompanied with a few, was thus in the desert wood, waiting the euent of these miseries: certaine stories recorde of a poore beggar, which there came and asked hys almes of the King. And the night folowing he appeared to the King in hys sleepe: saying his name was Cutbert, promising (as sent frō God, vnto him for his good charitie) great victories against the Danes. But to let these dreaming fables passe, althoughe they be testified by diuers authours, both Wilielmus Lib. de Reg. Polychronicon, Rog. Houeden, Iornalensis, and other mo. Notwythstanding the king in processe of time, was strēghened and cōforted more,* through the prouidence of God: respecting the miserable ruine of the Englishmen. First the brother of King Haldene the Dane before mentioned, comming in with xxiiij. ships, landed about Deuonshire: where by chaunce being resisted by a bushment of king Alfrede's men (who for their safegarde there lay in garyson) were slaine to the number of 1300. men,* and their ensigne called the Ranen was taken. Houedenus in hys booke of Continuationis wryteth, that in the same cōflict both Inguar and Hubba were slain among the other Danes. After this, King Alfrede being better cheared, shewed him selfe more at large: so that daily resorted to him, men of Wiltshyre, Somersetshyre, and Hamshyre, till that hee was strongly accompanied.

Then the King put himselfe in a bold and dangerous venture (as wryteth Wilelmus Lib. de Reg. Polychron. and Fabian which followeth them both) for he apparelling him in the habite of a Minstrell (as hee was very skilfull in all Saxon Poemes) with his instrument of Musike, entred in the tentes of the Danes, lying then at Eddendime: and in shewing there his interlude and songs, espied all theyr slouth and ydlenes, and heard much of their counsell. And after returning to hys companie, declared vnto them the whole manner of the Danes. Shortly vpon the same, the King sodainly in the night fell vpon the foresaid Danes, & distressed and slewe of them a great multitude, chased them from that coast. In so much that through hys strong & valiaunt assaults vpon his enemies, out of his tower of Edelyng newly fortified: he so encōbered them, that he clearly voyded the countrey of them, betweene that and Selwoodes. His subiectes eftsones, hearing of these hys valiaunt victories, and manful deedes, drewe to him daily out of all coasts. Who through the helpe of God, and their assistāce, helde the Danes so short, that he wanne from them Winchester, & diuers other good townes. Briefly, at lēgth he forced them to seeke for peace: * the which was concluded vpon certaine couenaunts. Whereof one and the principal was, that the forenamed Gutrum their King shoulde be Christened. The other was, that suche as woulde not be Christened, should depart and voide the countrey.

*Upon these couenants, first the sayde Gutrum the Danish Prince cōming to Winchester, there was Christened with xx. of his greatest Dukes or Nobles. To the whyche Gutrum King Alured being hys Godfather at hys Baptisme, named hym Athelstane. Who after a certaine season that he had feasted the said Danes: he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto theyr King the countrey of Eastanglia, containing Northfolke & Suffolke, and part of Cambridshire. Moreouer (as saith Polychron.) he graūted to the Danes that were Christened, the Countrey of Northumberland. So the residue that wold not be Christened, departed the land, and sailed into Fraunce▪ where, what vexation and harme they wrought, the Chronicles of Fraunce do partly comprehend.

King Athelstane thus hauing the possession of these countreis, * had all Eastangles vnder his obedience. And albeit that he held the sayd prouince as in fee of the king, & promised to dwel there as his liege mā: yet that notwithstanding, hee continued more like a tyrant, by the terme of xj. yeare and died in the xij. yere. During the which space, King Alfrede hauing some more rest and peace, repaired certain townes and strong holds afore by the Danes empaired. Also he builded diuers houses of religiō, * as y^e house of Nunnes at Shaftesbury. An other religious house at Ethelyng he foūded. Item an other in Winchester, named the new monastery. Item, he endewed richly the Church of S. Cutbert in Dyrham. He sent also to India, to pay and performe his vowes to S. Thomas of Inde, which he made during the time of his distresse against the Danes.

About the xv. yeare of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes returning from France to England, landed in Kent, and so came to Rochester, and besieged that City: and there lay so long, that they builded a Tower of tymber against the gates of the Citie. But by strength of the Citizens, that tower was destroyed, and the Citie defended t• King Alfrede came and reseued them. Whereby the Danes were so distressed, and so nere trapped: that for feare, they left their horses behind them, and fled to their ships by night. But the King, when he was thereof ware: sent after them and tooke xvj. of their shippes, & slew many of the said Danes. This done, the King returned to London, & repaired the same honorably (as sayth Houedenus) & made it habitable, which before was sore decaied and febled by the Danes.

The third yeare after this, * which was the xix. yeare of the raigne of king Alfred: the foresayd Athelstane the Danish king of Northfolke (which by Alfred was Christened before) deceased. Not lōg after this, about the xxj. yeare of this kinges reigne, the Danes agayne landed in foure places of this land: which was, in Eastinglande: in the North: and in the West, in two places. Before the landyng of these Danes, it chaunced king Elfred, hearing of the death of King Athelstane, and of other complayntes of the Danes, was then in Eastengland, when these tidings c•me to him.

When King Alfrede was hereof ascertained: forsomuch as some of the Danes were landed in that coast, thincking with themselues the further they wēt in those parties, the lesse resistance to haue, * and the more speede, as they were wont to haue before: Alfride therefore sending messengers in all hast to Etheldred Duke of Mercia, to assemble to him an host, to withstand the Danes which landed in y^e West, made forth toward hys enemies there, where hee was in Eastanglia, whom he pursued so sharpely, that hee droue them out from those parties. They then landed in kent, whether the king with his people sped him, and in lyke maner draue the Danes from thence, without anye great fight,* so farre as in our authors we can see. After this, agayne the Danes tooke shipping, and sayled into Northwales, and there robbed and spoyled the Britones, & from thence returned by the sea into Eastanglia, with an hundreth ships, and there rested them, for so much the king then was gone Westward.

The fourth host of the Danes, the same yeare came to Chester, which at length they won, but then, the countrey adioyning pressed so sore vpon them, and besieged them so long,* keeping them selues wythin the City, that at the last the Danes weryed with the long siege, were compelled to eat their owne horses for hunger. But by appointment, at last they gaue ouer the towne, and went about by Northwales to Northumberland, whyche was about the xxiiij. yeare of king Alfrede: Which Alfrede in the meane while with his host, sped him thetherward. Thē the Danes, leauing their strong holdes and Castles garnished with men and vitaille: tooke againe shipping, and set theyr course in such wise that they landed in Sussex, & so came to the porte of Lewes: and from thence toward London, and builded a Tower or Castle neare vnto the riuer of Ley,* xx. mile frō London. But the Londiners hearing therof, manned out a certaine number of men of armes, who w^t the assistance of them of that countrey, put the Danes from that tower: Page 143 and after beat it downe to the groūd. Soone after the king came downe thether. And to preuent the daungers that might ensue,* commaunded the riuer of Luye to be deuided in iii. streames: so that where a shyp might sayle in times before, then a litle boate might scantly row. Frō thence the Danes, leauing their shippes & wiues, were forced to flie that countrey, and tooke their way againe toward Wales, and came to Quadrage neare to the Riuer of Seuerne. Where, vpon the borders therof, they builded then a castle, there resting themselues for a time: whome the King eftsoones wyth his armie pursued. In the meane tyme, the Londiners at Luye taking the Danes shippes: some of them they brought to London, the rest they fired. During all these three yeres, from the first comming of the Danes to Luye, Englande was afflicted with three maner of sorrowes: with the Danes,* wyth pestilence of men, and morreine of beasts. The which troubles notwithstanding, yet the King manfully resisted the malice of his enemyes, and thāked God alway, what trouble soeuer fel to him, or vnto his Realme, and susteined it wyth great pacience & humilitie. These three yeares ouerpast,* the next yeare folowing, which was the xxviiij. of the reigne of Alfrede: the Danes deuided their hoste: of whom part went to Northumberland, some to Northfolke, part sailed ouer to Fraunce, some other came to Westsaxe.* Where they had diuers conflictcs with the Englishmen, both by lande and especially vpon the Sea: of whome some were slaine: many by shypwracke peryshed, diuers were taken and hanged, and xxx. of their shippes were taken.

*Not long after this, king Alfred, when he had reigned xxix. yeares, and vj. monethes, chaunged this mortall life. And thus much (and more peraduēture, then will seeme to thys our Ecclesiasticall storie appertaining) touching the painfull labours and trauailes of this good king: which he no lesse valiantly atcheued, then patiently susteined, for the necessary defence of his Realme and subiects.

Now if there be any Prince, who listeth to see and follow the vertuous and godly disposition of this king: both touching the institution of his owne life, & also concerning his carefull gouernement of the cōmon weale: thus the histories of him do record. That at what time he being yōg, perceaued hymselfe somewhat disposed to the vice of the flesh, & thereby letteth from many vertuous purposes: did not as many young Princes, and Kinges sonnes in the world be now wont to do: that is to resolute thēselues into all kind of carnal licence, and dissolute sensualitie, running and folowing without bridle, whether soeuer their licence geuen doth leade them (as therefore not without cause the common prouerbe reporteth of them) that Kings sonnes learne nothing well els, but onely to ride. Meaning therby, that Princes and Kinges sonnes hauing about them flatterers, whych bolster them in theyr faultes: onely their horses geue to them no more, then to any other: but if they sit not fast, they wil cast them. But this young king seeing in him selfe the inclination of his fleshly nature, minding not to geue hym selfe so much as he might take,* but rather by resistance to auoid the tentation thereof: besought God that he wold send to him some continual sicknes, in quenching of that vice, whereby he might be more profitable to the publike busines of the cōmon wealth, and more apt to serue God in his calling. Cestrens. Lib. 5. cap. 1. Fab. cap. 17.

Then at Gods ordinance, he had the euill called Ficus, til he came to the age of xx. yeres,* wherof at length he was cured (as is sayd in some stories) by the virgin called Modwen, an Irishwoman. After this sicknesse being taken away, to him fell an other: which continued with him from the xx. yeres of his age, to xlv (according to his own petition & request made vnto God) wherby, he was the more reclaimed & attempered from other more great incōueniences, and lesse disposed to that which he did most abhorre.

Moreouer to beholde the bountiful goodnes ioyned w^t like prudence in this man:* in the ordering & disposing hys riches and rents, it is not vnworthy to be recited. How he deuided his goods in two equall partes: the one appertaining to vses secular, the other to vses spirituall or Ecclesiasticall. Of the which two principall partes, the first he deuided into three portiōs: the first to the behofe of his house and family,* the second vpon his workmen and builders of his new works, whereof he had great delight & cunning: the third vpon strangers. Likewise the other second halfe, vpon spirituall vses, he did thus diuide in foure portions: One to the releuing of the poore: An other to monasteries: The iij. portion to the schooles of Oxforde,* for the mainteining of good letters: The iiij. he sent to foreine Churches, without the Realme. This also is left in stories written to his commendation, for his great tolerance and sufferance: that when he had builded the new Monastery at Winchester, and afterward hys sonne Edward had purchased of the Byshop and the Chapter a sufficient peece of grounde for certaine offices to be adioyned vnto the same, & had geuen for euery foote of ground, mancam auri pleni ponderis (which was as I thynke a marke of golde) or more: yet Alfrede therewithal was not greatly discontented to see his coffers so wasted.

Ouer and besides,* how sparing and frugall hee was of time (as of a thing in this earth most pretious) and howe farre from al vain pastimes and idlenes he was: this doth well declare, which in the storie of William de Reg. & other wryters is tolde of hym. That hee so deuided the day and night in three parts, if he were not let by warres, or other great busines: that eight houres hee spent in studie & learning: and other eight houres he spent in praier and almes dedes: and other eight houres he spent in his natural rest, sustenance of his body, and the needes of the realme.

The which order he kept duely by the burning of waxen tapers kept in his closet by certaine persons for the same purpose. Guliel.

How studious he was & carefull of the commō wealth and maintenance of publike tranquillitie: his lawes most godly set forth and diuised by him may declare. Wherein especially by him was provided, for the extirping and abolishing all theft and theeues out of the Realme. Wherby, the Realme through his vigilant care, was brought into such trāquillitie or rather perfection, that in euery crosse or turning way, he made be set vp a golden brouch at least of siluer gilded, through his dominiōs: and none so hardy neither by day nor night to take it downe: for the more credit wherof, the wordes of the Latin story be these: Armillas aureas iuberet suspendi, quae uiantium audiatem irritarent, dum non essent, qui eas abriperent. &c. Guliel. Lib. de Regibus Angl. And no great maruel therein, if the Realme in those dayes was brought in such an order, and that iustice then was so well ministred, when the king him selfe was so vigilant in ouerseeing the doings of his iudges and officers. Whereof thus also we read in the saide author testified: Iudiciorum a suis hominibus factorum, inquisitor, perperam actorum asperrimus corrector. 1. he was (sayeth mine author speaking of the king) a vigilant inquisitor of the doings of his iudges, and a strict punisher of theyr misdoinges. Iornalensis also wryting vpon the same, thus sayth: Facta ministrorum suorum, & potissimè iudicum diligenter inuestigauit, adeo ut quos ex auaritia aut imperitia errare cognosceret, ab officio remouebat, that is, he did diligently search out the doings of his officers, & especially of his iudges: so that if he knewe any of them to erre eyther through couetousnes, or vnskilfulnes: them he remooued from their office.

And thus much concerning the valiant actes, and noble vertues of this worthy Prince: whereunto although there were no other ornamēts adioyning besides: yet sufficient were they alone to set forth a Prince worthy excellent commendation. Nowe besides these other qualities & gifts of Gods grace in him, aboute mentioned: remayneth an other part of his no litle praise & commendation, which is his learning and knowledge of good letters: wherof he not onely was excellently expert hym selfe, but also a worthy maintainer of y^e same through al his dominiōs: where before, no vse of Grammer or other sciences was practised in this Realme, especially about the Westparts of the lād: there through the industrie of this king, schooles began to be erected, and studyes to florish. Although amōg the Britaynes in the towne of Chester in Southwales lōg before that, in kyng Arthurs tyme, as Galfridus writeth: both Grammer, and Philosophy with other tongues was thē taught. After that some writers record, that in the tyme of Egbert kyng of Kent, this llande began to florishe with Philosophy. About which tyme some also thinke: that the Uniuersitie of Graūtechester, neare to that which nowe is called Cambrige, began to be founded, by Bede: following this coniecture therein, for that Alcuinus (before mētioned) which after went to Rome, & from thence to Fraunce in the tyme of Charles the great, where he first began the Uniuersitie of Paris: was first traded vp in the exercise of studies, at the same schoole of Graūtechester. Bede Lib. 111. cap. 18. writing also of Sigebert king of Eastangles, declareth how the sayd Sigebert returning out of Fraunce into England (according to the examples whiche hee did there see) ordered and disposed schooles of learning, through the meanes of Felix then Bishop: and placed in them maisters and teachers, after the vse and maner of the Cantuarites. And yet before these times, moreouer is thought to be two schooles or vniuersities within the realme: the one Grek, at y^e town of Greglade, which afterward was called Kyrk|lade: The other for Latine, whiche place was then called Latinelade: afterward Letthelade neare to Oxford.

Page 144 But howsoever it chanced that the knowledge and study of good letters being once planted in this realme, afterwarde went to decay: yet King Alfrede deserueth no little praise, for restoring or rather increasing the same. After whose time they haue euersince continued, albeit not continually through euery age in like perfection. But this we may see, what it is to haue a Prince learned him selfe, who feeling and tasting the price and value of science & knowledge, is thereby not only the more apt to rule, but also to instruct & frame his subiectes, from a rude barbaritie, to a more ciuile congruencie of life, & to a better vnderstanding of thinges: as we see in this famous Prince to happen. Cōcerning whose first education & bringing vp, although it was somewhat late before he entred any letter: yet suche was the apt towardnesse & docilitie of his nature, that being a childe, he had the Saxon Poemes (such as were vsed then in his owne tounge) by hart and memory. Who afterward with yeares and time grewe vp in such perfection of learning and knowledge, in so much, that as mine author sayeth, Nullus Anglorum fuerit vel intelligendo acutior, vel in interpretando elegantior. The which thing in him the more was to be marueiled, for that he was xij. yeares of age before he knew any letter. Then his mother, careful and tender ouer him, hauing by chance a booke in her hand, which he wold faine haue:  promised to geue him the same, so that he wold learne it. Whereupon he for greedines of the booke, eftsoones learned the letters, hauing to his Scholemaister Pleimundus, after bishop of Canterbury. And so daily grew more and more in knowledge, that at length, as mine author sayth,  Plurimam partem Romanae bibliothecae, Anglorum auribus dedit, optimam praedam peregrinarum mercium, ciuium vsibus conuertens. That is. A great part of the Latin Librarie hee translated into English, conuerting to the vses of his Citizens, a notable pray of forein ware & marchādise. &c. Of which bookes by him and through him translated, was Orosius: Pastorale Gregorij. The historie of Bede: Boëtius de consolatione Philosophiae.  Also a booke of his owne making and in his owne tounge, which in the English speach he called a hādbooke, in Greke called it Enchiridion, in Latine a Manuel. Besides the historie of Bede translated into the Saxons tounge▪ he also himselfe compiled a story in the same speach, called the storie of Alfrede &c. which both bookes in the Saxons tounge I haue seene, though the language I do not vnderstād. And as he was learned himself excellently well, so likewise did he inflame all his countrey men to the loue of liberall letters, as the wordes of the storie reporteth, Illos praemijs, hos minis hortando, neminem illiteratum, ad quamlibet curiae dignitatem aspirare permittens.  That is. He exhorted and stirred his people to the studie of learning, some with giftes, some by threatens, suffering no man to aspire to any dignitie in the Court, except he were learned. Moreouer an other storie thus sayth, speaking of his nobles: Optimates quo{que} suos ad literaturam addiscendam in tantum prouocauit, vt sibi filios suos, vel saltem si filios nō haberent, seruos suos, literis commendarent. That is. Also his nobles so much hee did allure to the embracing of good letters, that they set all their sonnes to schoole: or if they had no sonnes, yet their seruantes they caused to be learned. Whereby the common prouerbe may be found not so common, as true. Such as is the Prince, such be the subiectes. He began moreouer to translate the Psalter in English,  & had almost finished the same, had not death preuēted him. Guliel. de Regib Angl. In the Prologue of the booke intituled Pastorale Grego. thus hee wryteth: declaring the cause why hee was so earnest and diligent in translating good bookes from Latine into English, shewing the cause therof, why he so did, as foloweth: Quòd Ecclesiae in quibus innumerae priscae bibliothecae continebantur, cum libris a Danis incensae sint: quod{que} in tota insula studium literarum ita abolitū esset vt quis{que} minus timeret capitis periculum, quam studiorum exercitia adire. Qua propter se in hoc, Anglis suis consulere &c. That is. The cause was, for that innumerable auncient Libraryes which were kept in Churches,  were consumed with fire by the Danes: And that men had rather suffer perill of their life, thē to follow the exercise of studyes: And therefore he thought thereby to prouide before for the people of the English nation. &c.

It is tolde of him both in Polychron Malmesb. Ironalensis, and other storyes mo, whereof I haue no names: that he seing his countrey (namely Westward) to be so desolate of scholes and learning, partly to profite himselfe, partly to furnish his countrey & subiectes with better knowledge, first sent for Grimbouldus a learned Monke out of Fraunce,* to come into England. Also sent for an other learned man out from the partes of Wales, whose name was Asserion, whome he made Byshop of Shyreborne. Item out of Mercia, he sent for Werefrithus, bishop of Worceter: to whō he put the Dialogues of Gregoy to be translated.* But chiefly he vsed the Counsell of Neotus, who then was counted for an holy man, and Abbot of a certaine Monasterie in Cornwall. By the aduisement of which Neotus, hee sent for these learned men aboue recited: and also ordained certaine scholes of diuers artes, first at Oxforde, and also fraunchised the same with many great liberties. Guliel. Iornalens. Fabi. cap. 171. Wherof perhaps the schole, now called the new Colledge (first then begon of this Neotus) myght take hys name: which (afterwarde peraduenture) the Byshops of Winchester after a larger manner did reed•fie, and inlarge wyth greater possessions.

Moreouer, amōg other learned men which were about king Alfrede: histories make mention of Iohannes Scotus (a godly Diuine, and a learned Philosopher) but not that Scotus, which nowe we call Duns. For that Iohannes Scotus came after this, many yeaes. This Iohannes is described to be a sharpe wit, of great eloquence, and well expert in the Greeke tounge: pleasant and mery of nature and cōditions, as appeareth by diuers his doings & aunsweres. First he comming to Fraunce out of his owne countrey of Scotland, by reason of the great tumultes of warre, was there worthily intertained:*, and for hys learning had in great estimation of Carolus Caluus the French king, whom he commonly and familiarly vsed euer to haue about him, both at table, and in chamber. Upon a time the King sitting at meate, and seeing something (belike in thys Iohn Scot) which semed not very courtly: cast forth a mery word asking of him, what difference there was betwixt a Scot, & a Sot. Whereunto the Scot sitting ouer against the King, somewhat lower, replied againe sodainly, rather then aduisedly (yet merely) saying: Mensa tantum, that is, the table onely: importing thereby himself to be the Scot, and so calling the king a Sot by craft. Which word howe other princes would haue taken to stomake, I knowe not: but thys Charles, for the great reuerēce he bare to his learning, turned it but to a laughter among his nobles, & so let it passe.

An other time, the same king being at dinner, was serued wyth a certaine dish of fish: wherein, were two great fishes, and a litle one. After the king had taken thereof his repast, setteth downe to Iohannes Scotus the foresayde fish, to distribute vnto the other ij. Clarke sitting there wyth him: which were two tall and mighty persons, he himselfe being but a litle man. Iohannes taketh the fish, of the which the two great, he taketh and carueth to himself: the litle fish he reacheth to the other two. The king perceiuing this his diuision thus made, reprehended the same. Then Iohannes, whose maner was euer to finde out some honest matter to delite the King, answered to him againe, proouing his diuision to stand iust and equal. For here (sayth he) be two great, and a litle, poynting to the two great fishes & himselfe: And likewise here againe is a litle one and two great, pointing to the litle fish, & two great persons, I pray you (sayeth hee) what oddes is there, or what distribution can be more equal? Whereat the King with his nobles, being much delighted, laughed merely.

At the request of thys Charles surnamed Bawld, the Frenche king, this Scotus translated the booke of Dionysius, intituled De Hierarchia, from Greeke into Latin, worde for worde, quo fit (as my author sayth) vt vix intelligatur Latina litera,*quum nobilitate magis Graeca, quam positione construitur Latina. He wrote also a Booke De corpore & sanguine Domini, whych was afterward condemned by the Pope In Concilio Vercellensi.

The same Iohannes Scotus moreouer compiled a booke of his own, geuing it a greeke title, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , that is, De naturae diuisione. In which booke (as sayeth my foresayd author) is contained the resolution of many profitable questions (but so) that he is thought to followe the Greeke Church,* rather then the Latine, and for the same was counted of some to be an hereticke: because in that booke some thinges there be, which in all poyntes accorde not with the Romish Religion. Wherefore the Pope, wryting to the saide king Charles of thys Scotus, complayneth, as in his owne wordes here followeth:

Relatū est Apstolatui nostro, quòd opus Dionysij Areopagitae, quod de diuinis nominibus, & de caelestibus ordinibus, Graeco descripsit eloquio, quidam vir Ioannes (genere Scotus) nuper transtulit in Latinum. Quod, iuxta morem Ecclesiae, nobis mitti, & nostro iudicio debuit approbari• praesertim quum idem Ioannes (licèt multae scientiae esse praedicatur) olim non sane sapere, in quibusdam frequenti rumore dicatur. &c. That is: Relation hath bene made vnto our Apostleship, that a certaine man called Iohannes a Scottish man, hath translated the booke of Dionysius the Areopagite: of the names of God, and of the heauenly orders, from Greeke into Latin. Which Booke, according to the custome of the Church, ought first to haue Page 145 bene approued by our iudgement: namely seeing the sayde Iohn (albeit he be sayde to be a man of great learning and science) in time past hath bene noted by common rumour, to haue bene a man, not of vpriht or sounde doctrine, in certaine pointes. &c. For this cause the sayde Scotus, being constrained to remoue from Fraūce,* came into England, allured (as some testifie) by the letters of Alured or Alfrede, of whom he was with great fauour entertained. and conuersant a great space about the king: til at length (whether before or after the death of the king it is vncertaine) he wēt to Malmesbery, where he taught certaine scholers a fewe yeares, by the which Schollers at laste most impiously he was murdered and slaine with their penkniues,* and so died, as stories say, a Martyr, buried at the sayd monastery of Malmesbury with this Epitaph.

Clauditur in tumulo sanctus sophista Ioannes,

Qui ditatus eratiam viuens dogmate miro.

Martyrio tandem Christi condescendere regnum

Qui meruit, regnans secli per secula cuncta.

King Alfrede hauing these helpes of learned men about him,* & no lesse learned also himself, past ouer his time not onely to great vtilitie and profite of his subiectes, but also to a rare & profitable example of other Christen kings and Princes, for them to follow. This foresaid Alfrede had by his wife called Ethelwitha, two sonnes: Edwarde and Ethelward, and three daughters: Elflena, Ethelgora, and Ethelguida: Quas omnes liberalibus fecit artibus erudiri. That is, Whome he set all to their bookes and study of liberall arts: as my storie testifieth. First Edward his eldest sonne succeeded him in the kingdome,* The second sonne Ethelward died before his father. Ethelgora hys middle Daughter was made a Nunne. The other two were married, the one in Marceland, the other to the earle of Flanders. Thus king Alfrede the valiaunt, vertuous and learned Prince, after he had thus Christianly gouerned the realme the terme of 29. yeares & 6. monethes,* departed this life. v. Kal. Nou. and lyeth buried at Winchester. An Dom. 901. Of whome thys I finde moreouer greatly noted and commended in historie, and not here to be forgotten, for the rare example therof touching this Alfrede: that wheresoeuer he was, or whethersoeuer he went, he bare alwaies about him, in his bosome or pocket, a litle booke cōtaining the Psalmes of Dauid, and certaine other Orasons of his owne collecting. Wherupon he was continually reading or praying when soeuer he was otherwise vacant,* hauing leisure therunto. Finally what were the vertues of this famous king, thys litle table here vnder written, which is left in ancient writing, in the remembraunce of his worthy and memorable life: doth sufficiently, in fewe lines containe.

In Regem Alfredum, & virtutum illius claram memoriam.

Famosus, Bellicosus, Victoriosus: Viduarum, pupillorum, & orphanorum pauperumque prouisor studiosus, Poetarum Saxonorum peritissimus: Suae genti Chatissimus: Affabilis omnibus: Liberalissimus: Prudentia, fortitudine, temperantia, Iustitia praeditus: in infirmitate, qua continuè laborabat pacientissimus: In exequendis iudicijs indagator discretissimus: In seruicio Dei vigilantissimus & deuotissimus: Anglosaxonum Rex Alfreodus, pi•ssimi Ethelulfi filius. 29. annis sexque mensibus regni sui peractis mortem obiit. Indict. 4. Quinto Kalend. Nouemb. feria quarta, & Wintoniae in nouo monasterio sepultus immortalitatis stolam, & resurrectionis gloriam cum iustis expectat. &c.

Moreouer in the Historie of Henricus Huntingtonensis, these verses I finde wrytten in the commendation of the same Alfrede: made (as I suppose and as by his words appeareth) by the sayd author, whereof I thought not to defraude the reader: the wordes whereof here follow.

Epitaphium Regis Alfredi.

Nobilitas innata tibi probitatis honorem,

Armipotens Alfrede dedit, probitasque laborem.

Perpetuum{que} labor nomen, cui mixta dolori

Gaudia semper erant, Spes semper mixta timori.

Si modò victor eras, ad crastina bella pauebas:

Si modò victus eras, ad crastina bella parabas.

Cui vestes sudore iugi, cui sica cruore.

Tincta iugi, quantum sit onus regnare probarunt.

Non fuit immensi quisquam per climata mundi,

Cui tot in aduersis nil respirare liceret.

Nec tamen aut ferro contritus ponere ferrum,

Aut gladio potuit, vitae finisse dolores.

Iam post transactos vitae regni{que} labores,

Christus ei sit vera quies, sceptrum{que} perenne.

In the storie of this Alfred,* a little aboue, mention was made of Pleimundus Scholemaster to the sayde Alfrede, and also Byshop of Caunterbury, succeeding Etheredus, there Byshoppe before him. Which Pleimundus gouerned that Sea, the number of xxxiiij. yeares. After Pleimundus succeeded Athelmus; and sate xij. yeares. After him came Ulfe•mus xiiij. yeares. Then followed Odo a Dane borne, in y^e sayd Sea of Caunterb. and gouerned y^e same xx. yeares, being in great fauoure with King Athelstane, king Edmund, and Edwine, as in processe hereafter (Christ willing) as place & order doth require, shall more at large be expressed.

As touching the course and proceedings of the Romish Bishoppes there:* where I last entered mention of them pag. 139. I ended wyth Pope Stephen the fifth. After hys time was much broyle,* in the election of the Byshops of Rome: one contending against an other: in so much that wythin the space of ix. yeares, were ix. Byshops. Of the which, first was Formosus, who succeeded next vnto the forenamed Stephen 5. being made pope against the mind of certaine in Rome: that wold rather Sergius then deacon of the church of Rome, to haue bene Pope. Notwythstanding, Mars and money preuailed on Formosus part. This Formosus, of whome partly also is mentioned in other places, of this Ecclesiastical historie, being before bishop of Portuake:* had in time past (I knowe not vpon what causes) offended Pope Iohn the viij. of that name. By reason whereof for teare of the Pope, he voided away, and left his Bishopprike. And because hee being sent for againe by the Pope, woulde not returne: therefore was excommunicated. At length comming into France, to make there his satisfaction vnto the Pope, was degraded from a Byshop into a secular mans habite, swearing to the Pope that he would no more reenter into the City of Rome, nor claime his Bishopprike againe: subscribing moreouer with his owne hand to continue from that time in the state of a secular person. But then, Pope Martin (the next Pope after Iohn) released the saide Formosus of his othe, and restored him againe vnto his Bishopprike. Whereby Formosus entred not onely into Rome againe, but also obtained shortly after y^e papacie. Thus he being placed in the popedome, arose a great doubt or controuersie among the Diuines, of his consecration, whether it was lawfull or not: some holding against him, that for so much as he was solemnly deposed, degraded, vnpriested, and also sworne not to reiterate the state Ecclesiastical: therefore he ought to be taken no otherwise, then for a secular man. Other alledged againe, that whatsoever Formosus was, yet for the dignitie of that order,* and for the credite of them, whom he ordered: all his consecrations ought to stand in force, especially, seeing the sayd Formosus was afterwarde receiued and absolved by Pope Martin, from that his periury and degradation. &c. In the meane time (as witnesseth Sigebertus) this Formosus sendeth for King Arnulphus for aide against his aduersaries. Who then marching toward Rome, was there resisted by the Romaines from entring. But in the siege (sayeth the author) the Romaines within so playd the Lyons, that a poore Hare (or such a like thing) comming towarde the Citie: the hoste of Arnulphus followed after with such a maine crie, that the valiaunt Romaines vpon the walles for very feare, (where there was no hurt) cast themselues desperately ouer the walles: so that Arnulphus with little laboure scaled the walles, and gate the Citie. Thus Arnulphus obtaining the Citie of Rome, rescueth Pope Formosus, and beheadeth hys aduersaries, whome the Pope, to gratifie wyth like recompence againe, blesseth and crowneth him for Emperoure. Thus Formosus sitting fast about y^e space of 4. or 5. yeres followed his predecessours: after whose time (as I sayde) within the space of ix. yeares were ix. Bishops as followeth. But in the meane time concerning the storie of thys Formosus declared by Sigebert, and many other Chroniclers: this thing woulde I gladly aske, and more gladly learne of some indifferent good Catholike person, whyche not of obstinacie, but of simple error being a papist wold aunswere his conscience. Whether doth he thinke the holy order of Priesthoode, which hee taketh for one of the seuen Sacramentes, to be Character indelebilis or not? If it be not indelebilis,* that is, if it be such a thing, as may be put of: why then doeth the Popes doctrine so call and so hold the contrary, pretending it to be indelebile, vnremoueable? If it be in deede, so as they teach and affirme, indelebilis character, why then did Pope Iohn, or could Pope Iohn, adnichilate & cuacuate one of his vij. Popeholy Sacraments: making of a Priest a non Priest, or a layman: vncharactering hys owne order, which is (as he sayeth) a Character, which in no wise may be blotted out, or remoued? Again, Page 146 how soeuer Pope Iohn is to be iudged in this matter, to do either wel or not wel,* this wold I know, if he did well in so dispriesting and discharactering Formosus, for suche priuate offences? If yea, how then stādeth his doing wyth his owne doctrine, which teacheth the contrary? If he did not well, how then standeth his doctrine with his doings to be true, which teacheth that the Pope with his Synode of Cardinals can not erre? Moreouer if this Pope Iohn did not erre in his disordering Formosus: howe then did Martinus hys successoure not erre, in repealing the sayd doing of hys predecessour? Or how did not Pope Formosus erre hymselfe, who beyng vnpriested by Pope Iohn: afterwarde wythout reiterating the Character or order of Priesthoode, tooke vppon hym to be Pope, and made actes and lawes in the Churche? Again, if Formosus nowe Pope did not erre, how then did Pope Stephen hys successoure afterwarde not erre: who did annihilate the consecration, and all other actes of the said Formosus, as erroneous? Or againe, if we say that this Stephen with his Synode of Cardinales did right: then howe could it be, that Pope Theodore, & Pope Iohn the tenth, which came after the foresayde Stephen, did not plainely erre? Who approuing the consecration of Formosus: did condemne, and burne the acts Synodale, of Stephen and his Cardinals, which before had condemned Formosus: according as in storie here consequently may appeare?

After Formosus had gouerned the Sea of Rome fiue yeres,* succeeded first Bonifacius the vj. who continued but 25. dayes, then came Stephen the vj. which so enuyed the name of his predecessor Formosus: that he abrogated and dissolued his decrees: And taking vp his bodye, after it was buried, cut two fingers of his right hande, and commanded them to be cast into Tiber, & then buried the body in a priuate or laymans sepulchre.

Thus Stephen after he had sat in the chaire of pestilēce one yere: succeeded in the same chaire, Pope Rhomanus, and sate iij. monthes: repealing the actes decreed by Stephen his predecessor, against Formosus. Next to whome came Theodorus 2. who likewise taking parte with Formosus against the foresaid Stephē,* reigned but 20. dayes. Then sate Pope Iohn the 10. who did fight and repugne against the Romanes. And to confirme the cause of Formosus more surely, did holde a Sinode at Rauenna of 74. Bishops, w^t the French king Endo and his Archbishops being present at the same. At the which councel, were ratified all the decrees and doings of Formosus: and the contrary acts of the Synode of Stephen the vj. were burned.* This Pope liued not Pope fully two yeares: after whom succeeded Benedictus the 4. which kept the chaire three yeares. After whom Leo the 5. was next Pope, who with in 40. daies of his papacie, was with strong hand taken & cast in prison by one Christopher his own houshold chaplain, whō he had long norished before in his house. Which thing (sayeth Platina) could not be done without great conspiracie and great slaughter of men.* Which Christofer being Pope about the space of seuen monthes, was likewise himselfe hoisted from his Papall throne by Sergius, like as he had done to hys maister before. And thus within the space of 9. yeares, had bene 9. Popes one after an other. Then Sergius after he had thrust downe Pope Christofer, and shorne him Monke into a Monasterie,* occupied the rouse 7. yeares. This Sergius a rude man, and vnlearned, very proude and cruell: had before bene put backe from the Popedome by Formosus aboue mentioned. By reason whereof,* to reuenge Formosus againe being nowe in his papacie, caused the body of Formosus, where it was buried to be taken vp: and afterwarde set in the Papall sea (as in his pontificalibus) first disgraded him, then commanded his head to be smitten off, w^t the other thre fingers that were left (as Sigebertus writeth) which done, he made his body to be throwne into Tiber, deposing likewise all such, as by the said Formosus before had bene consecrated and inuested. This body of Formosus thus throwne into Tiber, was afterward (as our writers say) found & taken vp by certaine fishers,* and so brought into s. Peters temple. At the presence whereof (as they say) certaine images there standing by, bowed downe themselues, and reuerēced the same, with lie and all. But such deceiueable miracles of stocks and images in monkish and frierly tēples, be to vs no newes, especially here in England: where we haue bene so inured with the like, & so many, that such wily practises cannot be to vs inuisible: though this crownshorn generation, thinke themselues to daunce in a nette. But the truthe is,* while they thinke to deceaue the simple, these wily beguily most of all deceiue themselues, as they will finde except they repent. By this Pope Sergius, first came vp to beare about candels on Candelmas day: for y^e purifying of the blessed virgine. As though the sacred conception of Iesus the sonne of God, were to be purified as a thing vnpure, and that with candell light.

After Sergius,* entred pope Anastasius, in whose time the body of Formosus forenamed, is thought to be foūd of fishermen in the riuer of Tiber, & so brought, as is said, into the temple to be saluted of the images, which thing may quickly be tainted as a lie. For how it is to be thought that the body of Formosus so long dead before, and now lying 7. yeares in the riuer: could remaine whole all that while, that Fishers might take it vp, & discern it to be the same? After Anasius had sate two yeres,* folowed Pope Lando, the father (as some stories think) of pope Iohn, which Iohn is sayde to be the paramour of Theodora'a famous harlot of Rome,* & set vp of the same harlot eyther against Lando, or after Lando his father to succede in hys rouse. There is a storie writer called Liuthprandus, who wryting de Imperatoribus.* Lib. 2 cap. 13. maketh there mention of this Theodora, and Pope Iohn xj. and sayeth moreouer, that this Theodora had a daughter named Marozia: which Marozia had by pope Sergius aboue mentioned, a sonne which afterward was Pope Iohn the 12. The same Marozia afterward it chāced to marry with Guido Marques of Tuscia: through the meanes of which Guido and hys frends at Rome, she brought to passe that this pope Iohn the 11. was smothered with a pillow laid to his mouth, after he had reigned 13. yeares. And so the foresayd Iohn the 12. her sonne, to succede next after him. But because y^e clergie and people of Rome did not agre to his election, therfore was Pope Leo the 6. in his place set vp.* Thus Pope Iohn the sonne of Sergius and Marozia being deiected, reigned Pope Leo 7. moneths. After him Pope Stephen 2 yeares. Who being poysoned, then was Pope Iohn the 12. aboue rehearsed, the sonne of Sergius and Marozia, set vp againe in the Papacie, where hee reigned neare the space of 5. yeres. Of the wickednesse of this strompet Marozia, howe she married two brethren, one after the death of the other: And howe she gouerned all Rome, & the whole church at that time, I let it passe. Although the latin verses wherewith the sayd Liuthprandus, doeth inuey against such women as marie two brethren,* were neither worthy here to be recited, and perhappes might be further applied then to that Marozia of Rome, but for shortnesse I let them also passe.

After Ioan. 12. followed Pope Stephen three yeares.* Pope Leo 3. yeares and 4. monethes. Pope Stephen the eight 3. yeres and 4. moneths. Pope Martine 3. yeres and 6. monethes. After him Pope Agapetus 8. yeres and 6. monethes. About whose time or a little before began first the order of monkes called Ordo Cluniacensis, &c.

But nowe to leaue of these monstrous matters of Rome,* and to returne againe to our country of England, where we last left before.

King Edward the elder.

After the reigne of the famous king Alfred, hys sonne Edward succeeded,* surnamed the elder. Where first is to be noted, that before the Conquest of the Normandes, there were in England 3. Edwardes, first this Edwarde the elder. 2. Edward the martyr. 3. Edward the confessor. Whereof hereafter (by the grace of Christ) shall followe in order, as place shall geue to be declared. This Edwarde began his reigne,* the yeare of our Lord. 901. and gouerned the land right valiantly and nobly 24. yeares. In knowledge of good letters and learning, he was not to be compared to his father. Otherwise, in princely renowne, in ciuile gouernment,* and such like martiall prowesse, he was nothing inferior, but rather excelled him. Through whose valiant actes, first the pryncedome of Wales, and kingdom of Scotland, with Constantine king thereof were to hym subdued. He adioyned moreouer to his dominion the coūtre of Eastanglia, that is, of Norfolk, Suffolke and Essex. All Merceland also he recouered and Northumberlād out of the hands of the Danes. In all his warres he neuer lightly wēt without victory. The subiects of his prouinces and dominions were so inured, and hardened in continuall practise and feates of warre,* that when they hearde of any ennemies comming (neuer tarying for any bidding from the king, or from his dukes) straight wayes they encountred wyth them: both in number, and in knowledge of the order of warre excelling alwayes their aduersaries. Guliel. de Regi. Ita hostes militibus contemptui, Regi risui erant. To meane, So was the comming and assaulting of theyr enemyes to the people and common Souldiours but a trifle, to the king but a ridicule. Among other aduersaries which were busie rather then wise, in assailing this king: Page 147 was one called Clito Ethelwoldus a yong man, king Edwardes vncler sonne. Who first occupying the Towne of W•nborne (taking thence a Nonne whome he had married) fled oc by night to Northumberland, to adioyne himself vnto the Danes, who was made chiefe king and captaine ouer them. Then chased from thence, hee fled ouer into France, but shortly returning againe into England, landed in Eastengland, where the saide Clyto wyth a company of Danes of that countrey gathered vnto him, destroyed and pillaged much of the country about Crekeford and Crikeland. And so passing over Thamis after he had spoiled the land there to Bradeuestocke: returned againe to Northfolke and Suffolke, where he meeting with a bushment of Kentish men, which dragged & taried after the maine hoste of Edward, contrary to his commaundement, inclosed them in, and slew the moste parte of them. Soone after the two hostes meeting together, betwene the two ditches of S. Edmunds lād, after a long fight, Clyto with many of the Danes were slaine, and the remnaunte were constrained to seeke for peace, which vpon certaine conditions, and vnder a tribute was to them graunted.

*In processe, about the 12. yeare of his reygne, the Danes repenting them of their couenants, and minding to breake the same: assembled an hoste and met w^t the king in Staffordshire at a place called Totenhall, & soone after at wodnefield: at which two places the king slew two kings, two erles, & many thousand of Danes, that occupied the country of Northumberland.

Thus the importunate rage of the Danes being asswaged, King Edward hauing nowe some leysure geuen from warres,* to other studies: gaue his minde to the building or repairing of cities, townes, and castles, that by the Danes were rased, shatred, and broken. As first of Chester, which cite he double enlarged to that it was before: compassing the castle within the walles of the same, which before stood without. That done, the king builded a strong castle at Herford in the edge of Wales. Also for the strengthening of the Countrey, he made a Castle at the mouth of the water of Auene, and an other Castle at Buckingham, and the third fast thereby vpon the riuier of Owse. Moreouer he builded or reedified the townes of Towsetor, and Wigmore, & destroyed the castle that the Danes had made at Domes•ord. Likewise vpon the riuier of Trent against the old towne of Notingham, he builded a new towne on the southside, and made a bridge over the riuier, betwene the said ij. townes. Also by the riuier of Merce, he builded a citie or towne, in the North end of Mercia, and named it Thilwall, and after repaired the citie of Manchester, that sore was defaced with warre of the Danes.

In this reuuing and building of townes and Castles for the more fortifying of his Realme: his Sister Elfleda, daughter of king Alfrede, & married to the Duke of Mercia (as is afore mentioned) was no small helper. Of this Elfleda it is firmly of wryters affirmed that shee being as is sayde married to Ethelrede Duke of Mercia, after she had once assayed the paines of women in traueling wyth her childe: so much shee abhorred euer after the embracing of her husbände, that it seemed to her (she sayde) not seemely for a noble womā to vse such fleshly liking, wherof so gret sorow and trauaile should ensue. And yet notwithstanding the same Elfleda, for all her delicate tendernes in eschewing the natural passion, which necessity geueth to women: so hardy she was in warlike daungers, which nature geueth not to women, that fighting against the Danes, so venturous shee was of stomacke,* that foure of her nexte knights, which were gardeius of her body, were slain fast by her. This Elfleda among her other noble actes, whereby she deserued praise, was a great helper and stirrer vp of her brother Edward: who builded and newly repaired many Castels and townes, as Toniworth, beside Lichfelde, Stafforde, Warwike, Shrowesbury, Watrisbury, Eldisbury, besides Chester in the forrest now destroyed. Also in the North end of Mercia, vpon the riuier of Merce, a castle called Rimcorne, also a bridge ouer Seuerne named Brimmisbury bridge.

As touching the lawes and statutes of thys Edwarde, as also of his father Alfrede made before him, I omit heere to recorde them for length of matter and wast of time: yet notwithstanding, this admonition by the way I thinke good to note: that in those dayes of these auncient Kinges reigning in Englande, the authoritie then both of conferring Bishoprickes,* and spirituall promotions, and also of prescribing lawes as well to the church men▪ as to the la•tie, and of ordering and intermedling in matters mere spiritual, was then in the hands of kings, ruling in the land, and not onely in the hande of the Pope, as appeareth by these lawes of Alfrede.

Si quis fornicetur cum vxore aliena, &c,

Si quis in quadragesima sanctum velum in publico vel in lecto. &c.

Vt Christiani Deum diligant & paganismo renuncient. &c.

Si quis Christianitatem mutet. &c.

Si quis ordinatus sacris furetur. &c.

Si praesbyter ad rectum terminum sanctum Chrisma. &c.

Si duo fratres, vel cognati cum vna aliqua fornicentur. &c.

By these and other such like constitutions of King Alfrede,* it may appeare: how the gouernaunce and direction of the church in those daies, depended not vpon Monsieur le Pope of Rome: but vpon the kings which here in their time (vnder the Lorde) did gouerne the land. To this also the example of King Edwardes time geueth testimonie: which Edward wyth Pleimundus (aboue mentioned) Archbishop of Canterbury, and with other bishops in a sinode assembled: assigned and elected 7. Byshops in 7. Metropolitane churches of the realme. Which were, 1. Fridestane. 2. Adelstane. 3 Werstane▪ 4. Adelelme. 5. Edulfus 6 Dernegus. 7 Kenulphus. In which election the kings authoritie semed then alone to be sufficient. &c.

This Edward (as in the beginning was sayd) reigned 24.* yeares. Who had three wiues, Egwine, Elfled, and Ethelwide. Of Egwine hee had hys eldest •onne Adelstane, who next succeeded in the kingdom, and a daughter married after to the duke of Northumberland. Of Elflede, he receiued two ionnes,* and vj. daughters, to witte Ethelward and Edwyne. Ethelward was excellently well seene in all knowledge of learning: much resembling both in countenance and conditions his grandfather Alfrede, and died soone after his father.* Of his vj. daughters, two of them. 1 Elflede and Ethelhilda, were made nonnes. The other foure were married. Edgina to Charles the French King, in hys fathers time. Ethilda by King Ethelstane was maryed to Hugo, the sonne of Duke Robert. Edgitha and Algina, were both sent to Henricus Prince of Almaines. Of which two sisters the seconde, the sayd Henricus, married to hys sonne Otho, who was the first Emperour of the Almaines. The other sister which was Edgitha, the foresayde Henticus, married to a certaine Duke about the border of the Alpes, in Italie. Of his thirde wife Ethelwide, he receiued two sonnes, Edmund, and Edred: which both reigned after Adelstane. And two daughters, Egburga whome hee made a Nonne, and Eadguina who was married to Ludouicus, Prince of Aquitania in Fraunce.* These sonnes and daughters Kyng Edward thus brought vp: Hys daughters hee set to spinning, and to the needle. Guliel. de Reg. His sonnes he set to the studie of learning, vt quasi Philosophi ad gubernandam remp. non iam tudes procederent: that is, to the ende, that they being as first made Philosophers, should be the more expert thereby to gouerne the common wealth.

King Ethelstane, or Adelstane.

EThelstane or Adelstane,* after the death of Edwarde hys father: began his reigne in England, and was crowned at Kingstone. He was a prince of worthy memorie, valyant and wise in all his actes, nothing inferiour to hys father Edwarde, In like worldly renowne of ciuile gouernance, ioyned with much prosperous successe, in reducing this realme vnder the subiection of one monarchie. For he both expelled the Danes, subdued the Scottes, and quieted the Welshinē, as wel in Northwales, as also in Cornwale. The first enemie against this Ethelstane, was one Elfredus: who, with a faction of seditious persons conspiring against the saide Ethelstane at Winchester, continently after the death of hys father, went about to put out his eyes. Notwithstanding the king escaping that danger: through the helpe of God, was at that time deliuered. Elfrede vpon the same being accused, fled to Rome: there before y^e Pope to purge himselfe by hys othe. Who being brought to the Church of S. Peter, and there swearing (or rather forswearing himself to be cleare,* which in deede was guiltie thereof: sodenly vpon his othe fell downe, and so brought to the English house in Rome within 3. daies after departed. The Pope sending worde to king Ethelstane, whether he would haue the sayde Eldred buried among Christians or not: at length through the perswasions of his friendes and kinsfolkes, it was concluded that he should be buried in Christen buriall. This storie although I finde in no other writers mentioned,* but only in the Chronicles of Guliel. Lib. de Regi. yet forasmuch as it heareth the witnesse and wordes of the king himselfe, as testified in an old dede of gift, giuen to the monastery of Malmesbury: I thought the same the more to be of credite. The wordes of the king procede in this tenor as followeth.

The copie of an olde writing of king Ethelstane, testifying of the miraculous death of Duke Elfrede, sodenly stroken by the hande of God for periurie.

SCiant sapientes regionis nostrae, non has praefatas terras me iniustè rapuisse, rapinamque Deo dedisse. Sed sic eas accepi, quemadmodum iudicauerunt omnes optimates regni Anglorum.* Insuper & Apostolicus Papa Romanae ecclesiae Ioannes (Elfredo defuncto) qui nostrae foelicitati & vitae aemulus extitit, nequitiae inimicorum nostrorum consentiens: quando me voluerunt (patre defuncto) coecare in vrbe Wintonia, si non me Deus sua pietate eripuisset. Sed denudatis eorum machinamentis, remissus est ad Romanam ecclesiam, vt ibi se, coram Apostolico Ioanne iureiurando defenderet. Et hoc fecit coram altare sancti Petri. Sed facto iuramento, cecidit coram altare, & manibus famulorum suorum portatus est ad scholam Anglorum, & ibi tertia nocte vitam finiuit. Et tunc Apostolicus ad nos remisit, & quid de eo ageretur a nobis consuluit, an cum caeteris Christianis corpus illius poneretur. His peractis, & nobis renunciatis: optimates regionis nostrae cum propinquorum illius turma efflagitabant omni humilitate, vt corpus illius per nostram licentiam cum corporibus poneretur Christianorū. Nosque flagitationi illorum cōsentientes Romam remisimus: & Papa consentiente, positus est ad caeteros Christianos, quamuis indignus. Et sic iudicata est mihi tota possessio eius in magnis & in modicis. Sed & haec apicibus literarum praenotauius, ne quando aboleatur, vnde mihi praefata possessio, quam Deo & sancto Petro dedi, donatur. Nec iustiùs noui, quàm Deo & sancto Petro hanc possessionem dare, qui aemulum meum in conspectu omnium cadere fecerunt, & mihi prosperitatem regni largiti sunt. &c.

In the second yeare of the reigne of King Adelstane, for an vnitie and a peace to be had betwene the King and the Danes of Northumberlande: hee married to Sythericus their king his sister, whereof mention is made before. But shortly after,* within one yeare this Sythericus died. After whose death King Ethelstane seized that prouince into hys owne hande, putting out the sonne of the foresayde Sythericus called Alanus:* who wyth his brother Godfridus fledde the one into Irelande, the other to Constantine King of the Scottes. And when he had thus accorded with the Danes of Northumberlande, hee shortly made subiect vnto him Constantine King of Scottes. But the sayde Constantine meeked himselfe so lowly to the King, that he restored him to his former dignitie, saying, that it was more honour to make a king, then to be a king.

Not long after, the sayde Constantine King of Scottes did breake couenaunt with king Ethelstane. Wherefore hee assembled his Knights, & made toward Scotland. Where he subduing his enemies, and bringing them againe vnto due subiection, returned into England with victory. Here by the way in some storie wryters (who forgetting the office of historians, seme to play the Poetes) is written and recorded for a maruell, that the sayde Ethelstane, returning out of Scotland into England, came to Yorke, and so into the Church of S. Iohn of Beuerly,* to redeeme his knife, which before hee had lefte there for a pledge at hys going forth. In the which place he praying to God & to S. Iohn of Beuerley, that he might leaue there some remembrance wherby they that came after, might know, that the Scots by right should be subdued to the English mē: smote with sword (they say) vpon a great hard stone standing nere about the castle of Dunbar, that with the stroke thereof the stone was cut a large elne deepe (with a lie no lesse deepe also, then was the stroke in the stone.) But of this poetical or fabulous storie, albeit Polychronicon, Fabian, Iornalensis, and other mo constantly accorde in the same: yet in Guliel and Henricus, no mention is made at all. But peradventure hee that was the inuentour first of this tale of the stone, was disposed to lie for the whetstone: Wherefore in my minde he is worthy to haue it.

Of like truth & credite seemeth also to be this that followeth,* about the same yeare and time, vnder the raigne of King Ethelstane, being the viij. yeare of hys raigne, of one Bristanus Bishop of Winchester,* who succeeded Frithstanus in the same see, and gouerned that Bishoprike iiij. yeares. This Bristanus being a deuout Bishop in prayer and contemplation:* vsed much among his solitary walkes, to frequent late the churchyard, praying for the soules there, and all christen soules departed. Upon a time, the sayde Bristanus after hys wonted maner proceeding in hys deuotions, when he had done, came to requiescant in p̄e. Whereunto, sodainly a great multitude of soules aunswering together with one voyce, said Amen. Of thys miracle, albeit I haue not much to say (hasting to other matters) yet this question wold I aske of some indifferent papist, which were not wilfull, but of ignorance deceiued: if this multitude, which here answered Amen, were the soules of them buried in the churchyard or not?* If yea, then howe were they in purgatorie, what time they were hearde in that place answering Amen▪ Except we shoulde thinke Purgatorie to be in the churchyarde at Winchester, where the soules were hearde then so many answering and praying Amen. And yet thys storie is testified by the accord of wryters of that time, Guliel. Polychron. Houedenus, Iornalensis, and other moe. Much like miracles and Prophecies also wee reade of Elphegus, which succeeded him: but because we haste to other things let these fables passe.

Ye heard a little before, howe king Ethelstane after the death of Sythericus King of Northumberland, seized that land or prouince into his owne hand, & put out hys sonne Alanus: who after flying into Scotland, married the daughter of Constantine King of Scots. By whose stirring and exhortation, he gathered a company of Danes, Scots, and other, and entred the mouth of Humber with a strong nauie of 615. ships.

Whereof King Ethelstane wyth his brother Edmund e hauing knowledge: prepared his army, and at length ioyned in fight with him & his people, at a place called Brimābruch or Brimford: ^{} where he fighting with them from morning to euen, after a terrible slaughter on both sides (as the like hath not bene sene lightly in England) had the victorie. In which battaile were slaine fiue small and vnder kings, with Constantine king of Scots: and xij. Dukes with the more part of all the strangers which at that time they gathered to them. ^{} Here also our wryters put in an other miracle in this battaile: howe king Ethelstanes sworde miraculously fell into his sheath through the prayer of Odo, then Archbishop of Canterburie.

Concerning this battaile, I finde in a certaine written Chronicle these verses: ^{*} which because they shoulde not be lost, I thought not vnworthy here of rehearsall.

Transierat quinos, & tres, & quatuor annos, lure regens ciues, subigens virtute tyrannos:

Cum redit illa Lues Europae noxia labes.

Iam cubat in terris fera barbaries Aquilonis,

Et lacet in campis pelago pirato relicto,

Illicitas toruasque minas Analanus anhelans, ^{*}

Bacchanti furiae, Scotorum rege volente,

Commodat assensum Borealis terrae serenum.

Etiam grande tument, iam terrent aera verbis.

Cedunt indigenae, cedit plaga tota superbis.

Nam quia rex noster fidens alacrisque iuuenta,

Emeritus pridem detriuerat ocia lenta,

Illi continuis foedabant omnia praedis,

Vrgentes miseros iniectus ignibus agros.
Marcuerant totis viridantia gramina campis,
Aegra seges votum deluserat agricolarum.
Tanta fuit peditum, tam barbara vis equitantum,
Innumerabilium, concursus quadrupedantum.
Exciuit tandem famae querimonia regem,
Ne se cauterio tali pateretur inuri.
Quod sua barbaricae cessissent arma securi,
Nec mora, victrices ducentia signa cohortes,
Explicat inuentum vexilla ferocia centum,
Iuncta virum virtus, decies bis milia quina,
Ad stadium belli comitantur prae uia signa.
Hicque clet strepitus armatorum legiones.
Terruit insignis venientum fama latrones.
Vt posita proprias praeda repetant regiones.
At vulgus reliquum miseranda strage peremptum,
Infecit bibulas terris nidoribus auras.
Fugit Analasus de tot modo millibus vnus &c.

After thys victorie thus obtained of the Danes and Scottes:  King Ethelstane also subdued (or at least quieted) the North Brytaines. Whome he conuenting together at Herforde (or there about) forced them to graunt vnto him as a yerely tribute, xx. pound of gold: three hundreth poũde of siluer: and of heades of neate xxv. hundred: with haukes and dogs,  to a certaine number. This done, he wēt to Exceter, and there likewise subduing the South Brytaines about Exceter and Cornewall: repaired the walles of Exceter with sufficient strength, and so returned.

Among these victorious and noble actes of this King: One blot there is of him written and noted, wherein he is as much worthy to be reprehēded, as in the other before to be commended (that is) the innocent death and murther of his brother Edwyne. The occasion thereof was this: King Edward aforenamed their father, in the time of his youth, cōming by a certaine village or grange, where he had bene nursed and brought vp of a child: thought of curtesy to goe Page 149 see howe his nurse did. Where hee entring into the house, espied a certaine yong damsel beautifull and right seemely attired, Egwina by name. This Egwina before being a pore mans daughter, had a vision by night, y^t of her body sprang such a bright light of the Moone, that the brightnes therof gaue light to the Realme of England. By reason wherof, she was taken into the foresaide house, & daintely brought vp in stead of their owne daughter: for hope of some commoditie to ensue thereby, as afterwarde it came to passe. For King Edward (as it is declared) comming into the house,* and rauished with the beautie of the maiden: begate of her the same night this Ethelstane. Wherefore the sayd Ethelstane being thus vasily borne of Egwina, the first wife to Edward (as is sayd) before he was married to her: and fearing his next brother Edwyne, which was rightly borne (especially being stirred therunto through the sinister suggestion of his Butler) did cast such displeasure to the foresayde Edwyne hys brother, being yet but young, that (notw^tstanding hys innocent submission and purgation made against his accusers) he caused him to be set in an old rottē boate in the broade Sea (onely with one Esquier w^t hym) w^tout any tackling or other prouision to the same. Where the young and tender Prince being dismaid with the rage of windes and of the floudes, and nowe weary of his l••e, cast himselfe ouer board into the sea, and so was drowned. Notwithstanding the Esquire shifting for himselfe as he could, and recouering the body of his master, brought it to Sandwich, where it was buried. Which done, the king afterwarde comming to the remembraunce of himselfe, was stroken with great repentaunce the space of vij. yeares together. And at length was reuenged of him that was the accuser of his brother. This accuser (as is sayde) was the kings cupbearer, who (as God the righteous iudge of all things woulde haue it) vpon a certaine solemne feast, bearing the cuppe vnto the king, chanced in the middle of the floure to stumble with one foote, helping and recouering himselfe with the other, saying in these wordes: Thus one brother (as ye see) helpeth an other.* These wordes being thus spokē in the hearing of the king, so moued his mind, that forthwith he commaunded the false accuser of his brother to be had out to execution. Whose iust recompence I would wish to be a warning to all men, what it is to sowe discorde betwixt brother and brother.

King Ethelstane (besides his vij. yeares lamentation, for this acte) builded the two Monasteries of Midletone, and of Michelenes, for hys brothers sake (or as the stories say) for his soule. Whereby it may appeare, what was the cause most speciall in those daies,* of building monasteries, to wit, for releasing the sinnes both of them departed, and them aliue, which cause howe it standeth wyth the grace and veritie of Christes Gospell, and of his passion, let the Christen reader trie & examine with himselfe. This cruell fact of the king toward Edwyne, caused him afterwarde, to be more tender and careful toward his other brethren and sisters left in his handes vnmarried. Which sisters, as is partly in the Chapter before declared, he richly bestowed, in great mariages: As one to the king of Northumberlād Sithericus:* an other he gaue to Lewes King of Aquitania, the thirde to Henricus Duke of Almaine for hys sonne Otho: who was the first Emperour of the Germanes. Whereby it is to be vnderstand, that the Empire at this time began first to be translated from Fraunce (where it remained about C. yeares and halfe) vnto Germanie where it hath euer since continued.

The fourth of his sisters, being a virgine of singulare benty Hugo y^e French king required to be geuen vnto him: sending to King Ethelstane pretious and sumptuous presents,* such as were not before seene in England. Among the which presents & gifts, besides the rare odours of sondry fauours & fine spices: and besides the precious & costly gemmes, namely of Smaradges of most redolēt grene, besides also many and great coursers and palfries richly trapped, especially of one iewell (as wryters make inention) which was, a certaine vessell finely and subtilly made of the precious stone Onichinus so radiantly wrought, y^t in it appeared the liuely corn growing, and mens images walking. &c. Ouer and besides was sent also the sworde of Constantine the great, w^t the name of the possessor wrytten in golden letters, where in the hast of the same al beatē in gold,* was one of the yron nailes, wherwith our Sauour on the crosse was nailed. Of the veritie whereof I am not disposed at thys present muche to say what I suspect, but that this in the Ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius, is euidēt. That two of the foresaid nailes of Christ, was spēt on the bridle of Constantine: the 3. he cast into the Sea in a raging tempest. Wherefore, if Christ were nailed w^t 4. nailes, perhappes this naile might be one. If he were nailed but with iij. I see not how this storie can stand with other stories, neither howe this fourth naile can stand with truthe. Among the rest moreouer, was the speare (as is reported) wherwith the side of our Sauour was opened: which also the sayd Constātine was wōt to cary in the field against his enemies: with a portion likewise of the holy crosse inclosed in Cristall: Also a part of the crowne of thorne in like maner inclosed. &c. Of the whych Reliques, part was geuen to Winchester, part to the Church of Malmesbury, where king Ethelstane was buried. As this King was indued and enlarged, by the gift of God (the serter vp & disposer of all kings) w^t great victories of worldly renowe: hauing vnder hys subiection both the Scottes, and Britons, and the whole Monarchie of the land: So he deuised diuers good and holesom lawes for the gouernment of the same, as wel concerning the state of the orders Ecclesiasticall, as also of the secular or lay people. Whereby it is to be vnderstād, that the vsurped power of the bishop of Rome, did not then extend it selfe so largely, nor so proudly to derogate frō the authority of kings & princes: but that euery one in his owne dominion, had (vnder God, and not vnder the Pope) the doing of all matters within the same his dominion contained: whether they were causes tēporal, or spiritual.* As by the decrees and constitutions of this king (& also of other as well before him, as after him) may euidently be testified: as where hee among other lawes, thus ordeineth •ouching the bishop, in wordes as folowe.

Episcopo iure pertinet, omnem rectitudinem promouere Dei videlicet,*ac seculi. In primis, debet omnem ordinatum instruere, quid ei •it agendum iure, & quid hominibus secularibus iudicare debeant.

Debet etiam sedulò pacem & concordiam operari cum seculi iudicibus: qui rectum velle diligunt, & in compellationum allegationem edocere, ne quis alij perperam agat, in iureiurando, vel ordalio.

Nec pati debet aliquam circumuentionem iniustae mensurae, vel iniusti ponderis. Sed conuenit vt per consilium & testimoniū eius, omne legis rectum, & burgi mensura, & omne pondus sit secundum*ditionem eius, institutum valde rectū: ne quis proximum suum seducat, pro quo decadat in peccatum.

Et semper debet Christianis prouidere contra omnia, quae praedicta sunt, & ideo debet se de pluribus intromittere: vt sciat quomodo grex agat, quem ad Dei manum custodire suscepit, ne diabolus cum dilaniet, nec malum aliquod superseminet. Nunquam enim erit populo benè consultum, nec dignè Deo conuersabitur, vbi lucrum impium & magis falsum diligitur. Ideo debent omnes amici Dei quod iniquum est eneruare, & quod iustum est eleuare, nec pati vt propter falsum, & pecuniae questum homines se forisfaciant erga verè sapientem Deum, cui displicet omnis iniustitia.

Christianis autem omnibus necessarium est, vt rectum diligant, & iniqua condemnent & faltem sacris ordinibus euecti iustum semper erigant, & praua deponant.

Hinc debent Episcopi cum iudicibus, iudicia dictitare & interesse, ne permittant (si possint) vt illinc aliqua prauitatū gramina pullulent. Et sacerdotibus pertinet in suo Dioecesi, vt ad rectum sedulò quemcumque muent, nec patiantur (si possint) vt Christianus aliquis alij noceat, non potens impotenti, non summus infirmo, non praelatis*subditis, non Dominus hominibus suis, seruis, aut liberis. Et secundum*ditionem, & per mensuram suam, conuenit per rectum, vt necessaria*serui operentur super omnem scyram cui*praeest.

Et rectum est vt non sit aliqua mensurabilis virga longio• quàm alia, sed per*Episcopi mensuram omnes institutae sint, & exequatae per su•m*dioecessin. Et omne pondus constet secundum dictionem eius, & si aliquid cōtrouersiarum intersit, discernat Episcopus.

Vniuscuius{que} Domini proprium est & necesse, vt seruis condescendat,*& compatiatur, sicut indulgentius poterit: Quia Domino Deo viuenti sunt aequae chari seruus, & liber. Et omnes vno & eodem pretio redemit, & omnes sumus Deo necessariò serui: Et sic iudicabit nos, sicut antè iudicauimus eos, in quos potestatem iudicij in terris habebimus. Et ideo opus est vt eis parcamus qui nobis parere debent & tunc manutenebimur in Dei omnipotentis proprio iudicio. Amen.

The sayde Ethelstane besides, prescribed other constitutions also, as touching tithes geuing: where hee sayeth and proclaimeth. Ego Ethelstanus Rex, consilio V•felmi Archiepiscopi mei & aliorum Episcoporum, mando praepositis omnibus in regno meo, in nomine Domini & sanctorum omnium, vt inprimis reddant de meo proprio decimas Deo, tam in viuente capitali, quàm in mortuis frugibus terrae: & Episcopi mei similiter faciant de suo proprio, & Aldermanni mei & praepositi mei, &c. That is, I Ethelstane King, charge and commaund all my officers through my whole Realme, to Page 150 geue tithes vnto God of my proper good, as wel in liuing cattel, as in the corne and fruites of the groūd, and that my Byshops likewise of their proper goods, and mine Aldermen, and my officers and headmen shal do the same. Item this I wil: that my Bishops & other headmen doe declare the same,* to suche as be vnder their subiection, & that to be accomplished at the terme of S. Iohn the Baptist. Let vs remember what Iacob said vnto the Lord: Of all things that thou geuest to me, I wil offer tithes vnto y^e Lord. &c. Also what the Lord sayeth in the Gospel of S. Mathewe. To him that hath, it shalbe geuen: and he shall aboūd. We must also cōsider how terribly it is written in bookes, that if we will not offer our tenths, from vs ix. partes shall be taken away, and only the x. part shalbe left vs. &c. And in the same place, after that he hath assigned y^e Church rightes to be paide in the place, whereto they belong: it followeth thus.*Facite etiam vt mihi mea propria cupiatis, quae mihi poteritis recté acquirere. Nolo vt aliquid mihi iniuste cóquiratis. Sed omnia vestra concedo vobis eo tenore, quo mihi mea similiter exoptetis. Cauete simul & vobis, & eis quos admonere debetis, ab ira Dei, & transgressionem meam.

Among his other lawes & ordinances, to the nūber of xxxv. diuers things be comprehended pertaining as well to the spirituall,* as also to the temporall iurisdiction.

Out of the lawes of this King, first sprang vp the attachement of theeuers, such as stoale aboute xij. pence, and were aboute xij. yeares old, should not be spared.

And thus much briefly concerning the historie of King Ethelstane, & things in his time done: who reigned about the space of xvj. yeares. And because he died without issue, therefore after him succeeded his brother Edmund, the yere of our Lord. 940. who reigned vj. yeares.

King Edmund.

EDmund the sonne of Edwarde the elder, by his thirde wife (as is declared) and brother of Ethelstane, being of the age of xx. yeares, entred his raigne: who had by hys Queene Elgina, two sonnes, Edwyne, and Edgarus, surnamed Pacificus, which both reigned after him, as followeth. This Edmund continued his reigne vj. yeares & a halfe. By him were expulsed the Danes, Scottes, Normandes, and all foreine enemies out of the land. Such Cities and Townes which before were in the possession of strangers: as Lyncolne, Nottingham, Derby, Stafforde, and Leycetour, he recouered out of their hands. Thus the realme being cleared of foreine power, for a time: then the king set his study and mind in the redressing and maintaining the state of the Church: which all stode then in building of Monasteries, and furnishing of Churches, eyther with newe possessions,* or w^t restoring the olde which were taken away before. In the time of thys Edmund, thys I find in an old written story, borrowed of W. Cary: a citizen of London, a worthy treasurer of moste worthy Monuments of antiquitie. The name of the author I can not alledge: because the booke beareth no title, lacking both the beginning, and the latter end. But the words therof faithfully recited, be these: Huius regis tempore, facta est dispersio Monachorum Eushmensis coenobij,* cum substitutione Canoniorum per Althelmum, & Vlrimum laicos, & Osulphum Episcopum. &c. That is: In the time of this King, there was a scattering or dispersion made of the Monkes out of the Monastery of Eusham, and Canons substituted in their place: through the doing of Athelmus, & Ulricus lay men, and of Osulfus Byshop. &c.

Where, as concerning this matter betwene Monkes and other of the clergie, first it is to be vnderstande: that in the realme of England,* heretofore before the time of Dunstane: the Byshops seas and cathedrall churches were replenished with no monkes, but wyth priestes and canons (called then clerks or men of the clergy) After this beginneth to rise a difference or a sect betwixt these two parties, in straitnesse of life and in habite:* so that they which liued after a straiter rule of holines, were called monkes, & professed chastitie: that was, to liue from wiues, (for so was chastitie then defined in those blinde daies) as though holy matrimony were no chastitie, according as Paphnutius did well define it in the councel of Nice. The other sort which were no monkes but priests or men of the clergy called, liued more free from these monkish rules and obseruances: and were then commōly (or at least lawfully) maryed,* and in their life and habite, came nearer to the secular sorte of other christians. By reason wherof great disdaine & emulation was among them: in so much that in many Cathedral churches, where as priests were before, there monks were put in. And contrary, sometime where as Monkes were intruded, there priests and canons againe were placed, and monkes thrust out: wherof more shal appere here after (by the grace of Christ) when we come to the lyfe of Dunstane. In the meane time, something to satisfie the cogitation of the reader, which peradventure either is ignorant, or els would know of the first cōming in of monks, into this realme and Church of England in the Saxones time:* this is to be noted, according as I finde in old Chronicles, namely in the latine history of Guliel. de gestis pontificum Angl. recorded, touching the same. That about thys time of king Edmund or shortly after, when hardnes and straitnesse of life, ioyned with superstition, was had in veneration, and counted for great holinesse: Men therefore, either to winne publique same with men, or merites with God, gaue themselues to lead a strait life: thinking thereby, the stranger their conuersation was,* and farther from the common trade of vulgar people, the more perfect to be toward God and mā. There was at that time (and before that) a monastery in France named Floriake, after the order and rule of Benedict: from the which Monasterie did spring a great part of our english mōks. Who being there professed, and afterward returning into England, did cōgregate men daily to theyr profession. And so, partly for strangenesse of theyr rule: partly for outwarde holinesse of their strait life: partly for the opinion of holinesse that many had of them, were in great admiration: not onely with the rude sort, but with kinges and princes: who founded their houses, maintained their rules, and enlarged them with possessions. Among the which order of monks comming from Floriake, especially was one Oswaldus, first a monke of Floriake, then bishop of Wirceter and of Yorke: a great patrone and setter vp of monckery.* Touching the which Oswaldus, William in his booke, De pontific. writing of his historie, hath these woordes: Familiaris per id temporis Anglis consuetudo fuit, vt si qui boni afflati essent desiderio, in beatissimi Benedicti monasterio caenobialem susciperet habitū: a quo, religionis huiusce manauit exordium, &c. That is, It was a common custome at that time amōg English men, that if any good men were well affected or minded toward religiō, they went to the Monasterie of blessed S. Benedict in France, and there receiued the habite of a Monke: Wherupon the first origine of this religion began,* &c. But of this Oswald bishop of Yorke, and Dunstane bishop of Canterburie, and Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, howe they replenished diuers Monasteries, & Cathedral Churches with Monkes: and howe they discharged maryed Priestes and Chanans out of their houses, to plante in Monkes in their celles: more shall be spoken (by the grace of Christ) heereafter. Nowe let vs returne againe to the matter where we left, of king Edmund: who besides his noble victories against his enemies, and recouering the Cities aboue expressed into his own hāds: did also subdue the prouince of Cumberland. And after he had put out the eyes of the two sonnes of Dunmail king of Cumberland,* he committed the gouernance therof to Malcolinus king of Scots: vpon promise of his trustie seruice & obedience, when the king should stande in any neede of him. In the time of this king, Dunstane was not yet Archbi. of Canterbury, but onely Abbot of Glastenbury:* of whom many fabulous narrations passe among the wryters, importing more vanity then verity. Wherefore this is one of the first: what time Edgarus called Pacificus was borne,* Dunstane being the same time Abbot of Glastenbury (as the monkish fables dreame) heard a voyce in the ayre of certaine Angels singing after this tenour, and saying: Nowe peace commeth to the church of England in y^e time of this child and of our Dunstane, &c. This I thought to recite, that the christian reader might the better pōder wyth himselfe, the impudent and abhominable fictions of this Romish generation. Out of the same mint also haue they forged, how the sayd Dunstane should heare the aungels sing the Kyrieleyson, vsed to be song at euensong in the church. Guliel de pontif. lib. 1. Which is as true as that the Harpe hanging in a womans house, played by it selfe the time of the Antheme, called Gaudent in coelis, &c. What would not these deceiuers faine in matters something likely, whych in thinges so absurde and so inconuenient, shame not to lie and to forge so impudently & also so manifestly? Through the motion of this Dunstane: King Edmund builded and furnished the monasterie of Glastenbury, & made the sayd Dunstane Abbot thereof.

Concerning the ende and death of this King, sundrye opinions there be, Alfridus and Marianus say: that while this King Edmund endeuored hymselfe to saue his sewer from the daunger of his enemies, which would haue slaine him at Pulcherchurch: the king in parting of the fray was wounded, and died shortly after. But Guliel. de Regibus. lib. 2. sayeth, that the king being at a feast at Pulcherchurch Page 151 vpon the day of S. Augustine, espied a fellow sitting in the hall, named Leof, whom he before for his felony had exiled. And leaping ouer the table did flie vpon him, & plucked the thiefe by the haire of the head to the ground. In which doyng, the fellow with a knife wounded the king to the death, and also with the same knife wounded many other of the kings seruants, and at length was all to hewen, and died forthwith.

*By the lawes of king Edmund (ordeyned and set forth, as well for the redresse of church matters, as also of ciuile regiment) it may appeare, that the state both of causes temporal & likewise spiritual, appertained then to y^e kings right (the false pretended vsurpatiō of the bishop of Rome notwithstanding) as by these lawes is to be seene: where he by the aduise of his lordes and bishops, did enact & determine concerning the chastitie & pure life of ecclesiastical ministers, and such as were in the orders of the Church, w^t the penalties also for them which transgressed the same.

Item, for tithes to be payd of euery christian man, and for the church fees, and alme fees, &c.

Item, for deflouring of womē professed, which we call Nunnes, &c.

Item, for euery bishop to see his churches repaired, of his owne proper charge, and boldly to admonish the king whether the houses of God were well maintayned, &c.

Item, for flying into the church for sanctuary, &c.

Item, concerning cases and determinations spousall, or matrimoniall, &c.

All which constitutions declare, what interest kings had in those days in matters as wel ecclesiastical as other, within their dominion, and that not only in disposing the ordinances and rites, such as appertained to the institutiō of the church: but also in placing and setting Bishops in their sens, &c.

In the tyme of this Edmund, was Ulstanus Archb. of Yorke,* and Odo Archbishop of Canterbury, which Odo beyng a Da•e borne (as is before touched) was promoted to that sea by king Ethelstane, for that (as they say) hee being first bishop of Witone, & present with kyng Ethelstane in the field against Analafus before mentioned, what time the said Ethelstane had lost his sword, he thorough his intercession vp to heauen, did see a sworde from heauen, come downe into the sheath of the kyng. Whereof relation beyng made to the kyng by the foresayd Byshop,* Ethelstane vpon the same was so affected toward Odo, that not onely he counted him for a Patrone of his life, but also made him Primate of Canterbury after the decease of Ulfelmus. This Odo was the first from the commyng of the Saxons, till his tyme which was Archbishop of Canterbury being no mōke.* For all the other before him were of the profession of Monkes, of whō a great part had bene Italiās vnto Berctualdus. Notwithstanding this Odo, beyng also a stranger borne, after he was elected into the bishoprike, to aunswer to the old custome of others before him, sayled ouer into France, and there at Floriake (after the vsuall maner aboue mentioned of Englishmen) receiued the profession and habite of monkish religion, as sayth my foresayd author. And like as the sayd Odo first beyng no monke, was made Archbishop of Canterbury. So also Ulstanus the same tyme, beyng bishop of Yorke and of Worcester,* differed from diuers his predeceßours before him in profession and in habite: of whome the forenamed author thus writeth in his iij. booke, speaking of Ulstanus qui sanctitate discrepabat & habitu, that is, he differed in sanctimonie and in habite.* Whereby is to be collected, that in those dayes was a difference in habite & garment, not only betwene monkes & bishops, but also betwene one Bishop and an other. Albeit what difference it was yet, I do not finde. But I returne agayne to Odo, who by the description of his maners, might seeme not to be the worste that occupied that place, were it not that our lying histories faining false miracles vpon him (as they do of other) make him in deede to seeme worse then he was.* As where they imagine that he should see from heauen a sworde fall into the scabberd of king Ethelstane. Itē, where he should couer and defend the church of Canterbury with his praiera from raine.* And also where he should turne the bread of the aulter (as the writer termeth it) into liuely fleshe, & from flesh into bread againe, to confirme the people which before doubted in the same. Where note agayn (good Reader) that albeit this miracle were true, as no doubt it is vntrue: yet is it to be noted, y^t in those dayes was a great doubt among englishmen of the popish sacrament,* & that transubstantiatiō was not receiued into the christiā creed. The like iudgement is to be geuē also of that, where our English writers testifieng of the same Odo, say that hee should prophesie long before of Dunstan, to be his successor in the church of Canterbury. But to let these fantasies and idle stories passe, this which we find of Odo, his own writing is certain, that the said Odo in the raighe of kyng Edmund, had a synode commensed of the chiefe Prelates and mē of the clergy in his time, to whom he directed this letter here following: the copy whereof I thought to expresse, for the Reader to see what zelous care raigned in Archbishops then toward the Church of the Lord. The wordes of his epistle proceed in this tenour.

The letter or an Epistle of Odo Archbishop of Caunterbury, sent to the other Bishops and men of the Clergy.

Mirabili cunctipotentis polorum praesulis clementia opitulante: Ego Odo,* ecclesiae Saluatoris Domini nostri Iesu Christi Archiepiscopus, Douerniensis ciuitatis Metropolitanus, coepiscopis fidei catholicae compagatoribus spirituali charitatis rigore meis confratribus. Praesentium prosperitatem aetherei{que} decoris beatitudinem, &c.

The same in English.

By the deuine grace of God, I Odo of the church of our lord and sauour Iesus Christ, Archbishop & Metropolitane of the citie of Douer, to my fellow bishops, and fellow planters of the catholike fayth, and my fellow brethren in the spirituall bonde of charitie, with greeting, wish prosperitie in this world present, & in the world to come felicitie. If it were so, or by any meanes could be, that all the riches of this world were layd before myne eyes, so that I beyng Emperour had all things vniuersally vnder my subiection, all those things gladly would I geue, yea and my selfe also would offer willingly for the health of your soules, as which also do desire and trust likewise my self to be strengthened with the feruencie of your holynesse, as appertayning to those things wherein the Lord our God hath set vs to be workmen, &c.

And after a few other wordes of like effect, wherein he doth declare the heauy burden of his office, it followeth after this maner.

Wherefore most humbly and one vnworthy, but yet a deuou• fellow brother of yours, I beseech and exhort your holines: that you will not shew your selues cold and negligent in the cure and regiment of soules, so that in the tyme of the feareful iudgement, the Lord doe not complaine of you, saying, my shepeheardes did not feed my flocke, but they fed thēselues And agayne they were princes of my flocke, and I knew not of it. But rather let vs take heede, and be diligent ouer the houshold of the Lord, ouer which he hath set vs to be the leaders: to geue them meate & true measure of corne in tyme conuenient: that is to say, wholesome doctrine. And although vpon myne owne demerites or worthinesse I do not presume to comfort or exhort any man: but as one beyng vnworthy & faultie in transgressions innumerable, am glad, and stand in neede, rather to be strengthened by your brotherly admonitions: yet for the auncient authoritie of my predecessors as of Augustine, of happy memory, and also of all other saintes by whose industrie the rule of christianitie did first florish and spring from this Metropolitane see, vnto all quarters of England. Therefore I haue thought good to direct vnto you these my letters to the profit of you all: especially, for that our renowned & princely king Edmond, with all his people doth ioy to folow that which he heareth in you, and of you: and also, forsomuch as all his subiectes which be vnder his Imperiall dominion, doe loue and delight to follow most ioyfully, the same and report of your sincere conuersation, &c.

This Odo continued bishop the space of 20. yeres. After whom Elsinus was elected and ordained by the kyng to succeede through fauour and money: * but in goyng to Rome for the Popes palle, in his iourney thorough the Alpes, he decayed and died for cold. Whereupon succeeded Dunstane• as in tyme and place (by the leaue of Christ) foloweth to be declared.

This Edmund gaue to S. Edmund the Martyr before mentioned, the towne of Bredrich•ehworth, which is now called S. Edmondesbury, with great reuenues and lands appertaynyng to the same. But concerning the friuolous miracles which our Monkish storywriters here •ayne of this good Edmund, by the way (or rather out of the way) I let them passe.

And thus much concerning the reign of king Edmūd,  who after he had reigned vj. yeres and half, was slaine as is sayd at Pulchorchurch, and buried at Glastenbury of Dunstane:  leauing behynd him two children, Edwine & Edgar, by his wife Elgina. But because the foresaid children were yet yong & vnder age, therefore Edrede brother to king Edmund, and vnclē to the children, gouerned as Protector about the space of 9. yeres and halfe,  til Edwine the eldest sonne came to age. This Edrede with great moderation, and fidelitie to the young children, behaued himselfe Page 152 during the tyme of his gouernement.  In his tyme, Dunstane was promooted through the means of Odo the Archbishop, from Abbot of Glastenbury, to be Bishop of Wirceter, and after of London. By the counsayle of this Dunstane, Edrede was much ruled, and too much thereto addicted: In so much that the sayd Edrede is reported in stories to submit himselfe to much fond penance, and castigations inflicted to him of the said Dunstane. Such zelous deuotion was then in princes, and more blynd superstition in bishops. And here agayn is an other miracle as fantastickall as the other before, forged of Dunstane. That whē that Edrede beyng sicke, sent for Dunstane to be hys confessor by the way: Dunstane should heare a voyce declaring to him before, that Edrede was already departed, at the declaring wherof Dunstans horse fel immediately dead vnder hym, * with lye and all.

* King Edwine.

EDwine the eldest sonne of king Edmund afore mētioned, after his vnclē Edrede, began his raigne about the yere of our Lord, 955. being crowned at Kingston by Odo the Archbishop of Caunterbury. Of this Edwine it is reported of diuers writers, that the first day of his coronation, sitting with his Lordes, brake sodainly from them & entred a secrete chamber, to the company of a certaine woman, whom he inordinately retained (being as some say an other mans wife) whose husband he had before slayne, as other say being of his aliance, to the great mislikyng of hys Lordes, and especially of the Clergy. Dunstane was yet but Abbot of Glastenbury, who following the king into the chamber, brought him out by the hand, and accused him to Odo the Archbishop,* causing him to be separate from the company of the foresayd partie, by the which Odo, the king was for his fact suspended out of the Church. By reason whereof the king beyng with Dunstane displeased, banished him his land, & forced him for a season to flee to Flanders where he was in the monastery of S. Amandus. About the same season the Monasticall order of Benedict Monkes or blacke monkes (as they were called) began to multiply and encrease here in England.* In so much, that where before tyme other priestes & Canons had bene placed. there monkes were in their rouses set in, and the secular priests (as they then were called) or Canōs put out, But king Edwine for the displeasure he bare to Dunstan, did so vexe all the order of the said monkes, that in Malmesbury Glastenbury, & other places mo, he thrust out the monkes, and set in secular priestes in their stead.

Notwithstanding it was not long, but these priestes and Canons were agayne remooued, and the said monkes in their stead restored, both in the foresayd houses, and in diuers other Churches Cathedrall besides, as in the next story of Kyng Edgar (Christ willyng) shall at more large appeare.

*In fiue kyng Edwine beyng hated by reason of certaine his demeanours, of all his subiectes (especially the Northumbrians and Mercians) was by them remooued from his kingly honour, and his brother Edgar in his steade receiued: so that the Riuer of Thamys deuided both theyr kingdomes. Which Edwine after he had raigned about the terme of foure yeares departed, leauing no heyre of hys bodye. Wherefore the rule of the lande fell vnto Edgar his younger brother.

King Edgar.

EDgar the second sonne of Edmund, and brother to Edwine being of the age of xvj. yeares, began his raygne ouer the realme of England, in the yeare of our Lord, 959. but was not crowned till 14. yeares after: the causes whereof here vnder follow (Christ willing) to be declared. In the beginning of his raigne he called home Dunstane, whome king Edwine before had exiled. Then was Dunstane, which before was Abbot of Glastenbury,* made bishop of Worcester, & then of London. Not long after, this Odo the Archbishop of Cant. deceaseth, after he had gouerned y^e Church 24. yeares. After whom Brithelinus bishop of Winchester, first was elected. But because he was thought not sufficiēt to furnish y^e roome: Dunstane was ordained Archb. and the other sent home agayne to his old Church. Where note by the way, how in those dayes the donatiō and assignyng of ecclesiasticall dignities remayned in the kings hand, onely they fet their palle frō Rome, as a token of the Popes confirmation. So Dunstane beyng by the kyng made Archb. tooke hys iourney to Rome for his palle of Pope Iohn the 13. which was about the beginning of the Kings raygne. Thus Dunstane obtayning his palle, shortly after his returne agayne from Rome,* entreateth King Edgar, that Oswaldus (who, as is said, was made monke at Floriake, and was nephew to Odo late bishop of Cant.) might bee promooted to the bishoprike of Worcester, which thyng to him was granted. And not long after, through the means of the sayd Dunstane, Ethelwoldus (whom stories doe fayne to be the great patrone of Monkerie) first Monke of Glastenbury, thē Abbot of Abbendon, was also made Bysh. of Winchester. Of this Ethelwold, Gulielmus libro de gestis pōtificum recordeth, that what tyme he was a Monke in the house of Glastenbury, the Abbot had a vison of him which was this. How that there appeared to him in hys sleepe a certayne great tree, the branches wherof extended through out all the foure quarters of the Realme, which branches were al couered with many little Monkes coules, where, in the top of the tree was one great maister coule, which in spreading it selfe ouer the other coules, inclosed all the rest, which maister coule in the tree top, myne Authour in the interpretation applyeth to the lyfe of this Ethelwold.* Of such prodigious fantasies, our monkish histories bee full, and not onely our histories of England, but also the Heathen histories of the Gentiles be stuffed with such kynd of dreames of much like effect.

Of such a lyke dreame we read of the mother of Ethelstane, how the Moone did spring out of her wombe, & gaue light to all England. Also of king Charles the Emperour, how he was led by a threed to see the torments of hel. Like wise of Furceus the Heremite mentioned in the third booke of Bede, who sawe the ioyes of heauen and the 4. fires that should destroy the world: the one of lying, for breakyng our promise made at Baptism. The second fire was of couetous. The third of dissention. The fourth was of the fire of impietie and wrongfull dealing. Item, in like sort of the dreame of Dunstane, and of the same Ethelwold, to whom appeared the three bishops, Bristanus, Birinus, and Swithinus, &c. Itē, of the dreame of the mother of this Ethelwold, who beyng great with him, did see a golden Egle flee out of her mouth, &c. Of the dreame likewise, or the vision of Kyng Edgar concerning the falling of the two apples,* and of the pots, one being full of water, the other empty, &c. Also of king Edward the Confessor, touching the ruine of the lande by the conquest of the Normands. We read also in the history of Astiages, how he dreamed of Cyrus. And likewise of many other dreames in the bookes of the monkes, & of the Ethnike writers. For what cannot either the idle vanitie of mans head, or the deception of the lying spirite worke by man: in foreshewing such earthly euentes as happen commonly in this present world? But here is a difference to be vnderstood betwene these earthly dreames, speaking of earthly things,* and matters of humaine superstition, & betwene other spiritual reuelations sent by God touching spirituall matters of the Church, pertayning to mans saluation. But to our purpose, by this dreame, and by the euent which followed after, it may appeare how & by what meanes the multitude of Monkes began first to swarme in the Churches of England (that is) in the dayes of this Edgar, by the meanes of these three Bishops, Dunstane, Ethelwold and Oswald. Albeit Dunstane was the chieftest ring leader of this race, yet Ethelwold beyng now Bishop of Winchester, & Oswald bishop of Worcester, were not much behind for their partes. By the instigation and counsail of these three aforesaid, king Edgar is recorded in histories to build either new out of the ground, or to reedifie monasteries decayed by the Danes, mo then xl. As the house of Ely, Glastenbury, Abington, Burgh by Stamford, Thorney, Ramsey, Wilton, Wenton, Winchtombe, Thamstock in Deuonshire, with diuers other moe. In the setting vp and building of the which, the foresayde Ethelwold was a great doer and a founder vnder the king. Moreouer, thorough the motion of this Dunstane and his fellowes, kyng Edgar in diuers great houses and Cathedrall Churches, where Prebendaries and priestes were before,* displaced the priestes, and set in Monkes. Whereof we read in y^e chronicle of Rog. Houeden, in wordes and forme as followeth: Hic nam{que} Ethelwoldus Regem cuius eximius erat consiliarius, ad hoc maximè prouocauit, yt clericos à Monasterijs expelleret, & monachos sanctimoniales{que} in eis collocaret, &c. That is, Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, who was then one of the kings coūsaile, did vrge the K. chiefly to expel Clerks out of Monasteries, and in their rowmes to bestow Monks and Nunnes, &c. whereunto accordeth likewise Historia Iornalensis, containing the like effect in these wordes: Hoc anno Ethelwoldus Wint. & Oswaldus Wygornensis Episcopi, iussu Regis Edgari (clericis de quibusdam maioribus Ecclesijs expulsis) Monachos instituerunt, aut de eisdem clericis & alijs monachos in eisdem fecerunt. Gulielmus also writing of the tyme of Dunstane, maketh the matter somewhat more plain Page 553 where he sayth: Ita{que} clerici multarum Ecclesiarum data optione, vt aut amictum mutarent, aut locis valedicerent, melioribus habitacula vacuefacientes. Surgebant itaque in tota insula, religiosorum monasteria, cumulabātur mole pretiosi metalli sanctorum altaria, &c. Thus the secular priests being put to their choise, whether to chaunge their habite, or to leaue theyr roumes, departed out of their houses, geuing place for other better men to come in. Then the houses & Monasterics of Religious men through all the Realme, went vp apace, &c.

After the kings mynd was thus perswaded and incited by these bishops to aduance Monkery, then Oswaldus bishop of Worcestre, & also made Archbishop of Yorke, after the decease of Oskitellus,sui <◇> compos effect{us} (as Houeden writeth) hauing his sea in the cathedrall Church there of S. Peter, began first with faire perswasions to assay the myndes of the Canons and priests, whether they could be content to change their profession, and to be made monks, or no: which when he saw it would not take effect, he practised this pollicie with thē. Nere to the said Church of S. Peter, within the churchyard he erected an other Church of our Lady, which when he had replenished w^t Monkes, there he continually frequented, there he kept, there he sat, and was euer there conuersant. By reason whereof, the other church was left naked and desolate, and all the people gathered there where the bishop was.* The priests seying themselues so to be left and neglected both of the Bishop and of the people, to whome nothing remayned but shame and contempt, were driuen of shame either to relinquish the house (such as would not enter the Monkish profession) or els to become monkes, such as had nothyng els to stay vpon. After the like superstition (although not after the same subtiltie) did Ethelwold also driue out the Canons and priests from the new Monastery in Winchester, afterward called Hida,* and placed his monkes. So in Oxford and in Mildune, with diuers other places moe: the secular Priests with their wiues were expelled to geue place to Monkes. The cause wherof is thus pretended in certaine story writers, whom I see also Fabian to folow, for that the priests and Clerkes were thought slack and negligent in their Church seruice, and set in Uicars in theyr stead, while they liued in pleasure, and mispent the patrimony of the Church after their owne lust. Then king Edgar gaue to the Uicars the same land which before belonged to the Prebendaries, who also not long after shewed themselues as negligent as the other.* Wherefore king Edgar (as mine authors write) by the consent of Pope Iohn, 13. voyded clerely the priests, and ordained there monkes. Although certaine of the nobles, and some of the Prelates were therewith not well contented, as in the chapter following, may partly appeare.

But for so much as we haue entred into the mention of Monkes & Nunnes,* and of their profession, which I see so greatly in our Monkish stories commended: lest perhaps the simple Reader may be deceiued thereby, in hearing the name of monkes in all histories of tymes to be such an ancient thing in Christian life (euen frō the primitiue church after the Apostles tyme) both commonly recited and well receiued: therfore to helpe the iudgement of the ignorant, and to preuent all error herein, it shall not be vnprofitable in followyng the present occasion here geuen (by way of a little digression) to entermedle somewhat concerning the originall institution of monkes, what they were in the old tyme, which were called Monachi, wherein the monkes of the primitiue tyme, did differ from the Monkes of the middle time, and from these our Monkes now of this latter age. Moreouer, wherein all these three do differ from Priests (as we call them) and frō men of the clergy. Wherefore to aunswer to the superstitious scruple of such, which alledge the old antiquitie of the name and title of monks: first I graunt, the name and order of Monkes to be of old continuance, during neare from the tyme of 300. yeares after Christ. Of whom diuers old authors do record, as Augustinus, Hieronymus, Basillus Magnus, who was also himself one of the first institutors and commendors of that superstition.

Chrysostomus,Nazianzenus, Euagrius, Sozomenus, Dionysius, and diuers other. In the number of these monkes (which then were deuided into Hermites or Anachorites and into Coenobites) wexe Antonius, Paulus, Ioannes, wyth diuers other recluses. Among the which was Hierome, Basile, Macarius, Isidorus, Pambus, Nilammon, Simeon, with infinite other, both in Palestina, Syria, Thebaide, Mesopotamia in Egypt, in Africa and Scythia. In so much that Cassianus, Lib. 2. cap. 4. de Canon. Noctur. orat. maketh mention of a certaine Monastery in Thebaide, wherein were aboue 5000. monks, vnder the gouernment of one Abbot. And here also in England mention is made before of Bangor, wherein were two thousand & two hundred Monkes vnder one mans ruling, in the yeare of our Lord, 596. wherby it appeareth that Monkes were then, and 2000. yeares before in the primitiue tyme of the Church. But what monks these were, is to be considered. Such as either by tyranny of persecution were driuen into solitary and desert places, or els such as not constrained of any, but of their owne voluntary deuotion (ioyned with some superstition among, for the loue they had to spirituall contemplation, and for hatred of the wicked world) withdrewe themselues from all company, either hauyng nothyng to themselues proper, or els all things common with other. And all these were then nothing els but lay men. Of which lay men there were two sundry sortes, one of the vulgare & common people, which onely were pertakers of the Sacraments, the other in folowing a Monasticall kynde of lyfe, were called Monkes (beyng nothing but lay men) leadyng a more seure and straighter trade of lyfe, then the other, as may sufficiently appeare by August. Lib. de moribus Ecclesiae cap. 13. Item, Lib. de operibus Monachorum. Item Epistola ad Aurelium. Also by Hierome ad Heliodorum, writing these wordes: Alia Monachorum est causa, alia clericorum. Clerici pascunt oues, ego pascor, &c. That is, One thing pertaineth to Monkes, an other thing to them of the Clergy. They of the Clergy feede their flocke. I am fed, &c. Et ex Dionysio. Also the same appeareth likewise by the 4. Canon of the Councel of Chalcedone, where it is prouided, Ne Monachi se Ecclesiasticis negocijs immisceant. That is, That Monkes should not intermedle with matters of the Church. &c. Et Leo Epistola 62 vetat Monachos & laicos, etsi scientie nomine glorientur, admitti ad officium docendi & concionandi.

By these foresayd authors alledged,* it is euident: that Monkes in the former age of the church, albeit they lyued a solitary life, yet they were then no other but only lay mē, differing from priests, & differing from the other monkes, which succeeded them afterward in the middle age of the Church, and that in iij. pointes. First, they were tyed and bound to no prescript forme eyther of diet or apparel, or any thing els, as we may see testified by the wordes of S. Augustine, which be these:

Ne{que} inter haec nemo vrgetur in aspera, quae ferre non potest: Nulli quod recusat imponitur. Nec ideo contemnitur à caeteris, in quod eis imitandis se fatetur inualidum. Meminerunt enim quantoperè commendata sit in Scripturis charitas. Meminerunt omnia munda mundis, &c Nō quod intrat in os coinquinat hominem, sed quod exit. Ita{que} non reiiciendis generibus ciborum, quasi pollutis, sed concupiscentiae perdomandae, & dilectioni fratrum retinendae, inuigilat omnis industria. And Sozomenus, Lib 3. cap. 16. speaking of the Monkes of the same time, which in cities had seuerall mansions frō other, sayth: Alij in turba ciuitatum conuersabantur, sic seipsos gerentes, vt nullius momenti viderentur, & à multis nihil differrent, &c. 1. Some liued in cities, so behauing themselues, as seeming nothing worth, and they differed nothyng from the multitude, &c. The second point wherin they were discrepant from the latter Monkes: was, in that they remained no other but in the order of lay men (onely beyng of a straighter lyfe then the rest) and had nothing to do in matters & charges Ecclesiasticall.* Which was afterward broken, by Pope Bonifacius the 4. as followeth more (the lord willing) to be sene and sayd. Thirdly, the foresaid monkes of that age (albeit the most part of them liued sole & single from wiues) yet some of them were married: certes none of them were forbidden or restrayned from mariage. Of such as were married,* speaketh Athanasius in Epistola ad Dracontium, qui ait se nouisse & Monachos & Episcopos coniuges & liberorum patres, &c. That is, which sayth that he knew both Monkes and Bishops married men, and fathers of children, &c.

And yet the said Monkes of the old tyme,* though they were better then the other which folowed them: yet al that notwithstanding, superstitiō with them and among them begā then to creepe into the church, through the crafty subtilty of Sachan, and all for the ignorance of our free iustification by faith in Iesus Christ. Examples do declare the vaine and prodigious superstitiō of these Monasticall sort of men, which examples do not lacke: if <◇> rather did not lacke to bring them in. But ij. or iij. shal suffice for many, which I purpose (the Lord willing) here to insert: to the intent the mind of the godly reader may the better consider and vnderstand,* how shortly after the tyme of Christ and his Apostles, the doctrine of christian iustification began to be forgotten, true religion turned to superstition, & the price of Christes passion to bee obscured through the vayne opinion of mens merites,* &c. A certaine Abbot named Moses thus testifieth of himselfe in the Collations of Cassianus, that he so afflicted himselfe with much fastyng and watching, that sometimes for ij. or iij. dayes together, Page 154 not onely he felt no appetite to eate, but also had no remēbraunce of any meat at all, and by reason thereof was driuen also frō sleepe. In so much, that he was caused to pray to God, but for a little refreshing of sleepe to be geuen him some piece of the night. In the same author, mention is made of a certaine old man an Hermite, who because hee had conceiued in himselfe such a purpose neuer to eat meat without he had some guest or strāger with him, sometyme was constrained to abstaine v. daies together vntil Sonday, while he came to the Church and there brought some stranger or other home with him.

Two other examples yet more will I adde out of the said Cassianus, to declare how the subtiltie of Sathan, thorough superstition and false colour of holynes, blindeth y^e miserable eyes of such which rather attend mens traditions, then the word of God. In the xl. chap. of the sayd author in his booke de Gastrimargia, is told of a certain Abbot named Ioannes, in the desert of Scythia, who sent ij. of hys Nouices with figs vnto one that was sicke in the wildernes 18. miles off from the Church. It chaunced these two yong Nouices missing the way, wandered so long in the wild forest or wildernes, and could not find the Celie, that for emptines and wearines they waxed faint & tired. And yet rather would they die then tast the figs committed to them to cary, and so dyd, for shortly after they were found dead, their figges lying whole by them.

An other story he also reciteth of two Monasticall brethren, who making their progresse, in the desert of Thebaide: purposed with thēselues,* to take no sustenance, but such as the Lord should minister himselfe vnto them. It happened, as they were wandering desolate in the desert, and faynting almost for penury, certayne Mazices, a kinde of people by nature fearce and cruel: notwithstanding, being sodenly altered into a new nature of humanitye, came forth and of their owne accord offered bread vnto them. Which bread the one thankfully receaued, as sent of God. The other as counting it sent of man and not of God, refused it, and so for lacke perished.

Hereunto might I also annexe the story of Mucius, who to declare his obedience, did not sticke at the commaundement of his Abbot, to cast his sonne into the water, not knowing whether any were appointed there ready to rescue him from drowning, so far were the Monkes in those dayes drowned in superstition. What is this, but for mans traditions and commaundements, to transgresse the commaundement of God, which saith: Thou shalt do no murther. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God? What man is so blynd, that seeth not by these & infinite examples mo: what pernicious superstition hath begun by reason of this Monkery, almost from the beginnyng to creepe into the Church? Wherefore I cannot maruell inough, seeyng that age of the Church, had in it so many learned and famous Doctors, who not onely did approue and allow these monasticall sectes of life: but also certaine themselues were the authors and institutors of the same, yea and of mens traditions made the seruice of God. In number of whome may be reckoned Basilius Magnus, & Nazianzenus, who with immoderate austeritie did so plucke downe themselues,* that when they were called to the office of Bishops, they were not able to sustaine the labour therof.

After these foresayd monkes of that time aboue recited, followed other Monkes of the middle age of the Church:* who as in multitude, so also in superstition increasing, began by little and little from their desolate dens in the vaste wildernes, to approach more neare to great towns, where they had solemne Monasteries founded by Kinges and Queenes, and kings daughters, and other rich Consuls, as is partly before touched. And the causes also touched withall, for the which they were first founded, as these: pro remedio animae meae,* pro remissione peccatorum meorum, pro redemptione peccatorū meorum, & pro salute regnorum, qui{que} meo subiacent regimini populorum. In honorem gloriosae virginis, &c. For all these impious, and erroneous titles, and causes, we finde alleaged in storyes, as in Malmesberiensis, Iornalensis, Henricus, and other moe. In which histories I also note, that the most part of these foresayd monasteries were erected first vpon some great murther, either by war in the field, or priuately committed at home: as shall well appeare to them which read the bookes whom I haue alledged. But to returne to our Monks agayn, who (as is sayd) first began to creepe from the cold field into warme townes and cloysters:* from townes, then into citties, and at length from their close cellors and citties, vnto Cathedrall Churches (as here appeareth by this storye of King Edgar) where not onely they did abound in wealth and riches (especially these Monkes of our latter tyme) but much more did swimme in superstition, and Pharisaicall hipocrisie, beyng yoked and tied in all their doings, to certaine prescript rules and formal obseruances: in watching in sleeping, in eating, in rising, in praying, in walkyng, in talking, in looking, in tasting, in touching, in handling, in their gestures, in their vestures, euery mā apparailled, not as the proper condition of other would require, nor as the season of the yere did serue, but as the coacted rules & order of euery sect did inforce them. The number of which sectes was infinitely diuers: some after Basilius rule, went in white: some after Benets rule in blacke: some Cluniacēsis, first set vp by Otho in the tyme of this king Edgar,* wearing after the rule of Benets order: some after Hieroms rule leather girdled and coped aboue their white coate: some Gregorians copper coloure•: Some de valle vmbrosa, graye Monkes: Some Grand•montenses, wearing a coate of mailles vpon theyr bare bodyes, with a black cloake therevpon: Some Cistercianes, who had white rochets on a blacke coate: Some Celestines, all in blew, both cloake, coule, and cap: Some Charter Monkes, wearing hearecloth next their bodyes.* Some Flagellants, going barefoot in long white linnen shirtes, with an open place in the backe, where they beat themselues with scourges on the bare skinne euery day, before the peoples eyes, till the blood ranne downe: saying that it was reuealed to them by an Angell, that in so scourging themselues, within 30. dayes and 12. houres, they should bee made so pure from sinne, as they were whē they first receiued baptisme: some starred Monkes: Some Iesuites, with a white girdle & a russet coule. Briefely, who can reckon vp the innumerable sectes and disguised orders of their fraternities? Some holding of S. Benet, some of S. Hierome, Some of S. Basill, Some of S. Barnard: Some of S. Bridget: Some of S. Bruno: Some of S. Lewes: as though it were not enough for Christen men to holde of Christ onely: so subiect were they to seruite rules, that no part of Christen liberty remayned among them. So drowned and sunck in superstition: that not onely they had lost Christes religion, but also almost the sense and nature of men. For where men naturally are and ought to be ruled by the descrete gouernment of reasō, in all outward doynges, wherein no one rule can serue for all men:* the circumstance of tyme, place, person, and busines being so sundry and diuers. Contrary, among these, not reason but onely the knock of a bell, ruled all their doinges: their rising, their sleeping, theyr praying, their eating, their comming in, their going out, their talking, their silēce, & altogether like insensible people, either not hauing reason to rule themselues, or els as persons vngrateful to God, neyther enioyning the benefite of reason created in them, nor yet vsing the grace of Christes libertie, wherunto he redemed them.

Thus thou seest (gentle Reader) sufficiently declared, what the monkes were in y^e primitiue time of the Church,* & what were the Monkes of the middle age, and of these our latter dayes of the church. Wherunto ioyned this with all, that where the Monkes of elder tyme (as is sayd) were meere lay men and no spirituall ministers. Afterward Bonifacius the 4. made a decree, an. 606. that Monkes might vse the office of preaching, of Christening, of hearing confessions, & also of assayling them of their sinnes, &c. So thē monkes, who in the beginning were but lay men, and no spirituall ministers, forbidden by the generall Councell of Chalcedon (as is aboue related) to intermeddle with matters ecclesiasticall: afterward in proces of time did so much incroch vpon the office of spirituall ministers, that at lēghth the Priests were discharged out of their Cathedrall churches, & monkes set in their places. Because that Monkes in those dayes leading a straighter lyfe,* and professing chastitie, had a greater countenance of holynes amōg the people, then the Priests, who then in the dayes of king Edgar had wiues (at least so many as would) no law forbidding them to the contrary, till the tyme of Hildebrand, now called Gregory the 7. whereof more shall be sayd (Christ willing) in the booke next followyng.

And thus much by the way as touching the order and profession of Monkes.* Nowe to turne in agayne from whence we digressed (that is) to the matter of kyng Edgar, who followyng the counsaile and leading of Dunstane, and the foresayd Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester, was somewhat thereby inclined to superstition. But otherwyse of his owne nature, well geuen to all vertues and princely actes worthy of much commēdation,* and famous memory. So excellent was he in iustice, and sharpe in correctiō of vices (as well in his magistrates, as other subiectes) that neuer before his dayes was lesse felony by robbers, nor lesse extortion or bribery by false officers. Such Prouinces & lordships as were not yet come vnder the kings subiection, he vnited and adioyned to his dominion. And Page 155 so made one perfect monarchy of the whole realme of England, with all the Ilelands and borders about the same. Such as were wicked, he kept vnder, he repressed thē that were rebels, the godly he maintayned, he loued the modest, he was deuout to God, and beloued of his subiects, whom he gouerned in much peace and quietnes. And as he was a great seeker of peace, so God did blesse hym with much aboundaunce of peace and rest from all warres: so that as the history recordeth of hym,Nullas insidias domesticorum, nullum exterminium alienorum sen serit, for the which he was called Pacificus. He neyther tasted of any priuy treson among his subiectes, nor of any inuasion of foraine enemies. So studious he was of the publike profite of hys Realme, and fruitfull in his gouernment, that as the sayd story testifieth of him, Nullus ferè annus in Chronicis praeterijt, quo non magnum & necessarium patriae aliquid fecerit: No yeare passed in all the tyme of his raigne, wherein he dyd not some singular and necessary commoditie for the common wealth, &c. A great mainteyner he was of Religion and learning, not forgetting herein the foresteps of Kyng Alfred his predecessor. Among his other princely vertues this chiefly is to be regarded, that where as other princes commonly in much peace and quietnes, are wont to grow into a dissolute negligence of life, or obliuiō of their charge committed vnto them. This king in continuance of peace (that notwithstanding) kept euer with him such a watch, & a vigilant seueritie ioyned with a seemely clemency, that I cannot here but recite the witnesse of our story writers, testifiyng of his diligent care ouer the common wealth: which was so great, Vt nullum cuiuscun{que} dignitatis hominē, leges eludere impunè permetteret i.* That he would suffer no man of what degree of nobilitie so euer he were, to dally out his lawes without condigne punishment, &c. And foloweth more in the same author. Nemo eius tempore priuatus latro, Nemo popularis praedo, nisi qui mallet in fortunas alias grassari propriae vitae dispendio,*&c. In all his tyme there was neither any priuy picker nor open thiefe, but he that in stealing other mens goods, would venter and suffer (as he was sure) the losse of his owne lyfe, &c. Guliel. de Reg.

Moreouer, as the studious industrie of this Prince was forward in all other points, so his prudent prouision dyd not lacke in this also,* in driuing out the deuouring & rauening Wolues, throughout all his land. Wherein he vsed this pollicie, In causing Ludwallus Prince or Kyng of Wales, to yelde to him yearely by way of tribute, 300. Wolues. By meanes whereof, within the space of 4. yeres after in England and Wales, might scantly be founde one Wolfe alyue.

This Edgar among other of his politike deedes, had in readines 3600. ships of warre, to scoure the Seas in the Sommer tyme, wherof 1200. kept the East seas, as many to defend the Westside, againe, as many on the Southseas to repulse the inuasion of foraine enemies. Moreouer, in Winter season, the vse and maner of this vertuous Kyng was this: During all the tyme of his life, to ride ouer the land in progresse, searching and inquiring diligently (to vse here the wordes of mine author.) Quomodo legum iura, & suorum statuta decretorum obseruarentur: & ne pauperes à potentibus praeiudicium passi opprimerentur. That is, How his lawes and statutes by him ordeined were kept, & that the poore should suffer no preiudice or he oppressed any maner of wayes by the mightier, &c. Briefly, as I see many things in this worthy prince to be commended, so this one thing in him I cannot but lament, to see him like a Phenix to flee alone, that of all his posteritie so few there bee that seeke to keepe him company. And although I haue shewed more already of this king, then I thinke will wel be folowed, yet this more is to be added to the worthines of his other acts.* That where as by the multitude of the Danes dwelling in diuers places of Englād much excessiue drinking was vsed, wherupon ensued dronkennes, and many other vices, to the euill example and hurt of his subiects: he therfore to preuent that euill, ordeined certaine cuppes with pinnes, or nailes set in them, adding therunto a law, that what person dranke past that marke at one draught, should forfeite a certaine peny. Whereof one halfe should fall to the accuser, and the other half to the ruler of the borough or towne, where the offence was done.

It is reported of this Edgar by diuers authors, that about the 13. yere of his raign, he bring at Chester, a kings (called in histories Subreguli) to wit petykings, or vnderkings, came & did homage to him. Of whom the first was the king of Scots, called Kinadius: Macolinus of Cumberland. Mackus or Mascusinus king of Moniae, and of diuers other Ilands,* & all the kings of Wales, the names of whō were Dufuall, or Dunewaldus; Sifreth, Hu••all, Iacob, Vikyll, Iuchell. All which kings after they had geuen their fidelitie to Edgar:* the next day following (for a pompe or royaltie) he entred with these aforesaid kings into the riuer of Dee. Where he sitting in a boate tooke the rule of the helme, and caused these 8. kings, euery person taking an ore in hys hand,* to row him vp and downe the riuer to and from the Church of S. Iohn vnto his palace agayne, in token that he was maister and Lord of so many prouinces: whereupō he is reported to haue sayd in this maner: Tunc demum posse successores suos gloriari, se Reges Angliae esse, cum tanta praerogatiua honorum fruerētur. But in my mynd this king had sayd much better, if he had rather said with S. Paule, Absit mihi gloriari,* nisi in cruce Domini nostri Iesu Christi.

And thus ye haue heard hetherto touching the cōmendation of king Edgar, such reportes as the old Monkish writers thought to bestow vpon him, as vpon the great patron of their monkish religion, who had builded so many monasteries for them, as were Sondayes in the yere, (as some say) or, as Edmer reporteth, but 48.

Now on the other side,* what vices in him were raigning, let vs likewise consider, according as we find in the sayd authors described, which most write to his aduancement. Wherof, the first vice is noted to be crueltie, as well vpon others, as namely vpon a certaine Erle being of his secret counsaile called Ethelwold. The story is this, Ordgarus Duke of Deuonshire, had a certaine daughter named Elfrida, whose beautie beyng highly commended to the king, he being inflamed therwith, sent this foresaid Ethelwold (whom he especially trusted) to the partie, to see and to bring him word againe, & if her beautie were such as was reported,* willing him also to make the match betwene them. Ethelwold wel viewing the partie, and seing her beautie nothing inferior to her fame, and thinking first to serue his owne turne, tolde all things contrary to the king. Wherupon the king withdrawing his mynd otherwise, in the ende it came to passe that Ethelwold hymselfe did marry her.

Not long after, the king vnderstanding further by the complaints and rumors of certayne, how he was preuented and beguiled, set a faire face vpon the matter before Ethelwold, and merily iesting with hym, tolde hym how he would come and see his wyfe, & in deed appointed the day when he would be there. Ethelwold the husband perceauing this matter to go hardly with hym, made hast to hys wife, declaring to her the comming of the king, and also opening the whole order of the matter how he had done, desired her of all loue, as she would saue his life, to disgrace & deforme her selfe with garmentes and such attyre, as the king might take no delighting in her. Elfrida hearing this what did she, but contrary to the request of her husband, & promise of a wife, against the kings commyng trimmed her selfe at the glasse,* & decked her in her best aray. Whom when the king beheld, he was not so much enamoured w^t her, as in hatred with her husband who had so deceaued him. Wherupon the king shortly after making as though he would goe to hunt in the forest of Harwood, sent for Ethelwold to come to him vnder the pretence of huntyng, & there ran him thorow and slew him. After this the bastard sonne of Ethelwold comming to him, the king asked hym how he liked that hunting. Who aunswered againe, that which pleaseth the king, ought not to displease him. For the death of which Ethelwold, Elfrida afterward builded a Monastery of Nunnes in remission of sinnes.*

An other fault which Malmesbury noteth in hym, was the comming in of strangers into this land, as Saxones, Flemmings, & Danes, whome he with great familiaritie retained, to the great detriment of this land, as the forsaid story of Malmesbury recordeth, whose wordes be these. Vndè factum est, vt fama eius per ora omnium volitante, alienigenae, Saxones, Flandritae, ipsi etiam Dani huc frequenter annauigarent, Edgaro familiares effecti: quo rum aduentus magnū prouincialibus detrimentum peperit. Inde meritò iure{que} reprehendunt eum literae, &c. That is, wherby it happened, that diuers straungers out of foraine countreys* allured by hys fame, came into the land, as Saxones, Flemmings, and Danes also, all which he retained with great familiaritie. The comming of which straungers wrought great dammage to the realme, and therefore is Edgar iustly blamed in stories, &c. with the which reprehension all the Saxone stories also do agree.

The third vice to him obiected,* was his incontinent & lasciuious lust in deflouring maides, as first of a Dukes daughter being a Nūne, and a virgin named Wilfrida, or Wilfrude, of which Wilfride was borne Editha, a bastard daughter of Edgar. Also of an other certaine virgin in the town of Audeuar. who was priuily conueied into his bed by this meanes. The lasciuious king commyng to Andeuar, not farre from Winchester, and thinking to haue his Page 156 pleasure of a certayne Dukes daughter, of whose beautie he heard much speaking, commaunded the mayde to bee brought vnto him. The mother of the virgine grieved to haue her daughter made a concubine, secretly by night cōueyed to the kings bed in stead of her daughter, an other mayden of beauty and fauour not vncomely: who in the morning rising to her worke, and so beyng known of the king what she was, had graunted vnto her of y^e king such libertie and freedome, that of a seruant she was made mistresse both to her maister, and also to her mistresse. Ex Mat. Paris. lib. de Regib.

*An other concubine he had also besides these aforesaid, which was Egelfleda or Elflada, called Candida y^e white daughter of duke Ordinare (as Guliel. Malmesb. recordeth) she beyng also a professed Nunne, of whom he begot Edward in bastardy. For the which he was enioined by Dūstane 7. yeares penance. After which penance beyng complete, then he tooke to him a lawfull wyfe (as Malmesbury sayth) Elfritha, the mother of Edmund and Ethelred, or otherwise called Egelred, whereof more shall be sayd (the Lord willing hereafter.

Ouer and besides all these vices noted and objected to king Edgar in our monkish storywriters, I also obserue another no lesse, or rather greater vice then the other afore recited, which was blynd superstition and idolatrous mōkery brought into the church of Christ, with the wrongfull expulsiō of lawful married priests out of their houses. Whereupon, what inconueniences ensued after in this realm, especially in the house of the Lord, I leaue it to the consideration of them which haue heard of the detestable enormities of these religious votaries. The occasiō wherof, first and chiefly began in this Edgar through the instigation of Dunstane and his fellowes, who after they had inueigled the kyng & had brought him to their purpose, they caused him to call a Councell of the Clergy, where it was enacted and decreed, that the Canons of diuers Cathedral churches, Colleginars, Persons, Uicars, Priests and Deacons, with their wiues and childrē, either should geue ouer that kind of life, or els geue rōume to Monkes, &c. For execution of which decree, two principall Uisitors were appointed, Athelwold or Ethelwold, bishop of Win|chester, and Oswold bishop of Worcester, as is partly before touched.*Osbernus in vita Dunstani, Malmesb. De vit. pontif. Rog, Houed.

And thus much concerning the history of king Edgar and of such things as in his tyme happened in the church. Which Edgar after he had entred into the partes of Britannie, to subdue the rebellion of the Welchmen, and there had spoiled the coūtrei of Glamorgan, & wasted the country of Ono within x. dayes after, when he had raigned the space of xvj. yeares, died, and was buried at Glastenbury, leauing after him two bastards,* to witte, Editha and Edward, and one sonne lawfully begottē, named Ethelred, or otherwise by corruption called Egelred: For Edmund the elder sonne died before his father.

Ye heard before how king Edgar is noted in all stories to be an incontinent liuer in deflouring maydes and virgines. Of which virgins iij. notoriously are expressed in authors, to witte, Wlfrude or Wlfride: The second, was the dukes maid at Andeuar, nie to Winchester: The third, was Elflede mother of Edward, for the which Elflede he was stayd and kept backe from his Coronation by Dunstane Archbishop of Cant. the space of 7. yeares, and so the sayd kyng beginning his raigne in the 16. yeare of his age beyng the yeare of the Lord,* 959. was crowned at his age 31. An. dom. 974. as is in the Saxon Chronicle of Worcester church to be prooued. For the more euident declaration of which matter concerning the coronation of the kyng, restrained, and the presumptuous behauiour of Dunstan against the king:* and his penance by the sayd Dunstane enioyned, ye shall heare both Osborne, Malmesb. and other authors, speake in their owne wordes as followeth, Perpetrato ita{que} in virginem velatam peccato, &c. After that Dunstane had vnderstanding of the kings offence perpetrated with the professed Nunne, and that the same was blased amongst the people, with great ire and passion of mynde he came to the king. Who seing the Archb. comming, eftsones of gentlenes arose from his regall seate towards hym, to take him by the hand,* and to geue him place. But Dunstan refusing to take him by the hand, and with sterne countenance bending his browes, spake after this effect of words (as stories import) vnto the king: You that haue not feared to corrupt a virgine mayde handfast to Christ, presume you to touch the consecrated handes of a bishop? you haue defiled the spouse of your maker, & thinke you by flattring seruice to pacifie the friend of the bridegrome? No sir, his frend will not I be, which hath Christ to his enemy, &c. The king terrified with these thundring wordes of Dunstan, and compuncted with inward repentance of his crime perpetrated, fel down with weping at the feete of Dunstane. Who, after he had raysed him vp from the ground againe, began to vtter to him the horriblenes of his fact,* and finding the king redy to receiue whatsoever satisfaction he would lay vpon him, enioyned him this penance for 7. yeres space, as followeth: That hee should weare no crowne all that space, that he should fast twice in the weeke, he should distribute his treasure left to him of his auncesters, liberally vnto the poore, he should build a Monasterie of Nunnes at Shaftsbury, that as he had robbed God of one virgine through his transgression, so should he restore to him many again in tymes to come: Moreouer, he should expell Clerkes of euil life (meaning such priests as had wiues and children) out of churches, and place Couents of Monkes in their rowme, &c.

It followeth then in the story of Osborne,* that whē the 8. yeres of the kings penance were expired: Dunstan calling together all the pieres of the Realme, with Bishops, Abbots, and other ecclesiasticall degrees of the Clergy, in the publike sight of all the multitude,* set the crowne vpon the kings head at Bathe, which was the 31. yeare of hys age, and the 13. yeare of his raigne, so that he raigned only but 3. yeares crowned king. All the other yeares besides, Dunstan belike ruled the land as he listed. Furthermore, as touching the sōne of the sayd Elfled, thus the story writeth: Puerum quo{que} ex peccatrice quondam progenitum, sacro fonte regeneratum lauauit, & aptato illi nomine Edwardo in filium sibi adoptauit. i. The child also, which was gotten of the harlot, he baptised in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and so geuing his name to bee called Edward, did adopt him to be his sonne, &c. Ex Osberno.

By the which narration of Osberne,* agreing also with the story of the Saxon booke aboue mentioned, is conuincid a double vntruth or error, eyther negligently ouerseen or of purpose dissembled in our latter Monkish storywriters, as in Malmesbury, Math. Paris. Math. Westm. & other mo. Who to conceale the fault of king Edgar, or to beare with Dunstans fact, in setting vp Edward for the maintenance of their monkish order, first doe falsly affirme, that Editha the daughter of Ulfride was borne after Edward, & that for her this penance was enioyned to king Edgar, which neither is, nor can be so, as in processe hereafter (the Lorde willing) shall appeare.

Secondly, they are deceiued in this, that they affirme king Edgar to haue two wiues, and that Elfleda the mother of Edward was not a professed Nunne in deede, but dissembled so to be, to auoid the violēce of the king: where as in deede the truth of the story both geueth her to bee a Nunne, and her sonne to be base, and she her selfe neuer to be married vnto the king.

Now,* forasmuch as we haue hitherto entred mention of Elfleda and Editha, also of Wlfride and Dunstane, here would not be let passe to speake something of their lying miracles, falsly forged to the great seductiō of christen people by superstitious Monkes, who cared not what fables and lyes they brought into the church, so they might haue the vantage of poore mens purses and oblations. And first here commeth in the fabulous myracles wrought at the tombe of Elfleda the kings concubine, which W. Malmesb. in these verses expresseth:*

Nam nonnullis passa annis morborum molestiam.

Defecatam & excoctam Deo dedit animam.

Functas ergo vitae futo beatas exuias.

Infinitis clemens signis illustrauit Deltas.

Inopes visus & auditus si adorant tumulum.

Sanitati restituti probant sanctae meritum.

Rectum gressum refert domum, qui accessit loripes.

Mente captus redit sanus, boni sensus locuples.

The English of which verses is needlesse here to bee recited. Briefly, the effect is this: That both the blynde, deafe, halte, and such as be mad, receiue their health agayne, if they worship the tombe of this Elfleda, &c.

The like fainings and monstrous miracles we reade also in chronicles of doting Dunstane,* drowned in all superstition, if he were not also a wicked sorcerer: First, how he beyng yet a boy, chased away the deuill, set about with a great company of dogs, and how the Angels did open the church dore for him to enter.* Then how the Lute or Harpe hanging vpon the wall, did sing or play without any finger these wordes: Gaudent in coelis animae sanctorum, qui Christi vestigi• sunt sequuti, & qui pro eius amore sanguinem suum suderunt: ideo cum Christo regnabunt in aeternum. Item where a certayne great beame or maisterpost was •••ed out of the place:* he with making the signe of a Crosse, set it in right frame agayne. Moreouer, how the sayd Dunstane being tempted vpon a tyme of the deuill with the cogitation Page 157 of women,* caught the deuill by the nose with a whore paire of tongs, and helde him fast. Item, how ofte heavenly spirits appeared to him, and vsed to talke with him amiliarly. Item, how he prophesied of the birth of king Edgar, of the death of king Egelred, of the death of Editha, and of Ethelwood bishop of Winchester. Also how our Lady with her fellowes appeared visibly to hym, singing this song: Cantemus Domino sociae, cantemus honorem. Dulcis amor Christi personet ore pio. Agayne, how the Angels appeared to him, singing the Hymne called Kyr•• Rex splendens, &c And yet these prodigious fantasies with other mo, are written of him in Chronicles, and haue bene beleued in Churches.

Among many other false and lying miracles, forged in this corrupt tyme of Monckery, the fabulous or rather filthy legēd of Editha were not to be ouerpassed, if for shame and honesty it might well be recited. But to cast the dyrt of these Pope holy monkes in their owne face, which so impudently haue abused the church of Christ, and simplicitie of the people with their vngratious vanities, let vs see what this miracle is, & how honestly it is told. Certayne yeres after the death of Editha, saith Will. of Malmes. which yeres Capgraue in his new Legend reckoneth to be thirtene, the said Editha & also S. Denys holding her by the hand, appeared to Dunstan in a vision, willing and requiring him that the body of Editha in the church of Wilton, should be taken vp & shrined, to the entent it might be honored here in earth of her seruants, according as it is worshipped of her spouse in heauen. Dunstan vpon this, comming from Salisbury to Wilton, where Editha was interred, commaunded her body to be taken vp with much honor & solemnitie. Who there in opening her tombe (as both Malmes. and Capgraue with shame enough recorde) found all the whole body of this Editha cōsumed to earth, saue only her thombe, her belly, & the part vnder the belly. Wherof the said Editha expounding the meaning, declared that her thombe remained found, for the much crossing she vsed with the same. The other partes were incorrupted for a testimony of her abstinence, and integritie, &c. Ex Malmes. & Capgrauo. What Sathan hath so enuied the true sinceritie of christian faith and doctrine, so to contaminate the same with such impudent tales, such filthy vanities, & Idolatrous fantasies as this? Such Monkes with theyr detestable houses,* where Christes people were so abhominably abused and seduced to worship dead carcasses of men and women, whether they deserued not to bee rased, and pluckt downe to the ground, let all chaste Readers iudge. But of these matters enough and to much.

Here followeth the Epitaphe written by Henricus Archdeacon of Huntington,* vpō the prayse and commendation of king Edgar.

*Autor opum, vindex scelerum, largitor honorum,

Septiger Edgarus regna superna petit.

Hic alter Salomon, legum pater, orbita pacis,

Quod caruit bellis, claruit inde magis.

Templa Deo, templis monachos, monachis dedit agros,

Nequitiae lapsum, iustitiae{que} locum

Nouit enim regno verum perquirere falso,

Immensum modico, perpetuum{que} breui.

*Among his other lawes, this king ordained that the Sonday, should be solemnised from Saturday at ix. of the clocke, till Monday morning.

King Edward called the Martyr.

AFTER the death of Edgar no smal trouble arose amōgst the Lordes and Bishops for succession of the crowne:* the principall cause wherof rose vpon this occasion, as by the story of Symon of Durham,* and Roger Houeden, is declared. Immediately after the decease of the king, Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other nobles, which held with Egelrede or Ethelrede the onely right heyre and lawfull sonne of Edgar, misliking the placing and intrudying of Monkes into churches, & the thrusting out of the seculare Priestes, with their wiues and children out of their auncient possessions, expelled the Abbots and Monkes, and brought in againe the foresayd priestes with theyr wyues. Against whom, certayne other there were on the contrary part, that made resistance, as Ethelwine Duke of Eastangles, Elfwoldus his brother, and the Erle Brithnothus, saying in a councell together assembled, that they would neuer suffer the religious Monkes to be expelled and driuen out of the Realme, which held vp all Religion in the land, and therupon eftsoones leuied an army, whereby to defend by force the Monasteries, such as were within the precinct of Eastanglia.

In this hurly burly amongst the Lordes about the placing of Monkes and putting out of Priests,* rose also the contention about the crowne, who should be their king: the bishops and such lordes as fauoured the Monkes, seeking to aduance such a king as they knew would inclyne to their side, so that the lordes thus deuided, some of them would haue Edward, and some consented vpon Egelred the lawfull sonne. Then Dunstane Archb. of Cant. & Oswold Archb. of Yorke, with other their fellowbishops, Abbots, and diuers other Lordes and Dukes assembled in a councel together.* In the which councell Dunstan cōmyng in with his crosse in his hand, & bringyng Edward before the Lords, so perswaded them that in the ende Edward by Dunstans meanes was elected, consecrated, and annointed for theyr kyng.

And thus hast thou (good Reader) the very truth of this story, according to the writing of authors of most antiquitie which liued nerest to that age,* as Osberne and others, which Osberne liuyng in the dayes of William Conquerour, wrote this story of Dunstan through the motiō of Lanfran•us, and alledgeth or rather translateth the same out of such Saxon stories as were writtē before his tyme. Besides which Osberne, we haue also for witnesse hereof, Nic Trinet, in his English story written in French, and also Ioannes Paris, in his French story written in the Latine tong, where he plainly calleth Edward, non legitimum filium, that is, no lawfull sonne. Whereunto adde moreouer the testimony of Vincentius and Antoninus, who in playne termes likewyse report the same.

Nowe hauing sayd the foundation for the truth and ground of this matter,* let vs come to examine how truely our latter writers do say, which write that Editha, and not Edward was the child for whom Dunstane enioined to the king 7. yeares penance, and also how truely they report Edward to be a lawfull heyre, and Elflede to bee a lawfull wyfe to king Edgar.

For first touching Editha, this is confessed by the sayd writers themselves, that she was of good yeares, at what tyme Edgar her father was enioyned his penance. After the which seuen yeares of his penance expyred, he lyued at the most but in yeares and a halfe. Which seuen yeares and 3. yeares and a halfe, make in all but x. yeres & a halfe. But now the said authors themselves do graunt, that she was made Abbas by her father, he beyng then alyue. And how can this then stand with her Legend, which sayth that she was not lesse then 15. yeares of age? By which account it must needes fall out, that she could not be so little as v. yeres old, before the birth of that chyld for whom the kyng did penance.

And thus much touching Editha. Now in like maner, to consider of the tyme of Edward. First, this by all writers is graunted,* that he was slayne in the 15. yeare of his age. Which yeares do well agree to that chyld which king Edgar begate in bastardy, & for the which he did hys penance. For the more euidence whereof, let vs come to the supputation of yeares in this sort.

First, the penance of the king, after the byrth of this child, lasted 7. yeres. Then the king after the same lyued 3. yeres & a halfe. After whose death Edward raigned other 3. yeres and a half, which in all make the full summe of 14. yeres. About the count of which age, the said Edward goyng on his 15. yeres, by their owne reckoning was slaine.

And thus haue ye by manifest demonstration prooued by the right casting of the yeres, after their owne graunt & rekonig, that Editha daughter of Wlfride in no case can be the child which was borne after Edward, & for whom the king was enioyned penance, but that Edward rather was borne after Editha, and was the childe for whom the penance was enioined, contrary to the opinion commōly receiued in the church, which for ignorance of y^e story hath hetherto holden Edward to be an holy Martyr,* and right heyre vnto the crowne. Which error and opinion, how it first sprang and by whom, albeit it pertaine not to my story to discusse, yet were it no hard matter to coniecture.

First, after that Dunstane and Oswolde, wyth other Bishops,* Abbots, and certayne Lordes & Dukes of that faction, for the maintenaunce of Monkery, had aduaunced Edward to be king against Queene Alfrith mother of Ethelred, & Alferus duke of Mercia, and certayne other Nobles, which held with the contrary side of the Priestes agaynst the Monkes. In processe of tyme the monkes that came after to write stories, perceiuing Dunstane to be reputed in the Church of Rome for an holy Saint, and the sayd king Edward for an holy Martyr, and partly also to bolster vp their owne religion of Monkery so muche as they could: to the intent therfore they would saue the credite both of Dunstane and of the kyng, and especially bearing Page 158 fauour to their owne religion, and partly that the reputation of the church of Rome should not be disteined by opening y^e truth of this matter, either did not see, or would not confesse herein what they knew, but rather thought best to blanch the story, and colourably to hide the simple truth therof, making the people falsly beleue, that Elfleda the mother of Edward was wife to king Edgar, and Edward to be lawfully borne, and also that Editha was born after Edward, & to be the child for which the king was enioyned penance. All which is false and cōtrary both to the order of tyme aboue declared, and also to the plaine words of Malmesbury, which speaking of king Edgars last concubine, sayth in plaine wordes:Dilexit vnicè, integram lecto vni deferens sidem, quoad legitimam vxorem accepit Elfthride, filiam Ordgari. That is, he had a concubine whom he loued entirely, keping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntil the tyme he married for his lawfull wife Elfride the daughter of duke Ordgare, &c. Wherby we haue to vnderstand that whatsoeuer concubine this was which Malmesbury speaketh off, certayne it is, that Edgar liued in whoredome till tyme he married his lawfull wyfe. Furthermore, and finally to conclude, beside these arguments and allegations aboue recited, let this also be perpended, how the said Dunstan with his complices, after the killing of king Edward, leauing the right heyre of the crowne (which was Ethelred) went about, as Capgrau and their owne Legend cōfesseth, to set vp Editha the other bastarde to possesse the crowne, but that she more wise then her brother Edward, refused the same. Wherby what is to be thought of the doyngs of Dunstane, and what should be the cause why hee preferred both Edward and Editha to the crowne rather then the lawfull heyre, I leaue to all indifferent Readers therof to iudge.

After that Dunstane and his fellowes had thus set vp Edward for their king, they were now where they would be, supposing all to be sure on their side, and that they had established the kingdom of Monkery for euer, through the helpe of the young king, and the Duke of Eastangles, and certayne other nobles whom they had drawn to their part. Howbeit this matter passed not so wel with them, as they hoped.* For shortly after the coronation of this yong king. Alferus duke of Mercia, who folowed much the deedes of the Queene with other great men, stoutly standing on the contrary side, droue out the Monkes from the Cathedrall churches,* which king Edgar before had set in, and restored agayne the Priestes (as Ranulphus sayth) with their concubines: but in the historie of the Librarie of Iornall, I find it plainly expressed with their wiues. The wordes of the very author be these: Alferus princeps Merciorum, caeteri{que} plures, eiectis monachis de magnis monasterijs, quos rex Edgarus nuper instituerat, clericos cum vxoribus reduxerunt: That is, Alterus duke of Mercia,* with other great men mo, droue out the Monkes from the great monasteries, whom king Edgar had there set in before, & restored agayne the priests with their wyues.

Wherby it doth euidently appeare, that priests in those dayes were married and had their lawfull wiues.* The like before that in king Inas tyme is plaine, that Bishops then had wiues and children, as appeareth by the words of the lawe then set forth, extant in the history of the said Iornalensis, which be these: Si quis filiolum alterius occidat vel patrinum, sit simile cognationi, & crescat emendatio secundum Weram eius Regi,*sicut cognationi. Si de parentela sit qui occidit eum, tunc excedat emendatio patrini, sicut manbota Domini. Si Episcopi filiulus sit, sit dimidium hoc, &c. And thus much by the way for Priestes wyues and their children.

Now to the purpose agayne of our matter, which is to declare how the Duke and Nobles of England expulsed the Monkes out of the Monasteries after the death of kyng Edgar. Whereof let vs heare what the Monkish story of the Abbey of Crouland recordeth. Monachis de quibusdam Monasterijs eiectis, clerici sunt introducti, qui statim monasteriorum maneria ducibus terrae distribuebant, vt sic in suas partes obligati, eos contra monachos defensarent. Tunc de monasterio Eueshamensi, monachis expulsis, clerici fuerant introducti. Terrae{que} tyranni de terris Ecclesiae praemiati sunt, quibus Regina nouercali nequitia,stans cum clericis in regis opprobrium, fauebat. Cum monachis autem Rex, & sancti Episcopi persistebant. Sed tyranni fulti Reginae fauore & potentia, super monachos triumphabant. Multus inde tumultus in omni angulo Angliae factus est. Ex Chronico Ingulphi Abbatis de Crouland, &c. That is, The Monkes beyng expelled out of certayne Monasteries, the Clarkes agayne were brought in, who distributed the Manors or Fermes of the sayde Monasteries, to the Dukes and Lordes of the land, that they beyng obliged to them should defēd them against the Monkes. And so were the monkes of Euesham thrust out and the seculare Clarkes placed, & the landes of the church giuen to the Lordes, with whom the Queene, the Kings stepmother holding the same time, tooke part also with the sayd Clerkes against the king. On the contrary part stood the king & the holy bishops, taking part with the monkes. Howbeit, the lordes & pieres of the Realme staying vpon the fauour and power of the Queene, triumphed ouer the monkes, &c.

Thus as much ado there was through all quarters of the realme,* about the matter among the Lordes, so arose no lesse contention betwene the priests & monkes of England. The Priestes complainyng to the Kyng and Dunstane, layd for themselues that it was vncomely, vncharitable, yea and vnnaturall, to put out an old known dweller for a new vnknown: and that God was not pleased, that to be taken from the auncient possessor which by God was geuen him, neither that it could be to any good man accepted, to suffer any such iniury to be done, least peraduenture the same thing wherein he was preiudiciall to an other, might after reuert & redound vpon himself at length. The monkes on the other side, layd for their part, y^e Christ allowed neither the old dweller, nor the new commer, nor yet looked vpon the person, but who so would take y^e crosse of penance vpon him, and follow Christ in vertuous liuing, should be his disciple.

These & such other were the allegations of the monkes. But whether a monkes coule or a wiewes life, make a sufficient title to enter into other mens possessiōs or no, I referre it to the iudgemēt of the godly. The troublous cares in mariage, the necessary prouision for house keepyng, the vertuous bringing vp of children,* the daily helping of pouertie and bearing of publike charges, with other manifold perturbations and combraunces daily incident to the state of matrimony, might rather appeare to godly wyse men, to come nearer to the right crosse of penance, then the easie & loytring idlenes of monkery. In the end, vpō this controuersie was holden a Councell of Bishops, & other of y^e Clergy. First, at Reading or at Winchester as Guliel. saith, where the greater part both of the nobles & commōs iudged the priestes to haue great wrong, and sought by all meanes possible,* to bring thē agayne to their old possessions and dignities. Iornalensis here maketh rehearsall of an Image of the Crucifixe, or a roode standing vpon the frater wall, where the Councell was holden. To this roode Dunstane requireth them all to pray, beyng belike not ignorant of some spiritual prouisiō before hand.* In the midst of their prayer the roode, or els some blind monke behynd him in a trūke through the wall, is reported to speak these words: Absit hoc vt fiat, absit hoc vt fiat: iudicastis benè, mutaretis non benè. In remembraunce whereof, these verses were written vnder the roodes feete.

Humano more crux praesens aediditore.

Coelitus affata, quae perspicis hic subarata.

Absit vt hoc fiat,* vt cae tera tunc memorata.

Of this Dunstanicall, or rather Satanical oracle, Henricus maketh no mention, nor Ranulphus, nor yet Houedenus, nor Fabian in their histories. Gulielmus in his booke de Regibus, reporteth it but by hearesay, in these wordes saying: Aliae literae docent, &c. Wherefore the lesse it seemeth to be of credite. Albeit if it were of credible truth, yet it proueth in this matter nothing els, but Dunstan to be a Sorcerer, as Polydorus Virgilius, also himselfe seemeth to smell something in this matter.

Notwithstanding for all this, yet the strife ceased not. In so much that a new assembly of the Clergy and other,* was appointed after at a place called the streete of Calue, where the Councell was kept in an vpper lofte. In this Councell many grievous complaints were obiected (as Malmes buriensis saith) against Dunstane. But yet he kept his opinion, and would not remooue from that which hee began to maintaine. And while they were there in great contention and argument which way should be admitted and allowed,* (if it be true that in the stories is written) sodenly the ioyes of the lof• failed, & the people with the nobles fell downe, so that certaine were slaine, & many hurt. But Dunstane (they say onely, standing vpon a poast of the sollar,* which remained vnbroken) escaped without dāger. Which thing, whether it so happened to portend before the ruine of the Realme and of the nobles (as Henry Hunting. doth expoūd it) which after ensued by the Danes, or whether it was so wrought by Dunstanes sorcerie (as was not vnpossible) or whether it were a thing but fained of the monkish writers, and not true, all this I leaue to the Readers, to thinke therein what them liketh. The stories say further, that vpon this the matter ceased, and Dūstan had all his will.

These things thus done at Calue, it hapned not long Page 159 after the same, that king Edward, whom the writers describe to be a vertuous and a meeke prince, much pitifull & beneficiall to the poore, about the iiij. yeare of hys raigne, came vpon a season from hunting in the forest alone, with out the company of his seruaunts, to the place in the West countrey,* where Alfeith his mother, with her sonne Egelred did lye. When the Queene the mother was warned of his comming by her men, anone she calleth a seruaunt of hers, which was of her speciall trust, opening to hym all her conceiued counsaile, & shewyng him all pointes how & what to do for the accomplishing of her wicked purpose. Which thing so done, she made towards the king, and receaued him with all curtesie, desiring him to tary y^e night. But he in like curtesie excused himselfe, and for speede desired to see his brother, and to drinke, vpō his horse sitting, the which was shortly brought.

And while the cup was at his mouth, the seruauent of the Queene (before informed) strake him in the body with a long two edged dagger. After the which stroke the king took the horse with the spurres, and ran toward the way, where he supposed to meete with his company. But he bled so sore, that with faintnes he fell from hys horse, hys one foote beyng in the styrrup. By reason whereof, he was drawen of his horse ouer fieldes and landes, till he came to a place named Coryfgate, where he was found dead. And for that, neither the maner of his death, nor yet he himselfe, for the king was knowen, was buried vnhonourably at the towne of Warham, where the body remayned y^e space of iij. yeares, and then after was taken vp by Duke Al•ere aboute mentioned,* and with pompe and honor accordingly, was remoued to the Minster of Shaftsbury, and there bestowed in the place called Edwardstow. Many tales runne (moe perchaunce then be true) concerning the finding and taking vp of his body, which our most common histories ascribe to myracles and great wonders, wrought about the place where the king was buried. As first how a poore woman borne blynde, receyued her sight by the meanes of S. Edward, there where he did lye. Also how a pillar of fire from heauen, descended ouer the place of his buriall. Then how the foresaid Queene Alfrith taking her horse to goe to the place, was stopped by the way, that neither her horse could be driuen by any meanes, nor she her selfe on foote was able to approach neare to the place where the corpes of S. Edward was. Furthermore, how the sayd Queene in repentaunce of her facte,* afterward builded two Nunneries, one at Amesbury by Salisbury, the other at Werewell, where she kept her selfe in continuall repentaunce all the dayes of her lyfe. And thus as ye haue heard, was this vertuous yong king Edward murthered when he had reigned almost iiij. yeares, leauing no issue behynd him, wherby the rule of the land fell to Egelredus his brother.*

But here by the way is to be noted (vpon the name of this Edward) that there were three Edwardes before the conquest.* The first, was kyng Edward the Senior. The second, king Edward the Martyr, which was this kyng. The third, was king Edward called the Confessor▪ whereof hereafter shall follow (Christ willyng) to be declared.

In the order and course of the Romain Bishops; mētion was made last of Agapetus the second. After whome next succeeded Pope Iohn xiiij.* of whom Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury receiued his palle, as in the story of King Edgar is before mynded. This Pope is noted to be very wicked and infamous, repleate from his first bringing vp with abhominable vices: a whoremaister, an adulterer, incestuous, libidinous, a gamester, an extorcioner periured, a fighter, a murtherer, cruell, and tyrannous. Of his Cardinals, some he put out their eyes, from some he cut of their tongues, some their fingers, some theyr noses, &c. In a generall councell before the Emperour Otho, she first of that name (who was the first Emperour of the Germaines) after the Empire was translated out of Fraunce to Germany by Pope Agapetus (as is aboute historied) these obiections were articulate agaynst hym.* First, that he neuer sayd hys seruice, that in saying hys Masse he did not communicate, that he ordained Deacons in a stable, that he committed incest with two of hys sisters, that playing at dice,* he called for the Deuill to helpe, that for money he made boyes Bishops, that he defloured Uirgins and strangers, that of the palaice of Laterane he made a Stewes, that he lay with Stephana his fathers concubine, likewise with Ramera and with Anna and her neese, that he put out the eyes of the bishop Benedict, that he caused houses to be set on fire,* that he brake open houses, that he dranke to the deuill, that he neuer crossed himselfe, &c. For the which causes (and worthily) he was deposed by the consent of the Emperour with the Prelates,* and Pope Leo was substitute in his place. But after hys departing (thorough the harlots of Rome and their great promises) the said Pope Iohn was restored agayne to his place,* and Leo (set vp by the Emperour) was deposed. At length about the tenth yere of the Popedome of this Iohn he beyng found without the citie with another mā's wife, was so wounded of her husband, that within viij. daies after he dyed.

After him,* the Romains elected Pope Benedictus the fift, without the consent of the Emperour. Wherupon the sayd Otho the Emperour beyng not a little displeased for displacing of Leo,* whom he had before promoted, and for the chusing also of Benedict, came with his army, and said siege to Rome, and so set vp Pope Leo agayne, the viij. of that name.* Which Leo to gratifie his benefactor agayne, crowned Otho for Emperour, and intituled him to be called Augustus. Also the power which Carolus Magnus had geuen before to the Clergy and people of Rome: this Leo by a synodall decree graunted to the emperor and hys successors:* that is, touching the election of the Byshop of Rome. The Emperor againe restored to the sea of Rome, all such donations and possessions, which either Constantinus (as they falsly pretend) or which Carolus Magnus tooke from the Lombards, and gaue to them.

After Pope Leo had raigned a yere and iij. moneths, succeeded Pope Iohn the 14. agaynst whom (for holding with the Emperour) Petrus the head captaine of the Citie,* with two Consuls, xij. Alderine, and diuers other nobles, gathering their power together, layd hands vpon him, in the Church of Laterane,* and clapt the Pope in prison, 11. months. The Emperour hearing this, with all speede returned with his army agayne to Rome, who after execution done vpon the authors and chief doers of that fact, among other 〈...〉 foresayd Petrus, to the Popes arbitrement. Whom 〈◇〉 caused first to be stript naked, then his beard beyng shauen, to be hanged by the haire a whole day together, after that to be set vpon an Asse (his face turned backward, and his hands bound vnder the asses tail) and so to be led through the Citie, that all men might see him:* that done, to be scourged with rods, and so banished the Citie. Thus ye see, how the holy father followeth the iniunction of the Gospell: Diligite inimicos vestros, Loue your enemies, Luke. 6. &c. From this Pope proceded first the Christening of bells, an. 971.

After him followed Pope Benedictus the sixt,* who in like maner was apprehended by Cynthius a Captayne of Rome, & cast in prison, where he was strāgled, or as some say, famished to death.

Then came Pope Donus the ij. After whom Bonifacius the vij. was Pope: who likewise seeing the Citizens of Rome to conspire agaynst him, was constrained to hide himselfe, And seeing no place there for hym to tary, tooke the treasure of S. Peters Church,* and so priuily stole to Constantinople. In whose stead the Romaines s^t vp P. Iohn the xv. Not long after: Boniface returning agayne from Constantinople, by hys money & treasure procured a garrisō or company to take his part: By whose meanes the foresayd Pope Iohn was taken,* his eyes put out, and so throwne in prison, where he was as some say famished: some say he was slayne by Ferrucius. Neither did Boniface raigne many dayes after, but sodenly dyed: whose carkase after hys death was drawne by the feete through the streetes of Rome, after the most despitfull maner of the people shriking and exclayming against him.* an. 976.

Next pope after him was Benedictus the vii. by y^e con^sent of the Emperour Otho the 2. and raigned xix. yeares. In the tyme of this pope: Hugh Cappet the French king, tooke Charles (the right heyre to the crowne) by the treason of the Bishop of Laou, and when hee had imprisoned him,* he also committed to prison Arnoldus Archbishop of Raynes, and placed in hys rowme Gilbertus a monke of Florsake (a Nicromanser) who was schoolemaister to D. Robert the kinges sonne. But this pope Benedictus, calling a Councell at Remis, restored the sayd Arnoldus agayne: and displaced Gilbertus: which after by the help of Otho was made Archbishop of Reuenna, and at length was Pope, as in processe hereafter (Christ graunting) shalbe declared.

After Benedictus succeeded in the sea of Rome Pope Iohn the xvi. & dyed the viij. month of hys Papacy.* Next to whom came Iohn the xvii. And after him Gregory the .v. in the yeare of our Lord. 995. This Gregory (called before Bruno) was a Germane borne, and therefore y^e more malaced of the Clergy & people of Rome. Wherupō, Crescētus with the people and Clergy, conuenting agaynst y^e sayd Gregory: set vp Pope Iohn the xvij. Gregory vpon Page 160 the same,* sped himselfe in all conuenient hast to the Emperour, Otho the iij. in Germany. Who hearing the complaint of Gregory, and vnderstanding his wrongs, set forward with his army well appointed, to Italy: gate the Citie, & there tooke both Crescentius the Consull, and Iohn the Pope.* Which Iohn first hauing his eyes put out, was depriued after of his life. Crescentius the Consul was set vpon a vile horse, hauing his nose and eares cut off, and so was led through the Citie, his face beyng turned to the horsetayle, & afterward hauyng his members cut off, was hanged vpon a gibbet.

Pope Gregory thus being restored to his former state,* raigned iiij. yeares in his Papacie (although Marianus Scotus and Martinus say, that he sate but ij. yeares) &c. During the which time he assembled a councell in Rome: where, he to stablish the Empire in his owne country (by the consent and counsaile of Otho) ordeined vij. Princes of Germany,* to be electors of the Emperour: which order, yet to this day remaineth. What be the names of these vij. electors, and what is their office, thus I finde in these verses expressed.

Maguntinensis, Treuerensis, Coloniensis.

*Quilibet Imperij fit cancellarius horum.

Et Palatinus Dapifer, Dux portitor ensis.

Marchio praepositus camerae, Pincerna Bohemus.

These vij. he ordeined to be electors, 3. bishops, 3. princes (to wit) the Palatine, the duke of Saxonie, the Marques Brandenburg. To whom was added also the king of Boheme to geue the odde voice, if the euen voices could not agree. This constitution being first begon, an 997. was after established in Germany by Otho the Emperour, the yeare of the Lord, 1002. And thus much by the way, or rather digression, concerning the rages and tumultes of the Romish church. Now to our matter agayne.

King Egelred, or Elred.

King Edward thus being murdered as is aforesayd, the crowne fell next to Egelrede his yonger brother,* & sonne to king Edgar by the foresayd Queene Alfrith, as we haue declared. This Egelred had a long raigne geuen of God,* which dured the terme of 38. yeares, but very vnfortunate, and full of great miseries. And he himself (by the histories) seemeth to be a Prince, not of the greatest courage to gouerne a common wealth. Our English stories writing of him, thus report of his raigne: That in the beginning, it was vngracious, wretched in the middle, and hatefull in the latter end. Of this Egelred it is read, when Dunstane the Archbishop should christen him,* as hee dyd hold him ouer the Fonte, something there happened, that pleased not Dunstan: whereupon he sware, per sanctā Mariam, iste ignauus homo erit. i. By the mother of Christ he wil be a Prince vntoward and cowardlike, Chron. de Croulād. I finde in William of Malmesbury, Lib. 2. de Regi. That this Egelred beyng of the age of x. yeares, when he heard hys brother Edward to be slayne, made suche sorow & weping for him, that his mother falling therewith in a rage, tooke waxe candles (hauing nothing els at hand) wherwith she scourged him so sore (well neare till he swounded) that after the same, he could neuer abide any waxe candles to burne before him. After this, about the yeare of our Lord, 981.* (the day of his coronation beyng appoynted by the Queene, the mother, and the nobles) Dunstan the Archb. of Cant. (who first refused so to doe) with Oswald Archb. of Yorke,* were enforced to crowne the king. And so they did at Ringstō. In doing wherof, the report of stories go, that the said Dunstane should say, thus prophesieng vnto the king: that for so much as he came to the kingdome by the death of his brother,* and through the conspiracie of the wicked conspirators and other Englishmen: they should not be without bloudshedding and sword, till there came a people of an vnknown tongue, and should bring them into thraldome, neither should that trespasse be clensed with out long vengeance, &c.

In the Chronicles of Crouland, I finde these wordes, Quoniam ascendisti ad thronum tuum, per mortem fratris tui, quem occidit mater tua, propterea audi verbum Domini, hoc dicit Dominus. Nō deficiet gladius de domo tua, saeuens in te omnibus diebus vitae tuae, & interficiens de semine tuo, & de gente tua, vsque dum regnum tuum transferatur in regnum alienum: Cuius ritum & linguam gens tua non nouit, nec expiabitur, nisi longa vindicta, & multa sāguinis effusione peccatum matris tuae, & peccatum virorum pessimorum, qui consenserunt consilio eius nequam, vt mitterent manum in Christum Domini, ad effundendum sanguinem innocentem. Chron. de Crouland.

Not long after the coronation of this king, a cloud was seene throughout the land, which appeared the one halfe like bloud, and the other halfe like fire. And changed after into sondry colours and vanished at the last in the morning.* Shortly after the appearaunce of this cloud, in the iij. yeare of his raigne, the Danes arriuing in sondry places of the land, first spoyled Southhampton, either slaying the inhabitants, or leading them captiue away. Frō thence they went to the Ile of Thanet, then they inuaded Chester, from thence they proceeded to Cornwall and Deuonshire,* & so to Sussex: where, in those coastes they did much harme, and so retired to their ships agayne. Roger Houeden writing hereof, sayth: that London, the same tyme (or as Fabian sayth) a great part of London, was consumed with fire. About this tyme fell a variance betwene the foresayd Egelred, and the bishop of Rochester: In so much, that he made warre against him, and besieged the Citie. And notwithstanding that Dunstan required the king, sending him admonishment to geue ouer, for the sake of S. Andrew, yet continued he his siege, till the bishop offred him an hūdreth pounds of gold, which he receaued, and so departed. The Danes seing the discord that then was in the realme, and specially the hatred of the subiectes against the kyng: rose againe, and did great harme in diuers places of England: In so much, that the king was glad to graunt them great summes of mony for peace to be had.* For the assurāce of which peace, Analeffe capitaine of the Danes, became a christen man, and so returned home to his countrey, & did no more harme.* Besides these miseries before recited, a sore sicknes of the bloody flixe, and hote feuers fell among the people, wherof many died, with a like moraine also among the beastes. Moreouer, for lacke of iustice, many thieues, rioters and bribers were in the land, with much miserie and mischief.

About the xi. yeare (some say the ix. yeare) of this kings raigne, died Dunstan. After whom succeded Ethelgarus, or as Iornalensis writeth, Stilgarus. After him Elfricus, as affirmeth Guliel. lib. 1. de pontif. But as Polydorus sayth, Siricius. After him Elfricus came, but Siritius after the mynd of William, Lib. 1. But Polydorus sayth Aluritus, thē Elphegus, &c.

About the same tyme in the yeare of our Lord,* 995. Aldunus Bishop, translated the body of S. Cuthbert from Chester (which first was in a Northren Iland thē at Rochester) to Durelme or Dunoline.* Wherupon the bishops sea of Duresme first began.

Not long after the death of Dunstane, the Danes agayne entred England, in many and sondry places of the land: In such sorte, that the kyng was to seeke, to which coast he should go first to withstand his enemies. And in conclusion, for the auoyding of more harme, he was compelled to appease them with great summes of mony. But when that money was spent, they fell to new robbing of the people, and assailing the land in diuers places, not only about the countrey of Northumberland, but also besieged the Citie of London at the last. But being frō thence repulsed by the manhood of the Londoners,* they strayd to other countreys adioyning, as to Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, burnyng and killing where so euer they wēt, so that for lacke of a good head or gouernour, many things in the land perished. For the king gaue himselfe to the vice of lecherie,* and polling of his subiects, and disinherited mē of their possessions, and caused them to redeeme the same agayne with great summes of money, for he payed great tribute to the Danes yerely,* which was called Danegelt. Which tribute so increased, that from the first tribute of x.M. poūd, it was brought at last in processe of v. or vj. yere, to xl.M. pound. The which yearly (during to the comming of S. Edward, and after) was leuied of the subiects of this land.

To this sorow moreouer, was ioyned hunger & penury among the commōs: in so much that euery one of thē was constrained to plucke & steale from other. So that, what for the pillage of the Danes,* and what by inward thieues and bribers, this land was brought into great affliction. Albeit, the greatest cause of this affliction (as to me appeareth) is not so much to bee imputed to the kyng, as to the dissention among the Lordes themselues, who thē did not agree one with another. But when they assembled in consultation together,* eyther they did draw diuers ways, or if any thing were agreed, vpon any matter of peace betwene the parties, soone it was broken againe: or els if any good thing were deuised for the preiudice of y^e enemy, anone the Danes were warned therof by some of the same counsaile. Of whom, the chiefe doers were Edrike Duke of Mercia, and Alfrike the Admirall or captain of the ships, who betrayed the kings nauy to the Danes. Wherefore the kyng apprehending Alfagarus sonne of the said Alfrike, put out Page 161 his eyes, and so did he after to the two sonnes of Duke Edrike in like maner.

*The Danes thus preuayling more and more ouer the english men, grew in such pride & presumption: that when they by strength, caused the husbandmen to care and sowe the land, and to do all other vile labour belongyng to the house, they would sitte at home, holding the wife at theyr pleasure, with daughter and seruauant. And when the husband man came home, he should scantly haue of his own, as his seruants had, so that the Dane had all at his will & till, taring of the best, when the owner scantly had his fill of the worst. Thus the common people beyng of them oppressed, were in such feare and dread, that not onely they were constrained to suffer them in their doings, but also glad to please them, & called euery one of them in the house where they had rule, Lord Dane. Which worde after (in processe of tyme, * when the Danes were voyded) was for despite of the Danes turned of the english men to a name of opprobry, that when one English man would rebuke an other, he would for the more part call him Lurdaine.*

And thus hitherto (through the assistaunce of Christ) we haue brought this history to the yere of our lord, * 1000. During now & continuing these great miseries vpon this English natiō, the land being brought into great ruine by the grieuous tribute of the Danes, and also by sustaynyng the manifold villar•ies and iniuries, * as wel by them as by other oppressions within the realm. This yere which was the yeare of our sauour 1000. This Egelred through the counsail of certain his familiars about him, * in the 21. yeare of his raigne, began a matter which was occasion eyther geuen by the one, or taken by the other, of a new plague to ensue vpon the Saxōs, who had driuen out the Britaines before. That was in ioynyng with the Normans in mariage. For the king this yere abouesaid, for the more strēth (as he thought) both of him and the realm, married Emma the daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. Which Richard was the third Duke of the Normains, and the first of that name. By reason of which mariage, king Egelred was not a little enhaunsed in his owne mynd: and by prosumption thereof, sent secret & straight commissions to the rulers of euery towne in England, that vpon S. Brices day at a certayne houre appointed, the Danes should bee sodenly slayne. And so it was performed, which turned after to more trouble.

After that tidings came into Denmarke of the murder of those Danes. Anone after, Suanus king of Denmarke with a great host and nauy, landed in Cornewall: where, by treason of a Normand named Hugh, which by fauour of Queene Emma, was made Erle of Deuonshire: The sayd Suanus tooke Exceter, & after beat downe the wals. From thence proceding further into the land, they came to Wilton and Shireborne, where they cruelly spoyled the countrey and slew the people. But anone Suanus hearing that the king was comming to him with the power of his land, tooke his ships & set about to Norfolke: where, after much wasting of that countrey, and spoyling the citie of Norwich, * and burning the towne of Thetford, and destroying the countrey thereabout, at length Duke Uskatel met him and beat him, & slew many of the Danes. Wherefore, Swanus for that yeare returned to Denmarke, and there made great prouision, to reenter the land againe the next yeare following. And so did, landing at Sandwich about the 25. yere of the raign of king Egelred, * & there spoiled that countrey. And as soone as he heard of any hoste of englishmen comming toward him, then he tooke shipping againe. So that when the kings army sought to meet him in one coast, then would he sodainly land in an other. And when the king prouided to meete with them vpon the sea, either they would fain to flee, or els they would with gifts blynd the Admirall of the kings nauy. * And thus wearied they the englishmen, & in conclusion brought them in extreme and vnspeakable misery. In so much that the King was fayne to take peace with them, & gaue to king Suanus 30000. pound. After which peace thus made, Suanus returned agayne to Denmarke.

But this peace continued not long. For the yeare next following, king Egelred made Edricus aboue mētioned, Duke of Mercia, which was subtile of witte, glosing and eloquent of speach, vntrusty, and false to the king and the Realme. And soone after one Turkillus (a Prince of the Danes) landed in Kent with much people, and there dyd such harme, that the Kentishmē were faine to make peace with great gifts, and so thence departed. But this persecution of the Danes (in one country or other in England) neuer ceased, nor the king did euer geue to them any notable battaile. For when he was disposed to geue them battail, this Edricus would euer counsaile him to the contrary, so that the Danes euer spoyled and robbed, and waxed rich,* and the english men euer poore and bare.

After this Suanus beyng in Denmarke, and hearing of the increase of hys people in England, brake hys couenaunts before made, and with a great army and nauie in most defensable wyse appoynted, landed in Northumberland proclaimyng himselfe to be king of this land. Where, after much vexation, when he had subdued the people, and caused the Erle with the rulers of the countrey to sweare to him feaultie:* he passed by the riuer of Trent to Ganisburgh, and to Northwatlyng streete, and subduyng the people there, forced them to geue hym pledges: whiche pledges he committed with his nauy vnto Canutus hys sonne to keepe, whyle he went further into the lande. And so with a great hoste came to Mercia, killing and slaying. Then he tooke by strength Winchester, and Oxford, & dyd there what him liked.* That done, he came toward London, and hearing the king was there, passed by the Riuer Thamys, and came into Kent and there besieged Canterbury, where he was resisted the space of 20. dayes. At lēgh by treason of a Deacon called Almaricus (whom the Bishop had preserued from death before) wanne it,* and tooke the goods of the people and fired the Citie, and tythed the Monkes of S. Augustines Abbey (that is to meane, they slew ix. by cruell torment, and the tenth they kept aliue as for their slaues.) So they slew there of religious men, to the number of 900. persons: of other men, women, & childrē, they slew aboue 8000. And finally, whē they had kept y^e Bishop Elphegus in straight prison the space of 7. monethes, & because he would not cōdescend to geue vnto thē 3000. pound: After many villanies vnto hym done, they brought him to Greenewich, & there stoned him to death.

Kyng Egelred in the meane tyme, fearing the ende of this persecution, sent his wyfe Emma with his ij. sonnes Alphred and Edward, to the Duke of Normandy, with whom also he sent the bishop of Londō. The Danes proceeded still in their fury and rage: and when they had won a great part of Westsaxonie, they returned againe to London. Whereof hearing the Londiners, sent vnto them certayne great giftes and pledges. At last the king about the 35. yeare of his raigne,* was chased vnto the Ile of Wight, & with a secret company, he spent there a great part of the Winter.* And finally, without cattaile or comfort sailed into Normandy to his wyfe. Swanus beyng ascertayned thereof, (inflamed with pride) reared exceeding impositions vpon the people. And amōg other he required a great summe of mony of S. Edmunds lands, which the people there clanning to bee free from kings tributes, denied to pay.* For this Suanus entred the territory of S. Edmūd, and wasted, and spoyled the countrey, despising the holy Martyr, & manacing also the place of his sepulture. Wherefore the men of that countrey fearing his tyranny, fell to prayer and fasting, so that shortly after Suanus dyed sodenly, crying and yelling among his knightes.* Some say that he was stricken with the sword of S. Edmund, wherof he dyed the 3. day after.

In feare whereof, Canutus his sonne which ruled as king after his father, graunted them the freedome of all their liberty,* and moreouer ditched the land of the sayde Martyr with a deepe ditche, and graunted to the inhabitaunts thereof, great freedoms, quityng them from all talke or tribute. And after builded a Church ouer the place of his sepulture, and ordained there an house of Monkes, and endued them with rich possessions. And after y^e tyme it was vsed, that kings of England when they were crowned, sent their crownes for an offering to Saint Edmuds shrine, and redeemed the same agayne afterwarde with a condigne price.

When king Egelred heard of the death of Suanus,* he made prouision & returned into england. Of whose sodain comming Canutus being vnprouided fled to Sandwich, And there cutting of the noses and handes of the pledges, which his father left with him, sayled into Denmarke: who the next yere returned againe with a great nauy, and landed in the South country. Wherefore the eldest sonne of king Egelrede called Edmond Ironside: made prouision with the ayd of Edrike Duke of Mercia to meet him. But Edrike fayning himselfe sicke came not,* but deceiued him. For as it was after proued, Edrike had promised his allegiance to Canutus. By reason wherof. Canutus entred y^e country of Westsaxon, & forced the people to be sworn vnto him, and to geue him pledges. In this season, king Egelred being at london, was taken with great sickenes, & there dyed: and was buried in the Northside of Paules church behind the quire, after he had raigned vnprosperou|sly 36. yeares: leauing after him his sayd eldest sonne Edmond Ironside, and Alphred, and Edward which were in Page 162 Normandy, sent thither before as is aboue rehersed. This Egelred although he was miserably impugned and vexed of his enemies, yet he with his counsail gaue forth wholsome lawes. Whereof this is one parcell conteinyng good rules and lessons, for all Iudges and Iustices to learne and follow.

OMnis iudex iustus misericordiam & iudicium liberet in omnibus, vt inprimis per rectam scientiam, dicat emendationē secundum culpam, & eam tamen admensuret propter indulgentiam. Quaedam culpa reputantur à bonis iudicibus, secundū rectum emendandae Quaedam per Dei misericordiam condonādae. Iudicia debent esse sine omni haderunga, quod non parcat diuiti alicui, vel egeno, amico, vel-inimico ius publicum recitari. Nihil autem iniustius est, quàm susceptio munerū pro iudicio subuertendo: Quia munera excaecant corda sapientum, & subuertunt verba iustorum, Dominus Iesus dixit: In quo iudicio iudicaueritis iudicabimini. Timeat omnis iudex ac diligat Deum iudicem suum, ne in die iudioij mutus fiat, & humiliatus ante oculos iudicis cuncta videntis. Qui innocentem opprimit, & dimittit noxium pro pecunia, vel amicitia, vel odio, vel quacun{que} factione, opprimetur ab omnipotente iudice. Et nullus Dominus, nulla potestas, stultos aut improbos iudices constituāt, quia stultus per ignauiam,* improbus per cupiditatem vitat, quam didicit veritatem. Grauius enim lacerātur pauperes à prauis iudicibus, quàm à cruentis hostibus. Nullus hostis acerbior, nulla pestis efficacior quàm familiaris inimicus. Potest aliquoties homo fuga, vel defensione vitare prauos inimicos. Non ita possunt iudices, quoties aduersus subditos malis desiderijs inflammantur. Saepe etiam boni iudices habent malos vicarios & ministros nephādos: quorum reatibus ipsi domini constringuntur, si non •os coerceant, & à rapacitate cohibeant.* Quia dominus & minister seculorum ait: Non solū malè agentes, sed omnes consentientes digni sunt aeterna morte. Saepe etiam prauis iudices iudicium pe•uertunt, vel respectant & non finiunt causam, donec voluntas eorum impleatur. Et quando iudicant, non opera, sed munera considerant. Impij iudices, iuxta verbum sapientum, sicut rapaces lupi vespere nil residuant vsque mane,* id est, de praesenti solum vita cogitant, de futura nihil considerant. Malorum praepositorum mos est, vt quicquid possunt, auferant: & vix necessarium parum quid relinquunt sustentationi. Iracundus iudex non potest attendere rectam iudicij satisfactionem. Nam per furoris excoecationem, non perspicit rectitudinis claritatem. Iustum iudicium, vbi non persona consideratur. Scriptum est: Non attendas personam hominis in iudicio, nec pro aliquo facies, vt à vero declines, & iniustè iudices. Susceptio muneris est dimissio veritatis. Ex historia bibliothecae Iornal.

*Of this king Egelred I find noted in the booke of Rog. Houed. that he deposed and depriued from all possessions, a certayne Iudge or Iusticer named Walgeatus, the sonne of one Leonet, for false iudgemēt and other proud doings, whom notwithstanding he loued aboue all other.

Edmund Ironside a Saxon, and Canutus a Dane, Kings together in England.

After the death of Egelred, variaunce fell betwene the Englishmen for the election of their king. For the citizens of London with certayne other Lordes: named Edwyne the eldest sonne of Egelred (a yong man of lusty and valiant courage) in martial aduētures, both hardy & wise, and could very well endure all paynes. Wherefore he was surnamed Irenside. But the more of the Lordes, fauoured Canutus the sonne of Swanus: especially the Abbots Bishoppes,* and men of the spiritualtye which before had sworne to his father. By meanes whereof, betwene these two martial princes were fought many great battels, first in Dorsetshyre, where Canutus was compelled to flie the field.* And after that they fought an other battayle in Worcetershire, so sore, that none could tell, who had the better: but either for wearines or for lacke of day, they departed one from the other, and on the next morow fought againe: but then Canutus was compelled to forsake the field. After this they met in Mercia, & there fought agayne, where Edmond (as storyes say) by the treason of that false Edrick Duke of Mercia (whom he before had receiued to sauour) had the worse. Thus many great conflicts there were betwene these 2. princes. But vpon a season, when the hosts were redy to ioyne, and a certayne time of truce taken before battayle: a knight of the party of Edmond stode vp vpon a high place, and sayd these wordes.

Daylye we dye, and none hath the uictorye: And when the knightes be dead on either part,* then the Dukes compelled by need shall accord: or els they must fight alone. And this kingdome is now sufficient for 2. men, whiche some time sufficed. 7. But if the couetousnesse of Lordship in these twayne be so great, that neither can be content to take part and liue by the other, nor the one vnder the other then let them fight alone, that will be Lordes alone. If all men fight still: at the last all men shall be slayne, and none left to be vnder their Lordship, nor able to defend the king that shall be, agaynst straunge enemies and natiōs.

These wordes were so well allowed of both the hostes and Princes:* that both were content to try the quarrel betwene thē two onely. Then the place & time was appointed where they •oth met, in sight of both hoastes. And whē either had assayd other with sharpe swordes and strokes: first by the motion of Canutus (as some write) hastelye they were both agreed, and kissed each other to the comfort of both hostes. And shortly after they agreed vpon particion of y^e land: & after that, during theyr lines they loued as brethren.* Soone after, a Sonne of wicked Edricus, by the minde

(as appeared afterward) of his father: espied, when king Edmond was at the draught: & with a speare (some say with a long knife) thrust him into the fundamēt, wherof the sayd Edmond shortlye after dyed, after that he had raigned two yeres. He left behinde him two sonnes, Edmond and Edward, whom Edricke the wicked Duke, after the death of their father, tooke from theyr mother (not knowing yet of the death of Edmond her husband) & presēted them to king Canutus,* saluting him in these words: Aue Rex solus. Thus Canutus after the death of Edmond Irenside, was king alone of the whole realme of englād. And afterward by the aduise of his counsaile, he sent the foresayd sonnes of Edmond Irōside, to his brother Suanus king of Sueueland to be slayne: who abhorring that deed, sent them to Salomon king of Hūgary, where Edmond being married to the kings daughter dyed. Edward was married to Agatha daughter of his brother Henry the 4. Emperour.

When Canutus was stablished in the kingdom, he called a parliament at London,* where (among other things there debated) it was propounded to the bishops, Barōs, and Lordes of the parliament there present, whether that in the compositiō made betwene Edmund and Canutus, any speciall remembraunce was made for the children, or brethren of Edmund, for any partition of any part of the land. Wherunto the english Lordes falsly •latteryng with the foraine kyng, and speaking against their own myndes, as also against their natiue countrey, aunswered and sayd nay. Affirming moreouer with an oth (for the kings pleasure) that they to y^e vttermost of their powers, would put of the blood of Edmund, in all that they might. By reason of which answer and promise, they thought (many of thē) to haue purchased with the king great fauour.* But by the iust retribution of God, it chaunced farre otherwise. For many of them, or the most part (such especially as Canutus did perceiue to be sworne before tyme to Edmund, & his heyres: and also considering that they were natiue englishmen) he mistrusted and disdained euer after. In so much, that some he exiled, a great sort he beheaded, & some by Gods punishment died sodainly. Among whom wicked Edricke also the traytour (although with hys sugred wordes he continued a while in the kings fauour) at lēgth escaped not condigne reward for his deceiuable dealyng. For (as the history of Iornalēsis recordeth) as the king was in his palace beyond Thames, this Edricke (beyng belike accused, or els suspected of the king before) comming vnto him, began to reckon vp his benefites & labours bestowed for his sake. First, in forsaking and betraying Egelred, then in slaying king Edmund his sonne, with many such other deedes moe,* which all for his sake he had done. Well saith the king, thou hast here rightly iudged thy selfe, and worthily thou shalt dye, for slaying thy naturall Prince, & my sworne brother. And so commaunded him to be bound immediately hand and foote, & to be thrown into Thames. Some stories say, that when he had saluted the king with Aue rex solus, and shewed him the slaying of Edmund, Canutus (promising that he would make him therefore higher then all the lordes of the realme) commaunded his head to be stricken off, & to be set vpon London bridge, and hys body to be cast in the towne ditche.* And thus with shame ended he his wretched life, as al they commonly do, which with like dissimulatiō seeke the destruction of their Prince and of their countrey.*

This Canutus (shortlye after the death of king Edmond, by the counsaile of Edricke) exiled Edmond, being brother to King Edmund, called Rex rusticorum: the king of Choor•es. But afterward, he was reconciled agayne to the kings fauour: and lastly slayne by certayne of the Kinges Secretaries or Seruauntes. Also, through the counsaile of the sayd Edricke, and of Emma his wife he sent the two Sonnes of Edmond Ironside (Edmond Page 163 and Edward) to his brother Suanus king of Denmark, to be slaine, as is aboue sayd.

In this meane time, Suanus king of Denmarke, brother to Canutus, died. Wherefore that land fel to Canutus: which anon after sailed thether, and tooke thereof possession. And after he had set it in an order, he retourned into England, and married Emma, late wife before of Egelred: and by her had a sōne called Herdeknight or Hardeknoutus. Moreouer this Canutus assembled a Parliament at Oxford: where it was agreed, that Englishmen & Danes should holde the lawes made by king Edgar, because they were thought so good & resonable aboue any other lawes.

Thus the Danes being in England, began by little & little to be Christen men. And Canutus went to Rome, & so returning againe to England, gouerned that lande the space of 20. yeares, leauing after him two sonnes, Harold & Hardeknoutus: which Hardeknoutus was made king of Denmarke in his fathers time.

Harold (called Harefoote, for his deliurnes and swiftnes) sonne to Canutus by Elgina his first wife: * began his raigne ouer England, an. 1039. Of him is little left in memory, for he reigned but 4. yeres, saue that he banished his stepmother Emma, & tooke her goods & iewels from her.

*Hardeknoutus, being king of Denmarke, and second sonne to Canutus by his last wife Emma, was next King of England. In the time of these Danish kings, there was one Godwyn an earle in England, * which had bene before in great fauour with Canutus, for his actes done in Denmarke against the Northwegians: and afterward maryed y^r sister (some say the daughter) of Canutus. This Godwyn was of a cruell and subtill wit, as he declared no lesse by the two sonnes of king Egelred: For when these two aforesaid (whose names were Alfride, and Edward) came from Normādie into England, to visit their mother Emma, and brought w^t them a great company of Normands: this Godwine (hauing a daughter called Godith, whome he thought to marry to Edward, & set him vp to be King, to bring his purpose about) vsed this practise: y^t is, to perswade king Hardeknoue, & the Lordes not to suffer those Normandes to be within the realme for ieoperdie, but rather to punish them for example. By which meanes he gat authoritie to order the matter himselfe: * wherefore he $\langle \diamond \rangle$ them on Guild downe, and there most wretchedly murdered, or rather Martyred the most number of the Normandes, and that innocently. For as Swanus before had tithed the Monkes of Canterburie: so he^e with the cruell cōpany of english soldiors, slew ix. of the saide Normands and saued the x. And yet passing the furie of Swanus (as not contented with that tiranny) he tithed againe the sayde tithe, and slew euery x. knight, and that by cruel tormēt, as winding their guts out of their bodies, as writeth Ranulphus. And among other, put out the eyes of the elder brother Alfridus, and sent him to an Abbey of Elie: where he being fed wyth breade and water, endured not long after. Of some writers it was recorded, that he was there slayne wyth the forenamed torment, and Edward was conueied by some other to his mother. Who fearing the treason of Godwine, sent him soone ouer the sea to Normady againe. This cruell facte of Godwine and his men against the innocent Normandes, whether it came of himselfe, or of the kings setting on: seemeth to me to be the cause, why the iustice of God, did shortly after reuenge the quarell of these Normands, in conquering & subduing the english nation by William Conqueror, and the Normandes which came with hym. For so iust and right it was, that as the Normandes comming with a naturall English Prince, were murdered of English men: so afterwarde the Englishe men shoulde be slaine and conquered by the Normandes, comming with a forraine King being none of their naturall country.

*Then it followeth in the storie that this king Canute or Hardeknout: when he had reigned ij. yeres (being mery at Lambeth) sodainly was striken dōmbe, & fell downe to the ground, and within 8. daies after died, without issue of his body. Who was the last that raigned in England of the blo•d of the Danes.

This foresaid Godwine, had by the daughter of Canutus his wife,* but one sonne which was drowned. Of hys seconde wife he receiued vj. sonnes, to wit, Suanus, Harold, Tostius, Wilmotus, Sirthe, or Surth, and Leofricus, with one daughter Galled Goditha, which after was married to king Edward the Confessor.

Concerning the story of this Alfred, I find it something otherwise reported in our english chronicles:* that it shuld be after the death of Hardeknout: forasmuch as the Earles & Barons after his death, assembled and made a councell, that neuer after, any of the Danes blood should be king of England, for the despite that they had done to english mē. For euermore before, if the English men and the Danes, had happened to mete vpō a bridge, the english men shuld not so hardy to mooue a foote,* but stande still, till the Dane were passed forth. And moreouer, if the English men had not bowed downe their heades to doe reuerence vnto the Danes, they should haue bene beaten and defiled. For the which despites and villanie, they were driuen out of the land after the death of Hardeknout, for they had no Lorde that might maintaine them. And after this maner auoided the Danes England, that they neuer came againe.

The Erles and Barons, by their common assent and counsaile: sent vnto Normandy for these two brethren, Alphred and Edward: intending to crowne Alphred the elder brother, & to make him king of England. And to thys the Earles and Barons made their othe: but the Earle Godwine of Westsaxe (falsly and traiterously) thought to slea these two brethren, assoone as they came into Englad, to that intēt to make Harold his sonne king: which sonne he had by his wife Hardeknoutes daughter that was a Dane. And so this Godwine went priuily to Southampton, to meete there with the two brethren at their landing. And thus it fell, that the messengers that went (saith mine author) into Normandie, found but onely Alphred the elder brother. For Edward his younger brother was gone to Hungarie, to speake wyth his cou•in the outlaw, which was Edward Ironsides sonne.

When Alfrede had heard these messengers and perceiued their tidings:* he thanked God, and in all hast sped him to England, arriuing at Southampton. There, Godwin the false traitor (hauing knowledge of his comming) welcommed & receaued him with much ioy: pretēding to lead him vnto London, where the Barons waited for to make him king. And so they together passed forth toward London. But when they came to Guild downe, the traitor cōmanded all his men to slea all that were in Alphredes cōpany, which came w^t him from Normandie. And after that to take Alphrede, & to lead him into the Isle of Ely, where they shuld put out both his eyes: and so they did. For they slew all the company that were there, to the number of xij. Gentlemen, which came w^t Alfrede from Normandie: and after that they tooke Alphrede, and in the Isle of Ely they executed their commissiō. That done, they opened his body, tooke out his bowels▪ set a stake into the ground▪ and fastened an end of his bowels therunto, & with needles of ••on they pricked his tēder body, therby causing him to go about the stake, till that all his bowels were drawen out. And so died this innocent Alphred or Alured, being the right heire of the crowne: through treason of wicked Godwyne. When the Lordes of Englande heard thereof, and how Alphred, that should haue ben their king, was put to death through the false traitor Godwyne, they were wonderous wroth: and sware betwene God and them, that he should die a worse death then did Edrith which betrayed his Lord Edmund Ironside: and wold immediatly haue put him to death, but that the Traitour fledde thence into Denmarke: and there helde him iiij. yeares and more, and lost all his landes in England.

An other Latin story I haue (bearing no name) which saith that this comming in of Alphred & the Normandes:^{*} was in the time of Harold Canutus sōne. And how Godwyne (after he pretended great amitie to them) sodenly in the night came vpon them at Gilford: And after he had tithed the Normandes: sent Alfrede to Harold at London, who sent him to the Isle of Ely, and caused his eyes to be put out.

And thus much of Canutus:^{} and of his sonnes, Harold and Hardecanutus. Besides these ij. sonnes Canutus had also a daughter named Gunilda: married to Henricus the Emperour. Of whome some write, that she being accused to the emperor of spousebrech,^{} and hauing no champion or Knight that woulde fight for her (after the maner of that coūtre) for trial of her cause: a certaine litle dwarf or boy, whom she brought with her out of England (stirred vp of God) fought in her cause against a mighty bigge Germain of a monstrous greatnesse: which sel•e dwarfe, cutting •y chaūce the sinews of his leg, after stroke him to the groūd, and so cut of his head, and saued the life of the Queene, if it be true that Gulielmus and Fabianus reporteth.

Of this Canutus it is storied,^{*} that he folowing muche the superstition of Achelnotus Archbishop of Cant. went on pilgrimage to Rome: and there founded an hospital for English pilgrimes. He gaue the Pope pretious gifts, and burdened the land with an yerely tribute called the Rome sho•e: he shrined the body of Berinus, & gaue great lands and ornaments to the Cathedrall Church of Winchester: he builded S. Benets in Northfolk, which was before an Page 164 Hermitage. Also S. Edmundes bury, which king Ethelstane before ordeined for a Colledge of Priests, he turned to an Abbey of monkes of S. Benets order.

^{}Henricus Archdeacon of Huntynghon, Lib. 6. maketh mention of thys Canutus, as doeth also Polidorus, Lib. 7. That he after his comming from Rome, walking vppon a tune by the porte of Southhampton. (But as Polydorus sayeth) and Fabian affirmeth the same, that it was by Thames side at London. When his flatterers comming about him,^{} began to exalt him vp with high wordes, calling him a king of all kings (most mighty) who had vnder his subiection both the people, the land, and also the sea. Canutus reuoluing this matter in his minde (whether for pride of his heart exalted, or whether to tr•e and refell their flattering words) cōmaunded his chaire of estate to be brought to the sea side, at what time it should begin to flowe. Polydore sayth, that no seate was brought, but sitting vpon his garments being folded together vnder him: there charged and commaunded the floudes arising & comming toward his feete,^{} that they shoulde not touch neither him, nor his clothes. But the water keeping his ordinary course, came nearer and nerer: First to his feete, and so growing higher began to wash him welfauoredly. Wherewith the king abashed & partly also afeard starte backe: and looking to his Lordes: Loe (sayth he) ye call me such a mighty king & yet can I not commaunde backe this litle water to stay at my worde,^{} but it is ready to drowne me. Wherefore all earthly kings may know, that all their powers be but vaine: and that none is worthy to haue the name of a king, but he alone: which hath all things subiect to the power & authoritie of his word: which is the Lord of heauen & earth: the creatour aboue of all thinges: * the father of our Christ and Lorde: who with him for euer is to be glorified: him let vs worship and extoll for our king for euer. After this (as histories witnes) he neuer suffred the crowne to come vpon his head, but went to Winchester (or as some say, to Canterbury, but both those may be true) for his going to Cāterbury, was to acknowledge y^t there was a Lorde much higher, & of more power then he himselve was, and therewithal to render vp his crowne for euer. With that, Egelnothes Archbyshop of Canterbury: informed him of the image of the Crucifix before mētioned, which dissolued the matter betweene married Priests and life of Monkes, and did many other myracles moe, being then at Winchester. Wherewith the King prouoked to go to Winchester to the roode, * there resigned vp hys regall Crowne, and made the roode king ouer all the land.

Here is also to be noted in this Canutus, that although (as is said) he cōdescended in the beginning of his raigne, vpon king Edgares lawes: yet after in proces of time, hee set forth peculiar lawes of his own. * Among which, diuers there be that concerne as well causes Ecclesiasticall, as also temporal. Whereby it may appeare, that the gouernmēt of spirituall matters not to depende then of the Bishop of Rome: but to appertaine to the lawfull authoritie of the temporall Prince, no lesse then of matters and causes temporall. As for example by these ordinaunces of the foresayd Canutus, * may be well considered as here folowe. Pecunia sepulturae iustum est vt aperta terra reddatur. Si aliquod corpus a sua parochia deferatur in aliam, pecunia sepulturae. &c. In English.

And heere an ende of the Danish kyngs. Nowe to the English kings againe, whose right line cōmeth in againe in Edward here following.

King Edward called the Confessor.

FOR so much as God of his mercye and prouidence, who is onely the maker of heires: * thought it so good, after the wofull captiuitie of this Englishe nation, to graunt now some respite of deliuerance, * in taking away the Danish kings without any issue left behind them: who reigning here in Englād, kept the english people in miserable subiection, * about the space of xxviij. yeaes, and that from their firste landing in the time of King Brightricus: wasting and vexing this land, the terme of cc. • v. yeres: Now their tyranny here comming to an ende, the next election & right of the crowne fell (as appertained) to Edward the yonger sonne of king Egelred and Emma, a meere Englishman: who had bene now long banished in Normandy, as is aboue declared. A man of gentle and soft spirite: more appliable to other mens coūsailles, then able to trust to his owne: of nature & condition so geuen from al warre and bloudshed: that being in his banishment, he wished rather so to continue all his life long in that priuate estate, then by warre or bloudshed to aspire to any kingdome. This Edward, after the death of Canutus the seconde, or Hardecanute, being sent for of the Lordes into Normādie to take possession of the Realme, although he something mistrusted the vnconstant and fickle heads of Englishmē (yet hauing sufficient pledges laid for him in Normandie) came ouer, with a few Normands accompanied: and not long after was crowned at Winchester. an. 1043. by Edsius then Archbishop of Cant. * And not long after that, he married Goditha, or Editha daughter of Earle Godwyne: whome he entreated after such sort, that he neither put her from his bed, nor yet delt with her fleshly. Whether it 〈◇〉 for hate of her kin (as most like it was) or for loue of chastitie, it remaineth vncertaine. * But most writers agree, y^t he continued his lyfe without offence with women: • or the which he is highly exalted among our story writers and called holy king Edward. After he had thus taken vpon him the gouernement of the realme, he guided the same w^t much wisdom and iustice, the space of 24. yeres, lacking two monethes: from whome issued (as out of a fountaine) much godlinesse, mercy, pitie, and liberalitie toward the poore: gentlenes and iustice toward all men: and in all honest life he gaue a vertuous example to his people. He discharged the Englishmen of the great tribute called Dane gelt, which before time was yerely leuied to the great impouering of the people. He subdued the Scottes and Welshmen, which in their borders began to rebell against him. In much peace he continued his reigne, hauing no forreine enemye to assault him: Albeit, as some Chronicles do shewe, * certaine Danes and Norgwaines there were, which entended to set vpon Englande: But as they were taking shipping, there was brought to them first one bowle, then an other, of meede or methe, to drinke vpon a bon viage. Thus one cup comming after an other: after drinke came dronkennes, after dronkennes followed iangling, of iangling came stryfe: and strife turned vnto stripes. whereby many were slayne, and the other returned to their home agayne. And thus the mercifull prouidence of the Lord dispatched that iourney.

In the time of this Edward: Emma his mother, was accused to be familiar with Alwyn the Byshop of Winchester: vpon which accusation (by counsaile of Earle Godwyn) he tooke from her many of her iewels, and caused her to be kept somedeale more straightly in y^e Abby of Warwel, and the Byshop committed to the examination of the clergy. Polydore sayth, they were both in prison, at Winchester: where she sorrowing the defame both of her selfe and of the Byshop, and trusting vpon her conscience, desireth them of iustice, offering her selfe ready to abide any lawfull triall: yea although it were with the sharpest.

Then diuers of the Byshops made labour to the king for thē both,* and had obtayned, had not Robert thē Archbishop of Cant. stopped the sute. Who not well contented with their labour sayd vnto them: My brethren how dare ye defend her which is no woman but a beast? she hath defamed her owne sonne the king, and taken her lecherous leman the Byshop. And if it be so, that the woman will purge the priest, who shall then purge the woman that is accused to be consenting to the death of her sonne Alphred: and procured venim to the poysonyng of her sonne Edward? But whether she be giltye or giltles: if she will goe barefooted for her self foure steps, and for the Bishop fiue, continually vpon ix. plough shares fire hote: then if she escape harmeles, he shalbe assoyled of this challenge and she also.

To this she graunted, the day was appointed at which day, the king and a great part of his nobles were present, except onely Robert the Archbishop. This Robert had Page 165 bene a monke of a house in Normandie,* & an helper of the king in his exile: and so by the sēding for of the king, came ouer and was made first Bishop of London, after Archbishop of Cant. Then was she led blindfield vnto the place betwene two men, where the yrons lay brenning hot; and passed the ix. shares vnhurt.* At last sayde shee, good Lorde when shal I come to the place of my purgation, whē they then opened her eyes, and shee sawe that shee was past the paine, she kneeled downe geuing God thanks.

Then the king repented (sayeth the story) and restored vnto her, that he had before taken from her, and asked her forgeuenes. But the Archbyshop fled into Normandie.

Neare about this time, about the x. yere of his raigne• fell passing great snow,* from the beginning of Ianuary, to the 17, day of Marche. After which insued a great mortalitie of men, morrian of cattel, & by lightning the corne was wonderfully blasted and wasted.

Not lōg after this: a certaine Earle of Bologne, who had married king Edwardes sister,* came into Englande: through the occasion of whom: when execution should be done vpon the citizens of Douer, for a fray betwene them, and the Earles men: variance happened betweene Kyng Edward and Earle Godwyne. Who perceauing that he could not wstand the kings malice, (although he gathered a great company to worke therein what he could) fled into Flanders,* & was outlawed with his 5. sonnes. King Edward repudiated his wife, the daughter of the sayde Godwine: but the second yere after, by mediators he was recōciled to the king againe, and called from banishment: And for his good a bearing, he gaue for pledges his two sōnes, Byornon, and Tostius, which were sent to the Duke of Normandy there to be kept.

During the time of the outlawry of Godwyn: William Bastard Duke of Normandy,* came with a goodly company into England to see king Edward, & was honorably receaued. To whom the king made great cheare, & at hys returne inriched him with great gifts and pleasures. And there (as some wryte) made promise to him, that if he died without issue, the said William should succeede him in the kingdome of England.

In this kinges raigne liued Marianus Scotus the story writer.* As concerning the end of erle Godwin, y^e cruell murderer of Alphred, and of the Normandes: although diuers histories diuersly do vary: Yet in this the most part do agree, that as he sate at the table with king Edward at Winsor, it happened one of the cupbearers one of erl Godwins sonnes to stumble and recouer again, so that he did shed none of the drinke: wherat Godwin laughed, & sayd, howe the one brother had sustained the other. With which wordes the King calling to minde his brothers death that was slaine by Godwine: beheld the erle (saying) so should my brother Alphred haue holpē me, had not Godwin ben. Godwine then fearing the kinges displeasure to be newly kindled, after many words in excusing himselfe, sayde: So mought I safely swallow this morsel of bread as I am giltles of the deede. But assoone as hee had receiued the bread, forthwith he was choked. Then the king commanded him to be drawne from the table, & so was cōueyed by Harolde his sonne to Winchester, and there buried.

About the 13. yere of this kings reigne, the sayde King Edward sent Aldred bishop of Worceter to the Emperour Henricus the 4. praying him, that he would send to y^e king of Hungary, that his cosin Edward sonne of Edmund Ironside, might come to England: for so much as he intended to make him King after him, which was called Edward outlawe. The which request was fulfilled, so that he came into Englande with his wife Agatha,* and with hys children, to witte, Edgar Adeling, Margarete, and Christina. But the yere after his returne into the realme, thys Edward deceased at London,* and was buryed at westminster: or as Iornalensis sayeth, at Paules church in London. After whose decease, the King then receaued Edgar Adeling his sonne, as his owne childe: thinking to make him his heire. But fearing partly the vnconstant mutabilitie of the Englishmen, partly the pride and malice of Harold the sonne of Godwine, & of other (perceauing therby, that he could not bring that his purpose so wel to passe) directed solemne Embassadors vnto Williā Duke of Normandy,* his kinsman: admitting & assigning him to be hys lawfull heire, next to succede after him to the crowne.

After the death of Godwin, Harolde his sonne waxed so in the kings fauour: that he ruled the moste and greatest causes of the realme, and was liefetenant of the kings army: Who with his brother Toston or Tostius (sent by the king against the Welchmen) subdued their rebellion. But afterward, such enuie grewe betwene these ij. brethren, for that Tostius saw his brother Harold so greatly aduanced in the kings fauour,* that at Herford, the said Tostius slew all his brothers men. Whom when he had cut in pieces, he poudered their quarters and mangled parts, in barrels of salt, vinegre, wine, and other liquors. That done, he made a power against his brother Harold (being king) with the aide of certaine Danes and Norgaines, and fought a battail with him in the North, as after shal follow (God willing) to be seene.* So vngratious were these wicked children of Erle Godwin: that if they had sene any faire mansion or maner place, they woulde slay the owner thereof, withall his kinrede, and enter the possession thereof themselues.

At length it came in the minde of this Harolde to saile ouer the sea (as Polydore sayth) into Normandie to see hys brother Wilnotus,* as also his cosin Hacus, whom y^e king had sent thither to be kept for pledges, as yee heard before. Polydore sayth these pledges were Tosto & Byornon, but that can not be, for Tostius was then in England. But as Henricus Archdeacon of Huntington sayeth, his iourney was into Flāders, as semeth more like. For it is not to be thought, that Harold who was a doer in y^e cruell murther of Alphred, and of the Normanes: wold venter into Normandy, & therefore more like it is,* that his sailing was into Flaunders. But as the storie proceedeth, he being in the course of his sailing, was weather driuen by tempest into the prouince of Pountith, where he was taken as a prisoner, and sent to Duke William of Normandy. To whome he was made to sweare, that he in time following shoulde marry his daughter: and that after the death of King Edward, he should kepe the land of Englande to his behoue, according to the will & minde of Edward (after some writers) and so to liue in great honor & dignity next vnto him in the realme.* This promise faithfully made to the Duke, Harold returneth into Englād (with his cosin Hacus the sonne of his brother Suanus being deliuered vnto him.) But Wilnotus brother of Harold, the duke kepeth stil for performance of the couenāts. Thus Herold I say, returning home, sheweth y^e king al that he had done in the foresayde matters. Wherewith the King was well contented. Wherby it may be gathered, that king Edward was right wel willing, that Duke William should reigne after hym, and also semeth not vnlike, but that he had geuen him his promise therunto before.*

Among all that were true and trusty to king Edward of the english nobility, none had like commendatiō as had Leofricus erle of Mercia and of Chester. This Leofricus purchased many great liberties for the towne of Couētry, and made it free of all maner things, except onely of horse. Which fredom there was obtained by meanes of his wife Godina, by riding (as the fame goeth) after a strāge maner through the towne. This Leofricus with his wife Godina, builded also the abbey of Couentrie, & indued the same with great lands and riches.*

You hearde a little before, of the comming ouer of Edward called the outlaw, sonne of king Edmund Ironsid: whom king Edward had purposed to haue made king after him. But soone after his comming ouer, he deceased at London. This Edward had by his wife Agatha, a sonne & a daughter called Edgar Adelyng, & Margaret. Which Margaret being married afterward to the king of Scots, was the mother of Matild or Maude Quene of England and of Dauid king of Scots. &c.

This vertuous & blessed king Edward, after he had reigned 23. yeres, and 7. moneths, died and was buried in the monastery of Westminster,* which he had greatly augmented & repaired, but afterward was more enlarged after this form which it hath now, by Henry the third, sōne of king Iohn.

They that write the historie of this King, heere make mention of a dreame or reuelation that shoulde be shewed to him in time of his sicknes: how, that because the peeres & bishops of the realme were seruantes not of God, but of the deuil: God wold geue this realm to the hād of others. And the king desired vtteraunce to be geuen him, that hee might declare the same to the people, whereby they might repent. It was answered againe, that neither would they so do, or yet if they did, it should be geuen to an other people. But because it is a dreame, I let it passe.

Diuers lawes were before in diuers countreis of this realme vsed, as the lawe first of Dunuallo Molinucius, w^t the lawes of Mercia called Mercenelega: then the lawes of Westsaxone kinges, as of Iue, Offa, Alfred, &c. whyche was called Westsaxenelaga. The thirde were the lawes of Canutus & of Danes called Danelaga. Of all these lawes which before were diuersly in certain particuler countreis vsed and receiued: this Edward compiled one vniuersal & commō law for al people through the whole realm, which Page 166 were called R. Edwardes lawes: which lawes being gathered out of the best and chieftest of the other lawes, were so iust, so equall, an so seruing the publike profite & weale of all es•ates: that mine authors say: the people long after did rebell against their heads and rulers, to haue the same lawes againe (being taken from them) and yet coulde not obtaine them.

*Furthermore, I read and find in Math. Paris. that when Will. Conquerour at his comming in, did sweare to vse & practise the same good lawes of Edward, for the common lawes of this realme: afterward (being established in his kingdome) he forswore himselfe, & placed his owne lawes in their rowme, much worse and obscurer then the other were. &c.

Notwithstanding among the said lawes of Edward, and in the first chapter and beginning therof, this I finde among the auncient recordes of the Guildhal in London. The office of a King, with such other appurtenaunces as belong to the realme of Britaine: set forth and described in the latine stile, which I thought here not vnmete to be expressed in the English tong, for them that vnderstande no Latine. The tenor and meaning wherof thus followeth.

De iure & appendijs regni Britannia, & quod sit officium Regis.

REx autem quia vicarius summi Regis est, ad hoc est constitutus, vt regnum terrenum & populum domini, & super omnia sanctam eius veneretur ecclesiam & regat, & ab iniuriis defendat, & maleficos ab ea auellat & destruat, & penitus disperdat. Quod nisi fecerit, nomen regis non in eo constabit. Verum, Papa Ioanne testante, nomen regis perdit, cui Pipinus & Carolus filius eius nec dum reges, sed principes sub rege Francorum stultò scripserunt quaerentes: si ita permanere deberent Francorum reges, solo regio nomine contenti. A quo responsum est, illos decet vocare reges, qui vigilanter defendunt, & regunt Ecclesiam Dei & populum eius, &c.

In English thus.

*The king because he is the vicar of the hiest king, is appointed for this purpose: to rule the earthly kingdom, and the lords people, and aboue al things, to reuerence his holy church: to gouerne it, and to defende it from iniuries: to plucke away wicked doers, and vtterly to destroye them. Which vnlesse he doe, the name of a king agreeth not vnto him, but he loseth the name of a King, as witnesseth Pope Iohn: to the which Pope, Pipinus & Carolus his sonne (being not yet kings but princes vnder the French King being not very wise) did write, demanding this question, whither the kings of France ought so to continue hauing but onely the name of a king. *Unto whome Pope Iohn answereth againe, that it was conuenient to cal thē kings which vigilā^{ly} do defend and gouerne the church of God and his people, following the saying of King Dauid the Psalmograph. He shal not dwel in my house which worketh pride. &c. Moreouer, the king by right & by his office, ought to defend & conserue fully & wholly in all amplenesse w^tout diminution, all the lands, honors, dignities, rights, and liberties of the crowne of his kingdome. And further to reduce into their pristine state, all suche thinges as haue bene dispersed, wasted and lost, which appertaine to hys kingdome. Also the whole and vniuersall lande wyth all Ilelands about the same vnto Norway and Denmarke, be appertaining to the crowne of his kingdome, and be of the appurtenances and dignitie of the King: making one monarchie and one kingdome, *which somtime was called the kingdom of Britains, and now the kingdom of England: such bonds and limites as is abouesaid, be appointed and limited to the name of this kingdome.

Moreouer, in the foresaid lawes of this king Edward, it followeth in the same booke where the foresaid Edward describing the office of a King, addeth in these wordes. A king sayth he, ought aboue al things to feare God: to loue and to obserue his commaundements: and cause them to be obserued through his whole kingdome. He ought also to kepe, chearish, maintaine, & gouerne the holy church w^tin his kingdome, with al integritie and liberty, according to the constitutions of his auncetors and predecessors: and to defend the same against all enemies, so that God aboue all things be honored, & euer be before his eies. He ought also to set vp good lawes and customes, such as be wholesome and approued: such as be otherwise, to repeale them, and thrust them out of his kingdom. Item, he ought to do iudgement and iustice in his kingdome, by the counsell of the nobles of his realme. All these things ought a King in his own person to do, taking his othe vpon y^e Euangelist, and the blessed reliques of saintes, swearing in the presence of the whole state of his realme (as well of the temporaltie as of the spiritualitytie) before he be crowned of the Archbishops & Bishops. Three seruants the king ought to haue vnder him as vassals: fleshly lust, auarice, and greedie desire. Whom if he kepe vnder as his seruants and slaues, he shal reigne wel and honorably in his kingdom. Al things are to be done with good aduisement and premeditation: and that properly belongeth to a king. For hastie rashnes bringeth all things to ruine, according to the saying of the Gospell: Euery kingdome deuided in it selfe, shall be desolate. &c.

After the duetie and office of Princes thus described, consequently followeth the institution of subiects, declared in many good & necessary ordinaunces, very requisite and cōuenient for publique gouernment. Of the which lawes William Conquerour was cōpelled, thorough the clamor of the people to take some: but the most parte he omitted, contrary to his owne oth at his coronation, inserting and placing the moste of his owne lawes in his language: to serue hys purpose: and whych as yet to this present day in the same Normande language do remaine. Nowe (the Lorde willing) let vs proceede in the storie, as in order followeth.

* King Harold.

Harolde the seconde sonne of Earle Godwine,* and laste king of the Saxons: notwithstanding that diuers of the nobles went with Edgar Adeling, the next heire after Edmund Ironside:, yet he through force and might contemning the young age of Edgar, and forgetting also his promise made to duke William, toke vpon him to be king of England, An. 1066. When Harolde Harefager, sonne of Canutus, king of Norway & Dēmark, heard of the death of king Edward, he came into England with 300. shippes or mo: who, then ioyning w^t Tostius, brother to the sayde Harold king of England, entred into the North partes, & claimed the land after the death of Edward. But y^e Lords of the countrey arose and gaue them battail, notwithstanding the Danes had y^e victory. And therefore Harold king of Englād prepared toward them in all hast, & gaue them an other strōg battel, and there had the victory, where also Harold the Dane was slaine, by the hand of Harold king of Englande. And Tostius was also slaine in the battell. After this victorie, Harold waxed proude & couetous: and would not deuide the praies to his Knights that had deserued it, but kept it to himselfe whereby he lost the fauour of many of his knights and people.

In this meane time William Duke of Normādy, sent Ambassades to Harolde king of Englande, admonishing him of the couenauntes that were agreed betweene them: which was, to haue kept the land to his vse after the death of Edward. But because that the daughter of Duke William (that was promised to Harolde) was dead: Harolde thought him thereby discharged, and sayd, that such a nice foolish promise ought not to be holden (concerning an others land) without the consent of the Lordes of the same: and especially for that hee was thereunto, for neede or for dread compelled.

Upon these answeres receaued, Duke William, in the while that the messengers went and came: gathered his knightes, and prepared his name, and had the assent of the Lordes of his lande to aide and assist him in his iourney.* And ouer that sending vnto Rome to pope Alexander, cōcerning his title & viage into england: the pope cōfirmeth him in the same, and sent vnto him a banner, willing him to heare it in the ship, wherein himselfe should saile. Thus Duke William, being purueied of al things cōcerning his iourney: sped him to the sea side, and tooke shipping at the hauen off. Ualery: where he taried a lōg time, or he might haue a conuenient winde. For the which his souldiours murmured (saying) it was a woodnesse, & a thing displeasing God, to desire to haue an others mans kingdome by strength, and namely whē God was against it in sending contrary wind.* &c. At the last the winde shortly after came about, and they tooke shipping with a great cōpanie, and landed at Hastings in Sussex.

For three causes Duke William entred thys lande, to subdue Harold.* One was, for that it was to him geuen by king Edward his nephew. The secōd was to take wreke, for the cruell murther of his nephewe Alfrede, King Edwardes brother, and of the Normands, which deede he ascribed chiefly to Harolde. The thirde was, to reuenge the wrong done to Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, which was exiled by the meanes & labour of Harold, in the time of king Edward.

Thus, while Harold was in the North: Duke William made so great spede that he came to London before the King: out of which he was holden, till he had made good Page 167 surety, that he & his people should passe through the Citie without tarying: which promise he well obseruing, passed the bridge, and went ouer vnto Sussex. From whence he sent a Monke vnto Harold, & profered to him three maner of wayes. 1. Either to render to him the possession of the land, and so to take it againe of hym vnder tribute, raigning vnder him.* 2. or els to abide and stand to the Popes arbitrement betwixt them both: or thirdly to defende hys quarel in his own person against the Duke, and they two onely to trie the matter by dinte of sworde, wythout any other bloudshedding.

But Harold refused all these offers, saying: it should be tried by dinte of swordes, & not by one sworde. And so gathered his people, & ioyned battaile with the Normands, in the place where afterwarde was builded the Abbey of Battaile in Sussex.* In the beginning of which fight the englishmen kept them in good array, like to vanquishe the Normandes. Wherefore Duke William caused hys men to geue backe, as though they fled: wherby the englishmē followed fast and brake their array. Then the Normanes fiercely geuing a charge vpon them, in cōclusion obtained the victorie, through the iust prouidence of God. Where king Harolde, who before had murdered Alfrede the true heire of the Crowne, with his company of Normandes so cruelly: was now wounded of the Normandes, in the left eye with an arrow, and therof incontinent died: although Gerardus sayeth,* hee fled away to Chester, and liued after that a Monke in the monasterie of S. Iames. Whyche is not like, but rather that he was there slaine, after that he had raigned nine moneths, and was buried at Waltham (which proueth that he died not at Chester) and so was he the last that raigned in England of the bloud of Saxons: the which continued (to reckon from Hengistus his firste raigne in Kent) by the space of 591. yeres. And if it be reckened from the yeares of the Westsaxons, then it endured the space of 565. yeres.

*This William Duke, and king Edward, were by the fathers side, cousin germanes remoued. For Richard the first of that name, which was the thirde duke of Normandy after Rollo: was father to Duke Richard the second of that name, & brother to Emma mother to king Edward. Which Duke Richarde the seconde, was father to Duke Robert, this Duke Williams father.

Albeit in this matter, other some may gather otherwise and better, perchance, yet if I may say what I thinke, verely I suppose, that there is no consanguinitie so muche here the cause, why God of hys vnknownen iudgements suffered the Normandes here to preuaile: as was rather the cruell murder of Alfred, & of the innocent Normands, wrought by the cruel despight of Harold and the englishmen, as is before declared.* The which merciles murther, God here iustly in this conquest recompensed.

Now remaineth also to these forein affaires of kings & Princes, to adde somthing likewise concerning the continuation of the Archbishops of Caunterburie, beginning there where we last left:* that is with Elphegus, whome we declared a little before to be stoned by the Danes at Grenewich. After which Elphegus next succeeded Liningus, after him Egelnothus also aboue mentioned. Then Robertus a Normand,* a great doer (as is declared) about king Edward, and a faithfull counsaile vnto him: but he abode not long. After whom, Stigandus inuaded the sea (as they report) by simony: being both Archbishop of Cāt. Byshop of Winchester, and also Abbot in an other place. Wherin he cōtinued a great space, gathering and heaping goodes together, till at length Duke William clapt him in prison, and there kept him: placing in his rounge, Lancfrācus a Lombard borne, of whom more shall follow (Christ willing) hereafter to be declared.

Although the Church of Christ, and state of religion first founded and groūded by Christ and his Apostles,* did not continually altogether remaine in his primatiue perfection, wherein it was first instituted: But in processe of time, began from better to worse, to decrease & decline into much superstition & incōuenience: partly through the com'ing in of Mahumet, partly through y^e increase of wealth and riches, partly through the decrease of knowledge & diligence in such as should be the guides of Christes flocke: yet the infection & corruption of that time (though it were great) did not so abounde in such excessiue measure, as afterwarde in the other latter times nowe following, about the thousand yeares expired after Christ: whereof we haue to intreat, Christ so permitting. About the which time and yeare came Siluester the seconde of that name, who next succeeded after Gregorie the v. before mentioned.* pag. 159. and occupied the sea of Rome about the yere of our Lorde 1000. lacking one or two.

This Siluester was a Sorcerer,* which after the sorte of them, that worke by familiars (as they cal them) and by cōiuration▪ cōpacted with the deuil, to be made pope. And so he was (through the operation of Sathan) according to his request, Which thing some histories say, he did greatly repent before his death. But for a more ample declaration heereof, I will bring in the wordes of Ioannes Stella, a Uenetian, translated from Latin into English, cōcerning the said Siluester: to the entent that our inchaunters and sorcerers now a dayes (wherof there be to many in England) may the better through his example be admonished. The words of Stella be these,* agreeing also with the narration of Benno, Platina and many other. Siluester the second of that name, being Pope, and a Frenchman, called Gibertus: sate in his Papacie iiij. yeares, one moneth and viij. dayes. He entred into his Papacie, through wicked & vnlawful meanes: who from his youth being a monke, and leauing his monasterie, gaue himself wholly to the deuill, to obtaine that which he required.

And first comming to Hispalis a City in Spayne, there applied his booke and profited there in somuch, y^t he was made Doctour, hauing amongst his auditours, Otho the Emperours sonne, and Robert the French King, Lotharius Archbyshop of Senon, with diuers other moe. By whose aduancement he was promoted, first Bishop of Rheme, afterward Bishop of Rauenna, and at last through the operation of Sathan, was exalted to the Papacy of Rome; vpon this condition, that after his death, he should geue himselfe to the deuill, by whose procuremēt, he came to that promotion. Upō a certaine time he demanded an answer of the deuill, how long he should enioy his Popedome, to whom he answered againe: vntill thou say Masse in Ierusalem thou shalt liue. At length the iiij. yeare of his Popedome, saying Masse at Lent time, in the temple of the holy crosse being called then Ierusalem, there he knewe the time was come, when hee should die. Wherupon being stroke with repentance,* confessed his fault openly before the people: desiring al men to cut his body al in peeces (being so seduced by deceits of the deuill) & so being hewen in peeces, they woulde lay it vpon a cart, and bury it there, where soeuer the horses wold cary it of their accorde. And so the saying is to be, that by the prouidence of God (whereby the wicked may learne yet hope of remission w^t God, so that they will repent them in their life) the horses of their own accord staid at the church of Laterane, and there he was buried: wheras commonly by the ratling of his bones within the tomb, is portended the death of Popes as the common reporte goeth. Thus much out of Ioannes Stella,* concerning Siluester. By whō our sorcerers and inchanters, or magicians may learne to beware of the deceitfull operation of Sathan: who, at the ende deceiueth and frustateth al them, that haue to do with him: as the ende of all such doth declare commonly, which vse the like art or trade. The Lorde and God of al mercye, through the spirite of Iesus our redemer, dissolue y^e works of Sathan, and preserue the hartes of our nobles, and of al other Englishmen from such infection. Amen.

After Siluester succeeded Ioannes .xix. by whom was brought in (as Volateran sayth) the feast of all soules,* an. 1004. through the meanes and instigation of one Odilo Abbot of Cluniake, to be celebrate; next after the feast of all Saintes. This Monke Odilo, thinking that Purgatory (as he heard) should be in the mount Aetna: dreamed vpō a time in the countrey of Sicile, that he by his Masses had deliuered diuers soules from thēce: saying moreouer, that he did heare the voyces and lamētations of deuils crying out, for that the soules were taken frō them by the Masses & Dirges funerall. Ex Bakenthorpo. in prolo. 4. Lib. Sentent. And not lōg after him came Iohn the xx. and Sergius the iiij. After whom succeeded Benedictus the viij. then Iohn the 21. who being promoted by art magike of Theoyhilact his nephew, Gratianus, Brazutus and other Sorcerers brought in first the fast of the euē of Iohn Baptist and S. Laurēce.* After him followed pope Benedictus the 9. likewise aspiring to his Papacy, by like magike, practising inchauntmentes and coniuration in woodes, after horrible maner. Who resisting the Emperor Henricus 3. sonne to Conradus, and placing in his rowme. Petrus the king of Hungarie wyth this verse. Petra dedit Romam Petro, tibi Papa coronam: Afterward for feare of Henricus preuailing in battaile; hee was faine to sell his seate to his successoure Gratianus, called Gregorius vi. for 1500. poundes.* At which time were 3. Popes together in Rome, rainging & raging one against an other. Benedictus ix. Siluester 3. & Gregorius vi. For the whych cause Henricus surnamed Niger; the Emperour, comming to Rome: displaced these 3. monsters at one time, placing for them, Clemens 2. and Page 168 thereupon inacting,* that there should no bishop of Rome henceforth be chosen, but by the consent and confirmation of the Emperour. Which constitution though it was both agreeable & also necessary for publike trāquilitie of that citie, yet the Cardinals would not suffer it long to stand, but did impugne it afterward by subtile practise and open violence, as in processe (the Lord permitting) shal appeare, in the time of Henricus the 4. and 5. In the time of this Clement, the Romanes made an othe to the Emperour, concerning the election of the Byshops, themselves to entermeddle no farther therein, but as the assent of the Emperour should goe with all.* Howbeit the Emperour departing thence into Germanie againe, by and by they forgote their othe, and within 9. monethes after poysoned the Bishop. Which fact some impute to Stephen his successour, called Damasus 2. Some impute it to Brazutus, who (as histories record) within 13. yeares poysoned 6. popes,* that is, Clemens 2. Damasus. 2. Leo. 9. Uictor. 2. Stephanus 9. Nicolaus the 2.

Thus Clement being poysoned, after him succeeded Damasus 2. neither by consent of the people, nor of the emperour elected: but by force and inuasion, who also within 23. daies being poisoned. An. 1049. much contention and struing began in Rome about the Papal seat. Whereupon the Romans, through the counsel of the Cardinals, sent to the foresaid Emperour, desiring to geue them a bishop, and so he did, whose name was Bruno an Almain, and bishop of Colle*, afterwarde called Leo 9. This Bruno being a simple man and easie to be led with euil counsel, comming from the Emperour towards Rome in his pontificall apparell like a Pope: meeteth him by the way the Abbot of Cluniake, and Hildebrand a monke. Who seing him so in his pontificalibus, begā to rate him, laying to his charge, that he would so take his authoritie of the Emperour, and not rather of the Clergy of Rome & the people thereof, as other his predecessors were wont to doe: and so counselled him, to lay downe that apparel, and to enter in w^t his own habite, till he had hys election by them. Bruno following their counsel, and confessing his fault before the Clergie of Rome, obtained their fauor, and so was nominate Leo 9. wherby Hildebrand was made a Cardinall, & put in high rowme. Under this Pope Leo were two Councils, one kept at Uercellis, where the doctrine of Berengarius against the reall substance in the Sacrament was first condemned, although Berengarius yet recanted not, whych neuerthelesse was done after in the Council of Lateran*, vnder Nicolas 2. An. M.lx.* The other was kept at Moguntia, where amongst many other decrees was enacted, priests to be excluded and debarred vtterly from mariage▪ Item, that no lay men might geue benefice, or bishoprick, or any spirituall promotion. &c.

This Leo, being at Wormes w^t the Emperour vpon Christmas day, did excommunicate the subdeacon because in reading the Epistle, he did it not in the Romane tune, he being there present. The Archbishop moued therewith, departed from the altare (being then at Masse) saying, he would not proceede no farther in his seruice, vnlesse hys subdeacon were restored. Whereupon the Pope commāded him to be released, & so they went forward in their seruice.

After the death of Leo, whom Brazutus poysoned the first yere of his popedome. Theophilactus did strue to be Pope: but Hildebrand to defeat him, went to the emperor, (partly also being sent by y^e Romanes for feare of the Emperours displeasure) who assigned an other bishop, a Germaine, called Uictor 2. This Uictor hauing a Councell at Florence, deposed diuers Bishops and Priestes, for simony and fornicatiō. For simony, in that they tooke of secular men their dignities for money:* for fornication, in that contrary to their Canon, they were married. &c. The 2. yeare of his papacie and little more, this Pope also followed his predecessours being poysoned by the foresaide Brazutus, through the procurement of Hildebrand and his maister.

Here now began the Church and Clergie of Rome, to wring out of the emperours hand the election of the pope: electing Stephen the 9. for pope,* contrary to their oth and to the Emperours assignement. Here was the Church of Millan first brought to obedience of the Romish Church, by this Stephanus the 9. bishop of Rome. Who also shamed not to accuse the Emperor Henry (of whom mention is made before) of heresy: for minishing the authority of the Romane sea. So this was their heresie at that time, not to maintaine the ambitious proceedings of the Romish prelate. And simonie they called this, to take & enioy any spirituall liuing at a secular mans hand. Wherefore Stephen hearing this simonie to raigne in diuers places,* namely in the Churches of Burgundy and Italy, sent foorth the Cardinal Hildebrand to reforme the matter: who was no lesse earnest in that kinde of commission to help the matter forward.

In the meane time Stephanus y^e pope,* tasting of Brazutus cup fel sick. Hildebrand hearing that, applieth home w^t all post speede. So being returned to Rome, assembleth all the companies and orders of the Clergy together, making thē to sweare: that they should admit none to be Byshop, but which should be appointed by the publike cōsent of them altogether. This being done, Hildebrande taketh his iorney to Florēce (belike to fetch the bishop of Florēce) to stal him bishop: the clergy swearing to him, that no bishop shuld be ordained before his returne againe. But the people of Rome not suffering the election to stand so long, after the death of Stephan: elected one of their owne citie, called Benedictus the 10. Hildebrand hearing of this,* was not a little offended: wherefore returning to Rome wyth one Gerhardus bishop of Florēce, caused y^e clergy to procede to a newe election, saying: that Benedictus was not lawfully called but came in by force & bribing. But y^e clergie not daring to attempt any new election at Rome,* wēt to Sene, and there elected this Garhardus bishop of Florence, whome Hildebrande brought with him. So were 2. popes in Rome together: But Garhardus named Nicolaus 2. holding a councel at Sutrium, through the helpe of Duke Godfride and Guibert, and other bishops about Italie, caused the other Pope to be deposed. Benedictus vnderstanding them to be set against him through y^e means of Hildebrand, vnpoped himself, and went to Ueltras, liuing there more quietly thē he shuld haue done at Rome.

Here is to be touched by the way,* the error of the glose vpon the 23. dist. which falsly alledgeth out of the Chronicles, y^t Benedictus 10. which succeeded Stephen, was deposed: after whō came Ioannes bishop of Sabine for money, & he againe deposed. Benedictus was then restored, and after displaced againe, and then Ioannes Archdeacon ad portam latinam, was made Pope, and he againe deposed by the Emperor, and all this w^tin one yere. Which history neither is founde in any Chronicle, nor agreeth vpon any Benedictus, saue only that Benedictus 9. was deposed, & then reigned 3. popes together, Benedictus 9. Silvester 3. & Gregorius 6.* which before was called Ioannes ad portam latinam, whome the Emperor deposed (all three together.) But that Benedict neither was the 10.* neither did hee succede pope Stephen, as the glose recordeth. Nicolas thus being set vp without the minde both of the emperour,* & of the people of Rome, after his fellow Pope was driuen away: brake vp the Synode of Sutrium, & came to Rome, where he assembled an other councel, called concilium Lateranum. In which councel first was promulgate the terrible sentence of excommunication mentioned in the decrees, & beginneth: In nomine Domini nostri. &c. The effect whereof is this. First, that he after a subtile practise (as farre and as plainly as he durst speake) vndermindeth the Emperours iurisdiction, and transferreth to a few Cardinals, and certaine Catholike persons, the full authoritie of chusing the Pope.* Secondly, against all such as do creepe into the seat of Peter, by money or fauoure w^tout the full consent of the Cardinals: he thūdreth with terrible blasts of excommunication, accursing them and their children with deuils, as wicked persons to the anger of almighty god, geuing also authoritie and power to Cardinals, with the Clergie and laitie, to depose all such persons, and cal a councel general, wheresoeuer they wil against them.

Item,* in the sayde Councell of Laterane, vnder Pope Nicholas the seconde, Berengarius Andegauensis, an Archdeacon was driuen to the recantation of his doctrine, denying the reall substance of Christes holy body and bloud to be in the Sacrament, otherwise then sacramentally and in mysterie.

In the same councell also was hatched & inuented,* the new found deuise and terme of Transubstantiation.

It were to long heere to declare the confederation betwixt this Nicholas, and Robertus Guiscardus: whome this pope (cōtrary to all right and good law, displacing the right heire) made Duke of Apulia,* Calabria, Sicilia, and captain general of S. Peters lands: that through his force of armes and violence, he might the better subdue all such as should rebell to his obedience, and so did. Nowe let all men iudge & vnderstand (which be godly wise) howe this standeth w^t the doctrine of Christ,* the example of Peter, or the spirit of a christen bishop, by ourward armes & violēce to conquer christen men & countreis, vnder the obedience of a bishops sea. Thus Pope Nicolas the 2. well aunswering to his Greeke name: by might and force continued 3. yeres and a halfe. But at length he mette with Brazutus cup,* and so turned vp his heeles.

At the beginning of this Nicolas, or somewhat before, Page 169 about the yere of our Lorde 1057. Henricus the 4. after the decease of Henrie the 3. was made Emperour being but a childe,* & raigned 50. yeres: but not without great molestatiō and much disquietnes, and all through the vngracious wickednesse of Hildebrand, as hereafter (the Lord so permitting) shalbe declared.

Here, by the way commeth to be noted, an exāple, wherby all Princes may learne and vnderstand, how the pope is to be handled, whosoeuer loketh to haue any goodnesse at his hand. If a man stand in feare of his curse, he shall be made his slaue, but if he be despised of you, ye shal haue him as you list. For the Popes curse may well be assimiled to Domicianus thunder:,* If a man geue eare to the noise and cracke, it semeth a terrible thing: but if ye consider the causes and effect therof, it is a most vaine ridicule.

In the reigne of this Nicolas, An. 1060. Aldredus Byshop of Worcester,* after y^e decease of Kinsius his predecessor shuld be made Archbishop of Yorke, who comming to Rome with Tostius erle of Northumberlād, for his palle (as the maner was) could not obtain it, but was depriued of all his dignitie (for some default, I can not tell what) in his aunswer. And furthermore, after his reuersion home, was spoyled also of all that he brought w^t him. Whereupon he returning againe to Rome with Tostius the foresayde Erle,* there made his complaint, but could not be heard: til Tostius, a man of stout courage, taking y^e matter in hand, tolde the Pope to his face, that his curse was not to be feared in farre countre•s, which his owne neighbours, yea & most vile vacabonds derided and despised at home. Wherefore he required the Pope, either to restore Aldredus again to his goods lost, or els it should be known, that they were lost through his meanes and subtlery. And furthermore, it would come to passe, that y^e king of England hearing this, would debar him of s. Peters tribute, taking it for a great shame to him & his realme, if Aldredus should come from Rome both depriued of dignity, & spoiled also of his goods. &c. In fine, the Pope thus perswaded by the argument of his purse, was content to sende home Aldredus with his palle, according to his request.

After the death of Nicholas, the Lombardes being oppressed before by pope Nicholas, and brought vnder fear, were the more desirous, and thought it good to haue a Bishop of their company: * and so elected the bishop of Parniē called Cadolus, to be Pope: sending to the emperour and desiring his fauour and supportation therein. For the election of the Pope (sayd they) most properly appertained vnto him.

The emperor wel pleased and content, geueth his good leaue and voice w^tal. Hildebrandus, no lesse a wicked Necromancer, then a stoute maintainer of popish liberties against good emperors, hearing this: setteth vp by a cōtrary faction, an other bishop, Anselmus, after called Alexander the 2. Cadolus thus elected by the emperor & the Cardinals, * setteth forward to Rome with a sufficient army & strength of mē. Alexander also no les prepared, there receiueh him with an other army, * where they had a great conflict, & many slaine on both sides. But Cadolus as he had the better cause, so had he the worse fortune: who being repelled, yet repaired himself and came again with a greater power. Albeit, he preuailed not. The Emperor seeing this hurly burly: to take vp the matter, sent thither his ambassador Otho, Archbishop of Colen: who cōming to Rome, beginneth sharply to chide the pope for taking so vpō him without the leaue or knowledge of the emperor, declaring how y^e election of that sea ought chiefly to appertein to the right of the emperor, as it hath done for y^e most part in the time of his predecessors tofore. But Hildebrande all set on wickednes and ambition, and also puft vp not a litle, with his late victories: not suffering the ambassador to tel to the end, interrupted him in the middle of his tale, affirming, y^t if they should stand to law and custome, the libertie of that election shuld rather belong to the clergy, then to the Emperor. To make short, Otho the ambassador bearing (belike) more with the Clergie, then with the emperour, was content to be perswaded: onely required this in the emperors name, a coūcell to be had, to decide the matter: wherat the emperor should be present himselfe. And so he was: In the which counsell being kept at Mantua, * Alexander was declared pope, the other had his pardon graunted. In this counsell amongst many other cōsiderations, was concluded concerning priests to haue no wiues: such as haue cōcubines to say no masse: priests children not to be seclued from holy orders: no benefices to be bought for mony. Alleluya to be suspended in time of Lent out of the church. * &c. This also was decreed (which made most for Hildebrandus purpose) that no spirituall man, whatsoeuer he be, shoulde enter in any Church, by a secular persone, & that the Pope should be elected onely by the Cardinals, &c. Benno Cardinalis wryteth thus of Alexander, * that after he perceiued the frauds of Hildebrande, and of other the Emperours enemies: and vnderstanding that he was set vp and inthronised, but onely for a purpose: being at his Masse, as he was preaching to the people, told them, he wold not sit in y^e place, vnlesse he had the licence of the Emperour. Which when Hildebrandus heard, he was stricken in suche a furie, that scarsly he could keepe his handes of him, while Masse was done. After the Masse being finished, by force of soldiours & strength of men he had him into a chamber, and there all to be pomild Pope Alexander with his fistes, rating and rebuking him for that he would seeke for fauoure of the Emperor. * Thus Alexander being kept vp in custody, and being stinted to a certaine allowance, as about v. groates a day. Hildebrand incrocheth all the whole reuenues of the Church to him selfe, procuring thereby muche treasure. At length

Alexander vnder the miserable endurance of Hildebrand, died at euentide after 11. yeares & half▪ of his popedome. And thus much of Romish matters.

These things thus discoursed concerning the matters of Rome (now returning againe to our owne country story) the order therof would require to enter againe into the reigne of William Conqueror, the next king following in England. But as a certain oration of K. Edgarus, which should haue bene placed before, chanced in the meane time to come to my hands, not vnworthy to be read: I thought by the way in the ende of this booke, to insert the same (although out of order) yet better I iudge it out of order, then out of the booke.

The oration of king Edgar to the Clergie.

BEcause God hath shewed his great mercy to worke with vs: it is meete (most reuerend Fathers) that with worthy works we should answer his innumerable benefites.* For we possesse not the land by our owne sworde, and our owne arme hath not saued vs: but his right hande and his holy arme, because he hath bene delighted in vs. Therefore it is meete that we should submit both our selues and our soules to him that hath subiected all these thinges vnder our gouernement: and that we ought stoutly to laboure, that they whome he hath made subiect to vs, might be subiect to his lawes. It belongs to me to rule the lay people with the lawe of equitie, to doe iust iudgement betwene man and his neighbour, to punish Church robbers, to holde vnder rebelles to deliuer the helpelesse from the hande of the stronger, the needye also and the poore from them that robbe them. It belongs also to my care to prouide necessary things to the ministers of the Churches, to the flockes of the Monkes, to the company of virgins, and to prouide for their peace and quiet. The examining of all whose maners belongeth vnto vs: whether they liue chastly, if they behaue themselues honestly towarde them that be without, whether they be diligent at Gods seruice, if they be earnest to teache the people if they be sober in eating and drinking, if they keepe measure in apparell, and if they be discreete in iudgement. If ye had regarded these thinges with a triall of them (O reuerende fathers, by your leaues I speake) suche horrible and abhominable thinges of the Clearkes, shoulde not haue come vnto our eares. I omit to speake how their crowne is not broad, nor their rounding conuenient, the wantonnesse in your life, your pryde in your gesture, the filthinesse in your wordes, doe declare the euill of the inward man.

Furthermore what negligence is in Gods seruice, when scarce they will be present at the holy vigils? And when they come to masse, they seeme rather to be gathered to play and laugh, then to sing. I will tell that, that good men be sory for, and the euil laugh at. I will speake with sorrow (if so be I may expresse it) how they be riotous in banquetings, in chambering dronkennes, and vnshamefastnes: that now clerkes houses may be thought to be a stewes of harlots, and a couent of players. There be dice, there is dancing, and singing, there is watching to midnight, with crying and shouting. Thus the goods of kinges, the almes of princes, yea (and that more is) the price of that precious bloud is not esteemed. Haue our fathers thē spent their treasures for this purpose▪ Hath the kinges cofers decayed by taking awaye many reuenues, for this cause? Hath the kinges liberalitie geuen landes and possessions to Christes Churches for this intent, that Clarkes harlots shoulde be decked with the same? that riotous feastes might be dressed? that houndes and haukes and such other toyes might be gotten? The souldiours crye out of these thinges, the people grudge minstrels sing and daunce, and yet ye regard it not, ye spare it, ye dissemble it. Where is the sworde of Leuy, and the zeale of Simeon, whiche killed the Sichemites, and the Circumcised, which bare the figure of them that defile Christes Church,* with filthy deedes, because they abused Iacobes daughter as a harlot? Where is Moyses spirite whiche spared not hys owne kinsfolke that worshipped the head of the Calfe?

Page 170Where is Phinies the priestes dagger, which pacified Gods anger by his holy zeale,* when he killed him that plaid the harlote with the Madianite? Where is Peters spirite, by whose power couetousnes is destroyed, & simonical heresie is condemned? Be earnest ye Priests, be earnest, to followe the waies of the Lord, & the righteousnes of our God. It is time to doe against them that haue broken the law of God.* I haue Constantines sword, and yee haue Peters sworde in your hands, let vs ioyne right hands, let vs couple sword to sword, that the lepers may be cast out of the tēples, that the holy place of the Lord may be purged, and the sonnes of Leuie may minister in the temple, who said to his father and mother I know you not, and to his brothers I know not you. Goe to diligently I pray you, least we repent to haue done that, that we haue done, & to haue geuen that, that we geue. If we shall see that to be spent not in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnes of wicked men, through vile and corrupt liberty of life for lacke of chastisement: let the reliques of holy saintes which they despise, and the holy altars, before which they play the madde men, moue you. Let the great deuotion of our ancetours moue you, whose almes the madnesse of the Clearkes doeth abuse. My great graundfather (as yee know) gaue the tenth parte of all hys landes to Churches and Abbeyes. My greate greate graundfather Alfredus of holy memorie, thoughte it not meete to spare hys Treasures, his goodes, no costes, nor rentes, that he might enriche the Church. My grandfather the elder, Edward, your fatherhoode is not ignoraunt, howe great things he gaue to the Churches It becommeth you to remember with what gifts my father & his brothers did enrich Christes altars. O father of fathers Dunstane, beholde I pray thee the eyes of my father looking on thee, from that bright place of heauen. Harken his complaining words, sounding in thine eares thus pitifully lamenting. O father Dunstane, thou, thou I say, geuest me counsell to builde Abbaies and Churches, thou wast my helper and fellow worker in all things. I chose thee as a shepheard and bishop of my soule, and a keper of my maners. Whē did I not obey thee? what treasures did I preferre in respect of thy counsels? What possessions did I not despise, if thou badde me? If thou thought meete to geue any thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou thought meete to geue any thing to Churches, I deferred not. If thou complained that Monkes or Clearkes wanted any thing, I supplied. Thou saidest that almes lasted for euer, and that there was none more fruitfull then that which was geuen to Abbeis or Churches. For with that, both Gods seruaunts are sustained, and that which remaineth is geuen to the poore. O worthy almes. O worthy price of the soule. Oh wholesome remedie for our sinnes, which nowē doeth stincke in the sweete furies of priests lemmans, wherwith they adorne their eares & decke their fingers, apparelling their delicate bodies with silke and purple. O father, is this the fruite of mine almes, is this the effect of my desire, and of thy promise? What wilt thou answer to this complaint of my fathers? I know, I know, when thou didst see a thiefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast exhorted, thou hast blamed them, but wordes haue bene despised. Nowe we must come to stripes of correction, thou hast here with thee the worshipfull father Edward bishop of Winchester. Thou hast the reuerend Prelate Oswold bishop of Worcester, I commit this businesse to you, that both by Bishoply correction, and the kings authority the filthy liues may be cast out of the Churches, and they that liue orderly may be brought in. &c.

In this Oration of K. Edgar aboue prefixed, 3. things are chiefly to be noted & considered, to them y^t haue iudgements to marke and vnderstand, to witte: The religious zeale and deuotion of kings, both in geuing to the church, & also in correcting the maners of churchmen. 2. Secondly, the dissolute behaiour and wantonnesse of the clergie, then abusing the great donatiōs and patrimonies of princes bestowed vpon them. 3. Thirdly, the blinde ignorance and superstition of that time in both states, as well Ecclesiastical as temporal, in esteeming Christes religion chiefly to consist in geuing to Churches, and in maintaining of Monkery, falsly being perswaded that remission of theyr sinnes, & remedy of their soules therein did lie in building monasteries, erecting churches and cloysters, and in placing monks in the same, and such other almes deedes, and workes of deuotion. Wherin appeareth how ignorāt that time was of the true doctrine of Christes faith, and of free grace of the Gospell, which promiseth life, remedy, and iustification, not by any deuout merits of oures,* nor by any workes either of the lawe of God, or of the inuentions of man, but onely and freely by our faith vpon Christ Iesus the sonne of God, in whom only consisteth al the promises of God. Amen.

Nowe remaineth as in the former booke before, so in this likewise, to prosecute the order & race of Archbishops of Canterbury, as we haue done the race of kings, beginning with Etheredus, who succeded next after Celnocke, the seuententh Archbishop of that Sea mentioned, where we last left before, Pag. 131.

The ende of the thirde Booke.

THE FIFT BOOKE CONTEYning the last 300. yeares from the loosing out of Satan.

*THVS hauing discoursed in these former Bookes, the order and course of yeares, from the first tying vp of Sathan vnto the yeare of our Lorde 1360. I haue a little ouerpassed the stint of time in the Scriptures appoynted, for the loosing out of hym againe. For so it is wrytten by S. Iohn Apocal. 20. that after a thousande yeares, Satanas the olde Dragon shalbe let loose againe for a season, &c. *

For the better explanation of the whych mysterie, let vs first consider the context of the scripture: afterward, let vs examine by history and course of times, the meaning of the same. And first to recite the wordes of the Apocal. the text of the Prophecy is this, cap. 23.

And I saw an Aungell descending from heauen, hauing a key of the bottomlesse pitte, *and a great chaine in his hande. And hee tooke the Dragon the olde Serpente, whych is the deuill and Satanas, and bounde hym for a thousand yeares, and put hym in the bottomlesse dungeon and shutte him vp, and signed him with hys seale, that he should no more seduce the Gentiles, till a thousande yeares were expired. And after that he must be loosed againe for a little space of time. And I sawe seates, and they sate vpon them: and iudgement was geuen vnto them, and the soules I sawe of them which were beheaded for the testimonie of Iesus. &c.

By these wordes of the Reuelation heere recited, three speciall times are to be noted.

- 1. First, the being abroade of Sathan to deceyue the world.
- 2. The binding vp of him. *
- 3. Thirdly, the losing out of him againe, after a thousand yeares consummate, for a time.

Concerning the interpretation of whych times, I see the common opinion of many to be deceiued by ignorance of hystories, and state of things done in the church: supposing that the chaining vp of Sathan for a thousand yeares, spoken of in the Reuelation, was meant from the birthe of Christe our Lorde. Wherein I graunt that spiritually the strength and dominion of Sathan in accusing & condemning vs for sinne, was cast downe at the passion and by the passion of Christ our sauour, and locked vp not onely for a thousande yeares, but for euer and euer. Albeit as touching the malicious hatred and furie of that Serpent, against the outward bodies of Christes poore saints (which is the heele of Christ) to afflicte and torment the Church outwardly: That I iudge to be meant in the Reuelation of S. Iohn, * not to be restrained til the ceasing of those terrible persecutions of the primitiue Church. At what time it pleased God to pity the sorrowfull affliction of his poore flocke, being so long vnder persecution, the space of three hundred yeares, and so to assuage their griefes and torments. Which is meant by binding vp of Sathan, worker of all those mischiefes: vnderstanding thereby, that for so much as the Deuill prince of thys worlde had now by the death of Christ the sonne of God lost al his power and interest against the soule of man, shoulde turne his furyous rage & malice which he had to Christ against the people of Christ, (which is meant by the heele of the seede. Genes. 3.) in tormenting their outward bodies. Which yet shuld not be for euer, but for a determinate time, when as it shoulde please the Lord to bridle the malice, and snaffle the power of the olde Serpent, and geue rest vnto his Church for the terme of a thousand yeares. Which time being expired, the sayd serpent should be suffred loose againe for a certaine or a small time. Apoc. 20.

And thus to expound this Propheticall place of scripture I am led by three reasons.*

*The first is, for that the binding vp of Sathan, and closing hym in the bottomles pit by the Angell, importeth as much that hee was at libertye, raging and doynge mischiefe before. And certesse those so terrible and so horrible persecutiōs of the primitiue time vniuersally through the whole world, during the space of three hundreth yeares of the Church, do declare no lesse. Wherein it is to be thought and supposed, that Sathan all that time, was not fastened and closed vp.

The second reason moouing me to thinke that the closing vp of Sathan was after the ten persecutions of the primitiue Church,* is taken out of the twelft chapter of the Apocalips. Where we read, that after the woman (meaning the Church) had trauailed foorth her man childe, the olde Dragon the Deuill, the same time being cast downe from heauen, drawing the thirde part of the starres wyth him: stode before the woman with great anger, and persecuted her (that is the Church of God) with a whole floude of water (that is, wyth aboundance of all kindes of torments) and from thence went moreouer to fight agaynst the residue of her side, and stode vpon the sands of the sea, wherby it appeareth that he was not as yet locked vp.

The thirde reason I collect out of the Apocalyps thirteenth Chapter,* where is wrytten of the beast, signifying the Emperiall Monarchie of Rome:* that hee had power to make warre fourtie and two monethes. By the whych monethes is meant no doubt, the tyme that the Dragon, and the persecuting Emperours, should haue in afflicting the Saintes of the primitiue Church.* The computation of which fortie two monethes (counting euery moneth for a Sabboth of yeares, that is for seuen yeares, after the order of Scripture) riseth to the summe (counting from the passion of the Lord Christ) three hundred yeares lacking sixe, at what time Maxentius the last persecutour in Rome fighting against Constantinus, was drowned wyth his souldiours, like as Pharaο was drowned persecuting y^e children of Israel in the red sea. Unto the which xliij. moneths, or Sabbothes of yeares, if yee adde the other sixe yeares wherein Licinius persecuted in the East: ye shal finde iust three hundred yeres, as is specified before in the first booke of thys volume. pag. 97.

After the which fortie and two monethes being expired,* manyfest it is that the furie of Sathan, that is, hys violent malice and power ouer the Saints of Christ, was diminished and restrained vniuersally through the whole world.

Thus then the matter standing eident, that Sathan after 300. yeares, counting from the passion of Christ, began to be chayned vp, at what time the persecution of the primitiue Church began to cease: Nowe let vs see, howe long thys binding vp of Sathan shoulde continue, which was promised in the booke of the Reuelation to be a thousand yeares. Which thousand yeares, if yee adde to the xliij. monethes of yeares, that is, to 294. yeares: they make 1294. yeares,* after the passion of the Lord. To these moreouer adde the 30. yeares of the age of Christ, and it commeth to the yeare of our Lord 1324. which was the yeare of the letting out of Sathan, according to the prophesie of the Apocalips.

A Table containing the time of the persecution both of the primitiue, and of the latter Church, with the count of yeares from the first binding vp of Sathan, to his loosing againe, after the minde of the Apocalips. Page 398

The first persecution of the primitiue Church, beginning at the 30. yeares of Christ, was prophesied to continue 42. monthes, that is, An.

*The ceasing of the laste persecution of the primitiue Church by the death of Licinius the last persecutour, began. An. 324. from the natiuitie of Christ, which was from the 30. yeare of hys age. 294.

294.

The binding vp of Sathan after peace geuen to the church, counting from the 30. yeares of Christ, began An.

294.

*And lasted a thousand yeres, that is, counting from the thirtie yeare of Christe, to the yeare.

1294.

*About which yeare Pope Boniface the 8. was Pope, and made the 6. booke of the decretals: confirmed the orders of Friars, and priuiledged them with great fredomes, as appeareth by his constitution: Super cathedram. An.

1294.

*Unto the which count of yeares doeth not much disagree that I founde in a certaine olde Chronicle prophesied and wrytten in the latter ende of a booke, which booke was wrytten as it seemeth, by a monke of Douer, & remayneth yet in the custodie of William Cary, a Citizen of London: alledging the Prophetie of one Hayncardus a gray Frier, grounded vppon the authoritie of Ioachim the Abbot, prophesying that Antichrist shoulde be borne the yeare from the Natiuitie of Christ. 1260. Which is, counting after the Lordes passion, the very same yere and time, when the orders of Friars both Dominickes and Franciscans began first to be sette vp by Pope Honorius the 3. and by Pope Gregorius 9. which was the yere of our Lord counting after his passion.

1226.

And counting after the Natiuitie of the Lord, was the yeare.

1260.

Wherof these verses in the author was wrytten.

Cum fuerint anni completi mille ducenti,

*Et decies seni post partum virginis almae:

Tunc Antichristus nascetur daemone plenus.

And these verses were wrytten, as appeareth by the sayd author. An. 1285.

These thyngs thus premised for the loosing out of Satan, according to the prophetie of the Apocal. nowe let vs enter (Christe willing) to the declaration of these latter times, which folowed after the letting out of Sathan into the worlde. Describing the wondrous perturbations and cruell tyranny stirred vp by him against Christes Church. Also the valiant resistance of the Church of Christ against him and Antichrist, as in these our bookes heere vnder following may appeare.

*The argument of which booke consisteth in 2. partes, first to entreate of the raging furie of Satan nowe loosed, and of Antichrist: Against the saints of Christ fighting and traueiling for the maintenance of the truth, & reformation of the Church: Secondly, to declare the decay and ruine of the said Antichrist, through the power of the word of God being at length (eyther in a greate parte of the worlde) ouerthrowen, or at least vniuersally in the whole world detected.

*Thus then to begin wyth the yeare of our Lord. 1360. wherin I haue a litle as is aforesayd, transgressed the stint of the first loosing out of Sathan: we are come now to the time wherin the Lord,*after long darknes beginneth some reformation of hys Church, by the diligent industrie of sondry hys faithful and learned seruauntes: of whome diuers already we haue foretouched in the former booke before, as namely Guliel. de Sancto Amore, Marsilius Patauinus: Ockam: Robertus Gallus: Robertus Grosted: Petrus de Cugnerijs: Ioannes Rupescissanus: Conradus Hager: Ioannos de Poliac, Cesenas, wyth other moe: whych withstoode the corrupt errors, and intollerable enormities of the Byshop of Rome. Beside them which about these times were put to death by the saide bishop of Rome, as Chastilion, & Franciscus de Arcatara in the booke before recorded: also the two Franciscanes, Martyrs, which were burned at Auinion, mentioned, pag. 391.

Now to these (the Lord willing) we will adde such other holy Martyrs and confessors, who following after in the course of yeares with like zeale and strength of Gods worde, and also with like daunger of their liues, gaue the like resistance against the enemie of Christes religion, and suffered at hys handes the like persecutions. First begynning wyth that godly man, whosoeuer he was the author of the Booke (hys name I haue not) intituled the prayer and complaint of the Ploughman: wrytten as it appeareth, about thys present time.

Which booke as it was faithfully set foorth by William Tindall,*so I haue truely distributed the same abroade to the Readers handes: neyther chaunging any thyng of the matter, neyther altering many woordes of the phrase thereof. Although the oldnesse and age of hys speache and termes be almost growne nowe out of vse: yet thought I it so best, both for the vtilitie of the booke to reserue it from obliuion, as also in his owne language to let it go abroad, for the more credite and testimonie of the true antiquity of the same. Adding withal in the margent for the better vnderstanding of the reader, some interpretation of certaine difficult termes and speches, as otherwise might perhaps hinder or stay the reader. The matter of this complaining prayer of the ploughman, thus proceedeth.

An olde auncient wryting, intituled, The prayer and complaint of the Ploughman.

IESV CHRIST that was ybore of the maid Marie,* haue on thy poore seruauntes mercie and pitie, and helpe them in their great nede to fight against sinne, and against the deuill that is author of sinne, and more nede nes there neuer to cry to Christ for helpe, then it is ryght nowe. For it is fulfilled that God sayde by Isay the Prophet: ye riseth vp erlich to follow drunkennesse, and to drinke till it be euen, the harpe and other minstrelsies beeth in your feastes and wine. But the woorke of God ye ne beholdeth not, ne taketh no kepe to the workes of his handes: And therefore my people is take prisoner, for they ne had no cunning. And the noble men of my people deyeden for hunger, and the multitude of my people weren dry for thirst, and therefore hel hath drawen abroade theyr soule, and hath yopened hys mouth wythout any ende. And estsoones sayeth Isay the Prophet: The worde is floten away, and the highnesse of the people is ymade sicke, and the earth is infecte of his wonnyers, for they haue broken my lawes, and ychaunged my right, and han destroyed mine euerlastynge bonde and * forward betwene them & me. And therefore cursing shal deuour the earth, and they that wonneth on the erthly shallen done sinne. And therefore the earth tilyars shullen waxe woode, and fewe men shullen cen yleft vpon the earth. And yet sayth Isay the Prophet, this sayeth God, for as much as this people nigheth me with their mouth, & glorifieth me with their lippes, and their hart is farre from me. And they han ydrad more mens commandement, then mine, and more draw to their doctrines, then mine. Therefore will I make a great wondring vnto this people, wisdom shall perish away from wise men, and vnderstanding of ready men shall be yhid. And so it seemeth that an other saying of Isay is fulfilled, there as God bad hym goe teach the people, and sayd go forth and say to this people: eares haue ye, and vnderstād ye not, and eyes ye haue and sight ne know ye not. Make blinde the hart of this people, & make their eares heauy, and close their eyen, least he see with his eyen, and yheare with his eares, and vnderstand with his hart, and by yturned, and ych heale him of his sicknes. And Isay sayd to God: how long Lord shall this be? And God sayd: For to that the cities ben desolate withouten a wonnier, and an house withouten a man.

Here is mychel nede for to make sorow, & to cry to our Lord Iesu Christ hertilich for helpe and for succour, that hee wole forgeue vs our sinnes, and geue vs grace and cōning to seruen him better here after. And God of his endles mercy geue vs grace and cōning trulich to tellen which is Christes law in helping of mens soules, for we beth lewde men, and sinfull men, and vnconning, and if he woll be our helpe and our succour, we shullen wel perfourme our purpose. And blessed be our Lorde God that hideth his wisdom from wise men, and fro ready men, and teacheth it to small children, as Christ teacheth in the Gospell.

Christen men haue a law to keepe, the which lawe hath twe parties.* Beleue in Christ that is God, & is the foundmēt of their law, and vpon this foundement, as he sayde to Peter, and the gospel beareth witnes, he woll byelden his Church, and thys is the first party of Christes law. The secōd party of this law beth Christes commaundements that beth written in the gospel, and more verilich in Christen mens hartes.

And as touching the beleue, we beleuen that Christ is God, and that there ne is no God but he. We beleuen neuertheles that in the Godhead there bene three persons, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, and all these three persons ben one God, and not many Gods, and all they beth ylich mighty, ylich good, and ylich wise, and euer haue bene, and euer shullen ben We beleuen this God made the worlde of nought, and man he made after hys owne likenesse in Paradise that was a land of blisse, and gaue him Page 398 that land fo• hys heritage, and bad him that he should not eate the tree of knowledge of good and euil, that was * a midde Paradise. Then the deuell that was fallen out of heauen for his pride, had enuie to man, and by a false suggestion he made man eate of this tree, and breake the commaundement of God, and tho was man ouercome of the deuill, and so he lost his heritage, and was put out therof into the world that was a land of trauel, and of sorow vnder the feendes thraldome, to be punished for his trespasse. There man followed wickednes and sinne, and God for the sinne of man sent a•sloud into this world, and drownd all mankind saue eight soules. And after this flud he let mē multiply in the world, and so he assailed whether man dread him or loued him, & among other he found a man that hight

Abraham: * this man he prooued whether he loued him and drad him, and bad hym that he should offeren Isaac his sonne vppon an hill, and Abraham as a true seruaunt fulfilled his Lords commaundement: and for this buxumnes and truth, God sware vnto Abraham that he would multiply his seede as the grauell in the sea, and as the starres of heauen, and he behight to him and to his heires the lande of behest for heritage for euer, gif they wolden ben his true seruauntes and keepe his hests. And God * held him forward, for Isaac Abrahams sonne begat Iacob and Esau: and of Iacob that is ycleped Israel, comen Gods people that he chose to be his seruaunt, and to whome he behight the land of behest. This people was in great thraldome in Egypt vnder Pharaο that was king of Egypt: and they cr•eden to God that he should deliueren them out of that thraldome, and so he did: for he sent to Pharaο, Moses and his brother Aaron, and bad him deliuer his people to done him sacrifice: and to fore Pharaο he made Moses done many wonders, or that Pharaο wold deliuer his people, and at the last by might he deliuered his people out of thraldom, and led them through a desert toward the lande of behest, and there he gaue them a lawe that they shulden lyuen after, when they comen into their countrey, and in their way thither ward, the ten commaundements God wrote himself in two tables of stone: the remnaunt of the lawe he taught them by Moses his seruaunt, how they shoulde do euery chone to other, and gif they trespassed againe the law, he ordeined how they shoulde be punished. Also hee taught them what maner sacrifices they should doe to him, and he chose him a people to ben his priestes, that was Aaron and his children, to done sacrifices in the tabernacle, and afterwarde in the temple also. He chese him the remnant of the children of Leuy to ben seruauntes in the tabernacle to the priestes, and he sayde: When ye come into the lande of behest, the children of Leuy they shullen haue none heritage amōgst their brethren, for I would be their part, & their heritage, & they shullen serue me in the tabernacle by dayes and by nigh•es, and he ordeined that priestes should haue a part of the sacrifices that were offred in the tabernacle, and the first begotten beastes, both of men and beastes and other things as the lawe telleth. And the other children of Leuy that serued in the tabernacle, should haue tythings of the people to their liueloode, of the which tythings they should geuen the priestes the tenth partie in forme of offering. The children of Leuy both priestes and other, shoulde haue houses and croftes, and lesewes for their beastes in the land of behest, & none other heritage: & so God gaue thē their land of behest, and bade them that they ne shoulde worship no other God then him Also he bade that they should kepe his cōmand•ments, and gift they did so, all their enemies about them shuld drede thē and be their seruaunts. And giue they worshipped false gods and so forsaken his lawes, he bihight them that he woulde bring them out of that land & make them serue their enemies, but yet he said he would not benemen his mercy away from them, if they would cry mercy and amende their defautes, and all thys was done on Gods side.

And heere is much loue showed of God to man. And who so looketh the Bible, hee shall finde that man showed him little loue againeward: for when they were come into their heritage, they forgotten their God, and worshipped false gods. And God sent to them the Prophetes and his seruaunts * fele times to bidde them withdrawen them from their sinnes, and other they haue slowen them, or they beaten them, or they ledde them in prison: and oft times God tooke vpon them great vengeance for their sinnes, & when they cried after helpen to God, he sent them helpe and succour. This is the generall processe of the old Testament, that God gaue to his people by Moses his seruaunt. And al this Testament and this doing ne was but a shadow and a figure of a newe Testament that was geuen by Christ. And it was byhoten by Ieremie the Prophet, as S. Paul beareth witnes in the Epistle that he wryteth to the Iewes. And Ieremy sayeth in this wise: Loe dayes shall come, God sayth, and I will make a new band to the house of Israel, and to the house of Iuda, not like the forward that I made with their fathers in that day that I tooke their hand to leade them out of the lande of Egypt, the which forward they maden veyne, and I had Lordship ouer them. But this shalbe the forward that I wold make with them after those daies: I wil geue my lawes with them in their inwardnes, and I will wryten them in their hearts, and I wil be their God and they should be my people, and after that a man shall not teach his neighbour ne his brother. For all (God sayeth) from the least to the most, should knowe me, for I will forgeuen them their sinnes, and I wil no more thinke on their sinnes.

Thys is the newe Testament, that Christe both God and man borne of the maid Marye, he taught here in this worlde to bryng man our of sinne and out of the deuils thraldome and seruice to heauen, that is land of blisse and heritage to all tho that beleueen on him and kepen hys commaundements, and for his teaching he was done to the death. But the third day arose againe from death to life, and fette Adam and Eue and many other folke out of hell, and afterward he came to his disciples and comforted them. After he stied vp to heauen to his father, and tho hee sent the holy Ghost amonges his disciples: and in time comming he wol come and demen all mankinde after their werkes, and after the wordes he spake vpon earth: some to blisse, with in body and in soule euer withouten end, and some to paine withouten end, both in body and in soule.

This is our beloue and all christen mennes, and this beleue is the first poynt of the newe Testament that yche Christen man is holde stedfastly to beleue, and rather to suffe the death thair forsaken this beleue, and so this beleue is the bread of spirituall life, in forsaking sinne, that Christ brought vs to life.

But for asmuch as mans liuing ne stondeth not all onlych by bread, he hath ygilten vs a draught of water of life to drink. And who that drinketh of that water, he ne shall neuer afterward ben a thirst. For this water is the cleare teaching of the gospel, that encloseth seuen commaundements.

The first is this: * thou shalt loue thy GOD ouer all other things, and thy brother as thy selfe, both enemy and frend.

The second commaundement is of meekenes, in the whych Christ chardgeth vs to forsake Lordship vppon our brethren and other wordly worships, and so he did himselfe.

The third commandement, is in stonding stedfastlich in truth and forsaking all falsenes.

The fourth commaundement, is to suffer in this world diseases and wrongs withouten ageinstondings.

The fifth commandement is: mercy, to forgeuen our brethren their trespasse, as often time as they gilteth, without asking of vengeaunce.

The sixth commaundement is poorenes in spirite, but not to ben a begger.

The seuenth commaundement, is chastity: that is a forsaking of fleshlich likings displeasing to God. These commaundements enclosen the ten commaundements of the old law, and somewhat more.

Thys water is a blessed drinke for christen mennes soule But more harme is, much folke would drinke of thys water, but they mowe not come thereto: for God sayth by Ezechiel the prophet: when iche geue to you the most cleane water to drinke, ye troubled that water with your feete, and that water so defouled, yee geue my shepe to drink.* But the clene water is yhid fro the shepe, and but gif God cleare this, it is dread least the sheepe dyen for thirst. And Christ that is the wisdom of the father of heauen, & well of thys wisdom that come from heauen to earth to teache man this wisdom, thorow the which man should ouercome the sleights of the deuill that is principall enemy of mankind: haue mercy and pity of his people, and shew if it be his will howe thys water is troubled, and by whom: and * sith clere thys water that his sheepe mowne drinke hereof, and kele the thirst of theyr soules. Blessed more our Lord bene, for he hath itaught vs in the Gospell, that ere then hee woulde come to the vniuersall dome, then should come many in his name and sayen, that they weren Christ: and they shoulde done many wonders, and begilen many men. And many false prophets shoulde arisen and begylen much folke.

A Lorde, yblessed more thou ben of euerich creature: which ben they that haue ysayd that they weren Christ, & haue thus begiled thus thy people? Trulich Lord I trowe, thilke that sayen that they ben in thy steede, and * binemen thy worship, and maken thy people worshippen them as God, & haue hid thy lawes from the people. Lorde, who durst sit in thy steede and benemen thee thy woorship and thy sacrifice, and durst maken the people woorship them as gods? The Sauter telles, that God ne wole not in the day of dome demen men for bodiliche sacrifices & Holocaustes: But God sayth, yeld to me sacrifice of heryng, and yeld to God thine auowes, and clepe me in the day of tribulation, and ych wole defend thee, and thou shalt worship me.

The heryng of God standeth in 3 things.* In louing God ouer al other things. In dreading God ouer al other things. In trusting in God ouer all other things.

These 3 poyntes Christ teacheth in the gospell. But I trowe men louen him but a little. For who so loueth Christ, he wole kepen his wordes. But men holden his wordes for heresie and folye, and kepeth mennes wordes.* Also men dreden more men & mens lawes and their cursings, then Christ and his lawes and his cursings. Also men hopen more in men and mens helps, than they doe in Christ and in his helpe. And thus hath hee that setteth in Page 400 Gods stede, by no men God these three hor•ings, & maketh men louen him and his lawes, more then Christ and Christes law, and dreden him also. And there as the people shulde yeelde to God their vowes, he sayth he hath power to assoylen them of theyr avowes, and so this sacrifice he * nemeth away• from God. And there as the people shoulde cry to God in the day of tribulation, he letteth them of their cryng to God and byne meth God that worship. This day of tribulation is whan man is fallen thorowe sinne into the deuils seruice, and than we shuldes cry to God after help, and axen forgeuenes of our sinne, and make great sorow for our sinne, and ben in f•ll will to do so no more ne none other sinne, and that our Lord God wole forgeuen vs our sinne, & maken our soule clene. For his mercy is endlesse.

*But Lord, here men haue by nomen thee much worshyp: For men seyn that thou ne might not cleane assoylen vs of our sinne: But if we knowlegen our sinnes to priests, & taken of them a penance for our sinne gif we mowen speake with them.

A Lord thou forgave sometime Peter his sinnes and also Mary Magdaleine,* and many other many sinfull men without shriuing to priests, & taking penance of priests for their sinnes. And Lord thou art as mighty now as thou were that time, but gif any man haue bynomen thee thy might. And we lewed men beleuen, that there nys no man of so great power, and gif any man maketh him selfe of so great power he* heigheth himselfe aboue God. And S. Paul speaketh of one that sitteth in the temple of God & highten him aboue God, and gif any such be, he is a false Christ.

*But hereto seyn priests, that whē Christ made cleane leprous men, he bade them goe and shewe them to priests. And therefore they seyn that it is a commandement of Christ, that a man should shewen his sinne to priests. For as they seyn, lepre in the olde lawe betokeneth sinne in this new lawe. A Lorde God, whether thine Apostles knew not thy meaning as well as men done nowe? And gif they hadden yknow that thou haddest cōmanded men to shriuen them to priests, and they ne taught not that commandement to the people, me thinketh they hadden ben to blame: But I trow they knewen wel that it was none of thy commaundements, ne nedeful to heale of mans soule. And as me thinketh the law of lepre, is nothing to the purpose of shriuing: for priestes in the olde law hadden certain poynts and tokens to know whether a man were leprous or not: and gif they were leprous, they hadden power to putten them away from other cleane men, for to that they weren cleane, & then they hadden power to receiuen him among his brethren, and offeren for him a sacrifice to God.

This nis nothing to the purpose of shriuing. For there nis but one priest, that is Christ, that may knowe in certaine the lepre of the soule. Ne no priest may make the soul cleane of her sinne, but Christ that is priest after Melchisedekes order: ne no priest here beneath may ywit for certaine whether a man be cleane of hys sinne or cleane assoyled, but gif God tell it him by reuelation. Ne God ordeined not that his priestes should set men a penance for their sinne after the quantitie of the sinne,* but this is mannes ordinaunce, and it may well be that there commeth good thereof. But I wote well that God is much vnworshipped thereby. For men trust more in his absolutions, and in his yeres of grace, than in Christes absolutions, and therby is the people much appaired. For now, the sorow a man should make for his sinne, is put away by this shrift: and a man is more bold to do sinne for trust of thys shrift, and of this bodilich penance.

An other mischief is, that the people is ybrought into thys beleefe,* that one priest hath a greater power to assoylen a man of his sinne and clennere, then an other priest hath.

An other mischief is this, that some priest may assoylen them both of sinne and paine, and in this they taken them a power that Christ granted no man in earth, ne he ne vsed it nought on earth himselfe:

An other mischief is, that these priestes sellen forgeuenes of mens sinnes and absolutions for money, and this is an heresie accursed that is ycleped simonie: and all thilke priestes that axeth price for graunting of spirituall grace, beth by holy lawes depriued of their priesthode, and thilke that assenteth to this heresy. And be they ware, for Helyse the prophet toke no mony of Naaman when he was made cleane of his lepre, but Giesi his seruant: and therefore * the lepre of Naaman abode with him and wyth his heires euermore after.

Here is much matter of sorow, to see the people thus far ylad away from God and worshupen a fals god in earth, that by might and by strength hath ydone away the great sacrifice of God out of his temple: of which mischiefe and discomfort, Daniel maketh mention, and Christ beareth thereof witnes in the gospell. Who that readeth it vnderstand it. Thus we haue ytold apertie, how he that saith he sitteth in Christs stede,*binemeth Christ his worship and his sacrifice of his people, and maketh the people worshopen him as a God on earth.

Cry we to God, and knowledge we our sinnes euerichone to other as S. Iames teacheth, and pray we hartilich to God euerichone for other, & then we shulen hopen forgeuenes of our sinnes. For God that is endles in mercy sayth, that he ne wil not a sinful mans death, but that he be turned from his sin & liuen. And therefore, when he came downe to saue mankinde, he gaue vs a lawe of loue and of mercy and bade, gif a man do a trespas, amend him priuilich: and gif he leue not his sinne, amend him before witnes: and gif he ne amendeth not men should tel to the church: and gif he ne amendeth not than, men shuld shone his company as a publicane, or a man that is misbeleued, and this lawe was yfigured in the law of lepre, who that readeth it, he may see the sooth.

But Lord God, he that sitteth in thy stede, hath vndo thy lawe of mercy and of loue, Lord, thou biddest loue enemies as our self: as thou shewest in the gospell, there as the Samaritane had mercy on the Iewe.* And thou biddest vs also prayen for them that cursen vs, and that defamen vs, & pursuen vs to death. And so Lorde thou didst, & thine apostles also. But he that clepeth himselfe thy vicar on earth, and head of thy church, he hath vndone thy lawe of loue and mercy. For gif we speaken of louing our ennemies, h• teacheth vs to fight with our enemies, that Christ hath forboden. He curseth and desireth vengeance to them that so doth to hym. Gif any man pursueth him, hee curseth him, that it is a sorowe a Christen man to hearken the cursinges that they maken, and blasphemies in such cursing. Of what thing that I know, I may beare true witnes.

But gif we speake of louing of our brethren, this is vndone by him that sayth he is Godsvicar in earth.* For Christ in the gospell biddeth vs, that we shoulde clepen vs no father vpon earth: But clepen God our father, to maken vs loue perfitlich together. And he clepeth himselfe father of fathers, & maketh many religions, & to euerich a father. But whether is loue and charity encreased by these fathers and by their religions, or els ymade lesse? For a Friar ne loueth not a monke, ne a secular man neither, nor yet one frier a nother that is not of the order, and it is againward.

A Lord, me thinketh that there is litle perfection in these religions. For Lorde, what charity hauen such men of religion, that knowen how they mown against and sin, and fleeen away frō their brethren that ben more vncūning then they ben, & suffren them to trauelen in the world withouten their coūcell as beastes? Trulich Lorde, me thinketh that there is but litle charity, and then is there litle perfection. Lorde God, when thou were on earth, thou were among sinful men to drawen them from sin, & thy disciples also. And Lord, I trow thou ne graūtest not one mā more kūning then an other al for himself: and I wote wel that lewd mē that ben laborers, ne trauel not alonlich for himself. Lord our belief is, that thou ne wer not of the world,* ne thy teaching neither, ne thy seruantes that liueden after thy teaching. But all they forsaken the world, and so euery christen man must. But Lorde, whether thou taughtest menne forsake their brethrens companie and trauell of the worlde, to liuen in ease and in rest, and out of trouble and anger of the worlde, by their brethrens trauell and so forsaken the world▪

A Lord, thou ne taughtest not a mā to forsaken a pore estate and trauel, to ben afterward a Lord of his brethren, or ben a lords fellow and dwelling with Lords, as doth men of these new religions. Lord thou ne taughtest not men of thy religion thus to forsake the world,* to liuen in perfection by them selfe in ease, and by other mens trauell. But Lord they sayen they ben ybound to thy seruise, and seruen thee both night and day in singing their prayers, both for themselfe and for other men, that done them good both quicke and dead, and some of them gone about to teach thy people when they hauen leisure.

A Lord, gif they ben thy seruauntes: whose seruaunts ben we that cannot preyen as they done? And when thou were heere on earth, for our nede thou taughtest thy seruauntes to preyen thy father priuulich and shortlich: And gif there had beene a better maner of praying, I trowe thou wouldest haue taught it in helpe of thy pe•ple. And Lorde thou reprovest hypocrites that preyen in long preyer and in open places, to ben yholden holy men. And thou seyst in the gospel, wo to you Pharisees hypocrits. And lord thou ne chargedest not thy seruaunts with such maner seruice: But thou seest in the gospel, that the Pharises workshopē thee with their lippes, and their hart is farre from thee. For they* chargen more mens traditions than thy commaundements.

And Lord, we lewd men han a beleefe, that thy goodnesse is endles: and gif we keepen thine hestes, than ben we thy true seruauntes. And though we preyen thee but a litle & shortlich,* thou wilt thinken on vs, and graūten vs that vs nedeth, for so thou behighted vs sometime: And Lord I trowe, that pray a man neuer so many quaint prayers, gif he ne kepe not thine hests he is not thy good seruaunt. But gif he keepe thine hestes, than he is thy good seruaunt, and so me thinketh. Lorde that praying of long prayers ne is not the seruice that thou desirest, but keping of thine heftes: and than a lewd man may serue God as wel as a man of religion: though that the Plowman ne may not haue so muche siluer for his prayer, as men of religion. For they* kunnen not so wel preisen their prayers as these other chapmen: But Lorde our hope is, that our prayers be neuer the worse though it be not so wel solde as other mens prayers.

Lorde, Ezechiel the Prophet sayth that whan he spake to the Page 401 people thy words, they turned thy words into songs & into tales, And so Lord men done now: they singin merilich thy words, and that singing they clepen thy seruice. But Lord I trow that the best singers he herieth thee not most: But he that fulfilleth thy wordes he * herieth thee full well, though he wepe more then sing. And I trow that weping for breaking of thy commandements, be more pleasing seruice to thee, than the singing of thy words. And wold God that men would serue him in sorow for their sinnes, and that they shoulde afterward seruen thee in mirth. For Christ sayth, yblessed ben they that maken sorow,* for they shoulde ben yconforted. And woe to them that ben merry and haue theyr comfort in this world. And Christ sayd that the world should ioyen, & hys seruāts shulde be sory, but their sorow shuld be turned into ioy.

*A Lord, he that clepeth himselfe thy vicar vpon earth, hath y ordained an order of priestes to doe thy seruice in church to fore thy lewd people in singing matens, euensong & masse. And therefore hee chargeth lewde men in paine of cursing, to bryng to hys priests tithyngs and offerings to finden his priests, and he clepeth that Gods part, & due to priests that seruen him in church.

But Lord, in the olde law, the tithings of the lewde people ne were not due to priestes, but to that other childer of Leuie that ferueden thee in the temple, and the priest haddē their part of sacrifices, and the first bygeten beastes and other things as the lawe telleth. And Lorde, S. Paul thy seruant sayth, that the order of the priesthode of Aaron ceased in Christes comming and the lawe of that priesthode. For Christ was end of sacrifices yoffered vpō the crosse to the father of heauen, to bring man out of sinne and become himself a priest of Melchisedeks order. For he was both king & priest without beginning and end, and both the priesthooe of Aaron, and also the law of that priesthode, ben ychaunged in the comming of Christ. And S. Paul sayth it is reprobued, for it brogh• no man to perfection. For bloude of gotes ne of other beastes ne might done away sinne, for to that Christ shad his bloud.

A Lord Iesu, wether thou ordenest an order of priests to offrē in the auter thy flesh and thy bloude to bringen men out of sinne,* and also out of peine? And whether thou geue them alonelych a power to eat thy flesh and thy bloud, and wether none other man may eate thy flesh and thy bloud with outen leue of priestes? Lord, we beleeuē, that thy flesh is verēy meate and thy bloude verēy drinke, and who eateth thy flesh and drinketh thy bloud dwelleth in thee, and thou in him, and who that eateth this bread shall liue without end. But Lord thine disciples sayd, this is an hard worde, but thou answerest them and seidest: When yee seeth mans soone stiuen vp there hee was rather, the spirite is that maketh you liue, the wordes that yche haue spoken to you ben spirite & life Lord, yblessed more thou be, for in this worde thou teachest vs that hee that kepeth thy wordes and doth after them, eateth thy fleshe and drinketh thy bloude, and hath an euerlasting life in thee. And for we shoulde haue minde of thys liuing, thou gauest vs the sacrament of thy flesh and bloud in forme of bred and wine at thy supper, before that thou shouldest suffer thy death, and tooke bread in thine hand, and saidest: take ye this, and eate it, for it is my body: and thou tookest wine, and blessedest it, and sayde: thys is the bloud of a new and an euerlasting testament, that shall be shed for many men in forgeuenes of sinnes: as oft as ye haue done, doo ye this in minde of me.

A Lord, thou ne bede not thine disciples makē this a sacrifice, to bring men out of paines, gif a priest offred thy body in the alter: but thou bede them go and fullen all the folke in the name of the father, & the sonne, and the holy ghost, in forgeuenes of their sinnes: and teache ye them to keepe those thynges that ych haue cōmanded you. And Lord, thine disciples ne ordeined not priests principallich to make thy body in sacrament, but for to teach the people, and good husbandmen that well gouern their houtholds, both wiues & children, & their meiny, they ordeind to be priests to teachen other men the law of Christ, both in worde, in dede, & they liuedein as true Christen men, euery day they eaten Christes body,* and drinken his bloude, to the sustenance of liuing of theyr soules, and otherwhiles they taken the sacrament of his body in forme of bread and wine, in mind of our Lord Iesu Christ.

But all this is turned vpse downe: for now who so will liuen as thou taughtest, he shal ben holden a foole. And gif he speake thy teaching, he shal ben holden an heretick, & accursed. Lord yhaue no longer wonder hereof, for so they seiden to thee whē thou wer here some time. And therefore wee moten take in pacience theyr wordes of blasphemy as thou didest thy selfe, or els we weren to blame. And truelych Lord I trowe, that if thou were nowe in the world, and taughtest as thou diddest some time, thou shuldest ben done to death.* For thy teaching is damned for heresy of wise men of the world, and then moten they nedes ben heretickes that teachen thy lore, and all they also that trauelen to liue thereafter.

And therfore Lord, gif it be thy wil, helpe thine vnkunning & lewde seruaunts, that wolen by their power and their kunning, helpe to destroy sinne. Leue Lorde, sithe thou madest woman in helpe of man, & in a more fraile degree then man is, to be gouerned by mans reason: What perfection of charity is in these priests and in men of religion, that haue forsaken spoushod that thou ordeinedst in Paradise betwixt man and woman, for perfection to forsaken traueile, and liuen in ease by other mens traueile▪ For they mow not do bodilich workes for defouling of their handes, with whom they touchen thy precious body in the aulter.

Leue Lorde, gif good men forsaken the company of woman, & nedes they moten haue the gouernaile of man, then motē they ben ycoupled with shrewes,* and therfore thy spoushode that thou madest in clennes from sinne, it is nowe ychaunged into liking of the flesh. And Lord, this is a great mischiefe vnto thy people. And young priestes and men of religion, for defaulte of wiues maken many women horen, and drawen through their euell ensample many other men to sinne, and the ease that they liuen in, and their welfare, is a great cause of this mischiefe. And Lord me thinketh, that these ben quaint orders of religion and none of thy sect, that wolen taken horen, whilke God forfendes,* and forsaken wiues that God ne forfendeth not And forsaKen traual that God commaunds, and geuen their selfe to idlenes, that is the mother of all noughtines.

And Lorde, Mary thy blessed mother and Ioseph, touched oftentimes thy body, and wroughten with their honds, and liueden in as much clennes of soule, as our priestes done nowe, and touched thy body, and thou touchedest them in their soules. And Lorde our hope is, that thou goen not out of a poore mans soule that traueileth for his liuelode with his handes. For Lord, our beliefe is, that thine house is mans soul, that thou madest after thine owne likenes.

But Lord God,* men maketh nowe great stonen houses full of glasen windowes, and clepeth thilke thine houses and Churches. And they setten in these houses Mawmets of stockes and stones, and* to fore them they knelen priuulich & apert, and maken their prayers, and all this they sayen is thy woorship, and a great * herieng to thee. A Lorde, thou forbiddest sometime to make suche Mawmetes, and who that had yworshipped such, had be woorthy to be deade.

Lorde in the Gospell thou sayst, that true * heriers of God ne herieth him not in that hil beside Samarie, ne in Hierusalem neyther, but true heriers of God herieth him in spirite and in trueth. And Lord God what herying is it to bilden thee a church of dead stones, and robben thy quicke Churches of their body liche lyueloode? Lord God what heryeng is it, to cloth mawmets of stockes and of stones in siluer and in golde, and in other good colours? And Lorde I see thine image gone in colde and in here in clothes all to broken, without shone and hosen, an hungred and a th•ust. Lorde what heryenge is it to teende tapers and torches before blinde mawmets that mowen not I seyen: And hide thee that art our light and our lanterne toward heauen and put thee vnder a bushell that for darkenes we ne may not seene our way toward blisse? Lorde what heryenge is it to kneele tofore mawmetes that mowe not yheren, and worshepen them with preyers, and maken thine quicke images knele before them, and asken of them absolutions and blessings, and worshupen them as gods, and putten thy quicke images in thraldom and in traueil euermore as bestes, in colde and in heate, and in feeble fare to finden them in liking of the world? Lord what herieng is it to fetch deed mennes bones out of the ground there as they shulden kindelich roten, and shrinen them in golde and in siluer: And suffren thy quicke bones of thine images to rot in prison for default of clothingh? And suffren also thy quicke images to perish for default of sustenance, and rooten in the hoore house in abhominable lecherie? Some become theeues and robbers, and manquellers that mighten ben y holpen with the golde and siluer that hongeth about deed mens bones and other blind mawmetes of stockes and stones.

Lorde here ben great abominations that thou shewdist to Ezechiel thy Prophet, that priests done in thy temple, & yet they clepen that thine heryenge. But leue Lorde, me thinketh that thy louen thee litle that thus defoulen thy quick images, & worshippen blinde mawmetes.

And Lord an other great mischiefe there is now in the world, an hunger that Amos thy Prophet speaketh of, that there shal comen an honger in the earth, not of bread ne thrust of drinke, but of hearing of Gods worde. And thy sheepe woulde be refreshed, but their shepheards taken of thy shepe their liuelode, as tythings. &c. and liuen them selfe thereby where them liketh.

Of such shepheardes thou speaketh by Ezechiel thy Prophet, and seist: wo to the shepheardes of Israel that feden them selfe, for the flockes of sheepe shoulde ben yfed of their shepheardes: but yee eaten the milke and clothen you with their wolfe, and the fat sheepe ye slow, and my flocke ye ne fede not, the sicke shepe ye ne healed not, thilke that weren to broken yee ne knit not together, thilke that perished ye ne brought not againe: but ye ratled them with sternship and with power. And so the shepe be sprad abroad in deuouring of all the beasts of the felde. And Ieremie the Prophet sayeth: wo to the shephards that disperse•h abroad and •eareth the flocke of my * lesewe.

A Lorde, thou were a good shepheard, for thou putttest thy soul for thy sheep: but lord thou teldest that thilke that comé not in by the dore ben night theues & day theues, and a these as thou Page 402 seest cōmeth not but for to steale, to sleine, & to destroy. And Zachary the prophet sayth, that thou wouldest reren vp a shepherde vnunning, that ne wol not hele thy shepe that beth sick, ne seek thilke that beth lost. Apon his arme is a swerd, and vpon his right eye: his arme shall waxe dry, and his right eye shall lese his light. O Lorde, helpe, for thy shepe beth at great mischiefe in the shepheardes defaute.

But Lord, ther commeth hired men, & they ne fedden not thy shede in thy plenteous lesew, but feeden thy sheep with * sweuēs and false miracles & tales. But at thy trewth they ne comen not, For Lord, I trowe thou sendest them neuer. For haue they hire of thy sheep they ne careth but little of the feding and the keping of thy shepe, Lord of these hired men speaketh Ieremy the Prophet, and thou seyst that woorde by him: I ne sende them not, and they ronne* blieue: I ne speake vnto them, and they propheciden. For if they hadden stonden in my cōsel, and they had made my words knowē to the puple, ich wold haue turned them away from their yuell way and from their wicked thoughtes. For Lorde, thou seyst that thy woordes ben as fire, and as an hammer breaking stones. And Lord, thou saist: Lo I to these Prophetes meeting sweuens of lesing, that haue ytolde her sweuens, and haue begyled my puple in their lesing & in their fals miracles, when I neither sent ne bede them. And these haue profitet nothing to my puple. And as Ieremie sayth, from the lest to the * mest all they studien couetise, and from the Prophet to the priest, all they done gyle.

A Lord, here is mych mischief & matere of sorow, & yet there is more. For gif a lewed man wold teach thy people trewth of thy words as he is y holde by the commaundement of charite, he shal be forboden and put in prison gif he do it. And so Lord, thilk that haue the key of conning, haue y lockt the trewth of thy teaching vnder many wardes, & yhid it from thy children. But Lorde, sith thy teaching is y come from heauen aboue, our hope is, that with thy grace it shall breaken these wardes, and showe hym to thy puple, to kele both the hunger and the thrust of the soule. And then shal no shepheard, ner no fals hiridman begile thy puple no more. For by thy law I wryte, as thou hightest some time, that from the left to the mest, all they shullen knowen thy wil, and* weten howe they shullen please thee euer more in certaine.

And leue Lord, gif it be thy will helpe at thys nede, for there is none helpe but in thee. Thus Lord, by him that maketh himselfe thy viker in earth, is thy commaundement of loue to thee & our brethren ybroken, both to him and to thy puple But Lorde God, mercy and pacience that beth* tweyne of thy commandements, beth destroyed, and thy puple hath forsake mercy. For Lord, Daud in the Sauter sayth: Blessed beth they that done dome and rightfulness in euerich time.

O Lord, thou hast itaught vs as rightfulness of heauen, & hast ybeden vs forgeuen our brethren as oft as they trespassen against vs. And Lord, thine olde lawe of iustice was, that such harme as a man did his brother, such he should suffer by the law, as eye for an eye, and tooth for a tooth But Christ made an end of this law, that one brother should not desire wracke of an other: but not that he would that sinne shoulde ben vnpunished, for thereto hath he ordained Kinges and Dukes and other lewde officers vnder them, whilke as S. Paule sayth, ne carien not the swerd in vaine, for they ben the ministers of God, and wrakers to wrath, to them that euil done. And thus hath Christ ymade an ende of this olde lawe, that one brother may not suen an other himselfe,* for that to wreken without sinne, for breaking of charity. But this charity Lord hath thy vicar ybroke, and says that we sinnen, but gif we suen for our right. And we se I wote that thou taughtest vs sometime to geue our mantell also, euer that we shoulde suen for our coate. And so Lord beleue we,* that we ben ybounden to don by thy law, that is all charitye, & officers duty is to defenden vs from thilke theuery though we cōplainen not▪ But lord, thy law is turned vpsedown.

A Lord, what dome is it to sleane a theefe that take a mā's cattell away from hym, and suffren a spousebreaker to liue, and a lecherour that killeth a womans soule? And yet thy lawe stoned the •pousebreakers and leachours, and let the theeues liuen and haue other punishment.

A Lord, what dome is it to sleane a these for stealing of a hors, and to let him liue vnpunished, & to maintaine him that robbeth thy poore people of their liuelod, and the soule of his foode•

Lorde, it was neuer thy dome to sayen, that a man is an heretike and cursed for breaking of mans lawe, and demen hym for a good man for breaking thine hestes.

*Lord, what dome is it to curse a lewd man if he smite a priest, and not curse a priest that smiteth a lewed man, and leeseth hys charitie.

Lord, what dome is it to curse the lewd people for tythings, and not curse the parson that robbeth the people of tythings, and teacheth them not Gods lawe, but feedeth them with painting of stone walles, and songs of Latin that the people knowen not?

Lord, what dome is it to punish the poore mā for his trespass, and suffer the rich to continue in his sin for a quantity of mony?

Lord, what dome is it to slaine an vncunning lewed man for his sinne, and suffer a priest, other a clerke that doth the same sin, scape a liue? Lord the sinne of the priest or of the cleark is greater trespasse then it is of a lewd vncunning man, and greater ensample of wickednes to the common people.

Lord, what maner people be we,* that neither keep thy domes and thy rightfulness of the old testament that was a law of drede, nor thy domes and thy rightfulness of thy new testament that is a law of loue and of mercy: but haue an other law, and taken out of both thy lawes that is liking to vs, and remnaunt of heathen mennes lawes, and Lord this is a great mischief.

O Lord thou sayest in thy law, deme ye not and ye should not be demed: for the same mesure that ye meten to other men, men shall meten to you againeward.* And Lord thou sayst that by their worke we should know them And by what we knowe that thou commaunded vs not to demen mens thoughts, nor their workes that were not agaynst thy law expresly. And yet Lord he that saith he is thy vicar, will demen our thoughtes and aske vs what we thinke: not of the Lord, of thy hestes, for they caren little for them but of him and of his wilke they sate aboue thine, and maken vs accusen our selfe, or els they willen accursen vs, for our accusers mowen we not knowne. And Lord thou sayest in thyne olde law, that vnder two witnes at the least or three, shoulde stand euery matter And that the witnes shoulde euer be the first that shoulde helpe to kill them.

And when the scribes and the Pharises some tymes brought before thee a woman that was itake in spouse breaking, and exeden of the a dome, thou didst write on the earth, and then thou gaue this dom: He that is without sinne: throw first at her a stone, and Lord they went forth away from thee and the woman▪ & thou forgau the woman her trespasse,* and bad her go forth and sinne no more.

Sweete Lord, if the priestes tooke keepe to thy dome, they would be agast to demen men as they done. O Lord if one of them breake a commaundement of thy law, he will axe mercy of thee, and not a peine that is due for the sinne, for peyne of death were to little.* O Lord, how daren they demen any man to the death for breaking of theyr lawes, other assent to such law? for breaking of thy law they will set penance or pardon them, and mayntayne them as oft as they trespassen. But Lorde, if a man ones breake theyr lawes or speake agaynst them, he may done penance but ones, and after be burnt. Trulych Lord thou sayst, but if euery of vs forgeue other his trespasse, thy father will not forgeuen vs our sinnes. And Lord when thou honge on the crosse, thou prayed•t to thy father to haue mercy on thine enemies.

And yet the sain Lord, that they demen no man to the death, for the sain they ne mowen by their law demen any man to the death. A leeuē Lord, euen so saden theyr forefathers the phariseis, that it ne was not lawfull for them to kill any man. And yet they bidden Pilate to done thee to the death agaynst his owne conscience, for he wold gladly haue iquitte thee, but for that they threatened him with the Emperour, and broughten agaynst thee false wnesse also. And he was an heathen man.

O Lord, how much truer dome was there in Pilate that was an heathen iustice, then in our kinges and iustices that woulde demen to the death and berne in the fire him: that the Priests deliueren vnto them withouten witnes or prefe? For Pilate ne would not demen thee: for that the Phariseis sayden that gif thou ne had dest not bene a misdoer we ne would not deliuer him vnto thee: for to,* they broughten in theyr false wnesse agaynst thee. But Lord, as thou saydest sometime that it should ben lighter at domes day to Tyro and to Sydon and Gomorra, than to the cities where thou wrought wonders and miracles: so I dred, it shall be more light to Pilate in the dome, then to our kinges and domes men that so demen without wnesse and prefe. For Lord to demen thy folke for heretickes: is to holden thee an hereticke: and to brennē them, is to brennen thee, for thou saydest to Paule when he persecuted thy people: Saule, Saule, wherefore persecutest thou me, & in the dome thou shalt say, that ye haue done to the left of mine ye haue done to me.

Thus Lord, is thy mercy & iustice foredone by him that sayth he is thy vicar in earth: for he neither keepeth it himselfe nor nill not suffer other to do it.

The third commaundement, that is patience and sufferance is also ibroken by this vicar. Lord thou biddest sufferen both wrōges and strokes withouten againstanding, and so thou diddest thy selfe to geuen vs ensample to sufferen of our brethren. For suffering nourisheth loue, and agaynstandeth debate. All thy lawes is loue, or els the thing that draweth to loue.

But Lord, men teachen, that men shoulde pleten for their right and fighten also therefore, and els they seyn, men ben in perill: and thou bid in the olde law men fight for theyr countrey. And thy selfe haddest two swordes in thy company when thou shouldest go to thy passion, that as these clerkes seyn, betokeneth a spirituall sword and a temporall sworde, that thou gaue to thy vicar to rule with, thy church.

Lord this is a sleight speech, but Lord we beleuē that thou art king of blisse,* and that is thine heritage and mankindes countrey and in this worlde wee ne bene but straungers and pilgrimes. Page 403 For thou Lord ne art of this world, ne thy law nether, ne thy true seruauntes that kepen thy law. And Lord, thou were king of Iuda by enheritance if thou wouldest haue ihad it, but thou forsooke it and pletedest not therfore, ne fought not therfore.

But Lord, for thy kinde heretage and mankindes countrey, that is a land of blisse, thou foughtest mightilich: In battaile thou ouercame thy enemie, & so thou wonne thine heretage. For thou that were a Lord mightiest in battail, and also Lord of vertues, are rightfullich king of blisse, as Dauid saith in the Psalter. But Lorde, thine enemy smote the despitesullich, and had power of thee and hang thee vpō the crosse as thou haddest ben a these, & benomyn thee all thy clothes, and sticked thee to the hart with a spere.

O Lord, this was an hard assault of a battaile, and here thou ouercome by paciē;ce mightilich thine enemies, for thou ne woldest not done against the will of thy father. And thus Lorde thou taughtest thy seruants to fight for their countrey. And Lorde this fighting was in figure itaught in the old law. But Lord men holdē now the shadow of the old fighting & leuen the light of thy fighting, that thou taughtest openlych both in word and in deede.

Lord thou gaue vs a sword to fighten against our enemies for our conntrey, that was thine holy teaching, & christen mens law. But Lorde thy sworde is put in a shethe and in priests warde, that haue forsake the fighting that thou taughtest. For as they seyn it is against their order to ben mē of armes in thy battail, for it is vnsemelich, as they seyn, that thy vicar in erth, other hys priests shulden suffer of other mē. And therefore gif any man smite him, other any of his clerkes,* hee ne taketh it not in pacience, but anon hee siniteth with his sworde of cursing, and afterward with his bodylich sworde, he doth them to death. O Lord, me thinketh that this is a fighting against kinde, and much against thy teaching.

O Lorde whether axsedest thou after swerdes in time of thy passion to again stonde thine enemies? nay forsooth thou Lorde. For Peter that smote for great loue of thee, had no great thanke of thee, for his smiting. And Lorde thou were mighty ynough to haue againe stonde thine ennemies, for through thy looking they fellen downe to the ground, Lorde iblessed mote thou be. Heere thou teachest vs that we shoulde suffren: For thou were mighty ynow to haue agaynst and thine ennemies, and thou haddest wepen, and thy men weren harty to haue smitten.

O sweet Lord, how may he for shame clepen himselfe thy Viker and head of the Church, that may not for shame suffer? Sithe thou art a Lord: and sufferedst of thy subiectes, to geuen vs ensāple: and so did thy true seruauntes.

O Lord: whether geue thou to Peter a spirituall sworde to curse & a temporal swerd to sle mens bodies? Lord I trow not for thē Peter that loued thee so much, wold haue smitwith thy swerds: But Lord, he taught vs to blessen them that cursen vs, and suffren and not smiten.* And Lord he fed thy people as thou bed him, and therefore he suffered the death as thou didst.

O Lord, why clepeth any man him Peters successor that hath forsaken patience, and feedeth thy people with cursing and wyth smiting? Lord thou saydest in thy Gospell, when thy disciples knewen well that thou were Christ, and that thou mustest goe to Ierusalem, and sufferen of the Scribes and Pharises, spittinges, reprofes, and also the death. And Peter tooke thee aside, and sayd God forbid that.* And Lord thou saydst to Peter, goe behinde me Sathanas, thou sclaunderest me in Israell. For thou ne sauorest not thilke thinges that ben of God, but thilke that ben of men. Lord to mens wyt it is vnreasonable, that thou or thy Vicar, gif thou madest any on earth, shoulde suffren of your suggests.

A Lord, whether thou ordeynest an order of fighters to turne men to the beliefe? Other ordeinest that knightes shoulde swear to fighte for thy wordes?

A Lord, whether bede thou, that gif a man turne to the fayth, that he should geue his goodes and cattell to the Vicar that hath great Lordships, and more then him needeth? Lord I wot wel that in the beginning of the church men that weren cōuerted, threwn adowne theyr goodes before the Apostles feete. For all they weren in charitie, and none of them sayd thus is myne, ne Peter made himselfe no Lord of these goodes.

*But Lord, now he that clepeth himselfe thy Vicar vpon earth, and successor to Peter, hath ybroke thy commaundement of charitie, for he is become a Lord. And he hath also broken thy commandement of mercy, and also of patience. Thus Lord we be fallen into great mischief and thraldome, for our chiefetayne hath forsaken war and armes, and haue treated to haue peach with our enemies.

A Lord, gif it be thy will draw out thy swerd out of his sheth that thy seruauntes may fight therewith agaynst their enemies, * & put cowardise out of our hartes. And comfort vs in bataille, or than thou come with thy sword in thy mouth, to take vengeance on thine enemies For gif we bene accorded with our enemies til that time come, it is dread least thou take vengeance both of thē and of vs together. A Lord, there is no helpe now in this great mischief, * but onely in thee.

Lord, thou geuest vs a commaundement of truth, in bidding vs say yea, yea, nay, nay, and sweare for nothing. Thou geue vs also a maundement of meekenes, and an other of poorenes, But Lord he that clepeth himself thy Vicar on earth, hath both ybrokē these commaundements, for he maketh a law to compell men to sweare and by his lawes he teacheth that a man to saue his life, may forswear and lye And so Lord, through cōfort of him and his lawes, the people ne dreadeth not to sweare and to lye, ne oft times to forswearen them. Lord here is little truth.

O Lord, thou hast ybrought vs to a liuing of soules that standes in beleeuing in thee, & keeping thy hestes, and when we breken thine hestes, than we slen our soule. And lesse harme it were to suffer bodylich death.

Lord, king Saule brake thine hestes, and thou tooke his kingdome from his heyres euermore after him, and gaue it to Dauid thy seruaunt, that kept thine hestes. And thou saydst by Samuell thy prophat to Saule king, that it is a mannour of worshipping of false Gods to breake thy hestes. For who that loueth thee ouer all thinges, and dreadeth thee also: he nole for nothing breake thyne hestes.

O Lord, * gif breaking of thine hestes be heryeng of false gods, I trow that he maketh the people breake thyne hestes, and commaundeth that his hestes ben kept of the people, maketh himselfe a false GOD on earth: as Nabuchodonosor did some tyme: that was king of Babilon.

But Lord, we forsaken such false Gods, and beleuen that ther ne ben no mo Gods then thou And though thou suffer vs a while to bene in disease for knowledging of thee: we thanken thee wyth our hart, for it is a token that thou louest vs, to ••uen vs in thys world some penaunce for our trespas.

Lord, in the old law, thy true seruauntes tooke the death, for they would not eaten swynes fleshe that thou haddest forbid them to eat. O Lord, what truth is in vs to eaten vncleene mete of the soule, that thou hast forbid? Lord thou sayst, he that doth sinne is seruaunt of sinne, and then he that lyeth in forswearing hymselfe, is seruaunt of lesing; and then he is seruaunt to the deuill that is a lyer and father of lesinges. And Lord thou sayst no man may serue two Lordes at ones. O Lord then euery lyer for the tyme that he lyeth, other forsweareth hymselfe, and forsaketh thy seruice for drede of hys bodyly death, and becommeth the deuils seruaunte.

O Lord,* what truth is in him that clepeth hymselfe seruaunt of thy seruantes. & in his doing, he maketh him a Lord of thy seruauntes: Lord thou were both Lord and maister, and so thou sayd thy selfe, but yet in thy warkes thou were as a seruaunt. Lord this was a great truth and a great meeknes: but Lord bid thou thy seruauntes that they should not haue Lordship ouer theyr brethren? Lord thou saydst kings of the heathē men han Lordship ouer their subiectes, and they that vse their power be cleped well doers.

But Lord, thou saydst it shoulde not be so amongst thy seruantes, But he that were most should be as a seruaunt. Thou Lorde thou taughtest thy disciples to be meeke. Lord in the old law thy seruauntes durst haue no Lordship of theyr brethren, but if that thou bid them.* And yet they should not doe to theyr brethren as they did to thrailes that serued them. But they should doe to theyr brethren that were theyr seruauntes as to theyr owne brethren. For all they were Abrahams Children, And at a certaine tyme they should let theyr brethren passe from them in all freedome, but if they would wilfullich abiden still in seruice.

O Lord thou gaue vs in thy comming a law of perfect loue, & is token of loue thou clepedst thy selfe our brother. And to make vs perfect in loue, thou bid that we shoulde clepe to vs no father vpon earth, but thy father of heauen we should cleape our father. Alas Lord, how violently our brethren and thy childrē ben now put in bodily thraldome, and in despite as beastes euermore in greuous trauell to finde proude men in ease: But Lord, if we take this defoule and this disease in pacience and in meeknes and kepe thine hests, we hope to be free. And Lord geue our brethren grace to come out of thraldome of sinne, that they fal in through the desiring and vsage of Lordship vpon theyr brethren.* And Lord thie priestes in the old law had no Lordships among theyr brethren, but houses and pastures for theyr beastes: but Lord our priestes now haue great Lordship, and put theyr brethren in greater thraldome then lewed men that be Lordes. Thus is meeknesse forsaken.

Lord thou biddest in the Gospell that when a man is bid to the feast he should sit in the lowest place, and then he may be set hyer with worship when the Lord of the feast beholdeth how his gestes fitteth. Lord it is drede that they that sit now in the hiest place should be bidd in tyme comming fit beneath. And that will be shame and vileny for them. And it is they saying, those that hyeth hymselfe shuld be lowed, and those that loweth themselues should be an heyghed. O Lord thou biddest in thy Gospell to beware of the Pharaseis, for it is a poynt of pryde contrary to meeknesse. And Lord thou sayst that they loue the first sittinges at supper, and also the principall chaires in churches, and greetings in cheeping and to be cleped maysters of men. And Lord thou sayest be ye not cleped maisters, for one is your maister, and that is Christ and all ye be brethren. And clepe ye to you no father vpon earth, for one Page 404 is your father that is in heauen. O Lord this is a blessed lesson to teach men to be meke.

*But Lord he that clepeth himself thy vicar on earth he clepeth himselfe father of fathers agaynst thy forbidding. And all those worships thou hast forbad. He approueth them, and maketh them maisters to many, that teach thy people their owne teaching, and leaue thy teaching that is nedefull, and hiden it by quainte gloses from thy lewd people, and feede thy people with sweuens that they mete, and tales that doth little profit: but much harme to the people. But Lorde, these glosers obiecte that they desire not the state of maistry to be worshipped therby, but to profit the more to thy people whē they preach thy word. For as they seggē the people will beleue more the preaching of a maister that hath taken a state of schole, then the preaching of an other man that hath not take the state of maistry.

Lorde whether it bee any neede that maysters beren witnes to thy teaching that it is true and good? O Lord whether may any maister mowe by his estate of maisterie, that thou hast forboden, drawe any man from his sinne, rather then an other man that is not a maister, ne wole bee none, for it is forboden him in thy Gospell? Lord thou sendest to maysters to preach thy people, and thou knowledgist in the Gospel to thy father that he hath hid his wisdom from wise men and redy men, and shewed it to litle Children.* And Lord, maisters of the law hylden thy teaching foly, and seiden that thou wouldest destroy the people with thy teaching. Trulich Lord, so these maisters seggeth now: for they haue written many bookes agaynst thy teaching that is truth, & so the prophecie of Ieremy is fulfilled, when he sayth: Truelich the false points maisters of the law hath wrought leasing. And now is the time come that S. Paul speaketh of, where he sayth: time shal come when men shall not susteine wholesome teaching. But they shullen gather to hepe maisters with hutching eares, and from trueth they shullen turnen away their hearing, and turnen them to tales that maisters haue maked to showne their maistry and their wisdom.

And Lord a man shall beleue more a mans workes then hys words, & the dede sheweth well of these maisters that they desiren more maistrie for their own worship than for profit of the people, For when they be maisters, they ne preachen not so oft as they did before. And gif they preachen, commonlich it is before riche men there as they mowen beare worship and also profite of their preaching. But before poore men they preachen but seldem, when they ben maisters: and so by theyr woorkes wee may seene that they ben false glosers.

And Lord, me thinketh that who so wole keepen thine hestes him needeth no gloses: but thilke that clepen them selfe Christen men, and lyuen agaynst thy teaching and thine hestes, needelich they mote glose thine hestes after their liuing,* other els men shulden openlich yknow their hipocrisie and their falshod.

But Lord, thou sayst that there ys nothing yhid that shall not be shewed some time. And Lord yblessed more thou be. For somewhat thou shewest vs now of our mischiefes that wee bene fallen in through the wisdomes of maysters, that haue by sleighes ylad vs away from thee and thy teaching, that thou that were thy maister of heauen taught vs for loue, when thou were here some time to heale of our soules, withouten error or heresie. But maisters of worldes wisdom and their founder, haue ydamned it for heresie and for errour.

O Lord, me thinketh it is a great pride thus to reprove thy wise\dom and thy teaching. And Lord me thinketh that this Nabugodonosor king of Babilon that thus hath reproved thy teaching and thine hestes, and commandeth on all wyse to kepen his hests: maken thy people hearken him as a God on earth, and maketh thē his thrales and his seruauntes.

But Lord: we lewd men knowen no God but thee, & we with thine help and thy grace forsaken Nabugodonosor and his lawes. For he is in his proud estate wole haue all men vnder him, and he nele be vnder no man.* He ondoth thy lawes that thou ordeynest to ben kept, and maketh his owne lawes as him liketh: and so he maketh him king aboue all other kinges of the earth, and maketh men to worshippingen him as a God, and thy great sacrifice he hath ydone away.

O Lord, here is thy commaundement of meekenes, mischiflich to broke: And thy blessed commaundement of poorenes is also to broken,* and yhid from thy people. Lord, Zacharie thy prophet sayth, that thou that shouldest be our king, shouldest bene a poore man, and so thou were: for thou saydest thy selfe. Foxes haue dens, and birdes of heauen nestes, and mans sonne hath not where to legge his head on. And thou saydest yblessed ben poore men in spirite for thy kingdome of heauen is therein. And woe to riche men, for they han theyr comfort in this world. And thou bad thy disciples to ben ware of all couetise,* for thou saydest, in the aboūdance of a mans hauing, ne is not his lyfelode. And so thou teachest that thilke that han more then them needeth to theyr liuing lyuen in couetise. Also thou sayst, but gif a man forsake all things that he oweth, he ne may not bene thy disciple. Lord, thou sayest also that thy worde that is sowne in riche mens hartes, bringeth forth no fruite: for riches and the busines of this world maken it withouten fruit

O Lord, here bene many blessed teachinges to teach men to bene poore, and loue porenes. But Lord harme is, poore men and poorenes ben yhated, and ryche men ben yloued and honoured. And gif a man be a poore man,* men holden him a man without grace, and if a man desireth poorenes, men holden him but a foole. And if a man be a rich man, men clepen him a gracious man, and thilke that ben busy in getting of riches: ben yhold wyse men and ready: but Lord these rich men sayen that it is both leful and needefull to them to gather riches together. For they ne gathereth it for themselfe, but for other men that ben needy, and Lord their woorkes shewen the truth. For if a poore needy man woulde borowen of theyr riches,* he nele leane him none of his good, but gif he mow be seker to haue it againe by a certayne day.

But Lord, thou bede that a man should send, and not hoping yelding againe of him that he lendeth to: and thy father of heauen wol quite him his mede. And gif a pore aske a rich man any good, the rich man will geue him but a little, and yet it shall be little worth. And Lord me thinketh that here is little loue and charitie, both to God and to our brethren.

For Lord, thou teachest in thy Gospell, that what men doe to thy seruauntes: they done to thee. A Lord, gif a poore man axe good for thy loue, men geueth him a little of the wurst.* For these rich men ordeinen both bread and ale for Gods men of the wurst that they haue. O Lord, sith all good that men hath commeth of thee: how dare any man geue thee of the wurst, and kepe to himselfe the best? How may suche men say that they gatheren riches for others need, as well as himselfe, sith their workes ben contratrary to their words? And that is no great truth. And be ye seker these goods that rich mē han, they ben gods goods, ytake to your keeping, to loke how he wolen be setten them to the worshipping of God. And Lord, thou sayest in the Gospell, that who so is true in litle, he is true in that thing that is more. And who that is false in a litle thing,* who wole taken him toward things of a greater value? And therefore, be ye ware that han gods goods to keep. Spend ye thilke truelich to the worship of God, least ye leesen the blysse of heauen, for the vntrue despending of Gods goods in this world.

O Lord,* these rich men seggen that they done much for thy loue. For many poore labourers ben yfound by them, that shoulde fare febelich, ne were not they and their readines: Forsooth me thinketh that poore labourers geueth to these rich men, more then they geuen them agaynward. For the poore men mote gone to his labour in cold and in heate, in wete and dry, and spend hys flesh and his bloud in the richmens works, vpon Gods gound, to finde the rich man in ease, and in liking, and in good fare of meate of drink and of clothing. Here is a great gift of the poore man, for he geueth his owne body. But what geueth the richman hym agaynward? Certes feeble meat, and feeble drinke, and feeble clothing. What euer they seggen, suche be their workes, and here is little loue. And whosoeuer looketh well about, all the worlde fareth as we seggē. And all mē studieth on euery side, how they may waxe rich men. And euerich man almost is ashamed to ben holden a poore man.

And Lord, I trow for thou were a poore man, men token litle regarde to thee, and to thy teaching. But Lord thou came to geue vs a new testament of loue,* & therefore it was semelich that thou came in poorenes, to prooue who wold loue thee, and kepen thine hestes. For gif thou haddest ycome in forme of a rich man and of a Lord, men wold rather for they dread then for thy loue, haue ykept thyne hestes. And so Lord now thou might wel ysee which louen thee as they should in keeping thyne hestes. For who that loueth thee in thy poorenes and in thy lownes, needes he more loue thee in thy Lordship and highnesse.

But Lord, the world is turned vpse downe, & men loue poore men but a litlene poorenes neither. But men be ashamed of poorenes, and therefore Lord,* I trow that thou art a poore king. And therefore I trow that he that clepeth himselfe thy vicare on earth, hath forsaken poorenes, as he hath do the remnaunt of thy lawe: and is become a rich man and a Lord, & maketh his treasure vpon the earth that thou forbiddest in the Gospell. And for his right and riches he will plete, and fight & curse. And yet Lord, he will segge that he forsaketh all thinges that he oweth, as thy true disciple mete done after thy teaching in the Gospell.

But Lord thou ne taughtest not a man to forsaken his goodes and plete for them and fight,* and curse. And Lord he taketh on him power to asloyle a man of all maner things, but if it be of det. Truely Lord, me thinketh he knoweth litle of charitie. For who that beth in charitie, possesseth thy goodes in common and not in proper at his neighbours nede. And then shall there none of them segge this is mine, but it is Gods that God granteth to vs to spenden it to his worship. And so if any of them boroweth a porcion of those goodes,* and dispendeth them to Gods worship: God is apayed of this spending, and alloweth him this true doyng: And if God is payed of that dispēding that is the principal Lord of those goods, how dare anye of his seruauntes axen there of, accountes, Page 398 other challenge it for dette? Serten, of one thing I am incerteine, that these that charge so much det of worldly cattell, they knowe little of Christes lawe of charitie. For if Ich am a bayly of Gods goodes in the world. If I see my brother in nede, I am holde by charitie to part with him of these goodes to his nede: and if he spendeth them well to the worshop of God, I mote be well apayd as though I my selfe had spended them to the worship of GOD. And if the principall Lord is well payed of my brothers doyng; and the despending of his goodes:

howe may I segge for shame that my brother is dettour to me, of the goodes that I tooke hym to spend in Gods worship at his nede? * And if my brother spendeth amisse the goodes that I take him, I am discharged of my deliuerance of the goodes; If I take him in charitie thilke goods at his nede. And I am hold to be sory of his euill dispending, ne I may not axen the goodes, that I tooke him to his nede in forme of dette, for at his neede they were his as well as myne. And thus is my brother yholde to done to me gif he see me in nede, and gif we bene in charitie, little should we chargen of dette. And ne we shold not axen so dertes, as men that knowen not God. And than we be poore in forsaking all thinges that we own, For gif we ben in charitie, we wollen nother fight nor curse, ne plete for our goodes with our brethren.

O Lord thus thou taughtest thy seruauntes to lyuen. And so they lyueden while they hadden good shepherds, that fedden thy, sheepe and robbed them nat of their lifelode, as Peter thy good shepheard and thy other Apostles. But Lord: he that clepeth hym selfe thy vicar vpon earth and successour to Peter: he robbeth thy puple of their bodylich lyfelode, for he ordeneth proud shepherds to lyuen in ese by th^eitenth party of poore mens trauell. And he geueth them leue to lyuen where them lyketh. And gif men no wolen wilfullich geuen them the tithinges, they wolen han them agaynst their will by maysterye & by cursing, to maken thē riche.

Lord, how may any man segge that such shepherdes that louen more the wolfe then the sheepe, and feden not thy sheepe in body ne in soul, ne ben such rauenours & theeues? And who may segge that the mayntaynour of such shepherdes, ne is not a maintenour of theeues and robbers? How wole he assoyle shepherdes of their robbing without restitution of theyr goodes, * that they robben thy sheep of against their will? Lord of all shepherdes, blessed mote thou be. For thou louedst more the sheepe then theire wole. For thou feedest thy sheepe both in body and soule. And for loue of thy sheepe thou tooke thy death to bring thy sheepe ou^r of Wolves mouthes. And the most charge that thou gone to Peter was to feede thy sheepe. And so he did truelich, and took the death for thee and for thy sheepe. For he came into the fold of shepe by the that were the dore. And so I trowe a fewe other did as he did, though they clepen himselfe successors to Peter, * for theyr workes shoven what they ben. For they robben and sleen and destroyen: they robben thy sheepe of the tenth part of their trauel, and feden themselfe in ease. They sleen thy sheepe, for they pyenen them for hunger of theyr soule to the death. They destroyen the sheepe, for with might and with sternship they rulen thy sheepe: that for dred they beene disparsed abroade in mountaynes, * and there the wilde beasts of the field destroyeth thē for default of a good shepeheard.

O Lord, gif it be thy will deliuer thy sheepe out of such shepherdes ward that retcheth not of thy sheepe, they han their wolfe to make them selfe rich. For thy shepe ben in great mischiefe and foule accombred with their shepherdes.

* But for thy shepherdes wolden ben excused, they haue ygeten them hyred men to feede thy people, and these comen in sheepes clothing. But dredles, their workes shewen that * with in forth they ben but Wolfes. For han they theyr hyre, they ne retcheth but a little howe sorilich thy sheepe ben kept. For as they seggen themselfe, they ben but hyred men that han no charge of thy sheepe. And when the shulden feden thy sheepe in the plentuous * lesewe of thy teaching, they stonden betweene them & theyr lesewe, so that the sheepe ne han but a sight of thy lesewe, but eaté they shall not therof. But they fedē them in a sorry sowre lesewe of lesinges & of tales. And so thy sheepe fallen into greeuous sicknes through this euill lesewe. And gif any shepe breake ouer into thy lesewe to tasten the sweetnes therof, anon these hyred men driue him out with hounds. And thus thy shepe by these hyred men, ben ykept out of their kindlich lesewe, and ben yfed with soure grasse & sory baren lesewe. And yet they feden but seldome, and when they han sorilych fed them, they taken great hyre, and gone away from thy sheepe and letten them a worth. And for drede least thy sheepe wolden in theyr absence goe to thy sweet lesewe, they han enclosed it all about so stronglich and so high, that there may no sheepe comen there with in, but gif it be a* walisch leper of the moūtayns that may with his long legs lepen ouer the wallys. For the hirid men ben ful certayn, that gif thy sheepe had ones ytasted the sweetnes of thy lesewe: They ne would no more bene yfed of these hyred men in their foure lewes, & therfore these hyred mē kepen thē out of that lesewe. For hadden the sheepe once ytasted well of thy lesewe, they wouldē without a leder go thider to their mete,* and then mote these hired men sechen them another labour to liue by than keping of shepe. And they bene sel and ware ynowe thereof, and therefore they feden thy sheepe with soure meate that naught is & hiden from thy shepe the swetenes of thy lesew. And so though these hyred men gone in shepes clothing, in their works they ben wolues, that much harme done to thy sheeps as we haue ytold.

O Lord, they comē as shepe, for the seggē that they ben poore and haue forsaken the world to liuen parsetlich as thou taughtest in the gospell. Lord this is shepes clothing. But Lord tho•• ne taughtest not a man to forsaken the trauelous liuing in porenesse in the world, to liuen in ese with riches by other mens trauell, & haue Lordship on their brethrē. For lord this is more to forsakē thee & go to the world.

O Lord thou ne taughtest not a man to forsake the world to liuen in poorenes of begging by other mens trauell that bene as feble as they ben.* Ne Lord thou ne taughtest not a man to liuen in poorenes of begging, that were strong inough to trauell for his lifelode. Ne Lord thou ne taughtest not a man to ben a begger to beg of mē more then him nedeth, to build great castles and make great •uasts to thilke that han no need.

O Lord thou ne taughtest not men this poorenes, for it is out of charitye. But thy poorenes that thou taughtest, nourisheth charitye. Lord sith Paul sayth, that he that forsaketh the charge of thilke that ben* homelich with him, hath forsaken his fayth and is worse then a misbeleued man: How then now these men seggen that they beleuē in Christ, that han forsake their poore feeble frendes; & let them liue in trauell and in disese, that trauelled full sore for thē, when the weren young and vnmighty to helpen themselfe? And they wolē liue in ese by other mens trauell euermore begging withouten shame.

Lord thou ne taughtest not this maner poorenes, for it is out of charite. And all the law is charity and thing that nourisheth charite. And these shepheards send about to kepe thy shepe & to feden thē other whiles bareyne lewsewes. Lord thoune madest none such shep'heardes,* ne keepers of the sheepe that ••desory lich thy shepe, and for so litle trauell taken a great ••, and sithē al the yeare afterward, do what them liketh, and let thy shepe perish for default of keping.

But thy shepherdes abiden still with their sheepe; and feden thē in thy plenteou, lesewe of thy teaching, and gone byfore thy shepe, and teachen them the way into the plenteous and swete 〈◇〉 we, and kepen thy flocke from rauening of the wilde bestes of the field.

O Lord deliuer the sheepe out of the ward of those shepheardes and these hyred mē,* that stonden more to kepe their riches that they robben of thy shepe, than they stonden in keping of thy sheepe.

O Lord when thou come to Ierusalem, some time thou droue out of the temple sellers of bestes and of other chaffre, and saydest: Mine house shoulde ben cleped an house of prayers: but they maden a dē of theues of it. O Lord, thou art the temple in whom we shoulde prayen thy father of heauen. And Salomons temple that was ybelded at Ierusalem, was figure of this temple. But Lord, he that clepeth himselfe thy vicar vpon earth, and sayth that he occupyeth thy place here on earth: is become a chapman in the temple, and hath his chapmen walking in diuers countreys to sellen hys chaffare, and to maken him rich. And he sayth, thou gaue him so great a power abouen all other men, that what euer he bindeth other vnbindeth in earth, thou bindest other vnbindest the same in heauen. And so of great power he selleth other men forgeuenes of their sinne.* And for much money he will assoylen a man so cleane of his sinne, that he * behoteth men the blesse of heauen withouten any payne after that they be dead, that geuen him much mony.

Bishopriches & cherches, & such other chaffares he selleth also for mony, and maketh himselfe rich And thus he beguiled the puple.

O Lord Iesu, here is much vntruth, and mischief, and matter of sorow. Lord thou saydest sometime, that thou wouldest be with thy seruantes into the end of the world. And thou saydest also, there as tweyne of three ben ygadred to gedder in thy name, that thou art in the midle of thē. A Lord, then it was no need to thee to maken lietetenaunt, sith thou wolte be euermore amongst thy seruauntes.

Lorde thou axedst of thy disciples,* who they trowed that thou were. And Peter aunswered and sayd, that thou art Christ Gods sonne. And thou saydest to Peter. Thou art I blessed Symon Bariona, for flesh and bloud ne showed not this to thee, but my Father that is in heauen. And I say to thee, that thou art Peter, and vpon this stone ych wole byld my Church, and the gates of hell he shullen not aua•len agens it. And to the ych wole geue the keyes of heauen and what euer thou byndest vpon earth, shall be bound in heauen: & what euer thou vnbyndest on earth, shalbe vnbounden in heauen. This power also was graunten vnto the other disciples as well as to Peter as the Gospell openlich telleth. In this place men seggen that thou graunted to Peters successors, the selue power that thou gaue to Peter. And therefore the Bishop of Rome, that sayth he is, Peters successour, taketh this power to him to binden and vnbynden in earth what him liketh. But Lord, ych haue much wonder how he may for shame clepen himselfe Peters successour. For Peter knowledged that thou were Christ and God, and kept the hestes of thy law: but these han forsaken the hestes of thy law, and hath y maked a law contrary to thyne hestes of thy law. And so he maked himself a false Christ and a false God in earth. And It row thou gaue hym no power to vndoe thy law.* And so in taking this power vpon him, maketh him a false Christ & Antichrist. For who may be more agens Christ, than he that in his wordes maketh himselfe Christes vicar in earth. And in hys werkes vndoth the ordinaunce of Christ, and maketh men byleuē that it is needful to the heale of mens soules: to byleuen that he is Christes vicar in earth. And what euer he byndeth in earth is ybounden in heauen, & vnder this colour he vndoth Christes law, and maketh men alwayes to kepen his law, and hestes. And thus men may yseene that he is agenst Christ, and therefore he is Antichrist that maketh men worshupen him as a God on earth,* as the the proud K. Nabugodonosor did sometime, that was K. of Babylon. And therefore we lewed men that knowne not God but thee Iesu Christ, beleuen in thee that art our God, and our king, and our Christ, and thy lawes. And forsaken Antichrist and Nabugodonosor that is false God, and a false Christ, and hys lawes that ben contrary to thy preaching. And Lord strength thou vs agenst our enemies. For they ben about to maken vs forsaken thee and thy lawe, other elles to putten vs to death. O Lord, onlich in thee is our trust Page 408 to helpe vs in this mischiefe, for thy great goodnes that is withouten end.

Lord, thou he taughtest not thy disciples to assoylen men of her sinne, and setten them a penaunce for their sinne in fasting ne in prayeng, ne other almous dede: ne thy selfe, ne thy disciples, vseden no such power here on earth. For Lord, thou forgeue men their sinnes, and bede him sinne no more. And thy disciples* fulleden men 〈◇〉 name, in forgeuenesse of her sinnes. Nor they toke no such power vpon them as our priestes dare now. And Lord, thou ne affo•tedest no man both of his sinne and of his payne, that was dew for his sinne, ne thou grauntedst no man such power here on earth.

And Lord, me thinketh that gif there were a purgatorye, and any earthliche man had power to deliueren sinfull men from the paynes of Purgatory,* he shoulde and he were in charitie, sauen euerich man that were in waye of saluation from thilke paynes, sith they make them greater then anye bodeliche paynes of thys world Also gif the Bishop of Rome had such a power, he himselfe should neuer comen in purgatory ne in hell. And sith we see well that he ne hath no power to kepen himselfe ne other men nother out of these bodilych paynes of the world,* and he may goe to hell for his sinne as an other man may: I ne by leue not, that he hath so great power to assoylen men of their sinne as he taketh vpon hym abouen all other men. And I trowe that in this he higheth hymselfe aboue God.

As touching the selling of Byshopricks & personages, I trow it be a poynt of falsehed. For agenst Gods ordinaunce he robbeth poore men of a porcion of theyr sustenaunce, and selleth it, other geueth it, to finde proud men in id•enes that done the lewd puplelitell profite, but much harme as we told before. Thus ben thy commaundementes of treweth, of meekenes, and of poore nesse, vndone by him that clepeth himselfe thy vicar here vpon earth.

A Lord thou gaue vs a commaundement of chastice that is aforsaking of fleshlich lustes. For thou broughtest vs to a liuing of soule that is ygouerned by the word. For Lord, thou ordeinedist woman more frele than man to ben ygouerned by mans rule & his help to please thee & kepe thine hests.* Ne thou ne ordeinedist that a man should desire the company of a woman, and maken her his wife, to lyuen with her in hys lustis, as a swyne doth or a hors. And his wife ne like him not to his lustes, Lord thou ne gaue not a man leaue to departen hym from his wyfe, and taken hym an other.

But Lord, thy mariage is a common accord betwene man & woman, to lyuen together to theyr liues ende, and in thy seruice eyther the better for others helpe, and thilke that thus ben ycome together, bene ioyned by thee, and thilke that God ioyneth, may no man depart. But Lord, thou sayest that gif a man see a woman to coueten her, than he doth with the woman lecherye in his hart, And so Lord, gif a man desire his wife in couetise of such lustes, and not to flye from whoredome, his weddins is lechery, ne thou ne ioynest them not together. Thus was Raguels doughter ywedded to seuen husbandes that the deuill instrangled. But Toby tooke her to lyue with her in clennes, and brynging vp of her children in thy worship, and on him the deuill ne had no power. For the wedding was I maked in God, for God, and through God,*

A Lord, the people is farre ygo from this maner of wedding. For now men weddē theyr wyues for fairenes, other for riches, or some such other fleshlich lustes. And Lord, so it preueth by thē for the most part. For a man shall not finde two wedded in a lande, where the husband loues the wife, and the wife is buxum to the man, as they shoulde after thy law of maryage. But other the mā loues not his wife, or the wife is not buxum to her man. And thus Lord is the rule of prefe, that neuer fayleth no preue whether it be done by thee or no.* And Lord, all this mischief is common among thy people, for that they knowe not thy worde, but theyr shepheardes and hyred men sedden them with their * sweuens and leasinges. And Lord, where they shoulde gon before vs in the field, they seggen theyr order is so holy for thy mariage. And Lord, he that calleth himselfe thy vicar vpon earth, will not suffren priestes to taken them wiues, for that is agaynst hys law: But Lord,* he will dispensen with them to kepen horen for a certayne somme of mony. And Lord, all horedome is forfended in thy law. And Lord, thou neuer forfendest priestes their wiues, ner thy Apostles neyther. And well I wote in our land, priestes hadden wiues vntill Anselmus dayes in the yere of our Lord God, a leuē hundred and twenty and nyne, as Huntingdon writes. And Lord, this makes people for the most part beleuen, that lechery is no sinne. Therefore we lewd men prayen thee that thou wolt send vs shepheardes of thine owne that wolen feeden thy flocke in thy lesewe, and gon before thēselfe, and so written thy law in our harts, that from the least to the most all they mayen knowne thee. And Lord, geue our king and his Lordes, hart to defenden thy true shepheardes and thy sheepe from out of the wolues mouthes, and grace to know thee that art the true Christ, the sonne of thy heauenly father, from the Antichrist, that is the sonne of pride. And Lorde, geue vs thy poore sheepe patience and strength to suffer for thy law, the cruelnes of the mischieuous Wolues. And Lord, as thou hast promised, shorten these dayes. Lord we axen this now, for more •eede was their neuer.

I doubt not gentle reader, but in reading this goodly treatise aboue prefixed, the matter is <◇> & playne of it selfe w^out any further explication, what is to be thought and iudged of this vicare of Christ, and successour of Peter, whome we call the Bishop of Rome: whose life here thou seest not onely to be so disordered in all poynts, swar^oing from the steppes and example of Christ the Prince and Byshop of our soules, but also whose lawes and doctrine is so repugnant and contrary from the preceptes and rule of the Gospell, that almost there is no conuenience betweene them: as in the perusing of this complayning prayer, thou mayest notoriously vnderstand. Wherefore hauing no neede to stand in any further expressing of thys matter, but leauing it to thine own consideration, and discretion: I will speede my selfe (Christ willing) to proceede toward the time of Iohn Wickliffe, and his fellowes taking by order of yeres as I go, suche thinges by the way as both happened before the said time of Wickleste, and also may the better prepare the minde of the reader, to the entring of that story. Where first I think it not inconuenient to inferre a propheticall parable, written about this time or not much before, which the author morally applieth vnto the Byshop of Rome. To what author this prophecie or morall is to be ascribed, I haue not certainly to affirme. Some say, that Rupesciffanus (of whome mention is made before. pag. 390. was the author therof, & alledge it out of Froysard, but in Froisard as yet I haue not found it. In y^e mean seasō, as I haue foūd it in Latin expressed, because it painteth out y^e Pope so rightly in his fethers & colours, as I thought the thing not to be omitted, so I tooke this present place, as most fit (although peradventure missing the order of yeares a litle) to insert the same. The effect of which parable followeth here vnder written.

In the time of Pope Innocent the 6. aboue specified, this Ioannes de Rupe scissa: a Fryer among other hys prophecies merueilously forespake (as alledged Froysard, who both hard and saw him) of the taking of Iohn the Frenche king prisoner, and brought forth many other notable collections concerning the perils, mutations and changings in y^e Church to come. And at what time the pope kept hym at Auinion in prison (where Froysard is sayd to see hym and to speake with him) the sayd Froysard hard in y^e popes Court this example and parable, recited by the foresayd Fryer Rupescissanus, to the two Cardinals, to wit, Cardinall Hostiensis, and Cardinal Auxercensis, which followeth in these wordes.*

When on a certayne time, a byrde was brought into the worlde all bare and without fethers, the other byrdes hearing thereof, came to visite her: & for that they sawe her to be a merueilous fayre and beautifull byrd they counsailed together howe they might best do her good, sith by no meanes without fethers, she might eyther flee or liue commodiously. They all wished her to liue for her excellent forme and beauties sake, in so muche that among them all there was not one, that would not graunt some part of her own fethers to decke this byrde withall: yea, and the more trim they sawe her to be, the more fethers still they gaue vnto her, so that by this meanes she was passing well pēned and fethered, and began to flee. The other byrdes that thus had adourned her with goodly fethers, beholding her to flee abroad, were merueilously delighted therewith. In y^e end, this byrd seeing her selfe so gorgeously fethered, & of al the rest to be had in honor: began to waxe proud & hauty. in so much that she had no regard at all vnto thē,* by whōe she was aduanced: yea she pūged them with her beak, plucked them by the skinne and fethers, and in all places hurted them. Whereupon the byrdes sitting in counsell agayne, called the matter in question, demaūding one of an other what was best to be done touching this vnkind bird whom they louingly with their own fethers had decked & adourned: Affirming, that they gaue not theyr fethers to y^e intent that she therby puft vp with pride, should contemp'tuously dispise them all. The Pecocke therefore aunswereth first. Truly sayth he, for that she is brauely set forth with my paynted fethers, I wil againe take them frōter. Then sayth the Falcon, and I also will haue mine againe. This sentence at length took place among them all, so that euery one plucked frō her those fethers which before they had geuen, chalenging to them their owne agayne. Now this proude byrd seeing her selfe thus to be dealt wythall, began forthwith to abate her hauty stomacke, and humbly to submit her selfe openly, cōfessing and acknowledging y^e or her selfe she did nothing: but that her fathers, her honor and other ornamentes was their gifte: she came into the world all naked & bare, they clad her with comely fethers, and therefore of right may they receaue thē againe. Wherefore in most humble wise she desireth pardon, promising to amend all that is past, neither would she at any time hereafter commit, whereby through pride she might lose her fethers againe. The gentle byrdes that before had geuen their fethers, seing her so humble and lowly, being moued with pitie, restored againe the fethers whiche lately they had taken away, adding withall this admonition. We will gladly, say they, behold thy flying amōg vs, so long as thou wilt vse thine office with humblenes of minde, which is y^e chieftest comelines of al the rest. But this haue thou for certainty, that if at any time hereafter thou extoll thy selfe in pride, we will straightwayes depriue thee of thy fethers, & reduce thee into thy former state wherin we found thee. Euen so oh you Cardinals (sayth Iohannes Rupescissanus) shal it happen vnto you. For y^e Emperours of Romaines and Almayne, and other Christian kings, potentates, and princes of the earth, haue bestowed vpon you goods, lāds, and riches, that should serue God, but you haue poured it out and consumed it vpon pride, all kinde of wickednes, ryot and wantonnes.

Armachanus.

*IN the Catalogue of these learned and zelous defenders of Christ against Antichrist aboute rehearsed, whome the Lord about this time began to rayse vp for reformation of his Church, being then farre out of frame, I cannot forget nor omit something to write of the reuerend Prelate, and famous Clerke Richard Armachanus, primate and Archb. of Ireland: A man for his life and learning so memorable, as the condition of those dayes then serued, that the same daies then as they had but sewe good, so had none almost his better. His name was Richard Fizraf, made primate and Archb, as is sayd, of Ireland. First brought vp in the vniuersitie of Oxford, in the study of all liberall knowledge, wherein he did exceedingly profire vnder Iohn Bakenthorpe his tutor and instructor. In this time the begging Friers began greatly to multiply and spread, vnto whome this Bakenthorpe, was euer a great enemye. Whose steppes the scholler also following, began to do the like. Such was the capacitie and dexteritie of this Fizraf, that he being commended to king Edward the 3. was promoted to him, first to be Archdeacon of Lichfield, then to be the commissary of the vniuersitie of Oxford. At length to be Archbishop of Armach in Ireland. He being Archbishop, vppon a time had cause to come vp to London: * At what time here in the said citty of London was contention betweene the Friers and the clergie about preaching, and hearing confessions &c. Whereupon, this Armachanus being requested to preach, made 7. or 8. sermons. Wherein he propounded 9. * conclusions agaynst the Friers, for the which he was cited vp by the Friers before this pope Innocent the 6. to appeare, And so he did, who before the face of the pope valiantly defended, both in preaching & in writing the same conclusions, & therein stood constantly vnto the death, as the wordes of Iohn Wickliffe in his Trialogo do well testifie in this wise:

Ab Anglorum Episcopis conductus Armachanus, nouem in Auinione conclusiones coram Innocentio 6. & suorum Cerdinalium coetu, contra fratrum mendicitatem, audacter publicauit, verbóque ac scriptis ad mortem vsque defendit

. The like also testifieth of him Waldenus in fasciso zizianniorum. Also Volateranus reporteth the same. Gulielmus Botonerus testifying of him in like maner, saith: that Armachanus first reprobued begging Friers for hearing the confessions of professed nonnes, without licence of their superiours, and also of maryed women without knowledge of their husbandes. What daungers and troubles he susteyned by his persecutors, and howe miraculously the Lord deliuered him from their handes: In so much, that they meeting him in the open streetes and in cleare day light, * yet had no power to see him, nor to apprehend hym. In what perill of theeues and searchers he was in, and yet the Lord deliuered him, yea and caused his mony being take from him, to be restored againe to him by portions, in time of his necessitie and famine. Also from what dangers of the kinges officers, which comming with the kings letters layd all the hauens for him: yet howe the Lord Iesus deliuered him, * shewing him by what wayes how to escape them. Moreouer, what appeales were layd agaynst hym, to the number of 16. and yet how the Lord gaue him to triumph ouer al his enemies. How the Lord also taught him & brought him out of the profound vanities of Aristotles subtlety, to the study of the Scriptures of God. All this w^t much more, he himselfe expresseth in a certaine prayer or confession made to Christ Iesus our Lord, in which he describeth almost the whole history of his owne life. Whiche prayer I haue to shewe in old written hand, and hereafter (Christ willing) intēd as time serueth to publish the same. The beginning of the prayer in latin is this.

Tibi laus,*tibi gloria, tibi gratiarum actio, Iesu pijssime, Iesu potentissime, Iesu dulcissime: qui dixisti, Ego sum via, veritas & vita. Via sine deuio: veritas sine nubilo: & vita sine termino. Quod tute viam mihi ostendisti. Tute veritatem me docuiste Et tute vitā mihi promisisti: Via eras mihi in exilio. Veritas eras in consilio. Et vita eris mihi in premio . With the rest that followeth in the foresayd prayer.

Thus what were the troubles of this good man, and how he was cited vp by the Friers to the P. you haue part|ly heard: Nowe what were his reasons and argumentes wherwith he defendeth his cause in the popes presence, followeth to be declared. For the tractation whereof firste I must put the reader in remēbrauce of the controuersie mētioned before in the story of Guliel de sancto de Amore. Pag. 322. Also in the story of the vniuersitie of Paris contending against the Friers pag. 392. For so long did this controuersie continue in the Church, from the yeare. 1240. whē y^e Oxford men began fies• to stand against the Fryers to the time of this Armachanus, that is, to the yeare 1360. and after this time yet more encreased. So it pleased the secret prouidence of God (for what cause he best knoweth) to suffer his Church to be entangled and exercised sometimes with matters and controuersies of no great importance. Eyther to keepe the vanitie of mens wits thus occupied frō idlenes, or els to prepare their mindes by these smaller matters, to the consideration and searching out of other thinges more graue and weighty. Like as nowe in these our Queenes dayes, we see what tragidies be rayسد vp in Englād about formes &, fashions of ministers wearings, what troubles grow, what placing and displacing there is about the same: Euen so at this time happened the like stirre about the liberties and priuilegies of the Friers, which not a little troubled, and occupied al the churches & Diuines almost through Christendome. The whiche controuersie, to the intent it may better be vnderstanded (all y^e circumstances therof being explained) we will first begyn from the originall and foundation of the matter, to declare by order and course of yeres, vpon what occasion this variance first rising, in continuance of time increased & multiplide in gathering more matter, and brast out at length to this tumultuous contention among learned men.

Concerning therfore this present matter, first it is to be vnderstand, that in the yeare of our Lord. 1215. vnder pope Innocent the 3. was called a generall coūcell at Laterane, mentioned before. Pag. 253. in the dayes of king Iohn. Iu the which councell among many other thinges, was constituted a certaine law or Canon, beginning Omnis vtrius{que} sexus. &c. the tenour of which canon in English is thus.*

Be it decreed, that euery faythfull Christian, both man and woman comming to the yeares of discretion, shall confesse hymselfe alone of all his sinnes, to the priest of hys own proper parish, once in the yeare at least: and that he shall endeouour by hys owne self to fulfil the penance, whēsoeuer he receiueth the sacrament of Eucharistie, at least at the time of Easter. Vnlesse by the assent of his Minister, vpon some reasonable cause to abstayne for the time. Otherwise dooing, let him both lacke the communion of the Church being aliue, and Christian buriall when he is dead. Wherefore be it decreed, that this wholesome constitution shalbe published accustomedly in Churches, to the end that no man of ignorance or of blindnes make to himselfe a cloke of excuse. And if any shall confesse himselfe to any other priest then of his owne parishe vpon any iust cause, let him aske and obtayne first licence of his owne priest: Other els, the Priest to haue no power to hinde him or to loose him. &c.

In the time of this Innocentius,* and of this Laterane councell, was Dominicke, the first author and founder of the preaching Fryers: who laboured to the said Pope Innocent, for the confirmation of his order, but did not obteyne, in his life tune.

The next yeare after this Laterane councell, dyed pope Innocent. an. 1216. after whome came Honorius 3. who in the first yeare of his Popedom confirmed the order of the frier Dominicke, and gaue to him and his fryers authority to preach and to beare confessions, with diuers other priuilegies more. And vnder this Pope whiche gouerned 10. yeares, liued Dominick fiue yeares after y^e confirmatiō of his order and dyed an. 1221. About which yeare, the order Page 408 of the Franciscane Friers began also to bread,* & to spread in the world, through preaching and hearing confessions.

After this Honorius next followed Pope Gregory the 9. about the yeare of our Lord 1228. who for the promoting of the forsayd order of Dominickes, gaue out this Bull, in tenour as followeth.

*Gregorius bishop seruaunt of Gods seruauntes, to his reuerende brethren, Archbishops Bishoppes, and to his welbeloued Children, Abbots, Priors, and to All Prelates of churches, to whom soeuer these presentes shall come, greting, and Apostolical blessing. Because*iniquitie hath abounded, & the charity of man hath waxt cold: Behold, the Lord hath rayseed vp the order of our weiloued children the preaching Friers, who not seking things of their owne, but pertayning to Iesus Christ, to the extirping as wel of heresies as to the roting out also of other pernicious pestilenciés: haue dedicate themselues to the preaching of the*word of God We therefore minding to aduaunce their sacred purpose. &c. and followeth, commaunding you to see the sayd persons, gently to be receaued among you: And that your flockes committed to your charge do receaue deuoutly the seede of Gods word out of their mouth, and doe confesse their sinnes vnto them, all suche as list, whome wee haue authorised to the same, to heare confessions, and to enioyne penance. &c. Dat. Perusij. an. Pont. nostri. 8.

*This pope Honorius dyed about the yeare of our Lord 1241. after whom came Celestinus the fourth and sat but 18. daies, then came Innocentius the fourth and sat 11. yeares and 6. monethes. who although he began first to fauour the friers: yet afterward being altered by certayn Diuines of Uniuersities, Prelates of Churches, and Curates: and debarred them of their liberties and priueledges, & gaue out agayne preceptes and excommunications, as well agaynst the Friers, as all other religious persons. And not long after the same he was dispatched.

Innocentius being thus remoued out of the way, about the yeare of our Lord, 1353. Then succeeded Pope Alexander the fourth a great mayntainer of the Friers, and sat 7. yeares. He reuoked and repeated the Actes and writings of Pope Innocent his predecessour, geuen forth agaynst the Friers: wherwith the Diuines and Students of Paris benig not wel contented, stirred vp foure principall Doctours: The first and chiefe captayne was Guliel. de sancto Amore, mentioned before. pag. 322. against whom wrote Albertus Magnus, and Thomas Aquine. And at last he was condemned by this foresayd Pope Alexander the 4. in the Extrau. Non sine multa. The second was Simon Iornalensis, the third, Godfridus de Fontibus, the iiii. Henricus de Gandaue. These foure with other their complices, compiled a certaiene booke against the begging order of Friers, both Dominicans, and Franciscāns intituled, Depericulis Ecclesiae, cōreiningxim chapters. wherof the 14. which is the last, with 39. articles agaynst the Friers we haue already trāslated and expressed, pag. 317. Beside these. 39. articles, be other vii. articles moreouer to the said booke annexed, vnder the name of the students of Paris against the Friers, prouing why the sayd Friers ought not to be admitted into their societie. which vii. articles because they are but short, I thought here better to place, then to omit them.

Certaine articles geuen out by the Studentes of Paris, agaynst the Fryers, why they should not be admitted to theyr societie.

*First we say, they are not to be admitted to the societie of our schole, but vpon our will and licence. For our company or fellowship ought not to be coactiue, but voluntary and free.

Secondly, we say they are not to be admitted, for somuch as we oft proued their community, manifold wayes to be hurtfull and incommodious.

Thirdly, seeing they be of a diuers prosession from vs (for they are called regular, and not schollasticall) we therefore ought not to bee ioyned and associate together in one scholasticall office. For asmuch as the Councell of Spayne doth say, * thou shalt not plough with the Oxe, and with the Asse together. which is to say: Men of diuers professions ought not together to be matched in one kinde of calling, or standing, for theyr studies and conditions be disagreeing and disseuered from ours, and cannot frame or couple together in one communion.

Fourthly we affirme, by the Apostle that they are not to be admitted because they worke dissensions and offēces: For so sayth the Apostle Rom vlt. we desire you brethren, that ye obserue. * and take heede of such as make dissensions and offēdicles about the doctrine which you haue learned by the Apostles, and auoyd them. For such serue, not the Lord, but their own belly. Glose Some they flatter some they backbyte, whereby they might feede their belly. That through their sweete and pleasaunt wordes, * and by their benedictions, they may deceaue the hartes of the simple. Glose. That is, with their fine sugered, and trimme couched wordes, they set forth their own traditions, wherewith they beguile the hartes of the simple innocentes.

Fiftly, we say they are not to be admitted. For that we feare least they be in the number of them, which goe about and deuoure mens houses. For they thrust in themselues into euery mans house, searching and sacking the consciences and states of all persons. * And whom they finde easie to be seduced, as women: such they doe circumuent, & lead them away from the counsailes of their Prelates, bynding them either in acte or oth: from such we are warned by the Apostle to auoyd.

Sixtly, wee say they are to bee auoyded: because wee feare they are false Prophetes. Whiche being neither Byshops, ner parish priests, * nor yet their Uicars, nor sent by them, yet they preach (not sent) against the minde of the Apostle, Rom. 10. saying: How shall they preach except they be sent? For els there appeareth in them no such great vertue, for the whiche they ought to be admitted to preach vncalled. Seing therefore that such are so daungerous to the Church, they ought to be auoyded.

Seuenthly, we say they are not to be admitted, because they be a people so curious in searching & inquiring of oother mens doings and spirituall demaynour. And yet be they neyther Apostles,* nor yet successours of y^e Apostles, as bishops: nor of the number of the 72. Diciples of the Lord: nor their successors, y^t is parish Priestes: nor their helpers, nor yet Uicars, wherefore, seing they liue so in no order, by the sentence of the Apostle we are commaunded to auoyd them. 2. Thess. vlt. where he saith: we admonish and denounce vnto you (O brethren) in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: that is, as the Glose, sayth (we commaund you by the authoritie of Christ) that you withdrawe your selues from euery brother, that walketh inordinately, and not after the tradition, which you haue receaued of vs. &c. Looke vpon the common glose of this place, and you shall finde, that such are to be auoyded till time they amend from so doing. &c.

Besides these articles aboue rehearsed,* certaine propositions or conclusions were also propounded in the scholes of Paris the same time, solemnly to be disputed and defended agaynst the Fryers: which in a briebe some of wordes to collect, were these.

First, that the begging Friers were not in the state of saluation.

Secondly, that they were bound to labour with theyr handes that could, and not to begge.

Thirdly, that they ought not to exercise the office of preaching, or to heare the confessiōs of them that wil come to them, although being licensed thereunto by the Byshop of Rome, or by the Diocesane: for somuch as the same is preiudiciall to the ministers and Priestes of the Parishes.

All these foresayd articles & conclusions,* w^t the booke set forth by these Paris men: This Pope Alexander the 4. condemned to be abolished and burned, writing his preceptes to the French K. and also the Vniuersitie of Paris, in the fauour of the Friers: willing and commaunding the sayd Fryers to be restored to all their priueledges and libertyes, in as ample maner as in Pope Gregories tyme before.

Not long after Pope Alexander the 4.* followed Clement the 4. an. 1263. and sate 3. yeares. Who also gaue the priuiledge to the Friers, beginning: Quidam temerè &c. In which priueledge he condemneth them that say, that no mā without licence of his Curate or minister, ought to confesse him to the Friers, or that a subiect ought to aske licence of theyr ministers so to doe, whiche was agaynst the Canon Omnis vtriusque sexus &c. made by the Pope Innocent the 3. before recited.

After this Clement, agayn came Pope Martine the 4. an. 1281. who renued again the Canon. Omnis vtriusque sexus; in the behalfe of the Curates against the Friers.

Then Pope Boniface the 8. began to sit, an. 1294, viii. yeares. ix. monethes. Who taking side with the Fryers, gaue to them an other priuiledge, beginning,* Super Cathedram. &c. In the whiche priuiledge he licensed the Fryers, that without licence of Uicars of Churches, they shal first present themselues to the Prelates to be admitted: by whō if they be refused the second time, then they vppon speciall authoritie of this Pope, shall be priueledged: without eyther Byshop or Curate, to preach, to bury, and to heare cōfessions who soeuer will come to them, reuoking all that was decreed by his predecessours before to the contrary notwithstanding.

Page 409 By this Pope Boniface, a certayne Dominick Frier was made Cardinall named Nicholaus de Teruisio, and after the death of Boniface, was made also Pope. an. 1303. surnamed Pope Benedictus 11. Who seing the constituciō of Boniface his predecessor to gender dissension betweene the Prists and Friers,* made an other constitution, beginning: Inter cunctas &c. reuoking the constitution of Boniface his predecessour. Upon which constitution of Pope Benedict, Ioannes Monachus, make a Glose, reuoked also his other Glose made vpon the constitution of Boniface before.

Again, after this Benedictus the 11. folowed pope Clement the 5. an. 1335. and sat 9. yeeres, who in his generall Councell holden at Uienna, reuoked the constitution of Benedictus his predecessor, and renewed agayne the former decree of Boniface, by a new constitution of his, beginning: Dudum a Bonifacio. 8. &c. whiche constitution moreouer was confirmed afterwarde by Pope Iohn the 22. an. 1316. which Pope also caused Ioannes de Poliacco to recant.

Upon this variable diuersity of the Popes (one dissēting and repugning from an other) rose among the Diuines & scholemen in Uniuersities great matter of cōtention, as well in the Uniuersity of Paris, as the Uniuersity of Oxford about the begging Friers, some holding one way, some an other way. But especially 5. principal opinions to be noted of learned men, who thē disputing against the friers, were condemned for heretickes, and their assertions reproued.

*The first, was the opinion of thē which defended, that the friers might not by the licence of the Byshop of Rome and of the Prelats, preach in Parishes, and heare confessions. And of this opinion was Guliel. de Sācto Amore, with his felowes, who as is sayd, were condemned.

The second opiniō was this, that friers, although not by theyr own authority, yet by priuiledge of the Pope and of the Bishop, might preach and heare confessions in Parishes, but yet not without licence of the Parish Priestes. Of this opinion was Bernardus glosing vpon the canō. Omnis vtriusque sexus, afore mentioned,

The third opinion was, that friers might preach and heare confessions, without licence of the Parish Priestes: but yet the sayd parishners notwithstanding were boūd, by the Canon: Omnis vtriusque sexus: to repeate the same sinnes again, if they had no other, to theyr own proper curate: and of this opinion were many, as Godfridus de Fontibus: Henricus de Gandauo:*Ioannes Monachus Cardin: Ioannes de Poliacco. Which Ioannes de Poliacco, Pope Iohn the 22 caused openly in Paris, to recant and retract.

*This Ioannes de Poliacco Doctor of diuinity in Paris, being complayned of by y^e friers for certaine articles or assertions, was sent for to the Pope: where time and place being to him assigned, he in the audience of the Pope and of Frierly Cardinals & other doctors: was straitly examined of his articles. To make the story short, he at length submitting himselfe to the authority of the terrible see of Rome: was caused to recant his assertions openly at Paris. His assertions which he did hold, were these.

The three assertions of Ioannes de Poliaco, which he was caused by the Pope to recant at Paris.

His three assertions.

- *Whereof the first was, they which were confessed to friers, although hauing a generall licence to heare confessions: were bounde to confesse agayne their sinnes to their own Parish Priest, by the constitutiō. Omnis vtriusque sexus. &c.
- The second was, that the sayd cōstitution, Omnis vtriusque sexus, standing in his force, * the Pope could not make: but parishners wer boūd once a yere to confesse theyr sinnes to their Priest. For the doing otherwise importeth a contradiction in it selfe.
- The 3. was, that the Pope could not geue geuerall licēce to heare confessiōs so, but y^r the parishners so confessed were bound to reiterate y^e same confession made, vnto his owne Curate. Which be proued by these places of the Canon law, 25. q. 1. Quae ad per. petuam. Those thinges which be generally ordeyned for publike vtilitey, ought not to be altered by any chaunge, &c. Item, the decrees of the sacrat Canons, none ought to keepe more then the Bishop Apostolicall. &c. Ibidem. Item, to alter or to ordeine any thing agaynst the decrees of the fathers, is not in the authoritey or power, uo not of the Apostolicall sea. Ibidem.

The fourth opinion was, * that the Friers by the licēce of the Pope and of the Bishops might lawfully heare cōfessions, and the people might be of them confessed and absolved. But yet notwithstanding, it was reason, cōueniēt, honest and profitable, that once in the yeare they should be confessed to theyr curats (although being cōfessed before to the friers) because for the administration of Sacraments, * especially at Easter. Of which opinion was Gulielinus de monte Landuno. Henricus de Gandauo also held, not onely to be conuenient, but also that they were bound so to doe.

The fift opinion was, that albeit the Friers might at all times, and at Easter also, heare confessions as the Curates did: yet it was better and more safe, at the time of Easter to confesse to the curates, thē to the Friers. And of this opiniō was this our Armachanus, of whom we presently now entreat.

And thus haue ye, as in a briefe summe opened vnto you, what was the matter of contention betweene the friers and the Church men. What Popes made with the friers: and what Popes made against thē. Moreouer, what learned mē disputed against them in Paris, and other places, and what were theyr opinions.

The matter of contention about the Friers, stode in foure pointes. First preaching without licence of Curats, Second, in hearing cōfessions. Thyrd, in burying. Fourth in begging and taking of the people.

The learned men that disputed agaynst the Friers.
were Guilielmus de S. Amore.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Barnardus super capitulum, Omnis vtriusque sexus,

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Godfridus de Fontibus.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Henricus de Gandauro.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Guilielmus de Landuno.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Ioannes Monachus Cardini.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Ioannes de Poliaco.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.
were Armachanus.

All these were cōdemned by the Popes, or els caused to recant.

These considerations and circūstaunces hetherto premised, for the more opening of this present cause of Armachanus sustained agaynst the idle beggerly sects of friers,* in whom the reader may well perceiue Antechrist plainly reigning, and fighting against the Church: Now remayneth, that as I haue before declared the trauelles & troubles of diuers godly learned mē in the Church striuing agaynst the sayd friers, continually from the time of Guliel. de Amore, hetherto: So now it remaineth, that for so much as this our Armachanus labouring and in the same cause sustained the like conflict with the same Antechrist: we likewise collect and open his reasons and arguments vttered in the consistorye and in the audience of the Pope himselfe wherwith he maynteyneth the true doctrine and cause of the Church agaynst the pestiferous canker creeping in, by these friers after subtle wayes of hypocrisy, to corrupt the sincere simplicity of Christes holy fayth & perfect Testament. The which reasons and argumentes of his, with the whole processe of his doinges: I thought good and expedient for the vtility of the Church, more amply and largely to discourse and prosecute, for that I note in the sects, institutions, and doctrine of these friers, such subtle poyson to lurke: more pernitiuous & hurtfull to the religion of Christ and soules of Christians, then all men peradventure do consider.

Thus Armachanus ioyning with the clergy of England, disputed and contended with the friers here of England Page 410 an. 1358. about a double matter. Wherof the one was concerning confessiō and other exchetes which the friers encroched in parish Churches agaynst the Curates, and publicke pastors of Churches. The other was concerning wilfull beggery and pouerty, which the Friers then tooke vpon them, not vpon any necessity being otherwise strōg enough to worke for their liuing, but onely vpon a wilfull and affected profession. For the which cause the Friers appealed him vp to the court of Rome. The occasion wherof thus did rise.

It befell, that Armachanus vpon certayne busines comming vp to London, found there certayne Doctours disputing and contending about the begging of Christ our Sauior. Wherupon (he being greatly vrged and requested oft times therūto) at request, made seuen or eight sermōs vnto the people at London, wherein he vttered 9. conclusions. Wherof the first and principal conclusion was, touching the matter of the friers priuiledges, in hearing confessions. His conclusion was this.

First, that if a doubt or question be moued for hearing cōfessiōs, which of 2. places is rather to be chosē. The parish church is to be preferred before the church of the friers.

Secondly, being demaunded whether is to be taken (to heare the confession of the parishioners the Parson, or the Curate, or the frier) It is to be sayde, rather the Parson or the Curate.

Thirdly, that our Lord Iesus Christ in his humayne conuersatiō was alwayes poore, but not that he loued pouerty, or did couet to be poore.

Fourthly, that our Lord Iesus Christ did neuer beg, wilfully professing to be poore.

Fiftly, that our Lord Iesus Christ did neuer teach wilfully to beg, or to professe wilfull beggery.

The sixt conclusion was, that Christ our Lord did cōtrary, that men ought not wilfully or purposely wythout meere necessity to beg.

Seuēthly, that there is neither wisdom nor holines, for any man to take vpon him wilfull beggery, perpetually to be obserued.

The eight, that it is not agreing to the rule of the Obseruants, or Friers Minorites, to obserue wilful pouerty.

The last conclusion was, touching the Bull of Pope Alexander the 4. whiche condemned the libell of the maisters of Paris: that the same Bull touched none of these 7. last conclusions.

Upon these 9. conclusions premised, Armachanus being appealed, cited, and brought vp to the presence of the Pope: began to proue the same his foresaid conclusions or assertions vnder protestation made, that his intētiō was not to affirme any thing contrary to the christian fayth, or to the Catholicke doctrine, or that should be preiudicial or destructiue to y^e orders of the begging friers, such as were approued by holy Church, or confirmed by the high Byshops: But onely his intētiō was, to haue the sayd orders reduced to the purity of their first institution. Concerning which matter, he desired his reasons to be heard, which if they should be fōūd weaker then the reasons of the friers, the punishment should be his. If otherwise, that then the friers iustly to be rewarded, for their slaūderous obtrectation and publique cōtumelies, & iniurious dealinges both priuatly and publickly wrought and sought agaynst him:* And so taking for his Theame: Nolite iudicare secundum faciem, sed iustum iudicium iudicate. &c. That is. Iudge not after the outward face, but iudge true iudgement. &c. Iohn. 7. he entreth to the probation of his conclusions:* First beginning with the former conclusion, that the Parish church was a place more fit and conuenient, for the confessiōs or burials of the Parishioners to be vsed, then any other exempt Church or place of the Friers. Which he proued by three causes:* First for the more surenes or certaynty to the conscience of the Parishioners confessed. Secondly, for the more vtility and profit of him.* Thirdly, for the lesse incommodity ensuing by confessions taken in Parish churches, then in friers Churches.

*As touching the first, for the more assurednesse and certainty, thus he argued vpon the place of Deu. 12. vnto that place, which y^e Lord your God shall assigne of all your tribes, to place his name and dwell therein: thether shall you resort, to offer vp your oblations, tithes. &c. And the same place God sayth: See thou offer not thy sacrifice in euery place that liketh thee: but in that place alone which the Lord hath elect in one of the tribes, and thou shalt doe in all thinges as I commaund thee. Also vpon the wordes of Leuit. 4. and 5. which be these. Whosoeuer sinneth of ignorance, shal offer to the priest, and he shall pray for him,*and he shalbe forgeuen &c. Upon these places thus he argued: that forasmuch as the Sacramēts of the Church are to be frequented and vsed in no other place but onely in that, which by God himselfe peculiarly is assigned and commaunded for the same: And seing that elect place in the law representeth the Parish Churches: neither can it be proued that the Friers Church is the place prescribed of God, but onely permitted by Byshops of Rome: He concluded therefore, that Parish Churches for confessions and burialles, were more sure and certayne to the conscience of Parishioners, then the exempt places of the Friers.

By an other reason also he confirmed the same, for that the parish Church commonly standeth free frō the Popes interdict, so do not the Churches of the Friers:* As which stand not so cleare, but that they are vnder suspition, and doubt of the Popes interdict: by the Decretall. De sepulturis in sexto. cap Animarum periculis. In which Decretall, all such conuentuall Churches and Churchyardes of Friers be interdicted, which do induce any person or persons, either by oth or promise made, to chuse their burying places in their churches, as commonly the friers are reported to do. For els what parishner would forsake his owne church & parish where his auncestors do lye, to be buried among the Friers, if the Friers did not induce thē so to do:

Moreouer for the secōd part,* concerning the vtility of the place, that he confirmed doublewise. First, for that confessiō made within the parish church, hath a double merit of obedience, both for obeying the commaūdement of God in opening his confessiō thus he speaketh according to y^e blindnes of that time, for that auricular confessiō hath any cōmaundement of God, cannot be proued: & also in obeying the commaundemēt of God in obseruing the place by him appointed, y^e which second merit of obedience lacketh in y^e Friers part.* Secondly, he proued to be greater vtility for a parishioner to confesse him in his parish Church, thē with the Friers. Because commonly the number of Christen people praying, is ten times more in parish churches. Wherby is to be thought, that ech singuler persō may better be helped through moe prayers, then in the Oratories of the Friers, &c.

Farther as touching the third part of the first conclusion or Article he proued,* that it had fewer incōmodities to resort euery man to his parish Church, then to the friers: for that both great vtilitye, and more certaynety (as hath ben proued) did ensue therof: which two being take away, (as must need, in resorting to the friers Church) thē two speciall commodities should be hindred, & so great incommodities therof should follow. And thus much for y^e place of the friers.

Now to the second conclusion or Article touching the person of the frier,* and of the ordinary Curate. If the questiō be, which of these two is to be preferred in the office of Ecclesiasticall administratiō: the opinion of Armachanus was, that the ordinary Curate was better then the extraordinary frier,* and that for the three foresayd respectes, to wit, for certaintie or assuraunce, for vtility, and for incommodity to be auoyded.

First that it is more safe and sure for the parishioners to resort to theyr ordinary or parish priest, hee argued by 3. reasons: first because the person of the lawfull ordinary or priestes is expressly of God commaūded, where the persō of the frier is not, and therefore is forbid. Secondly, because the parishner may more trust to his ordinary Curate, as who is more bound & obliged to prouide and to be carefull for him, then any other extraordinary person, Thirdly, because in the person of the ordinary curate, commonly there is no doubt of any interdict to bind him: whereas contrary in the friers be halfe: there is good matter to doubt, whe|ther he stand bound vnder the popes cēsure of excōmunication or not, and that for diuers causes, as by the cap. Reli|giosi, in Clemētinis de decimis.* Where is decreed, that all such religious mē, which hauing no benefices or cure of soule, presume to impropertate vnto them glebe land or other tithes due vnto Churches, and not appertayning to them (by any maner of colour or fraudulent circumuention) do incur the sentence of excommunication,* ipso facto. Also by another cap Religiosi, De priuilegijs. in Clement. Where it is sayd, that all such religious men are excommunicated De facto, whosoever doe absolue any, agaynst whom the sentence of excommunication hath bene denounced by statute prouincial, or sinodal: as it is commonly said, that the friers hearing mēs cōfessions are accustomed to do, in loosing them whom the censure of prelates, or their Officials haue bound. Wherof the sayd Armachanus bringeth forth example of his own Dioces: For I (sayd he) in mine own Dioces of Armachan, haue as good as two thousād vnder me, who by the censure of excōmunication euery yere, denoūced against wilfull murtherers, common theues, burners Page 411 of mens houses, & such like malefactors, stand accursed: Of all which number notwithstanding, scarcely 14. there be, which come to me or to any about me for their absolution. And yet all they receiue the Sacramentes as other do, & all because they be absoyled, or because they faine themselues to be absoyled by none other then by friers: who in so doing, are proued to be vnder the daūger of excommunication, both the friers, and also the parishners, if they knowing therof do consent to theyr error.

Also out of the said Clementines, by three other places in one chapter, he proued the friers to be excōmunicate, to with in the chap. *Cupientes, De poenis in Clement. In y^e which chapter: First, all such religious men are excommunicate, which in their Sermons presume to withdraw their hearers from their tithes paying, due vnto churches. Secōdly, in the sayd chapter all such friers are suspended from preaching, * and so are excommunicate, which within a certayne time did not make a conciō to such as come to theyr confessions, in paying their tythes truely and duely to the Church. Thirdly, in the foresayd chapter also, all such religious persons be bound in excōmunication, which induce men by any maner of meanes, either by vow, othe, or promise, to chuse theyr burials within their Churches, or not to chaūge the same, if they haue made any such promise before. In all which three poyntes, he proued the friers to be culpable and excommunicate.

*Moreouer, for the more surer way for y^e parishners to resort to their appointed curates, thē to y^e friers, he argued thus. For that the parish Priest or Curate being better acquaynted with his owne parishner thē is a straunger, can better iudge of the nature and dispositiō of his disease, and minister to him due Phisick of penaunce for the same, and also wilbe more carefull in curing him.

Thus the first part of the second conclusion or article being proued and argued, Armachanus procedeth farther to proue the second part: that is better for the parishners to leaue the Friers, and to resort to their owne Pastors. Which he proued by eight or nine reasons.

First, for that the ordinary pastor, is properly appointed of God vnto that ministry: Wheras the Frier, is but onely permitted of man therunto.

Secondly, for that in resorting to the ordinary of the parish, is a double reward of merite, wheras in comming to the Friers there is but one.

Thirdly, because the ordinary is more bounde to his owne flocke, and is to be thought to be more tender and carefull ouer them, then a straunger.

Fourthly, because to resort to the person of his owne ordinary, there is more assuraunce and certainty, (as is aboue declared) then to an other.

*Fiftly, because (as Innocentius, Cap. Si animarum, sayth) the comming to the curate or pastor ordinary, is more easy and light, both in the night and in necessity.

Sixtly, for so much as the parishner must needes come to his Curate at some time, and especially beeing in necessity: It is expedient and profitable, that his former life before were knowne to him, rather then to the other.

Seuenthly, for that (as the sayd Innocentius affirmeth) it striketh more shame of his sinne to the parishner to be confessed to his curate whom he seeth euery day, then to a frier vnknowne.

Eightly, because it is more profitable especially for thē that liue in Matrimony, that he which heareth the confession of the one, should heare also the cōfession of the other. So that one hearing the confession of them both as a spirituall Phisition taking two cures in one body, may better know what spirituall coūsell is to be ministred to the one, after he hath cured the other, &c.

*These things thus proued before, then Armachanus consequently proceedeth to the third part: Arguing, how the greater detrimetes and inconueniences do ensue by confessions, burials, and other Ecclesiasticall functions exercised by the friers, then by pastors & secular curats, seruing in parishes. About the which matter, the sayd Armachanus learnedly and worthely inferreth a long discourse prouing and inferring how pernicious these orders of friers are to the whole state of the church: And what mischief commeth by the priuiledges of certain Popes, which haue priuiledged them to intermeddle in the office & function of Ecclesiasticall ministers, to preach, and to take almes, and tithes of the people, and impropertions from the church. All which his reasōs & argumēts to prosecute in order as he hath left them in writing, it would make a matter of a large booke. Notwithstanding, because it shall not be vnfruitfull both for the time present & the posterity, to know the manifold de•rimetes and discommodities receiued by these friers, and to know what benefit God hath done for vs in vnburdening the Church of this monstrous generation: * And especially because the booke of Armachanus is rare otherwise to be found, intituled, Defensorum Curatorum: I haue briefly therfore contracted out of the same, certaine of his reasons, such as semed most apperteyning and most worthy of noting.

And first, alleading the authority of Innocent the 4. He importeth foure incōueniēces rising by the friers, whibe these: Contempt of the people against their ordinaries, decreasing of deuotion, taking away of shame frō the people by confessing to the friers, deteining of oblations, such as the people are wont to geue at their confessiō & burials, and which by right belong to the parish churches.

Item, by the sayd priuiledges of the Popes, graunted to the friers, * many other great enormities do rise. As first because therby, the true shepheards do not know the faces of their flocke.

Item, * by the occasion of these priuiledges, geuen to the Friers, great contention, and sometimes blowes rise betwene the friers and secular curates, about tythes, impropertions, and other auayles.

Item, by the occasion of the foresayd priuiledges, diuers yoūg men as well in vniuersities as in their fathers houses, are allured craftely by the friers their confessors, to enter their orders: from thence afterward, they can not get out though they would, to the great grieve of their parentes, and no lesse repentaunce to the young men themselues. The example wherof, Armachanus in the sayd hys treatise inferreth, of a certayne substantiall English man being with him at his Inne in Rome: who hauing a sonne at the vniuersity of Oxford, which was entised by y^e friers to enter into their order, could by no meanes after release him out. But whē his father & his mother woulde come vnto him, they could not be suffered to speake with him, but vnder the friers custody. Wheras the Scripture commaundeth plainly, * that who so stealeth any man & selleth him (being therof conuicted) shal be put to death. Exod. 21. And for the same cause, the father was compelled to come vp to Rome to seek remedy for his sonne. And thus sayth Armachanus, it may appeare what damage and detrimets come, by these friers vnto the common people.

And no lesse inconuenience and daunger also by y^e sayd friers,* riseth to the Clergy: for so much, as lay men seeyng their childrē thus to be stollē frō thē in the vniuersities by y^e friers, do refuse therfore to send thē to their studies: Rather willing to keep them at home to their occupation, or to folow the plough, then so to be circumuēted and defeated of their sonnes at the vniuersity, as by dayly experiēce (sayth he) doth manifestly appeare. For where as in my time (sayth Armachanus) there were in the vniuersity of Oxford 30000.* studentes: now are there not to be founde 6000. The occasion of which so great decay, is to be ascribed to no other cause, but to this circumuention onely of the friers aboue mentioned.

Ouer and besides this,* an other incōuenience as great or greater, the said Armachanus inferred to proceed by the friers, through the decay of doctrine, and knowledge in all maner faculties and liberall sciences, which thus he declared. For that these begging friers through their priuileges obtained of the Popes, to preach, to heare confessions, and to bury: and through theyr charters of improperatiōs, did grow therby to such great riches and possessions by theyr begging, crauing, catching and intermeddling with church matters, that no booke could stirre of any science, either of Diuinity,* law, or Phisicke, but they were both able and ready to buy it vp. So that euery couent hauing a great library full stuffed and furnished with all sortes of bookes, and being so many couents within the realme, & in euery couent so many friers increasing dayly more and more: by reason therof, it came to passe, that very few books or none at all remayne for other students.* Which by his owne experiēce he thus testifieth, saying: that he himselfe sent forth to the vniuersity foure of his owne Priests or chaplaynes, who sending him word agayne y^t they could neither finde the Bible, nor any other good profitable booke of diuinitye meete for theyr studye, therefore were minded to returne home to their country: and one of them, he was sure, was returned by this time agayne.

Furthermore, as he hath proued hetherto, the Friers to be hurtful both to the laity,* and to the clergy: so proceeding farther, he proueth them to be hurtfull also to themselues. And that in 3. poynts, as incurring the vice of disobedience agaynst God, against their owne rule: The vice of auarice: and the vice of pride. The probatiō of all which poyntes, he prosecuted in a long discourse.

Page 412First (sayth he) they are disobedient to the law of God: Thou shalt not couet thy neighbors house,* Oxe nor Asse, nor any thing that is his: In that they procure the Popes letters to preach in Churches, and to take burials from churches, with licence annexed withal to receiue the auailles which rise of the same, which properly belōgeth to the right of parish priestes.

*Item, they are disobedient to this rule of the Gospell: So do to other, as thou would haue done to thee.

Itē, they be disobediēt agaynst theyr owne rule, which being fouēded vpon straight pouerty and beggery, this licence obtained for thē to require necessary for theyr labors of the people, is repugning agaynst the same foundation.

Item, they be disobedient to the rule of the Scripture, which sayth: let no man take honor vnto him, except he be called, as Aarō, Also saith S. Paul, how shall they preach, vnlesse they be sēt. And how obserue they this rule of obedience, who professing to keepe the perfection of the Gospell, yet contrary to the Gospell, procure to thēselues priuiledges to runne before they be sent▪

Itē, to theyr own rule they are disobediēt: For where theyr chapter sayth, that if any wil take vpō them this order, & will come to our brethren: let our brethren first send them to the prouincials to be examined of the Catholicke fayth and Sacraments of the Church. &c. Cōtrary wherevnto the friers haue procured a priuiledge, that not onely the prouincials, but other inferiors also may take vnto them indifferently, whom they can catch: so farre without al examination, that almost at this day there is no notable house of friers, wherein is not either a whole, or halfe a couent of lads & boyes vnder 10. yere old, being circūuented, which neither can skill of the Creed nor Sacraments.

*Agayne, the rule of Frauncise sayth: that his brethren Obseruaunts must obserue not to preach in the Dioces of any bishop, without the consent of the Bishop: And moreouer the sayd Frauncise in his testament sayth: that if he had as much wisdomē as Salomon, and found poore secular priests in the parishes where the dwel: yet he would not presume to preach without theyr will, and also would feare, loue, & honor them, & all other as his maisters, & so they be Haecille. Against which rule, how the friers do disobey, how litle they reuerence Bishops or secular priests: what priuileges, exemptions, & immunities they procure agaynst them, the world may see and iudge.

Itē, when none may be admitted to preach, or to heare confessions, vnles they be entred into orders: and seing by the commō law of the Church, none must be admitted into holy orders, except he haue sufficient title of liuing and clothing: The friers therefore hauing no such title (being wilfull beggers) do disobey in both respects, that is, both in entring into such orders without conuenient title, and in exercising the office of preaching without such lawfull orders.

Moreouer the foresayd Frauncise in his testament cōmaundeth thus: I commaund (sayth he) firmly by vertue of obedience, to all and singular my brethren wheresoeuer they be: that none of them presume to obtayne in the court of Rome any letter or writing, either by himselfe or by any other meanes, neither for the Church nor for any other place nor vnder any coulour of preaching, nor yet for the persecuting of their owne bodyes &c. Against which testamen of Francise, the Franciscanes in procuring theyr priuiledges from the Bishop of Rome, haue incurred manifest disobediēce, as all the world may see. Neither will this obiectiō serue them, because the Pope hath dispensed with Francise rule. For if the testament of Francise as he sayth came from GOD, (and so should God haue three testaments) how then can the Pope repeale his precept, or dispense with his rule, when by the rule of the law. Par in parem non habet imperium?

*Secondly, concerning the vice of auarice, manifestly it may be proued vpon them (sayth Armachanus) for els, seing so many charges belong to the office of a secular parish priest, as to minister the Sacrament at Easter, to visit the sicke with extreme vnction to baptise childrē, to wed, with such other wherein standeth as great deuotion: how then happeneth that these friers making no labor for these, onely procure to thēselues priuiledges to preach in churches, to heare confessions, and to receiue licence to bury frō parish churches but because there is lucre and gayne in these to be looked for, in the other is none?

Which also may appere by this: for otherwise if it were for mere deuotion onely,* that they procure licence to bury from parish churches, and to preach: why then haue they procured with all, licence to take offerings? oblations and legacies for theyr funerals. And for theyr preaching, why haue they annexed also licence to require and take of the people necessaryes for theyr labor, but onely auarice is the cause thereof.

Likewise for hearing of confessiōs: whē all good men haue enough to know theyr owne faults,* and nothing left to heare the faultes of other: It is probably to be supposed by this theyr priuilege of hearing all mens confessiōs, that they would neuer haue bene so desirous of procuring that priuilege, were it not that these friers did fele some sweetnes and gayne to hang vpon the same.

Item, where the rule of frier Francise forbiddeth them to company with any womē, to enter into Monasteries, to be Godfathers and Gossips to men and women:* how commeth it, that they contrary to theyr rule, enter into the secret chambers of Queenes and other women: and made to know the most secret counsels of theyr doings, but that auarice and commodity haue so blinded their eyes, & styrred theyr hartes.

Thirdly,* that the friers fall into the vice of pride & ambition, the sayd Armachanus proued thus.

To seek or to procure any high place in the Church, is a poynt of pride & ambition. Chrisost. in opere perfecto: Nūquam sine ambitione desideratur primatus in Ecclesia.

The friers se•k and procure a high place in the church.

Ergo. the friers be proud and ambitious.

The Minor he proueth: To haue the state of preaching and hearing confessions, is in the church a state of honor.

The friers seeke and haue procured the state of preaching and hearing confessions.

Ergo, The friers seeke and procure an high place in the Church. &c.

His third conclusion was,* that the Lord Christ in his humane conuersation was alwayes poore, not for that he loued or desired pouerty for it self. &c, Wherin this is to be noted, that Armachanus differed not frō the friers in this that Christ was poore, and that he loued pouerty: but here in stood the difference, in maner of louing, that is whether he loued pouerty for it self, or not. Wherin the foresayd Armachanus vsed foure probations.

First, forsomuch as to be poore, is nothing els but to be miserable: and seing no man coueteth to be in misery for it self: Therefore he concluded, that Christ desired not pouerty for it selfe.

His second reason was deriued out of Aristotle. Nothing (sayth he) is to be loued for it selfe,* but that frō which (all commodities being seclused which folow therupō) is voluntarily sought and desired. But take from pouerty al respect of cōmodities folowing y^e same, it would be sought neither of God nor mā, Ergo, he cōcluded, Christ loued not pouerty for it selfe.

Thirdly agayne: No effect of sinne, said he, is to be loued for it selfe. But pouerty is the effect of sinne. Ergo, pouerty was not loued of Christ for it selfe.

Fourth, Item, no priuation of the thing that is good, is to be loued for it selfe. Pouerty is the priuation of the thing that is good, that is of riches (for God hymselfe is principally rich:) Ergo, pouerty for it selfe was not loued of Christ.

The fourth conclusion was, that Christ our Lord and Sauior did neuer begge wilfully.* Which he proued by son'dry reasons.

1. First, for that Christ in so doing should breake the law, which sayth: Thou shalt not couet thy neighbors house, his wife, his seruāt, his maid, his oxe, his asse, or any thing that is his, Exod. 20. In the daunger of which cōmaundement, he that beggeth voluntarily must needs incurre.

2. Item, if Christ had begged voluntarily he should haue committed agaynst an other cōmaundement, which sayth. There shalbe no begger, nor needy person among you &c. Deut. 6.

3. Item, Christ in so doing should haue transgressed the Emperours law, vnder which he would himselfe be subiect (as appeareth by geuing, & bidding tribute to be geuē to Cesar) forasmuch as the same Emperours law sayth. There shall no valiant begger be suffered in the City.

4. Item, if Christ had bene a wilfull begger, he had broke the law of louing his neighbor: whō he had vexed, hauing no need. For who so without need asketh or craueth of his neighbor, doth but vex him, in such sort as he would not be vexed himselfe. Which Christ would neuer do.

5. Item. if Christ had begged wilfully, he had moued slaūder therby to hys owne Gospell, which he with miracles did confirme. For then they that saw his miracle in feeding 5000. in wildernes, would haue thought much with them selues how that miracle had bene wrought, if he in feeding other, either could not, or would not feed himselfe.

Page 4136. Item, if Christ had begged wilfully, then he had done that which himselfe condemneth by Paule: for so we read. 1. Timo. 6. That Paule condemneth them, which esteme piety to be gayne and lucre. Which all they do that vnder the coulour of piety, hunt or seeke for gayne, when otherwise they need not.

7. Item, if Christ had begged willfully, he had offended in declaring an vntruth, in so doing. For he that knoweth in his mind, that he needeth not in deed that thing whych in word he asketh of other: Declareth in himselfe an vntruth as who in word pretendeth to be otherwise then he is in very deede, which Christ without doubt neuer did nor would euer do,

8. Item, if Christ had begged wilfully, that is, hauing no •eue•nced thereunto: then had he appeared cither to be an hipocrite, seeming to be that he was not, and to lacke whē he did not: or els to be a true begger in very deed, not able to suffice his necessity. For he is a true begger in deed, whiche being constrainned by mere necessity, is forced to aske of other that which he is not able to geue to himself. But neither of these two agreeth in Christ.

*9. Item, if Christ had begged wilfully, then why did Peter rebuke the mother of S. Clement his disciple, finding her to stād amōg the beggers, whō he thought to be strōg enough to labor with her handes for her liuing: If she in so doing had folowed the example of Christ:

*10. Item, if Christ had begged wilfully: And if the Friers do tightly define perfectiō of the Gospell by wilful pouerty: thē was Clement S. Peters successor to blame, which labored so much to remoue away beggery and pouerty frō among al them, that were conuerted to the faith of Christ: and is specially for the same commended of the Church:

*11. Agayne, why did the sayd Clement, writing to Iames Byshop of Ierusalem, commaund so much to obey the doctrine and examples of the apostles: who as he sheweth in that Epistle, had no begger nor needy person amōgst thē, If Christian perfection (by the friers Philosophy) stadeth in wilfull beggery?

12. Item, if Christ the high priest had begged wilfully, thē did holy Church erre wittingly, which ordeined that none without sufficient title of liuing & clothing, should be admitted to holy orders. And moreouer, when it is seyde in y^e canonically decrees, that the bishop or clerke that beggeth, bringeth shame vpon the whole order of the clergy.

13. Item: if Christ had wilfully begged, then the example of wilful pouerty had perteyned to the perfection of Christian life, which is contrary to the old law: which commaūdeth the Priestes (which liued then after the perfection of the law) to haue possessions and tithes, to keep them from beggery.

14. Item, if Christ did wilfully begge, then beggery were a poynt of christian perfection. And so the Church of God should erre, in admitting such patrimonies and donatiōs geuen to the Church, and so in taking from the Prelates their perfection.

15. Agayne, what will these friers which put their perfection in begging, say to Melchisedech: who without begging or wilfull pouerty, was the high Priest of God, and King of Salem, and prefigured the order and Priesthoode of Christ?

16. And if beggery be such a perfection of the Gospell (as the friers say) how cōmeth it, that the holy Ghost geuen to the Apostles, which should lead them into all trueth: tolde them no word of this beggerly perfection, neither is there any word mentioned therof through the whole Testamēt of God.

17. Moreouer, where the Prophet sayth, I neuer did see the lust man forsaken, nor his seed go begging their bread: How standeth this with the iustice of Christ, which was most perfectly iust, if he should be forsaken, or his seede goe begge their bread? And thē how agreeth this with the abominable doctrine of friers Franciscan, which put theyr perfection in wilfull begging?

18. Finally, doe wee not read that Christ sent his disciples to preach without scripp or wallet, and bid them salute no man by the way? Meaning that they should begge nothing of no man? Did not the same Christ also labor with his handes, vnder Ioseph? S. Paule likewise did he not labour with his handes, rather then he would burden the Church of the Corinthians? And where now is the doctrine of the friers, which putteth state of perfectiō in wilfull begging.

*The fift conclusion of Armachanus agaynst the friers was this: that Christ neuer taught any man wilfully to begge, which he proued thus. It is written Actes. 1. Christ began to do and to teach. If Christ therfore, which did neuer wilfully beg himselfe, as hath bene proued, had taught men otherwise to do, then his doing and teaching had not agreed together.

Item, if Christ which neuer begged himselfe wilfully, had taught men this doctrine of wilfull begging contrary to his owne doing: he had geuen suspition of his doctrine, and ministred slaunder of the same; as hath bene proued •t the fourth conclusion before.

Moreouer in so reaching, he had taught cōtrary to the Emperors iust law, which •xpresly forbiddeth the same.

The sixt conclusion of Armachanus agaynst the Friers was,* that our Lord Iesus Christ teacheth vs, that we should not beg wilfully, which he proueth by seuē or eight reasons.

First where it is written Luke. 14. when thou makest a feast call the poore, weake, lame, and blind: and thou shalt be blessed, for they haue not wherewith to reward thee agayne.

To this also pertaineth y^t decree of y^t apostle. 1. Thes. 3. He that will not worke let him not eat. Furthermore, the same Apostle addeth in the same place: For you haue vs for exāple how we were burdenous to nomā, neither did we eat our bread freely: but with labor and wearines, toiling both day and night, and all because we would not burthē you. &c.

4. Item, where we read in the scripture, the slouthful in ā reprehended, Pro. 6. why slepest thou O sluggard, thy pouerty and beggery is comming vpon thee like an armed man. &c. And agayne in the same booke of Prouerbs. The slouthfull man (sayth the scripture) for colde would not go to the plough, therfore he shal beg in sommer, and no man shall geue bun. &c. Also in the sayd booke of Prouerb. last chapter. The diligent labouring woman is commended, whose fingers are exercised about the rocke & spindle. And all these places make agaynst the wilfull begging of sturdy Friers.

5. Item,* Frier Frances their owne founder in his owne testament sayth: And I haue laboured with mine owne hands, and will labor, and will that all my frierlings shall labor and litle of theyr labor, wherby they may support thē selues in an honest meane. And they that cannot worke, let them learne to worke, not for any couetousnesse to receiue for theyr labor, but for example of good workes, and to auoyd idlenesse. And when the price of theyr labor is not geuen them, let them resort to the Lords table, & aske their almes from dore to dore. &c. Thus much in his Testamēt. And in his rule he sayth: Such brethren to whom y^e Lord hath geuen the gift to labor, let them labour faithfully and deuoutly. &c. wherfore it is to be maruelled, how those friers with their wilfull begging, dare transgresse the rule & obedience of Frier Frauncis their great graundfathers testament.

6. Item, if Christ at any time did beg or did lacke, it was more because he would vse a miracle in his own persō, thē because he would beg wilfully: as when he sent Peter to y^t sea to finde a groat in the fishes mouth. which thing yee he thought rather to do, thē to beg the groat of the people, which he might soone haue obtained.

7. Item, by diuers other his examples he seineth to teach the same as where he sayth: The workmā is worthy of his hier. Also the workeman is worthy of his meate. Math. 10. Luke 10. And whē he spake to Zache, that he would turne into his house. And so likewise in Bethany and all other places he euer vsed rather to burden his frends thē to beg of other, vnacquaynted.

8. Item, with playn precept thus he sendeth forth his disciples, willing them not to go from house to house, Luke. 10. so as Friers vse now to goe. Many other Scriptures there be, which reprove begging: as where it is sayd. The foot of a foole is swift to the house of his neighbor, Eccl. 29. And in an other place: My childe (sayth he) see thou want not is the tune of thy life, for better it is to die then to lack. Eccl. 21.

9. Itē, where Christ counselling the young man, had him go and sel that he had and geue to the poore and folow him if he would be perfect: doth not there cal him to wilful beg'ging, but calleth him to folow him, which did not beg wilfully.

The seuenth conclusion of Armachanus is: that no wise nor true holy man can take vpon him wilfull pouerty to be obserued alwayes,* which he proueth by foure reasons.

First, that wilfull beggery was reprobued both by the doctrine of Christ and of the Apostles, as in the conclusion before hath bene declared.

2. Item, a man in taking vpon hym wilfull beggery, in so doing should lead himselfe into temptation, which were agaynst the Lordes prayer. For as muche as Salomon Page 414 Prouerb. 30. saith:* O Lord, beggery and great riches geue me not, but onely sufficiency to liue vpon: least if I haue to much, I be driuen to deny thee, & say: who is the Lord. Agayne, if I haue to litle, I be forced thereby to steale, and to p•riure the name of my God. Wherefore sayth Eccle. 27. For need many haue offēded. And therefore they that chuse wilfull pouerty, take to them great occasion of temptatiō.

3. Item, they that take wilfull pouerty vpon them when they need not induce themselues voluntarily to break the commaudemēt of God: Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house. &c. Agayne, where it is commaunded, there shalbe no begger among you. &c.

4. Item, he that taketh vpon him needles and wilfully to beg, maketh himselfe vnapt to receiue holy orders, hauing (as is sayd) no sufficient title thereunto, according to the lawes of the Church.

*The 8. conclusiō of this matter: That it is not agreing to the rule of the Friers obseruant, to obserue wilfull beggery. which (saith he) may be proued, for that Frier Frances, both in his rule and in his Testamēt, being left to his Franciscans, doth plainly preferre labor before begging.

*The 9. and last conclusion of this matter is. That the bull of pope Alexander the 4. which condemneth the booke of the maisters of Paris, impugneth none of these conclusions premised. For the prooffe therof, he thus inferred.

1. First, that Pope Iohn the 24. in his constitutiō, beginning thus: *Quia quorundam, affirmeth expresly, how Pope Nicholas the 3. reuoked and called backe the sayd Bull of Pope Alexander the 4. and all other writings of his: touching all such articles, which in the same foresayd constitution of this Pope Iohn be cōreined and declared. Wherin also is declared, how strayt the pouerty of the friers ought to be, which they call wilfull pouerty.

2. Item, it is manifest and notorious to all men, how the sayd Pope Nicholas the 3. in his declaratiō sheweth, how the friers both ought to labor with their handes and how moreouer the sayd Friers ought not to preach within the dioces of any bishop, wheresoeuer they be resisted. Which being so, the conclusion appereth, that the bull of Pope Alexander the 4. as touching these articles, is voyde and of none effect. Beside the which articles, there is nothing els in the sayd Bull of Alexander (that I remember) which unpugneth any of these conclusions premised.

*Many things mo(sayd he) I had beside these, both to obiect and to aunswere again to the same: and to confirme more surely and firmly these my reasons and assertions premised. But I haue already to much wried your holynesse, and your reuerend Lordships here present. Wherefore I conclude and humbly and deuoutly beseech you, according to my former petition premised in the beginning of this matter: that you iudge not after the outward face, but iudge ye true iudgement. Iohn. 7. Ex libro Armachani, cui titulus Defensorium Curatorum.

Notes to be obserued in this former Oration of Armachanus.

*BY this Oratiō of Armachanus the learned Prelate, thus made before Pope Innocent and his Cardinals, diuers and sundrye thinges there be for the vtility of the Church worthy to be obserued. First what troubles and vexations came to the Church of Christ by these Friers. Also what persecution foloweth after by the meanes of them, *agaynst so many learned mē & true seruants of Christ. Furthermore, what repugnance and contrariety was among the Popes, & how they could not agree among themselues about the Friers. Fourthly what pestiferous doctrine, subuerting welneare the testament of Iesus Christ. Fiftly what decay of ministers in Christes church, as appereth pag. 411. Sixtly, what robbing and circumuenting of mens children, as appeareth, pag. 411. Seuently, what decay of vniuersities, as appeareth by Oxforde, pag. 411. Eightly, what damage to learning, and lacke of books to students came by these friers, as appeareth pag. 411. Ninthly, to what pride vnder coulour of feined humility to what riches, vnder dissimuled pouerty they grew vnto, here is to be seene. In so much that at length through theyr subtle & most daungerous hipocrisy they crept vp to be Lordes, Archbishops, Cardinals & at last also, Chauncelors of realmes, yea and of most secret counsell with king and queenes, as appeareth pag. 411.

*All these things wel cōsidered, now remaineth in the church to be marked: that forsomuch as these Friers (with theyr new foūd testament of Frier Fraunces) not beeing contented with the testamēt of God in his sonne Christ, began to spring the same time, when as Satan was prophesied to be let loose, by the order of the Scripture, whether therefore it is to be doubted, that these Friers make vp the body of Antechrist, which is prophesied to come in the Church, or not: so much more to be doubted, because who so li•t to trie shall finde, that of all other enemies of Christ, of whom some be manifest, some be priuy, all be together cruel: yet is there no such sort of enemies which more sleightly deceiue the simple christian, or more deeply drowneth him in damnation, then doth this doctrine of the Friers.

But of this Oration of Armachanus enough.* which Oration what successe it had with the Pope, by story it is not certain. By his own life declared, it appereth, that the Lord so wrought, that his enemies did not triumph ouer him. Notwithstāding, this by story appereth, that he was 7. or 8. yeares in banishment for the same matter, & there died in the same at Auiniō, Of whom a certayne Cardinal hearing of his death openly protested, that the same day, a mighty pillar of Christes church was fallen.

After the death of Armachanus,* the Friers had contētion likewise with the monkes of Benedictes order about the same yeare, 1360. and so remoued theyr cause both against the monkes and agaynst the vniuersity of Oxford, vnto the court of Rome, wherin seyth the author, they lacked an other Richard. Ex Botonero. By this appeareth to be true,* which is testified in the first tome of Wald. that lōg debate continued betwene the friers and the vniuersity of Oxford: Against whom first stood Robert Brosted bishop of Lincolne aboue mentioned: Then Seuallus of Yorke. Afterward Ioannes Bachothorpe, and now this Armachanus, of whom here presently we entreate. And after hym agayne Iohn Wickliffe, of whom (Christ willing) we will speake hereafter. Ex Waldeno. Against this foresayd Armachanus wrote diuers Friers, Roger Conaway a Franciscan, Iohn Heyldeshā Carmelite, Balfridus Hardby frier Augustine. Also frier Engelbert a Dominican, in a booke intituled, Defensorium priuilegiorum, and diuers other. I credibly heare of certayne olde Irish Bibles translated long since into the Irish tounge,* which if it be true, it is not other like but to be the doing of this Armachanus. And thus much of this learned prelate and Archbishop of Ireland, a man worthy for his christian zeale of immortall cōmendation.

After the death of this Innocent, next was poped in y^t sea of Rome,* pope Urbane the fift, who by the fathers side was an englishman.* This Urbane had bene a long wayter in the court of Rome: and when he saw no promotion would light vpon him, complayning to a certayn frend of his, made to him his mone, saying:* That he thought verily, if all the Churches of the world should fall, yet none would fall in his mouth. The which frend after seing him to be Pope, and inthronised in his threefold crowne, commeth to him, & putting him in remembrance of his words to him before, sayth: that where his holynesse had moned his fortune to him, that if all the Churches in the world would fall, none would fall vpō his head: Now (sayth he) god hath otherwise so disposed, that all the churches in the world are fallen vpon your head. &c.

This Pope mayntayned and kindled great wars in Italy, sending Egidius his Cardinall and Legate, and after him Arduinus a Burgundian his legate and Abbot with great puissaunce and much mony agaynst sundry cities in Italy:* By whose meanes, the townes and Cittyes which before had broken frō the bishop of Rome were oppressed: also Bernabes & Baleaceus princes of Millam, vanquished.* By whose example other being sore feared, submitted themselues to the Church of Rome. And thus came vp that wicked church to her great possessiōs, which her patrons would needes father vpon Constantine the godly Emperor.

In the time of this Pope Urbane the 5. and in the second yeare of his raign, about the beginning of the yere of our Lord. 1364. I finde a certayne Sermon of one Nicolas Drem, made before the Pope and his Cardinalies on Christmas euen. In the which Sermon, the learned man doth worthely rebuke the prelates and priests of his time, declaring their destruction not to be farre of, by certayne signes taken of their wicked and corrupt life. All the sayings of the Prophets spoken agaynst the wicked priestes of the Iewes,* he doth aptly apply against the clergy of his time, comparing the Church then present to the spirituall strumpet spoken of in the 16. of the Prophet Ezechiel. And proueth in conclusion the clergy of the church then, to be so much worse then the old Synagoge of the Iewes, by how much it is worse to sell y^t church & Sacraments, thē to suffer doues to be solde in the church. with no lesse iugement also and learning he answereth to the old and false obiection of the papists: who albeit they be neuer so wicked, yet thinke themselues to be the church which the Lord cannot forsake. All which thinges to y^t entent they may the better appeare in his owne words, I haue thought here to translate Page 415 and exhibite the Sermon as it was spoken before the Pope.

A copy of a Sermon made before Pope Vrbane. 5. the fourth sonday in Aduent 1364. by Nicholas Orem.

*IVxta est salus mea, vt veniat, & iustitia. &c. That is: My sauing health is neare at hand to come, and my righteousnes to be reuealed. &c. Esay. 56. After the sentence of S. Paule Rom. 2. and in diuers other places, before the Natiuity of Christ: the whole world was deuided into two sorts of men, the Iewes and Gentils. The Iewes who wayted for the opening of the dore of Paradise, by the bloud of the Sauior to come. The Gentiles who yet sitting in darcknesse were to be called to light, and to be iustified by fayth, as is written. Rom. 5.

This saluation pertaining both to the Iew and Gentile. God promised before time to the Fathers by the Prophets, to stirre vp the desire thereof in their hartes the more: and to encrease theyr firme hope and fayth in the same. As first in Mich. 6. the voyce of the Lord cryeth: Health and saluation shall be to all men which feare my name. And Esay. 46. I will geue in Sion saluation, and in Ierusalem my glory. &c. with diuers such other places like. And forsomuch as hope in many times which is deferred, doth afflict the soule, and conceiueth wearinesse of long deferring: He therefore prophesying of the nearenesse of the commying thereof sayeth moreouer. Esay. 14. his time is neare at hande to come. Also Abacuc. 2. He will come and will not tary, with many such other places mo[•]. So then the holy Fathers being in Limbo, looked & hoped that he should bring out them that sate bound, and which in the house of prison sat in darcknesse, as is read Esay. 41. Then the time drew on in which came the fulnesse of the Gentiles, and in which the Lord would declare the riches of this mistery being hidden from the world, and from generations. Col. 1. Wherefore the Lord in this text doth both certifie our fathers of the comming of our Sauior,* and doth comfort them touching the nearenesse thereof, and also teacheth the iustification of the Gentils by fayth approching now neare at hand, according to the words of my text, Iuxta est salus mea. &c. Which words were fulfilled thē, what time the Lord did manifest his saluation, and did reueale his righteousnes in the sight of all the Gentiles. And is deuided in 3. partes. Of which the first speaketh of the nearenesse of his comming,* where is sayd, Iuxta est salus. &c. The second concerneth the mistery of the Aduent of Christ and his incarnation,* where he sayth: Vt veniat. &c. Thirdly is considered the seuerity of God,* his terrible reuenging iudgement to be reuealed, where he sayth: Vt reueletur. &c. which is to be expounded of his primitiue iustice: whereof speaketh Amos the 5.* saying: And iudgement shall be reuealed like a sloud, and righteousnesse like a strong stream. Wherefore for our contēplation let vs receiue with ioy the solemnities of his holy vigile, the word I say of God the father, that is, Christ. To whom it is sayd Esay. 49. I haue geuen thee to be a light to the Gentiles, and to be my saluation, through the ends of the world. Agayne Esay. 46. My saluation shall not slacke. &c.

As touching the nearenes thereof, it is in these dayes opened to vs by the gospell, where we read in S. Math. When the virgine Mary was dispoused vnto Ioseph before they did come together: she was found with childe by the holy Ghost. By this it was euident to vnderstand, that our sauior ought shortly to proceed out of the chaste wombe of the virgin, according as the Prophet dyd foretell, saying: Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a sonne. &c. For like as the grape when it waxeth great and full, is neare to the making of wine, and the floure when it shooteth abroad, it hasteth to the fruit: So the saluation of the world in the swelling and growing of the virgins wombe, began to draw nigh to mankinde. For then appeared the grace and benignity of our Sauior, when his mother was found to haue in her wombe by the holy Ghost as is declared in that as followeth by the Angell saying: for that which is borne of her, is of the holy Ghost.

Touching the 2. part of that which is sayd, vt veniat: this may be applyed to the contemplation of the mistery of Christes comming in the flesh.* Wherof speaketh Aggeus the Prophet 2. He shal come, who is desired and looked for of all nations. &c. Albeit the same also may be applied to the second Aduent, spoken of the 3. of Esay. The Lord shall come to iudgemēt &c. In memoriall wherof, the 4. sonday was dedicate, in the olde time of the fathers. And of this day of iudgement is writtē in the Prophet Sophon. cap. 1. The day of the Lord is neare:.* great & mighty it is approaching at hande & wondrous shoort. &c. And albeit not in it selfe, yet it may be expōded in tribulatiōs that go before, as preambles vnto the same: as Greg. saith: The last tribulation is preuēted with many & sundry tribulations going before, although the end of al be not yet.

Wherefore now cōming to the 3. part of my sermō or the am,.* let vs see of those tribulations that go before the last comming of Christ, if there be any such tribulation approaching nigh at hand, wherof this last part of my theame may be verified, where is said: vt reueletur, that my righteousnes shalbe reuealed to wit the righ|teousnes primitiue, that righteousnesse may be brought, and the Prophecy of Daniel fulfilled Dan. 9. Concerning which matter. 4. thinges here come in order to be declared.

First concerning the reuealing of tribulation,.* according to that part of my theame. Vt reueletur. &c.

Secondly,.* concerning the nearenes of the tribulatiō cōming according to the part of my theame. Quia iuxta est. &c.

Thirdly,.* of the false opinions of some, vpon this part of my theame. Vt veniat &c.

Fourthly,.* what meanes and consultation we ought to take. Vt iuxta est salus.

As for the first,* it is so notorious and so commō in the scriptures that the church should suffer and abide tribulation, that I need not here to stand in alleading any thing touching either the causes to be weid, or the terme to be coniectured thereof. As concerning the which causes,* I will geue 2. rules to be noted before, for the better opening of that to follow. The first rule is, that by the 2. kingdomes of the nation of Hebrues, which were in the olde time, to wit, by the kingdome of Israel, whose head was Samaria, is signified in the prophets the erroneous sinagoge: And by the second kingdome of Iuda, of whose stock came Christ, whose head metropolitane was Ierusalem, is signified the true Church.* And this rule is not mine, but is an authentike glose of S. Ierome, and also is the rule of Origene in the last Homely vpon the olde testament, and is approved by the church.

The second rule is,* that by the brodell house and fornication mentioned in the Prophets: is signified simony, and abused dispēsations, and promotions of persons vnworthy, for lukers sake, or els for any other partiall fauour, whiche by vnlawfull wayes, by al lawes of the world to come to office and honor. Merx dicitur namque a merendo, that is, for gaine or price is deriued of gaining: For the which gayne or price, that is solde which by nature ought not to be solde. Therefore, to geue any thing for respect of gayne or hier, which ought to bee geuen freely for vertues sake, is a kinde of spirituall corruption & as a man would say,* an whorish thing, wherof the prophet Esay, complayneth speaking of Ierusalem, and saying: The Citty which once was faythfull and full of iudgement,* how is it now become an whorish city? And in like maner Osee also the prophet. chap. 9. Ierusalem, thou hast fornicated and gone an whoring frō thy God. Thou hast loued like an harlot, to get gayne in euery barne of corne. And in many other places of Scripture, where fornication can not be otherwise expounded.

These two rules thus premised, now let vs marke the Scriptures, and according to the same iudge of the whole state of the Church, both that is past, and that is to come: first intreating of the causes of tribulation to come: secōdly of the vicinity of time of the sayd tribulation to come.

And first concerning the state of the Church,* & of causes of tribulation. Thus sayth the Lord in the prophet Ezechiel. 16. cap. speaking to the Church vnder the name of Ierusalem. In the day of thy byrth I came by thee, and saw thee troden downe in thine owne bloud.* &c. Here he speaketh of the time of the martyrdome of the Church. Then it followeth: After this thou wast clensed frō thy bloud, that wast growne vp, & waxen great: thē washed I thee with water, I purged thy bloud from thee (speaking of ceasing of persecution) I annoynted thee with oyle,* I gaue thee chaunge of rayments, I girded thee with white silke, I decked thee with costly apparel, I put ringes vpon thy fingers, a chayn about thy neck, Spangs vpon thy forehead, and Earinges vpon thine eares. Thus wast thou deckt with siluer & gold, & a beautifull crowne set vpon thine head. Meruelous goodly wast thou & beautifull, euen a very queen wast thou: For thou wast excellēt in my beuty, which I put vpon thee, sayth the Lord God. &c. This prophecy or rather history speaketh of and declareth,* the prosperity of the church.

And now heare the corruptiō and transgression of the church, for so it followeth: But thou hast put confidence in thine own beauty, and playd the harlot, when thou haddest gotten thee a name. Thou hast committed whoredome with all that went by thee, and hast fulfilled their desires: Yea thou hast taken thy garments of diuers coulors and decked thine altars therwith, whervpon thou mightest fulfill thy whoredome of such a fashion as neuer was done, nor shall be. Which whoredome can in no wise be expounded for carnall, but spirituall whoredome. And therefore, see how liuely he hath paynted out the corruption and falling of the Church.

And therefore followeth now the correction and punishmēt of the Church.* It followeth: Beholde, I stretch out my hand ouer thee, and will diminish thy store of foode, and deliuer thee ouer into the willes of the Philistines, and of such as hate thee: And they shall breake downe thy stues, and destroy thy brodell houses (that is, the place wherein thou didst exercise this wickednesse) they shall strippe thee out of thy clothes: All thy fayre and beautifull iuels shall they take from thee, and so let thee sit naked and bare.* &c.

Here is playnely to be seene what shall happen to the church Page 416 and followeth more in the sayd chapter. Thine eldest sister is Samaria, she and her daughters vpon thy left hand: But the yongest sister that dwelleth on thy right hand is Sodoma with her daughters, whose sinnes were these: pride, fulnesse of meate, aboundāce and idlenesse,* neither retched they theyr hand to the poore. And yet neither Sodoma thy sister with her daughters,* hath done so euill as thou and thy daughters: Neither hath Sumaria (that is the Sinagoge) done half of thy sinnes, yea thou hast exceeded them in wickednesse.* Take therefore and beare thine owne confusion. &c. Agayne in the 23. chapter of Ezechiel. After the Prophet had described at large the wickednesse, corruption, and punishment of the Sinagoge, turning to the Church, sayth: And when her sister saw this,* the raging and was madde with lust, loue of riches, and folowing voluptuousnes. Her fornication and whoredome she committed with Princes and great Lordes, clothed with all maner of gorgeous apparell:* so that her puppes were brused, and her brestes were marred. And then speaking of her punishment, sayth: Then my hart forsooke her, like as my hart was gone from her sister also. And moreouer repeating againe the cause therof, addeth: Thy wickednesse and thy fornications hath wrought thee all this. &c.

The like we finde also in Esay, Jeremy, Ezechiel and in all the other Prophetes, who prophesying all together in one meaning: and almost in one maner of wordes:* Do conclude with a full agreement and prophecye to come, that the Church shall fall, and then bee punished for her great excesses, and to bee vtterly spoiled except she repent of all her abominations. Whereof speaketh Oseas chap. 2. Let her put away her whoredome out of her sight; and her aduoutry from her brestes, least I strip her naked and set her euen as she came naked into the world (that is in her primitiue pouerty) So if she do not it,* it shal folow of her as in the prophet Nahum, chap. 3. For the multitude of the fornication of the fayre and beautifull harlotte, which is a maister of witchcraft, yea and selleth the people through her whoredome, and the nations through her witchcraft. And followeth vpon the same: Behold I will vpon thee sayth the Lord of hostes, and will pull thy clothes ouer thy head, that thy nakednes shall appeare among the heathen, and thy shame among the kingdomes. &c.

*Wherefore by these it is to be vnderstand, that vpon this Church the primitiue iustice of God is to be reuealed hereafter. And thus much of the first of the foure members aboue fore touched.

*Now to the second member of my theame, Iuxta est: concerning the nearenesse of time. Although it is not for vs to knowe, the momēts and articles of time: yet by certaine notes and signes peraduenture it may be collected and gathered, that whiche I haue here to say. For the tractation whereof, first I grounde my selfe vpon the saying of the Apostle Paule. 2. Thessal. 2.

where he writeth: That vnlesse there come a defection first. &c. By the whiche defection. Ierome vltima quaest. ad inquisitiones Ianuarij, gathereth and expoundeth allegoricallye,* the desolation of the monarchy of Rome: Betweene the which desolation, and the persecution of the Church by Antechrist, he putteth no meane space. And now what is the state of that common wealth, if it be compared to the maiesty of that it hath bene, iudge your selues. An other glose there is that sayth, how by that defection is ment: that from the Church of Rome shall come a departing of some other Churches.

The second note and marke is this, when the Church shalbe worse in maners then was the Sinagoge: as appeareth by the ordinary glose vpon the 3. of Ieremy where it is written. The backslider Israell, may seeme iust and righteous in comparison of sinfull Iuda. That is, the Sinagoge in comparison of the Church of God Whereof writeth Origenes saying: Thinke that to be spokē of vs what the Lord sayth in Ezech. 16. Thou hast exceeded thy sister in thine iniquities. Wherefore now (to compare the one with the other) First ye know how Christ rebuked the Phariseis, who as Ierome witnesseth were then the Clergye of the Iewes: of couetousnesse, for that they suffered doues to be solde in the temple of God. Secondly, for that they did honor God with their lips and not with theyr mouth, & because they sayd, but dyd not. Thirdly, he rebuked them, for that they were hypocrites. To the first then let vs see, whether it be worse to sell both Church & Sacramentes, then to suffer doues to be solde in the Temple or not. The second, where as the phariseis were rebuked for honouring to God with their lips, and not with hart: there be some, which neither honor God with hart, nor yet with lips: And which neyther do well, nor yet say well, neither do they preach any word at all, but be domb dogs not able to barke, impudent and shameles dogs that neuer haue enough, such pastors as haue no vnderstanding declining & straying all in their owne way, euery one geuē to couetousnes from the highest to the lowest. And thirdly, as for hipocrisy there be also some, whose intollerable pride & malice is so manifest and notorious, kindled vp like a fire; that no cloake or shadow of hypocrisy can couer it, but are so past all shame, that it may be well verified of them which the Prophet speaketh. Thou hast gottē thee the face of an Harlot, thou wouldest not blush &c.

The 3. signe and token of tribulation approching neare to the Church,* may well be taken of the to much vnequall proportion seene this day in the church. Where one is hungry and statueth, another is dronke. By reason of which so great inequality, it cannot be that the state of the Church as it is now, can long endure. For like as in good harmony to make the musick perfect, is required a moderate and proportion at equality of voyces,* which if it do much exceed it taketh away all the sweet melody: So according to the sentence of the Philosopher, by to much immoderate inequality or dispariety of citizens, the cōmon wealth falleth to ruine. Cōtrary, where mediocrity, that is, where a mean inequality with some proportion is kept; that pollicy standeth firme & more sure to continue. Now among al the politicke regiments of the gentlle, I thinke none more is to be found in histories, wherin is to be seene so great and exceeding oddes, then in the pollicye of Priestes: Of whom some be so high, that they exceed all Princes of the earth, some agayne be so base, that they are vnder all rascals, so that such a pollicy or common wealth, may well be called Oligarchia.*

This may we playnely see and learne in the body of man, to the which Plutarchus (writing to Thracinius) doth semblablye compare the common wealth In the which body, if the sustināce receiued should all runne to one member, so that that member should be to much exceedingly
